PREFACE

TO THE

FIFTH VOLUME OF THE SECOND EDITION.

ALTHOUGH, from the extenſive nature of the preſent Work, I have declined being anſwerable to the Public for the ſpecific times in which the ſucceſſive parts of it ſhall appear, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that this Fifth Volume would undoubtedly have been given to the world at leaſt ſix months ſooner, had not peculiar and temporary circumſtances made ſuch demands upon the printer, and, indeed, upon printers in general, that undertakings of a permanent kind were obliged to ſubmit to a conſiderable degree of interruption. One advantage, however, ariſes even from delay, which is, that, in conſequence of new publications, ſuch a continual acceſſion is afforded to the Treaſures of Biography as contributes to render our Repoſitory more inſtructive and valuable.

This Volume preſents an additional ſet of friends, to whom, for their aſſiſtance, my thanks are particularly due. The articles of Mr. Day, Mrs. Delany, Mr. Orton under Dr. Doddridge, Archbiſhop Dolben, Profeſſor Duncan, Mr. William and Mr. John Duncombe, Dr. John Edwards, and Dr. Thomas Edwards, of Coventry, will ſhew how much I am indebted to the communications of the late Mrs. Day and William Lowndes, Eſq.; George Keate and Court Dewes, Eſqrs.; the Rev. Mr. Stedman, Vicar of St. Chad's, Shrewſbury; John Engliſh Dolben Eſq.; Mrs. Duncombe, of Canterbury, and Anthony Highmore, Eſq.; Dr. Gerard, Profeſſor of Divinity, in King's College, Aberdeen; an anonymous Benefactor, whom I have reaſon to believe to be a perſon of very high rank in the Church; and Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge, and the Rev. Peter Emans.

To Mr. Park, of Piccadilly, I muſt pay my grateful acknowledgements, not only for his information relative to Drummond of Hawthornden, but for a ſeries of Addenda to various articles in the preceding Volumes. Theſe I have thought proper to inſert ſeparately, at the end of my own Addenda.

The obligations I have received have extended not ſolely to occaſional aſſiſtance, but, in ſeveral caſes, to the gratuitous communication of entire articles. To Dr. Diſney I owe the account of the Rev. John Diſney. The Life of Humphrey Ditton was ſent me by Mr. Newton, of New Ormond Street. For the Article of Dr. Daniel Duncan, and the curious narrative of the Duncan Family, I am obliged to the Rev. Dr. John Duncan, Rector of South-Warmborough, Hants. The Account of Sir Richard Fanſhawe has been compoſed, at my particular requeſt, by Edmund Turnor, jun. Eſq. of Panton, in Lincolnſhire, who is deſcended from a branch of the family. All theſe Articles will, I doubt not, be judged to be valuable parts of the preſent volume.

The

PREFACE.

The curious Life of Sir John Faſtolff, which was elaborately, but awkwardly, written by Mr. Oldys, Richard Gough, Eſq; has condeſcended entirely to new-model. In doing this Mr. Gough has not only made uſe of Mr. Oldys's materials, but has enriched the Account with much additional information, ariſing from his ſuperior and eminent knowledge in whatever relates to Antiquarian Literature.

One Gentleman is yet remaining, to whom my acknowledgments are eſpecially due. The gentleman I mean is the Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, Rector of Whitechurch, in Shropſhire, and Prebendary of Durham, who has favoured me with the accurate and elaborate life of his great anceſtor, the Lord Chancellor Egerton. This is, in every reſpect, ſo much ſuperior to the Article concerning his Lordſhip in the former edition, that it will juſtly be regarded as an important acceſſion to the Biographia.

There is one article, from the length of which I am apprehenſive of being charged with ſome degree of partiality, ariſing from my particular profeſſion and connections. It is the life of Dr. Philip Doddridge. What I have to ſay, by way of apology, is as follows: Firſt, having been requeſted to write a life of that eminent divine, to be prefixed to the ſeventh edition of his Family Expoſitor, and this being (though with conſiderable acceſſions of new matter), in a great meaſure, an abridgment of Mr. Orton's Memoirs, I found that to abridge my own account ſtill farther would render it leſs intereſting than it is in its preſent form. Secondly, The narrative contains much information relative to the Proteſtant Diſſenters during the period in which Dr. Doddridge flouriſhed; and the hiſtory of ſects conſtitutes a part of the general eccleſiaſtical and literary hiſtory of any country. Thirdly, the Doctor is a divine who is held in ſuch great reputation by the Clergy and Laity of the Church of England, that there is reaſon to believe, that a copious account of him will be as acceptable to them as to thoſe of his own Denomination. Fourthly, There are interſperſed, through the narrative, various anecdotes reſpecting ſeveral of the moſt dignified and diſtinguiſhed ornaments of the eſtabliſhed religion. Fifthly, Nothing will be found in the article which can give juſt cauſe of offence to any party of Chriſtians. And, ſixthly, Having been a pupil of Dr. Doddridge, and highly favoured by him; and regarding his memory with the utmoſt gratitude, reverence, and affection, as my benefactor, friend, and father; if theſe circumſtances have led me aſtray, it can only be ſaid, that the feelings of the heart have been ſuperior to the dictates of the underſtanding. Should theſe conſiderations not be deemed of ſufficient force to conſtitute my vindication, I ſhall patiently, and even chearfully, ſubmit to any cenſures that may be paſſed upon me.

It is with ſome degree of confidence that I offer to public inſpection a Volume which contains fifty new lives, and additions (ſeveral of them very large) to almoſt forty old articles. In ſo complicated a work, there will undoubtedly occur various errors and defects; and diverſities of judgment will be formed concerning different objects. But if, on the whole, it ſhall appear that there is not any diminution of diligence or candour in the preſent volume, and that it contains no ſmall ſtore of Hiſtorical, Biographical, Miſcellaneous, and Literary, Information, the Editor has no doubt of receiving that approbation with which the labours of himſelf and his co-adjutors have hitherto been indulged.

OF Dr. Aldrich's knowledge and taſte in building notice is taken in a Treatiſe upon the Elements of Architecture, publiſhed in 1789.

ALLEYN (Edward), p. 157.

For a very curious and accurate account of Dulwich College, and its Founder, Edward Alleyn, our Readers are referred to the Rev. Daniel Lyſons's late valuable publication, entituled, "The Environs of London," Vol. I. p. 87—106. We ſhall tranſcribe the inſcription which there is, upon a tablet of black marble, over the door, in the centre of the front building of the College:

In Alleyn's article, it is ſaid, that he was twice or three times married; and Mr. Lyſons informs us, that the tradition in the College has always been, that he had three wives; though there is no account of more than two. That he had only two wives is now aſcertained by Mr. Malone, in his Prolegomena to his late edition of Shakeſpeare. Joan Woodward was the daughter of Agnes, the widow of ——— Woodward, whom Henſlowe married after Woodward's death. Mr. Alleyn, therefore, did not marry the daughter, but the ſtep-daughter, of Henſlowe, who was one and the ſame perſon with the daughter of Woodward. Henſlowe, in the Biographia, is erroneouſly called Hinchtoe (b).

ANNESLEY (ARTHUR), Earl of Angleſey, p. 202.

The note L, the deſign of which is to deſtroy the credit of the Earl of Angleſey's memorandum concerning the Eikon Baſilike's having been written by Dr. Gauden, forms a curious inſtance of ingenious reaſoning againſt a matter of fact. It is now clearly aſcertained that Gauden was the Author of that book. In the third volume of the Clarendon State-papers are ſeveral of his letters, in which he claims the merit of having been the ſole writer of the work, and grounds upon it his title to farther promotion and favour. It does not appear that his aſſertions either were, or could, be called in queſtion. Previouſly to the publication of the Clarendon papers, we had concurred in opinion with thoſe who believed the Eikon Baſilike to be King Charles's own production. Some extracts from Biſhop Gauden's Letters, and a farther diſcuſſion of the ſubject, will more properly find a place in our addition to that prelate's article (c).

ARABELLA (STUART), p. 229.

It is aſſerted, in the original article of this lady, that ſhe was far from being either beautiful in her perſon, or from being diſtinguiſhed by any extraordinary qualities of mind, and yet ſhe met with many admirers, on account of her royal deſcent, and near relation to the Crown of England. This aſſertion, ſo diſadvantageoas to Arabella Stuart, has been laid hold of by Mr. Lodge, in his "Illuſtrations of Britiſh Hiſtory;" and, in his Remarks upon it, he hath indulged himſelf in ſome reflections, rather of a ſarcaſtic nature, on the perſons concerned in the new edition of the Biographia. But, if he had chanced to look forward to the end of the article, he would have found a note added by us, in which we have not only pointed out the error of our predeceſſor, but done full juſtice to the intellectual accompliſhments, and perſonal beauty, of the Lady Arabella. A regard to our own character has obliged us to take notice of this circumſtance, in doing which we act from no diſreſpect to Mr. Lodge; of the value and uſefulneſs of whoſe work we are entirely ſenſible (d).

BATHE (WILLIAM), p. 691.

At the beginning of this article, it is ſaid, that the family of the Bathes were heretofore of conſiderable conſequence in the counties of Dublin and Meath, and diſperſed into many branches; but that, what by rebellions, extravagance of heirs, or one misfortune or other, it has been reduced to narrow bounds, inſomuch that not one of them remains now of any rank in their country. The latter part of what is here inſerted is founded on a miſtake. It is true that the family has ſuffered much, both in its ſplendour and fortune, on account of the unhappy attachment of the principal members of it to the Roman Catholic religion, and the Houſe of Stuart. But the de Bathes have continued in regular deſcent down to this time, and have retained ſome part of their property in Ireland, eſpecially in the County of Meath.——————Till lately, they have chiefly reſided abroad; and, in a courſe of years, the original name of de Bathe was changed to Bath. James Michael de Bathe, Eſq. who is a Proteſtant, is the preſent head of the family. Having produced unqueſtionable evidence of his deſcent, in the direct male line, through ſeveral centuries, from the de Bathes, as well as from other illuſtrious anceſtors, his claim has been certified and recorded in the Heralds' office in Ireland, and acknowledged and regiſtered in the College of Arms in England. In conſequence of this, his Majeſty has been graciouſly pleaſed to grant him licence and authority to aſſume the name of de Bathe, according to the ancient cuſtom of the family. This grant appeared in the London Gazette, of March 26, 1793, and is as follows:

"Whitehall, March 26.

"The King has been pleaſed to grant to James Michael Bath, of Knightſtown, "Caſhel, and Ladyrath, in the County of Meath and Kingdom of Ireland, Eſq. now "reſident in the pariſh of St. Mary-le-Bone, in the County of Middleſex, and his "iſſue, his Royal Licence and Authority to take and uſe the name of De Bathe, as "anciently uſed by his family: and, alſo, to order that this his Majeſty's conceſſion and "declaration be regiſtered in the College of Arms."

CORRIGENDA & ADDENDA

TO THE

BAXTER (Richard), p. 22.

TO the teſtimonies ſo copiouſly given of the merit of this famous divine, we ſhall add that of Dr. Johnſon. The Doctor, in the latter part of his life, "betook himſelf," ſays Sir John Hawkins, "to the reading of books of practical divinity, and, among the reſt, the writings of Baxter, and others of the old Puritan and Nonconforming Divines. Of Baxter, he entertained a very high opinion, and often ſpoke of him to me as a man of great parts, profound learning, and exemplary piety. He ſaid, of the Office for the Communion drawn up by him and produced at the Savoy-Conference, that it was one of the fineſt compoſitions of the ritual kind he had ever ſeen, It was a circumſtance to be wondered at, that a High Churchman, ſuch as Johnſon profeſſed himſelf to be, ſhould be driven to ſeek for ſpiritual comfort in the writings of ſectaries; men whom he affected, as well to condemn for their ignorance as to hate for their principles. But, as his acquaintance with the world, and with the writings of ſuch men as Watts, Foſter, Lardner, and Lowman, increaſed, theſe prejudices were greatly ſoftened (a)."

Dr. Johnſon thought, that Baxter's "Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion" contained the beſt collection of the evidences of the Divinity of the Chriſtian Syſtem. Mr. Boſwell, having aſked the Doctor what works of Richard Baxter he ſhould read, he ſaid, "Read any of them; they are all good (b)."

Mr. Cookſey, in his Eſſay on the Life of Lord Somers, after giving an honourable teſtimony to Mr. Baxter, as having contributed, by his inſtructions and his zeal, to promote a ſpirit of induſtry as well as of Religion at Kidderminſter, has added, that he was the author of a treatiſe, entituled, "A Shove for a heavy-a—d Chriſtian (c)." It was not to be expected that a young lawyer ſhould be much acquainted with Baxter's works. But Mr. Cookſey ought to have obtained better information before he related ſo falſe and fooliſh a ſtory. If he had read the catalogue of Mr. Baxter's writings, he would have known that no ſuch treatiſe occurs among them; and, if he had underſtood the character of this eminent Divine, he would have been ſenſible that he was wholly incapable of publiſhing any book with ſo ridiculous a title.

BECKET (Thomas), p. 114.

In 1790, was publiſhed by Mr. Berington, "The Hiſtory of the Reign of Henry the Second, and of Richard and John, his ſons; with the events of the period, from 1154 to 1216. In which the character of Thomas a Becket is vindicated from the attacks of George Lord Lyttelton." It is evident from the title-page, as well as from the nature of the ſubject, how diſtinguiſhed a part Thomas Becket muſt ſuſtain in this work. It would carry us too far to enter into the various points wherein Mr. Berington differs from Lord Lyttelton, and from other Proteſtant hiſtorians. For theſe things we ſhall refer our readers to the book itſelf, in which they will find much matter deſerving of attention, and perhaps of diſcuſſion. We ſhall content ourſelves with adding, to the characters that have already been given of Becket, in the courſe of the article, that which is drawn up by Mr. Berington.

'Thus, in the fifty-third year of his age, died Thomas à Becket, Archbiſhop of 'Canterbury, and Primate of England.—Without incurring the imputation of vain 'ſingularity, may I ſay, that the character of this man has never been fairly appreciated? 'When the catholic draws the portrait, all his virtues are emblazoned, and his blemiſhes

'are loſt in the glare of light. They view him as a ſaint; and, unfortunately, ſo im-
'poſing has that character been rendered, that the eſſential ſtrains of morality are not al'lowed to reſt upon it. Since the recent date of the Reformation, it ſhould ſeem, that 'the moral order of things has been inverted. Some virtues loſt their name; and what 'had been religious, exemplary, and perfect, above the reach of unaſſiſted nature, ceaſed
'to be ſo. The Proteſtant then ſeized the pencil, and, viewing Becket, drew a portrait
'on which were ſeen no lines of former beauty. On both ſides is much partial judg'ment. The ancient hiſtorians, I know, who lie before me, wrote with two warm an 'impreſſion. The glare of miracles, they thought, was flaſhing round them; and the 'praiſes of Rome and of Europe echoed in their ears. It is an apotheoſis which they 'celebrate. But, becauſe this is too much, can we ſit down with too little, and ſay that 'we are juſt?

'With ſome enthuſiaſm on my mind, I confeſs, I have deſcribed the conduct of 'Becket. Every where I ſaw him great as other men; and, on ſome occaſions, I ſaw him
'greater. Real excellence there may be; but it is by comparing only that we judge.
'By his ſide, the contemporary men of the day, the greateſt the æra could produce, in 'church or ſtate, loſe all their ſplendor. Alexander is an irreſolute and timid poli'tician: the prelates of England, baſely deſerting a cauſe, which their own conſciences
'held ſacred, are courtly ſycophants, and excite contempt: the ſacred college of 'Cardinals, bribed by gold, forget their dignity, and, bartering away the privileges of 'the Roman ſee, publicly poſt up their venality, and become the ſhame of Chriſten-
'dom: Henry, the lord of many people, whom Europe then admired, and whom
'poſterity has called the greateſt of Engliſh Kings, through the quarrel which him-
'ſelf provoked, is wayward, vindictive, timorous, and deceptious, never ſhewing one
'exertion which became a King, and ever indulging a train of affections, which would 'have diſgraced his loweſt vaſſal: Becket, from the beginning, is firm, dauntleſs,
'compoſed, and manly; like a deep and majeſtic river, he proceeds even in his courſe
'hardly ruffled by rocks of oppoſition, and true to the level he had taken.

'His endowments from nature were great, and he had given to them ſuch cultivation
'as the ſtate of the times permitted. It would have been well, perhaps, had he never
'ſeen Bologna, and imbibed from its maſters thoſe maxims of church-domination,
'which, though the age held them ſacred, were to him the occaſion of an unfortunate
'controverſy, and, to others, much affliction. Early in life, he was engaged in buſi-
'neſs, which made him an able negociator; and the favour of his Prince, which ſoon
'followed, raiſed him to uncommon greatneſs. But the unbounded confidence he 'enjoyed was all uſed to ennoble the ſource from which it flowed. He did not enrich 'himſelf, his family, or his retainers. All was Henry's. His influence he employed 'to gain him friends, and to ſpread his intereſt; and when he diſplayed a munificence,
'more than royal, it was his maſter's fame he looked to. The love of pleaſure,
'which in a diſſipated court can make the ſtouteſt virtue tremble, paſſed over his ſenſes
'as a gentle gale. There was a ſternneſs in his character, which would not bend to 'affections that enervate; and it is remarkable, that, even when his enemies were moſt
'numerous and malevolent, they never charged him with a ſingle vice. His ruling
'paſſions were the paſſions of a great mind, ſuch as, when circumſtances favour, lead
'men to the atchievements of patriots and of heroes; and, had Providence given
'Becket to his country but a few years later, we ſhould have ſeen him oppoſing with
'main fortitude the wild pretenſions of Rome, and, at the head of the barons, wreſting
'Magna Charta from the tyrant ſon of Henry. On ſome occaſions, I think, he was 'too acrid in his expreſſions, and too unyielding in his conduct; but, when we
'weigh his provocations, and the inceſſant ſtreſs of low oppoſition, wonder we cannot,
'and we may eaſily forgive. His private virtues were amiable. They endeared him
'to Henry, who loved him with a brother's love; nor were they ſoured, it ſeems, by
'adverſe fortune. They made him many friends; and John of Saliſbury, his ſecretary
'and companion, then deſcribes him beſt, when he checks his impetuoſity, and chides
'his too cauſtic humour, and does not give offence.

'With regard to the controverſy itſelf, he only is competent to judge, who can 'tranſport himſelf back to the times I have deſcribed. The privileges of the church,
'deemed ſacred, and, by a ſelfiſh policy, too much, at all times, confounded with 'thoſe of religion, were immediately connected with it. To require that Becket, on 'this head, ſhould not have had the notions, which Chriſtian Europe then had, is
'abſurd; and to require that, from any worldly motive, he ſhould have relinquiſhed
'them, is to think baſely of human nature. I read in all his letters the ſtrongeſt con'viction of the magnitude and holy import of his cauſe. By the force of what caſuiſtry,
'then, could he have acted than as he did? The favour of his Prince, the allure-
'ments of patronage, the vaſt power of Canterbury with its wealth, and the endearing
'ties of his country, he ſacrificed. In the gratification of a ruling paſſion, I know, all 'that is not connected with it weighs as does a feather; but, in the ſituation he left,

'was there not a wider ſcope for action, than in exile, in the retirement of Pontigny, 'or in the dependence, even for bread, on the precarious bounty of another?

'Religion, I think, through life, gave energy to his conduct. I ſpeak of Religion 'as he viewed it, not always, perhaps, clear from every miſconception in theory, or in 'practice, always uninfluenced by human failings. To read its divine maxims, with 'an unerring preciſion, and to be guided in all things by them alone, has been of ſome 'minds, I believe, the noble ardour: but the beſt wiſhes of the heart are clogged 'by the connate weakneſſes of our being.—There was a time when the virtues, which 'beſt become a Churchman, ſtood not foremoſt, it is true, in the life of Becket. 'That time I marked. But Theobald, his patron and his guide, had then given him 'to Henry, and told him to be his companion in the cabinet, in the court, in the 'camp, and in the ſports of the field. The old man's views were upright. Ap-'pointed to a higher charge, with which thoſe occupations could not accord, even as 'a misjudging age beheld it, with a becoming fortitude, he broke from every en-'gagement, and became the ſhepherd of his flock. Courtiers, he knew, and men of 'earthly minds, would charge him with ingratitude, and with motives even of ambi-'tion. He ſpurned the malevolent imputation, and, as the duties of his ſtation di-'rected, ſteadily purſued his choice. What benefits England might have drawn from 'his exertions, in the promotion of virtue and the ſuppreſſion of vice, the troubles 'which ſoon followed did not permit her to experience. To good men the proſpect 'had been flattering.-- Through the trying years of proſecution, Religion doubtleſs 'often aided his reſolution; and when he exceeded, let it be remembered, that the 'conviction of his mind, and the patronage of many, had then given an enthuſiaſm 'to his cauſe.—He practiſed abſtemiouſneſs and other penitential rigours. Theſe, I 'know, are an equivocal ſign of virtue; but when they are done in ſecret, or are 'known only to a few, he truly muſt be an unequitable man, who will aſcribe them 'to other motives than thoſe of piety and ſelf-abaſement.

'Give me the greateſt heroes, whom antient times did deify, or ſuch as a more 'temperate poſterity has regiſtered on the liſts of fame, and I will ſay, that Becket, 'when he cloſed his life, was full as great as they. All his native energy then col-'lected at the heart; and ſeeing the heavens, as he thought, opened to him, he fell, 'as bleſſed martyrs had done.

'In a word, he had blemiſhes, and he had many virtues: his cauſe, which to us 'wears few marks of Chriſtian truth, to him was ſacred, and he defended it ſincerely: 'but if many Catholics have praiſed him immoderately; why ſhall Proteſtants be un-'juſt? True it is,

'Men's evil manners live in braſs, their virtues
'We write in water.'

(c) The Hiſtory of the reign of Henry the Second, &c. p. 235—240.

Mr. Berington, in his ſecond Appendix, calls in queſtion the authenticity and the authority of a Letter of Foliot, Biſhop of London; and of a bull aſcribed to Pope Alexander the Third, which Lord Lyttelton found in the Cottonian Collection of Manuſcripts, and on which his Lordſhip has laid conſiderable ſtreſs, in his account of Becket (d).

BOETHIUS (HECTOR), p. 396.

The following character of Boethius is drawn by Dr. Johnſon, in his journey to the Weſtern Iſlands of Scotland. "In old Aberdeen ſtands the King's College, of "which the firſt principal was Hector Boece, or Boethius, who may be juſtly reverenced "as one of the revivers of elegant learning. When he ſtudied at Paris, he was acquainted "with Eraſmus, who afterwards gave him a public teſtimony of his eſteem by in-"ſcribing to him a catalogue of his works. The ſtyle of Boethius, though, perhaps, "not always rigorouſly pure, is formed with great diligence upon ancient models, "and wholly uninfected with monaſtic barbarity. His hiſtory is written with ele-"gance and vigour, but his fabulouſneſs and credulity are juſtly blamed. His "fabulouſneſs, if he was the author of the fictions, is a fault for which no apology "can be made; but his credulity may be excuſed in an age, when all men were "credulous. Learning was then riſing on the world; but ages, ſo long accuſtomed "to darkneſs, were too much dazzled with its light to ſee any thing diſtinctly. The "firſt race of ſcholars, in the fifteenth century, and ſome time after, were, for the "moſt part, learning to ſpeak, rather than to think, and were therefore more ſtudious "of elegance than of truth. The contemporaries of Boethius thought it ſufficient "to know what the Ancients had delivered. The examination of tenets and of facts "was reſerved for another generation.

" Boethius, as Preſident of the Univerſity, enjoyed a revenue of forty Scottiſh marks, " about two pounds four ſhillings and ſix-pence of ſterling money.

" In the preſent age of trade and taxes, it is difficult even for the imagination ſo to " raiſe the value of money, or ſo to diminiſh the demands of life, as to ſuppoſe four- " and-forty ſhillings an honourable ſtipend: yet, it was probably equal, not only to " the needs but to the rank of Boethius. The wealth of England was, undoubtedly, " to that of Scotland, more than five to one; and it is known, that Henry the Eighth, " among whoſe faults avarice was never reckoned, granted to Roger Aſcham, as a " reward of his learning, a penſion of ten pounds a year (e)."

When this article was written, navigable canals, though ſignally uſeful, ſo far as they had been conſtructed, were comparatively in their infancy. They are now extended in an extraordinary degree, and plans for the increaſe of them are forming every day. In Mr. Philips's hiſtory of canals, recently publiſhed, there is much curious information on the ſubject.

BUC (GEORGE), p. 678.

Mr. Malone, upon the authority of Sir Henry Herbert's papers, relates, that this Sir George Buc, who was knighted by King James, July 23, 1603, was not the author of the celebrated " Hiſtory of King Richard the Third;" which was written above twenty years after his death, by George Buch, Eſq. whom we may ſuppoſe to have been the ſon of the former. Not having Mr. Malone's Shakſpeare at hand, we ſtate the fact as given in the Monthly Review for September, 1793, p. 72.

BUCHANAN (GEORGE), p. 688.

Mr. Whitaker, in his Vindication of Mary, Queen of Scots, has treated the character of George Buchanan with great ſeverity. He accumulates and enforces ſeveral of the charges againſt him that had been brought by Dr. Gilbert Stuart. Still, however, there are admirers of Buchanan, who will not give a ready aſſent to Mr. Whitaker's poſitions, or find themſelves eaſily ſatisfied with the force of his reaſonings. Of this number is Lord Gardenſtone, who, in the ſecond edition of his Miſcellanies, publiſhed at Edinburgh in 1792, has printed original Memoirs of the life, character, and Writings, of George Buchanan, including a Vindication of his moral character, and the firſt regular criticiſm on his poetical works which has appeared in the Engliſh language. Both the facts and the critical remarks advanced by his Lordſhip will be found deſerving of attention.

BUNYAN (John), p. 13.

DR. JOHNSON, we are told by Mr. Boſwell, praiſed John Bunyan highly. The ſhort but comprehenſive character which the Doctor gave of him was as follows: 'His "Pilgrim's Progreſs" has great merit, both for invention, imagination, 'and the conduct of the ſtory; and it has had the beſt evidence of its merit, the 'general and continued approbation of mankind. Few books, I believe, have had a 'more extenſive ſale. It is remarkable, that it begins very much like the Poem 'of Dante; yet, there was no tranſlation of Dante when Bunyan wrote. There is 'reaſon to think that he had read Spenſer (a)."

BURNET (Gilbert), p. 41.

In the former Corrigenda & Addenda to this Volume, we have ſaid, upon evidence which we deemed authentic, that there are no deſcendants left of Biſhop Burnet. An extract from a letter, with which we have been favoured by the Rev. Mr. Williams, of Wellſbourn, Warwickſhire, will amply enable us to correct our miſtake. The letter was dated on the third of October, 1789.

"The truth of the caſe is, that there are now living ſeven legitimate deſcendants of "the Biſhop, viz. Firſt, On the male ſide—Governor Burnet had, beſides Captain "Burnet, a legitimate ſon, named Gilbert, a moſt accompliſhed gentleman, and a moſt "incorrigible rake, who died early in life, but not before he had abſolutely exhauſted "a very handſome fortune, leaving a ſon without a penny; which ſon, Mr. Thomas "Burnet, is now a ſurgeon at Chigwell, in Eſſex, and has a daughter.

"Secondly, On the female ſide,—

"Lord Chancellor Weſt, who married the Biſhop's youngeſt daughter, had by her "two children—Richard Weſt, the poet and friend of Gray; and Mary Weſt, who, "after her father's death, married John Williams, Eſq. of Pembrokeſhire, who had "been the firſt Secretary to the Chancellor, and was afterwards Secretary to the "Engliſh Embaſſador at Paris. This laſt mentioned Lady (the Biſhop's grand-"daughter) is now living at Warwick, and has been for ſome time the oldeſt penſioner "on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment. She has a ſon (the writer of this) who is Vicar of Wellſ-"bourn, in Warwickſhire, and he has three children. Your account of Mrs. Mit-"chell is nearly exact—ſhe was fair, blue-eyed, and remarkably good-tempered; her "ſiſter, Mrs. Weſt, was juſt the reverſe, with black eyes, full of fire and fierceneſs, "and a temper exactly correſponding with her appearance. She was a woman of a "very ſuperior underſtanding—her ſallies of wit and depth of reaſoning were ſuch as to "aſtoniſh Mr. Addiſon, Steele, and other eminent men of thoſe days; but they ſeldom "left her company without bluſhing alſo at the intemperance of her paſſions and "the irregularity of her mind. To her pen they are indebted for ſome elegant "letters in the Tatlers and Spectators."

BUTLER (James, Duke of Ormond), p. 79.

In Lord Mountmorres's Hiſtory of the Principal Tranſactions of the Iriſh Parliament, from the year 1634 to 1666, containing Proceedings of the Lords and Commons during the the adminiſtrations of the Earl of Strafford, and of the firſt Duke of Ormond, is inſerted a narrative of his Grace's Life, collected from the papers of Sir Robert Southwell, Knight, Secretary of State in Ireland, and Preſident of the Royal Society. This narrative, which appears to have been written about the time of the Revolution, was only a collection of ſome ſhort notes of the Duke of Ormond's private familiar converſation, and was ſolely intended for the inſpection of his grandſon and relations. Being, therefore, plainly never deſigned for the preſs, Lord Mountmorres has taken the liberty of correcting the ancient ſpelling, of extending the ſentences occaſionally, and of ſubſtituting in many places modern for obſolete phraſes and expreſſions. "This ſhort hiſtory," ſays his Lordſhip, "which is the moſt authentic account that has hitherto appeared of "one of the firſt characters of his age, the greateſt ſtateſman, the moſt polite and ac- "compliſhed man that Ireland ever knew, cannot but be acceptable. Touching this "laſt part of his character, it has been remarked, by many Engliſh officers who have "been quartered in the town where the ancient manſion of the family is ſituated, that "they had experienced more hoſpitality and good-breeding there than in any other "country quarters; which certainly were the remnant of that politeneſs and decorum, "introduced by the firſt and laſt Duke of Ormond, during their occaſional reſidence at "the Caſtle of Kilkenny (b)."

CAMPBELL (Dr. John), p. 215.

Dr. Johnſon's teſtimony to Dr. Campbell was, that he was a man of much knowledge, and had a good ſhare of imagination; that his "Hermippus Redivivus" is very entertaining, as an account of the Hermetic Philoſophy, and as furniſhing a curious hiſtory of the extravagances of the human mind; and that he was the richeſt author that ever grazed the Common of Literature (c)."

CHILLINGWORTH (William), p. 518.

Mr. Whitaker, in his "Origin of Arianiſm diſcloſed," has produced a number of arguments to ſhew, that Mr. Chillingworth, in the latter part of his life, became a Socinian (d). We acknowledge ourſelves to be convinced by Mr. Whitaker's teſtimonies and reaſonings; and, therefore, retract what we had before ſaid upon the ſubject. The Socinians, we apprehend, will be proud to have ſuch a name as that of Chillingworth ranked among them.

CLARKE (Samuel), p. 610.

Mr. Whitaker has taken uncommon pains to ſupport the truth of Chevalier Ramſay's aſſertion, that Dr. Clarke greatly repented of his ever having publiſhed his work upon the Trinity. The teſtimonies on the other ſide of the queſtion Mr. Whitaker endeavours to reconcile, by ſuppoſing that the Doctor occaſionally avowed his repentance, and yet continued his practices. He avowed fully "to Mr. Ramſay what he was too "timid to avow to his ſon, to a Hoadly, or to an Emlyn; and what he even took pains "to conceal from them, in a ſeeming continuance of opinion, and in an actual perſeve- "rance of conduct (e)." Thus is Dr. Clarke charged with having been guilty of the groſſeſt diſſimulation and falſehood. We ſcruple not to ſay, that we conſider this charge as totally groundleſs; and we ſteadfaſtly adhere to our former opinion and declaration on the ſubject in queſtion.

CLAYTON (Robert), Biſhop of Clogher, p. 628.

Mr. Whitaker has made ſome ingenious ſtrictures on the fact related by us, that the "Eſſay on Spirit" was not written by the Biſhop of Clogher (f). All that we deem neceſſary to anſwer is, that we have been very ſpecific in giving the authority on which our narrative is founded; and that we did not conſider ourſelves as obliged to wander into the regions of conjecture.

TO THE

Fourth Volume of the Biographia Britannica.

COLLINS (William), p. 34.

IT is related, in the life of our poet, that, in his laſt illneſs, he ſhewed to Dr. Joſeph and Mr. Thomas Warton an Ode, inſcribed to Mr. John Home, on the Superſtition of the Highlands; which they thought ſuperior to his other works, but which no ſearch has yet found. Happily, the poem has at length been diſcovered. The manuſcript is in Mr. Collins's handwriting, and fell into the hands of Dr. Alexander Carlyle, among the papers of a friend of his and Mr. John Home's, who died as long ago as the year 1754. Soon after Dr. Carlyle found the poem, he ſhewed it to Mr. Home, who told him that it had heen addreſſed to him by Mr. Collins, on his leaving London in the year 1749, and that it was haſtily compoſed and incorrect. This is apparent from the ode itſelf. It is evidently the prima cura of the poem, as will eaſily be perceived from the alterations made in the manuſcript, by the blotting out of many lines and words, and the ſubſtitution of others. In particular, the greateſt part of the twelfth ſtanza is modelled in that manner. "Struck with the ſingular beauty of this "poem," ſays Alexander Frazer Tytler, Eſq. (in a letter to Mr. Robinſon, Secretary "to the Royal Society of Edinburgh,) of which, I believe, no man of taſte will ſay "that Dr. Warton and his brother have over-rated the merit, I could not help regret-"ting the mutilated form in which it appeared; and, on talking on that ſubject to my "friend Mr. Henry Mackenzie, of the Exchequer, (a gentleman well known in the "literary world by many ingenious productions,) I propoſed to him the taſk of ſup-"plying the fifth ſtanza, and the half of the ſixth, which were entirely loſt. How "well he has executed that taſk, the public will judge; who, unleſs warned by the "inverted commas that diſtinguiſh the ſupplemental verſes, would probably never "have diſcovered the chaſm. Several hemiſtichs, and words left blank by Mr. "Collins, had before been very happily ſupplied by Dr. Carlyle." The poem, which is entitled "An Ode on the Popular Superſtitions of the Highlands of Scotland, con-"ſidered as the Subject of Poetry," is now publiſhed in the firſt volume of the "Tranſactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh;" and Dr. Carlyle and Mr. Tytler have conferred no ſmall obligations upon the literary world in bringing it to light. Though there are evident proofs that it was haſtily compoſed, it evinces, at the ſame time, the vigour of the author's imagination, and the ready command he poſſeſſed of harmonious numbers (a).

The conſtruction of the ſtanza is different from what Mr. Collins has uſed on any former occaſion. To us it is not perfectly pleaſing; being, we think, too operoſe and formal. That the poem is highly beautiful, every man of taſte muſt ſtrongly feel; but ſtill there will probably be found perſons who will give the preference to the "Ode "upon the Paſſions."

The late Mr. Scott, of Amwell, in his "Critical Eſſays," has entered into a particular diſcuſſion of Collins's "Oriental Eclogues." Many of the critic's remarks are juſt and ingenious; but, ſome of them we conſider as too minutely faſtidious. On the whole, Mr. Scott concludes, that theſe eclogues, however they may have been depreciated, have all the requiſites of a good poem, deſcription, incident, ſentiment, and moral; that they have ſimplicity of thought, and melody of language; and that they have nothing to fear from a compariſon with any of their predeceſſors (b).

CORRIGENDA & ADDENDA.

CONGREVE (WILLIAM), p. 82.

Mr. Thomas Davies, in his "Dramatic Miſcellanies," has ſpent two chapters upon Congreve. His remarks are not injudicious; and his account of the ſeveral performers, who have repreſented the principal characters in Mr. Congreve's plays, is entertaining. It is ſufficient to refer to a book which, we ſuppoſe, is well known to ſuch of our Readers as make the hiſtory of the Stage the object of their attention (c).

(c) Dramatic Miſcellanies, Vol. III. p. 312—382.

In the third volume of the "Obſerver" is an ingenious criticiſm upon Congreve's "Double Dealer," the principal deſign of which is to ſhew, that, though the Author meant that his villain ſhould in the end outwit himſelf, he has made him fall into ſome improbable, and even abſurd, contrivances. It is alſo juſtly remarked, that the match between Melafont and Cynthia, for the prevention of which, artifices of ſo virulent and diabolical a nature are practiſed by Lady Touchwood and Maſkwell, is not preſſed upon the feelings of the ſpectators in ſo intereſting a manner as it ſhould and might have been. The view, upon the whole, which is given of the play, is as follows: "Of the characters in this comedy, Lady Touch-"wood, though of an unfavourable caſt, ſeems to have been the chief care of the poet, "and is well preſerved throughout. Her elevation of tone, nearly approaching to the "tragic, affords a ſtrong relief to the lighter ſketches of the epiſodical perſons, Sir "Paul and Lady Pliant, Lord and Lady Froſt, who are highly entertaining, but "much more looſe than the ſtage in its preſent ſtate of reformation would endure. "Nothing more can be ſaid of Careleſs and Briſk than that they are the young men of "the theatre, at the time when they were in repreſentation. Of Maſkwell enough "has been ſaid in theſe remarks; nor need any thing be added to what has been already "obſerved upon Mellafont and Cynthia. As for the moral of the play, which the "author ſays he deſigned in the firſt place, and applied the fable to it, it ſhould ſeem "to have been the principal object in the formation of the comedy, and yet it is not "made to reach ſeveral characters of very libertine principles, who are left to reform "themſelves at leiſure; and the plot, though ſubordinate to the moral, ſeems to have "drawn him off from executing his good intentions ſo completely as thoſe profeſſions "may be underſtood to engage for (b)."

COWLEY (ABRAHAM), p. 376.

In our addition to this article, after having related an anecdote from Dr. Warton's Eſſay on the writings and genius of Pope, concerning the cauſe of Cowley's death, we have expreſſed our wiſh that the Dr. had favoured the public with the authority on which the ſtory is founded. This has procured to the Editor the honour of a letter from that ingenious and learned writer, by which we are informed, that the authority he had for ſaying how Cowley had contracted his illneſs was from the papers of Mr. Spence. Theſe papers Dr. Warton tranſcribed a Mr. Spence's houſe, and under his eye, in the year 1754. Mr. Spence had his account from Mr. Pope, who had been very diligent in making all the enquiries he could about Cowley, in the neighbourhood of Chertſey. The fact was, that both the divine and the poet not only prolonged their viſit to a late hour, but had indulged their conviviality in a very high degree, which occaſioned their miſtaking their way, and lying all night under a hedge. If we had conſulted the third, inſtead of the firſt, edition of the Eſſay on Pope, we ſhould have found, that Mr. Spence's authority was referred to, and conſequently that our remark was groundleſs.

CREW (NATHANAEL), BISHOP OF DURHAM, AND LORD CREW, p. 441.

In 1790, was publiſhed "An Examination of the Life and Character of Nathanael "Lord Crewe, Biſhop of Durham: wherein the Writings of his ſeveral Biographers,

" and other Authors, are critically reviewed, and compared with a Manuſcript, never " before publiſhed, containing curious Anecdotes of that Prelate." The manuſcript here mentioned ſeems to have been written by ſome domeſtic of his Lordſhip, and relates a number of minute circumſtances concerning him, but not ſuch as are generally intereſting, or which ſerve to place the Biſhop's political conduct in a more favourable light than that in which it is uſually repreſented. Of this the Editor of the " Examination" is ſufficiently ſenſible, who is by no means partial to Lord Crew's memory. The moſt important part of the manuſcript is the account that is given of our prelate's retreat to Holland, at the time of the Revolution. As this matter has not hitherto been fully underſtood by any of his Lordſhip's Biographers, we ſhall tranſcribe the paſſage : " The latter end of " February, 1688, my Lord went over into Holland, his attendants Mr. James Montague, " his Nephew, who was perfect maſter of the French language; my Lord's ſervant, Harry " Carter, who was maſter of the Dutch language; and one Mr. John Turner, a facetious " pleaſant man, a fellow of King's College, Cambridge. My Lord embarked for Holland " in a clean new veſſel ; for five days they had a violent ſtorm, the ſeamen loſt their gage, " and were confounded in their calculations. My Lord, on Saturday, at ſix in the even- " ing, took the compaſs, and ſteered the veſſel into the Brill; the wind turned fair, but " the tide contrary. On Sunday, about one, they got to Rotterdam. After my Lord had " refreſhed himſelf on ſhore, he walked round the town, viſiting the churches and other " curioſities: he ſtayed about three weeks. Will frequently mimic the geſtures of the " preachers with much pleaſantry. Went to Leyden, where he met with his old tutor " Mr. Hickman, who retired from Brackley at the Reſtoration. My Lord told him of " the government oaths, ' Alack, alack !' ſays he, ' are they come to that again, that " is poor doing indeed !'—Hickman was a lover of Aqua Cinnamomi. My Lord viſited " Bruſſels and Antwerp, and continued abroad four or five months: returned to Eng- " land in July, the ſame year: never lived more to his ſatisfaction: was ſuſpected to " be the Earl of Northumberland, Un homme fort ſçavant. My Lord has often ſaid, he " would not have wanted the pleaſure of this voyage for any conſideration.

" During my Lord's ſtay abroad, King William and Queen Mary were crowned. My " Lord had letters, kindly to invite his attendance to aſſiſt at that ceremony, and large pro- " miſes of favour and welcome reception; but he would not return at that time. Return- " ing in July he fell into a deep calm, was many days at ſea, and not a breeze to move the " veſſel. It pleaſed God my Lord came to London the day before the time limited for ta- " king the oaths to government expired. Upon inquiry, he found the Houſe of Lords had " adjourned three days before the expiration of the limited time, which adjournment was " chiefly promoted by the Biſhop of Sarum, who was a well-wiſher to have Durham vacant: " upon this, he got his countryman, Sir Thomas Stamp, then Lord Mayor of London, " to call a Guild; and in Guildhall, the day before the time limited for all perſons to " qualify themſelves to government, did my Lord take thoſe public oaths. This was no " ſooner done, than the news was carried to Court, which was no ſmall mortification, " particularly to Burnet, who had got King William's promiſe of the Biſhopric, if my " Lord did not comply with the laws. Old Lord Falconberg, in the King's bed-chamber, " ſaid, ' My Lord had done wiſely,' or, ' was a wiſe man in taking the oaths.' My " Lord's pardon was the day before the exception, his ſwearing was the day before the " time expired: had either of them been wanting, or omitted, he would not have " continued in the See of Durham; at leaſt not quietly. My Lord was never out of " the dominions of the States of Holland (a)." The laſt ſentence is in expreſs contradiction to what is before ſaid, that the Biſhop viſited Bruſſels and Antwerp.

"IT is no wonder, if the Earl of Portland was not acceptable to the Engliſh nation. His Lordſhip had been, for ten years, entirely truſted by the King; was his chief favourite and boſom-friend; and the favourites of Kings are ſeldom favourites of the people. But, as long as hiſtory has not charged his memory with failings that might deſervedly render him obnoxious to the public, there can be no partiality in attributing this nobleman's unpopularity, partly to the above reaſons, and, partly, to his being a foreigner, for which he ſuffered not a little, from the envy and malice of his enemies, in their ſpeeches, libels, &c.'"

The latter part is particularly glanced at by Daniel De Foe, in his ſatire of "The True-born Engliſhman."

Great Portland ne'er was bantered when he ſtrove
For us, his maſter's kindeſt thoughts to move.
We ne'er lampoon'd his conduct when employ'd

BROWNE, (WILLIAM), p. 624.

Though the fact has hitherto, I believe, been unnoticed, it appears from the liſt of George Wither's productions, drawn up by himſelf, at the end of his Fides-Anglicana, Ed. 1661, that he had a ſhare in writing "The Shepherd's Pipe;" for, he expreſsly ſays, it was "compoſed by him and Mr. William Brown." This divided claim has farther preſumptive confirmation from the teſtimony of their friend and contemporary, Richard Brathwaite. Mr. Tyrwhitt's admirable vindication of Chaucer's poetry from metrical irregularity, " ariſing either from a ſuperfluity or deficiency of ſyllable, or from the accents being " improperly placed," has farther corroboration, if, indeed, it needed any, in the following appoſite remarks, by a writer of the 16th century.

" Our Father Chaucer hath uſed the ſame libertie in feete and meaſures that the " Latiniſts doe uſe; and who ſo ever doe peruſe and well conſider his workes, he ſhal " finde that although his lines are not alwayes of one ſelf ſame number of ſyllables, " yet being red by one that hath underſtanding, the longeſt verſe, and that which " hath moſt ſillables in it, will fall (to the eare) correſpondent unto that which hath " in it feweſt ſillables;" and, vice verſa—From " Certaine Notes of Inſtruction con- " cerning the making of Verſe or Rime in Engliſh,"—printed at the end of Gaſcoigne's Works, 1587 (b).

M. in March, 1793, and purchaſed by Mr. Waldron, of Drury-Lane Theatre. It contained the five books of Troilus, with the Teſtament of Creſcida, by R. Henderſon (or Henderſoun, as Lord Hailes and Mr. Pinkerton diſcriminate him) as a ſixth book. Each ſtanza of Chaucer's text is followed by the Latin Verſion, and interſperſed with a variety of curious and intelligent remarks. As the imprimatur of Tho. As the Intereſt exerted by Cleiveland, againſt Cromwell's being elected for Cambridge, was overpowered by the ſtronger influence of the latter; this circumſtance, perhaps, was leſs likely to have rankled in the Protector's mind, than that bitter invective which was perſonally levelled at him by Cleiveland in " The Character of a " London Diurnall;" but, which Cromwell had the ſuperior greatneſs not to reſent. I cite the following extract from an edition publiſhed two years before the ſatyriſt was " generouſly ſet at liberty."

" This Cromwell is never ſo valourous, as when he is making ſpeeches for the " Aſſociation: which, nevertheleſſe, he doth ſomewhat ominouſly, with his neck " awry, holding up his ear, as if he expected Mahomet's pidgeon to come and prompt " him. But all is not gold that gliſters: " what we wonder at in the reſt of them is naturall in him, to kill without bloud-ſhed:

" for moſt of his trophies are in a church-window, when a looking-glaſs would ſhew
" him more ſuperſtition. O brave Oliver! Times Voider, ſubſizer to the worms:
" in whom death, who formerly devoured our anceſtors, now chews the cud.
" Believe him, as he whiſtles to his Cambridge teem of Committee-men, and he does " wonders. But holy men, like the holy language, muſt be read backwards. They riſle
" to colleges to promote learning, and pull down churches for edification. But ſacrilege
" is intailed upon him: there muſt be a Cromwell for cathedrals, as well as abbeys; a
" ſecure ſin, whoſe offence carries its pardon in its mouth; for, how can he be hanged
" for church robbery, which gives itſelf the benefit of the clergy."

And, againſt the Earl of Mancheſter, by whom he was deprived of his Fellowſhip, he proceeds (as might be expected) in a ſtrain ſtill more indignant.

" But for all Cromwell's noſe (c) weares the dominical letter, compared to Mancheſter,
" he is but like the Vigil to an holy-day. This, this is the man of God! ſo ſanctified a
" thunderbolt, that Burroughs, in a proportionable blaſphemy to his Lord of Hoſts,
" would ſtyle him the Archangel, giving battell to the devil. Indeed, as the angels,
" each of them makes a ſeveral ſpecies, ſo every one of his ſoldiers is a diſtinct church.
" Had theſe beaſts been to enter into the ark, it would have puzzled Noah to have " ſuited them into pairs. If ever there were a rope of ſand, it was ſo many ſects
" twiſted into an aſſociation (d)."

(c) "Cromwell's noſe, ſays Mr. Granger, being remarkably red and ſhining, was the ſubject of much ridicule." Biog. Hiſt. Vol. III. p. 5.

VOLUME IV.

COLLINS (WILLIAM), p. 28.

THE lines to Miſs Aurelia C——r, printed from Dr. Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, as the " Firſt Efforts of Collins's Poetical Genius," appear in the Gent. Mag. for January, 1739, with the ſignature Amaſius; and, in ſucceeding months of that, and following years, are numerous poetical pieces, with the ſame ſignature; but, they appear to have been ſent by a different Correſpondent. It were to have been wiſhed, that Dr. Johnſon had ſpecified upon what authority his aſſertion was made, which gave Collins a claim to the excepted poem in the ſingle inſtance produced.

In his celebrated " Ode upon the Paſſions," Collins's finiſhed picture of Fear, ſeems to have been firſt ſketched by Sir Philip Sidney.

" A fatyr once did run away for dread
" With ſound of horn, which he himſelf did blow,
" Fearing and fear'd, thus from himſelf he fled,
" Deeming ſtrange evil in that he did not know (a)."

(a) Sir Philip Sidney's Works, p. 478. Ed. 1619.

Quere—Whether the intelligence, announced in the following paragraph, from a daily paper, is to be relied on?

" A beautiful monument is juſt completed at Rome, intended to be erected in " Chicheſter Cathedral, to the memory of Collins, the poet. It conſiſts of a ſtriking
" buſt of that elegant writer, with a ſimple inſcription; and, underneath, appear the " paſſions, in baſs relief, moſt expreſſively copied from the inſpiration of his own
" poem (b)."

(b) Ledger, Feb. 6, 1792.

Should this deſign take place, it will ſuperſede the poetical complaint of Scott, of Amwell.

TO THE FOURTH VOLUME.

CORBET (RICHARD), p. 273.

Some humourous anecdotes of Biſhop Corbet (not noticed here) were extracted by Mr. Headley from Aubrey's MSS. in the Aſhmolean Muſeum, and printed in his "Biographical Sketches," pp. xxxviii—ix.

CORYATE, (THOMAS), p. 278.

Note I, [Many copies of verſes by the moſt eminent Poets.] Theſe verſes were reprinted in the ſame year, (1611,) detached from the Crudities, with this title: "The Odcom-"bian Banquet, diſhed foorth by Thomas the Coriat, and ſerved in a Number of "Noble Wits, in praiſe of his Crudities and Crambe too—Aſinus portans Myſteria;" and with a proſe advertiſement at the concluſion, of which the following is a tranſcript.

"Noverint univerſi, &c.

"Know, gentle Reader, that the booke, in prayſe whereof all theſe preceding "verſes were written, is purpoſely omitted for thine and thy purſes good; partly for "the greatneſs of the volume, containing 654 pages, each page 36 lines, each line "48 letters, beſides panegyricks, poems, epiſtles, prefaces, letters, orations, frag-"ments, poſthumes, with the commas, colons, full-points, and other things here-"unto appertaining; which being printed of a character legible without ſpectacles "would have cauſed the booke much to exceed that price, whereat men in theſe "witty dayes value ſuch ſtuffe as that; and, partly, for that one

"Whoſe learning, judgement, wit, and braine,
"Are weight with Tom's juſt to a graine.

"Having read the booke with an intent to epitomize it, could he but have melted out "of the whole lumpe ſo much matter worthy the reading as would have filled foure "pages; but, finding his labour loſt, and his hope therein fallen ſhort, is reſolved to "defer it till the author of the "Crudities" have finiſhed his ſecond travels; which "being intended for a place farre more remote, is likely to produce a booke of a farre "greater bulk: both which being drawne into an exact compend, as Munſter, "Baronius, the Magdeburgians, and other famous Chronologers, have beene, may, "perhaps, afford ſomething either worthy thy reading, or ſupply thy need in ſuch "caſes of extremitie, as nature and cuſtome oft times inforce men unto. VALE."

In Note I it is inferred, from the dedication to Prince Henry, that Coriate was unconſcious of the deſign of the poets to ridicule him; but, from the prefatory addreſs before his book, this obviouſly was not the caſe. His diſcernment was ſufficiently acute to perceive, that the drift of their mock-commendations was to expoſe both the work and its author; but his vanity being paramount to every other feeling, he was proud even of irony from men of eminence, and ſo his production did not eſcape notice, he was content with having it "damned to everlaſting fame."

COWLEY (ABRAHAM), p. 366.

In deſcribing the contents of Cowley's "Poetical Bloſſoms," a ſlight inaccuracy of Anthony Wood's has been copied into note B. The title of the firſt is not Antonius and Melida, but "Conſtantia and Philetus." The two copies of recommendatory verſes by his ſchool fellows are ſigned Ben Maers and Robert Meade; the latter of whom was afterwards diſtinguiſhed as a ſoldier and dramatic writer (a).

(a) See Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. Col. 165.

CHATTERTON (THOMAS), p. 593.

To the poetic eulogiums on Chatterton, may be added the following tribute to his memory, from the claſſical pen of Mr. Headley; after the manner of "An Ode to "Evening," by Collins, and another "To Spring," by Miſs Aikin (now Mrs. Barbauld).

—— Hunc inopem vidiſtis Athenæ
Nil præter gelidas auſæ conferre cicutas. Juvenal.

Ill-fated youth, adieu; was thine a breaſt
Where fell deſpair might fix her dark reſolve,
To mar thy ſimple heart,
And ſnatch thee from the world?
Whilſt Fancy finds a friend, and Genius charms,
With eagle-eye, and high-aſpiring thought,
Thy ſainted memory
Shall ever ſacred live.
When Spring, with ſcanty veſt and maiden ſmile,
Leads on the ſprightly months and infant year,
Her tears of morning dew
Shall wet thy death-bed cold.
When jocund Summer, with her honey'd breath,
(Sweetening the golden grain and blithſome gale)
Diſplays her ſun-burnt face
Beneath the hat of ſtraw,
The lily's hanging head, the panſy pale,
(Poor Fancy's lowly followers,) in meek
Attire, ſhall deck thy turf,
And, withering, lie with thee.
When ſober Autumn, with lack-luſtre eye,
Shakes, with a chiding blaſt, the yellow leaf,
And hears the woodman's ſong
And early ſportman's foot;
When naked Winter, like a pilgrim grey,
Of verieſt rude aſpect, and joyleſs brow,
Calls for the carol wild,
And trims the ſocial fire;
Remembrance oft, in Pity's penſive ear,
At ſilent eve, ſhall ſorrowing toll thy knell,
And tell to after-days
Thy tale, thy luckleſs tale.

From a copy of Chatterton's Life, by Dr. Gregory, in my poſſeſſion, it appears, that the notes to the 8vo edition, ſigned O, were contributed by the late Dr. Lort.

DANIEL (SAMUEL), p. 628.

To the various editions of Daniel's numerous works here produced from Wood's Athenæ, the following might be ſuperadded:

Complaint of Roſamond	1605, 8vo.
Letter from Octavia	1605,
Funeral Sermon on the Earl of Devonſhire	1611, 12mo.
Panegyric Congratulatory	1603, 12mo.
Epiſtle to Great Perſonages, in Verſe	1603,
Paſſion of a diſtreſſed Man	1603,
Sonnets to Delia	1592, 4to. 1611, 12mo.
Queen's Accadia	1611,
Defence of Rhime	1603.

TO THE FOURTH VOLUME.

In Daviſon's "Poetical Rapſodie" are ſome Verſes "To Samuel Daniel, Prince of "Engliſh Poets," in which he is applauded, even beyond Spenſer: this is the concluding ſtanza:

"One ſhar'd out Greece, another Aſia held,
"And fertile Egypt to a third did fall,
"But onely Alexander all did wield.
"So in ſoft pleaſing Lyricks ſome are ſkil'd,
"In Tragicke ſome, ſome in Heroicall,
"But thou alone art matchleſs in them all."

D'AVENANT, (WILLIAM), p. 642.

Beſide the encomiums on Gondebirt, here cited from Mr. Headley, that accompliſhed ſcholar addreſſed a Sonnet to Mrs. Barbauld, complimenting her on the part ſhe was ſuppoſed to have taken with her brother Dr. Aikin, in reviving the reputation of Sir William Davenant.

DAVIES (JOHN), p. 662.

In Daviſon's "Poetical Rapſodie" are two ingenious pieces by Sir John Davies, not collected by his modern Editor on the republication of his poems. One is entituled, "A Contention betwixt a Wife, a Widdow, and a Maide;" and the other, "Yet "other Twelve Wonders of the World;" in which the following characters are introduced, with much ſhrewd ſatire: "The Courtier, the Divine, the Souldier, the "Lawyer, the Phyſician, the Merchant, the Country Gentleman, the Bachelor, the "Married Man, the Wife, the Widow, and the Maid."

In the text, p. 653.—"Noſce Teipſum" is ſaid (probably from Anthony Wood) to have been firſt publiſhed in 1599; but how is this to be reconciled with the Author's dedication of it to Queen Elizabeth, which bears date July 11, 1592?

LIVES

OF THE

Moſt Eminent PERSONS

Who have flouriſhed in

GREAT-BRITAIN, AND IRELAND,

From the earlieſt Ages, down to the preſent Times.

DAVIS (JOHN), an excellent Pilot, and fortunate diſcoverer of unknown countries, in the XVIth century, was born at Sandridge, a pleaſant ſeat, in the pariſh of Stoke-Gabriel, near Dartmouth in Devonſhire (a). His birth near that eminent ſeaport, having given him a fair opportunity, to which probably was added a ſtrong natural diſpoſition, he put himſelf early to ſea; where, by the help of a good maſter, and his ſubſequent induſtry, knowledge, and experience, he became the moſt expert Pilot, and one of the ableſt Navigators of his time (b). The firſt publick employment he had was in the year 1585, when he undertook to diſcover a new Paſſage, by the North-Weſt parts of America, to the Eaſt-Indies. For that purpoſe, he ſailed from Dartmouth, on the ſeventh of June, with two barks [A], and met, July 19, many iſlands of ice floating, in 60 degrees northern latitude (c). They were ſoon encompaſſed with them; and going upon ſome, perceived, that the roaring noiſe they heard, at which they were greatly aſtoniſhed, was cauſed only by the rolling of the ice together. The next day, they diſcovered the ſouthern coaſt of Groenland; five hundred leagues diſtant from the Durſeys, or Miſſenhead, in Ireland (d); and obſerved it to be extremely rocky and mountainous, and covered with ſnow, without any ſigns of wood, glaſs, or earth to be ſeen. The ſhore, likewiſe, was ſo full of ice, that no ſhip could come near it by two leagues: and ſo ſhocking was the appearance of it, and the cracking of the ice ſo hideous, that they imagined it to be a quite deſolate country, without a living creature, or even any vegetable ſubſtance; for which reaſon Captain Davis named it, The Land of Deſolation (e). Perceiving that they were run into a very deep bay, wherein they were almoſt ſurrounded with ice, they kept coaſting along the edge of it, South-ſouth-weſt, till the 25th of July; when, after having gone fifty or ſixty leagues, they found that the ſhore lay directly North. So they altered their courſe to the North-weſt, in hopes of finding their deſired paſſage: but on the 29th they diſcovered land to the North-eaſt, in 64 degr. 15 min. Latitude. Making towards it, they perceived that they were paſſed the ice, and were among many green, temperate, and pleaſant iſlands, bordering upon the ſhore; though the hills of the continent were ſtill covered with great quantities of ſnow. Among theſe iſlands were many fine bays, and good roads for ſhipping: they landed in ſome, and the people of the country came down and converſed with them [B]. By ſigns they made Mr. Davis underſtand, that there was a great ſea towards the North and Weſt (f). He ſtaid in this place till the firſt of Auguſt, and then proceeded in his diſcovery. The ſixth of that month, they found land in 66 degr. 40 min. Latitude, quite free from ice; and anchored in a ſafe road, under a great mountain, the cliffs whereof gliſtered like gold. This mountain he named, Mount Raleigh: the road where their ſhips lay at anchor, Totneſs Road: the bay which encompaſſed the mountain, Exeter Sound: the foreland towards the North, Dier's Cape: and the foreland towards the South, Cape Walſingham. He departed from hence the eighth of Auguſt, coaſting along the ſhore, which lay South-ſouth-weſt, and Eaſt-north-eaſt; and on the eleventh came to the moſt ſoutherly cape of that land, which he named, The Cape of God's Mercy, as being the place of their firſt entrance for the diſcovery. Going forward, they came into a very fine ſtraight, or paſſage, in ſome places twenty leagues broad, in others thirty, quite free from ice, the weather in it very tolerable, and the water of the ſame colour and nature as the main ocean. This paſſage ſtill retains the name of its firſt diſcoverer, being called to this day Fretum Davis, or Davis's Straights. Having ſailed, North-weſt, ſixty leagues (g) in this paſſage, they diſcovered ſeveral iſlands in the midſt of it; on ſome of which they landed. The coaſt was very barren, without wood or graſs; and the rocks were like fine marble, full of veins of divers colours. Some days after they continued ſearching for the North-weſt Paſſage [C], but found only a great number of iſlands. And, on the 20th, the wind coming contrary, they altered their courſe and deſign; and returning for England, arrived at Dartmouth the 29th of September (h). The next year Mr. Davis undertook a ſecond voyage, for the farther diſcovery of the North-weſt Paſſage, being ſupported and encouraged again by Secretary Walſingham, and other adventurers (i). With a view therefore of ſearching the bottom of the Straights he had been in the year before, he ſailed from Dartmouth, May the 7th, 1586, with four ſhips [D], and the 15th of June diſcovered land in 60 degr. Latitude, and 47 degr. Longitude Weſt from London. The ice along the coaſt reached in ſome places ten, in ſome twenty, and in others fifty leagues into the ſea; ſo that, to avoid it, they were forced to bear into 57 degr. Latitude. After many tempeſtuous ſtorms, they made the land again, June the 29th, in 64 degr. of Latitude, and 58 of Longitude; and ran among the temperate iſlands they had been at the year before. But the water was ſo deep, they could not eaſily come to an anchor: however, they found means to go aſhore, on ſome of the iſlands, where they were extremely careſſed and welcomed by the natives, who knew them again (k). Having finiſhed a pinnace, which was to ſerve them for a front in their diſcoveries; they landed, not only in that, but alſo in their boats, in ſeveral places [E]: and, upon the ſtricteſt ſearch, found

[A] With two barks.] One of fifty tuns, named the Sunſhine of London, which carried twenty-three perſons, John Davis, Captain; the other was of thirty-five tuns, named the Moonſhine of Dartmouth, having nineteen perſons on board. William Bruton, Captain. They were fitted out at the charge of ſeveral of the Nobility and Gentry, particularly Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary of State, and of many Merchants of London and the Weſt Country The chief manager of this undertaking, was Mr. William Sanderſon, Merchant and Globe-maker in London; who recommended to the adventurers Mr. John Davis, a man well-grounded in the principles of Navigation, for Captain and chief Pilot in this expedition. Some attempts had been made before, by Capt Henry Hudſon, Capt. Martin Frobiſher, Capt. Adrian Gilbert, and others, to diſcover this North-weſt paſſage; but without ſucceſs (1). Mr. Davis informs us, (2) that 'in his firſt voyage he was not experienced of the nature of thoſe climates, and had no direction either by chart, globe, or other certain relation, in what altitude that paſſage was to be ſearched.'

[B] The people came down and converſed with them.] Namely, by ſigns. For the Engliſh could not underſtand the Savages' language; whoſe pronunciation was very hollow, through the throat. Before they would come near, they pointed to the Sun, and ſtruck their breaſt, and the Engliſh doing the like, the others ventured to truſt themſelves with them. They were a very tractable people, void of craft or double-dealing, eaſy to be brought to any civility or good order, and took great care of one another. Their light garments were made of birds' ſkins with the feathers on; and the heavier of Seal's ſkins. Their buſkins, hoſe, and gloves, were neatly ſewed, and well dreſſed. Theſe iſlands had no freſh water, but pools of melted ſnow: and the cliffs abounded with ore, that look'd like gold. Upon the rocks, and in the moſs, grew a ſhrub, whoſe fruit was very ſweet, and full of red juice, like Corinths, ſuppoſed to be the Cranberry, or Bearberry (3).

[C] They continued ſearching for the North-weſt paſſage.] And, for the following reaſons, concluded that in all probability there was ſuch a paſſage, 1. Becauſe this place was all iſlands, with great ſounds between them. 2. The water remained of one colour with the main ocean, without altering. Whereas the colour of the water, in whatever Bay they came, was very blackiſh. 3. They ſaw to the Weſt of thoſe iſles, three or four whales, which they judged to come from a weſterly ſea, not having ſeen any to the eaſtward. 4. As they were rowing into a very great ſound lying South weſt, from whence the whales came, on a ſudden there came a violent counter-check of a tide from the South-weſt againſt the flood they came with, not knowing from whence it proceeded. 5. In ſailing twenty leagues within the mouth of that entrance they had ſounding in ninety fathoms, and the farther Weſt they ran, the deeper was the water, ſo that cloſe to the ſhore among theſe iſles they could not find ground in 330 fathoms. 6. It ebbed and flowed ſix or ſeven fathoms, the flood coming from divers parts, ſo that they could not perceive the chief ſource of it (4).

[D] With four ſhips.] Namely, The Mermaid, of one hundred and twenty tuns: The Sunſhine, of ſixty tuns: The Moonſhine, a bark of thirty-five tuns: and a Pinnace of ten tuns, named the North Star. About the beginning of June, when they came into nearly ſixty degrees of latitude, Mr. Davis divided this little fleet; ſending the Sunſhine, and the North Star, to ſeek a paſſage northward, between Groenland and Iceland to the latitude of eighty degrees; whilſt he proceeded himſelf, with the Mermaid and the Moonſhine in the farther diſcovery of the North-weſt Paſſage (5). The Sunſhine returned to England, October 4, with a quantity of ſeal-ſkins; but the Pinnace was loſt.

[E] They landed - - - - - - in ſeveral places.] And ſaw the habitations of the nations, which were only a kind of tents covered with ſeal-ſkins. They found likewiſe a grave, with ſeveral buried in it, being covered with ſeal ſkins, and having a croſs laid over them. The people are of good ſtature, well proportioned in body, have ſmall ſlender hands and feet, broad viſages, ſmall eyes, wide mouths, generally beardleſs, great lips, and are cloſe-toothed. They are very apt to bleed, and therefore ſtop their noſes with deer's hair, or the hair of an elan (6). They are idolaters, and have abundance of images. Their meat, which is moſtly fiſh, they eat raw; and drink ſalt-water, and eat graſs and ice with pleaſure. Seldom found the land not to be a continent, as they imagined, but a collection of huge, waſte, and deſert iſles, with great ſounds and inlets paſſing between ſea and ſea (l). They purſued their voyage the 11th of July, and on the 17th in 63 degr. 8 min. Latitude, met with a prodigious maſs of ice, which they coaſted till the 30th. This was a great obſtacle, and diſcouragement to them, not having the like there the year before; and, beſides, the men beginning to grow ſickly, the crew of the Mermaid, on which he chiefly depended, forſook him, and reſolved to proceed no farther (m). However, not to diſappoint Mr. W. Sanderſon, who was the chief adventurer in this voyage, and for fear of loſing the favour of Secretary Walſingham, who had this diſcovery much at heart, Mr. Davis undertook to proceed alone in his ſmall bark of thirty tuns. Having therefore fitted, and well-victualled it, in a harbour lying in 66 degr. 33 min. Latitude, and 70 degr. Longitude; which he found to be a very hot place, and full of muſcatoes; he ſet ſail the 12th of Auguſt, and coming into a ſtraight followed the courſe of it for eighty leagues, till he came among many iſlands, where the water ebbed and flowed ſix fathom deep (n). He had hopes of finding a paſſage there, but upon ſearching farther in his boat, he perceived there was none. So he returned again into the open ſea, and kept coaſting ſouthward as far as 54 degr. ½ of Latitude: in which time he found another great inlet near forty leagues broad, between two lands, Weſt, where the water ran in with great violence. This, he imagined, was the paſſage ſo long ſought for, but the wind being then contrary, and two furious ſtorms happening ſoon after, he neither thought it ſafe nor wiſe to proceed farther: eſpecially in one ſmall bark, and when the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced. Wherefore he ſailed for England the 11th of September (o); and arrived there in the beginning of October [F]. By what obſervations he made, he concluded, that the North parts of America are all iſlands (p). He made a third voyage to theſe parts again the year following, 1587. All the Weſtern Merchants, and moſt of thoſe of London refuſed to be engaged farther in the undertaking; but the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, and Secretary Walſingham, ſet it forwards. Mr. Davis having, in his laſt voyage, diſcovered prodigious quantities of excellent cod-fiſh, in 56 degr. of Latitude; for that reaſon, two ſhips were ſent along with him for fiſhing, and one only for the diſcovery of the North-weſt Paſſage [G]. They ſailed from Dartmouth the 19th of May, and diſcovered land the 14th of June, at ſixteen leagues diſtance, being very mountainous, and covered with ſnow (q). On the 21ſt of June the two barks left him, and went upon the fiſhing, after having promiſed him, not to depart till his return to them about the end of Auguſt. But having finiſhed their voyage in about ſixteen days after, they ſet ſail for England without any regard to their promiſe. As for Captain Davis, he purſued his intended diſcovery, in the ſea between America and Groenland, from 64 to 73 deg. of Latitude. Having entered the Straights which bear his name, he went on northward, from the 21ſt to the 30th of June; naming one part Merchants Coaſt (r); another, The London Coaſt; another, Hope Sanderſon in 73 degr. Latitude, being the fartheſt he went that day. The wind coming northerly, he altered his courſe, and ran forty leagues Weſt, without ſeeing any land (s). On the 2d of July, he fell in with a great bank of ice, which he coaſted ſouthward till the 19th of July, when he came within ſight of Mount Raleigh on the American coaſt, in about 67 degrees of Latitude. Having ſailed ſixty leagues North-weſt into the gulf that lies beyond it, he anchored, July 23, at the bottom of that gulf, among many iſlands, which he named The Earl of Cumberland's Iſles. He quitted that place again the ſame day, and ſailed back South-eaſt, in order to recover the ſea; which he did the 29th in 62 deg. of Latitude. The 30th he paſſed by a great bank, or inlet, to which he gave the name of Lumley's Inlet; and the next day by a head land, which he called The Earl of Warwick's Foreland. On the firſt of Auguſt he fell in with the ſouthermoſt cape, named by him Chudley's Cape: and, the 12th, paſſed by an iſland which he named Darcy's Iſland. When he came in 52 deg. of Latitude, not finding the two ſhips that had promiſed to ſtay for him, he was in great diſtreſs, having but little wood, and only half a hogſhead of water left. However, taking courage, he made the beſt of his way home, and arrived at Dartmouth dom are they out of water, excepting when they go to ſleep on the land, in ſome warm corner, or under a rock. Their nets for catching fiſh are made of a whale. When they grow familiar, they are very thieviſh; and ſo covetous are they of iron, that they could not forbear ſtealing any thing that was made of that metal. Their way of kindling a fire is thus: they take a piece of board having a hole half through, in which they put the end of a round ſtick, (like a bed-ſtaff,) dipped in train oil; then working it round in that hole with a leather thong, like a turner, they ſoon get a fire by the violent agitation. Mr. Davis got among theſe people copper-ore, and black and red copper (7).——Whilſt he remained among theſe iſlands he ſaw a whirlwind that laſted three hours, and took up great quantities of water into the air, with incredible violence and fury (8).

September

September the 15th (i), very ſanguine, that the North-weſt Paſſage was moſt probable, and the execution eaſy [H]. But Secretary Walſingham being otherwiſe engaged, and dying not long after, that deſign was laid aſide (u). Mr. Davis, notwithſtanding, did not remain idle. For, Auguſt 26, 1591, he was Captain of the Deſire, Rear Admiral to Mr. Thomas Cavendiſh, in his ſecond unfortunate expedition to the South-Sea; and is highly blamed by Mr. Cavendiſh, for having deſerted him, and thereby being the cauſe of his overthrow (w). After many diſaſters, Mr. Davis arrived again at Bear-Haven in Ireland, June 11, 1593 (x). He performed afterwards no leſs than five voyages to the Eaſt-Indies [I], in the ſtation of a Pilot (y). One was in a Dutch ſhip, wherein he ſet out, March 15, 159$\frac{4}{5}$, from Fluſhing, and returned to Middleburgh, July 23, 1600 (z). Of the reſt we have no account, only of one he performed with Sir Edward Michelbourne (a), in which were ſpent nineteen months, from December 5, 1604, to July 9, 1606. During this voyage Mr. Davis was ſlain, on the 27th of December, 1605, in a deſperate fight with ſome Japoneſe near the coaſt of Malacca (b). He married Faith, daughter of Sir John Fulford, of Fulford in Devonſhire, Knight, by Dorothy his wife, daughter of John Lord Bouchier, Earl of Bath (c); by whom probably he had iſſue: for ſome of his poſterity are ſaid to have been living ſome years ago at, or near, Deptford (d). He was author of ſome things in the naval way [K].

DAVYSON or DAVISON (WILLIAM), a very eminent Stateſman, and Secretary of State in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was, if not a native of Scotland, at leaſt deſcended from thoſe who were, as himſelf profeſſed to Sir James Melvile (a), which is all that we know of his family. At what time he came into the Court of Queen Elizabeth, or in what ſtate, cannot, at this diſtance of time, be poſitively affirmed. It is moſt probable, that his parts and learning, together with that extraordinary diligence and wonderful addreſs for which he was always diſtinguiſhed, recommended him to Mr. Killigrew, afterwards Sir Henry Killigrew, with whom he went in quality of Secretary, at the time he was ſent into Scotland to compliment Queen Mary upon the birth of her ſon (b). This was in the year 1566, and there is a good reaſon to believe that he remained thenceforward about the Court, and was employed in ſeveral affairs of great conſequence. In 1575, when the States of Brabant and Flanders aſſumed to themſelves the adminiſtration of all affairs, till his Catholick Majeſty ſhould appoint a new Governor of the Low Countries, Mr. Daviſon was ſent over with a publick character from the Queen to thoſe States, under the plauſible pretence of exhorting them to continue in their obedience to his Catholick Majeſty, but, in reality, to ſee how things actually ſtood in that part of the world, that her Majeſty might be the better able to know how to proceed in reſpect to the ſeveral applications made to her from the Prince of Orange, and the people of Holland (c). He executed this commiſſion very ſucceſsfully, and therefore, when things were riper, the Queen ſent him over as her Miniſter, to pacify the troubles that had ariſen at Ghent; and, when his preſence was no longer neceſſary there, he was commiſſioned on her behalf to the States of Holland in 1579 (d). His conduct there gave equal [H] Very ſanguine that the North-weſt Paſſage was moſt probable, and the execution eaſy.] This he declared to his great patron, Mr. W. Sanderſon, in a letter from Sandridge, the next day after his return to England—'I have,' ſaith he, 'made my ſafe returne in 'health, with all my company, and have ſailed three-'ſcore leagues further than my determination at my 'departure. I have been in 73 degrees, finding the 'ſea all open, and forty leagues betweene land and 'land. The paſſage is moſt probable, the execution 'eaſie, as at my coming you ſhall fully know (11).' ——But the Spaniſh Invaſion happening the year following, and Secretary Walſingham dying two years after, that deſign was laid aſide, and never again attempted by Mr. Davis (12).

[I] He performed afterwards no leſs than five voyages to the Eaſt-Indies.] 'He was the firſt Pilot that con-'ducted the Zealanders to that country,' ſays Mr. Prince (13): which may be true of the Zelanders in particular. But the Dutch had been once before to the Eaſt-Indies; namely in the year 1595 (14). And if Mr. Davis ſet out for the Eaſt Indies, firſt in 159$\frac{7}{8}$, as Mr. Prince ſeems to intimate, I do not find how he could poſſibly perform five voyages, thither, in that ſpace of time; namely, between 159$\frac{7}{8}$ and 1605.

There are likewiſe in print two letters of his (16), to Mr. Sanderſon: one dated from Exeter, October 14, 1586; and the other from Sandridge, September 16, 1587. III. Hakluyt hath alſo preſerved (17), 'A Traverſe Booke made by M. 'John Davis in his third voyage for the diſcoverie of 'the North-weſt Paſſage, Anno. 1587.' IV. And moreover it appears, that our author, J. Davis, compoſed a treatiſe, intituled, 'The World's Hydrogra-'phicall Deſcription.' For Hakluyt hath extracted out of it, and publiſhed, 'A report of Maſter John 'Davis, of his three voyages made for the diſcovery 'of the North-weſt Paſſage (18).' V. His voyage to the Eaſt Indies in a Dutch ſhip, in the year 1598, was written alſo by himſelf (19). VI. We are informed, that 'There is a Rutter, [Routier,] or Brief Direc-'tions for ſailing into the Eaſt Indies, digeſted into 'a plain method by this ſame perſon, John Davis of 'Limehouſe, (as he is there called) written upon ex-'periment of his five voyages thither, and home 'again (20).' But, either it was not written by the ſame John Davis, who is the ſubject of this article: or elſe, our John Davis was not ſlain in the Eaſt Indies, as we have ſaid above upon the authority of Purchas, and of thoſe that have copied from him. ſatisfaction to the Queen his Miſtreſs, and to thoſe with whom he negotiated. He gave them great hopes of the Queen's aſſiſtance and ſupport; but, when a ſum of money was deſired, as abſolutely neceſſary towards providing for their defence, he very readily undertook to procure it upon reaſonable ſecurity; in conſequence of which, a very conſiderable ſum was ſent from England, for which all the valuable jewels and fine plate, that had been pledged by Matthias of Auſtria to the States of Holland, and which were the remains of the magnificence of the houſe of Burgundy, were tranſported to England (e). Theſe journies, and the ſucceſs attending them, gave Mr. Daviſon great reputation at Court, inſomuch, that in all matters of a nice and difficult nature, Daviſon was ſome way or other continually employed. Thus in 1583, when things were very much embroiled in Scotland, he was ſent thither as the Queen's Ambaſſador, in order to counteract the French Miniſters, and to engage the King of Scots, and the people, both to ſlight the offers made them from that country, and to depend wholly upon aſſiſtance from England (f) [A]. Affairs in the Low-Countries coming at laſt to a criſis, and the States reſolving to depend upon Queen Elizabeth, in the bold deſign they had formed of defending their freedom by force of arms, and rendering themſelves independent, Mr. Daviſon, at this time Clerk of the Privy Council, was choſen to manage this delicate buſineſs, and to conclude with them that alliance which was to be the baſis of their future undertakings (g). In this, which, without queſtion, was one of the moſt perplexed tranſactions in that whole reign, he conducted things with ſuch a happy dexterity, as to merit the ſtrongeſt acknowledgments on the part of the States, at the ſame time that he rendered the higheſt ſervice to the Queen his Miſtreſs, and obtained ample ſecurity for thoſe expences which that Princeſs thought it neceſſary to be at (b), in order to keep danger at a diſtance, and to entertain the flames of war in the dominions of her enemy, whom, at that juncture, ſhe knew to be meditating how he might transfer them into her own [B]. Upon the return of Mr. Davison into England, after the conclusion of this treaty, he was declared of the Privy Council, and appointed one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in conjunction with Sir Francis Walsingham (i); so that, at this time, these offices may be affirmed to have been as well filled as in any period that can be assigned in our history, and yet by persons of very different, or rather opposite dispositions; for Walsingham was a man of great art and intrigue, one who was not displeased that he was thought such a person, and whose capacity was still deeper than those who understood it best apprehended it to be (k). Davison, on the other hand, had a just reputation for wisdom and probity; and, though he had been concerned in many intricate affairs, yet he preserved a character so unspotted, that, to the time he came into this office, he had done nothing that could draw upon him the least imputation (l). It is an opinion countenanced by Camden, and which has met with general acceptance, that he was raised in order to be ruined, and that, when he was made Secretary of State, there was a view of obliging him to go out of his depth in that matter, which brought upon him all his misfortunes (m). This conjecture is very plausible, and yet there is good reason to doubt whether it is well founded. Mr. Davison had attached himself, during the progress of his fortunes, to the potent Earl of Leicester; and it was chiefly to his favour and interest that he stood indebted for this high employment, in which if he was deceived by another great Statesman, it could not be said that he was raised and ruined by the same hands. But there is nothing more probable than that the bringing about such an event by an instrument which his rival had raised, and then removing him, and rendering his parts useless to those who had raised him, gave a double satisfaction to him who managed this design. The tracing the principal steps of this transaction, which was, without doubt, one of the finest strokes of political management in that whole reign, was what chiefly determined us to insert this article. When the resolution was taken, in the beginning of October 1586, to bring the Queen of Scots to a trial, and a commission was issued for that purpose, Secretary Davison's name was inserted in that commission; but it does not appear that he was present when that commission was opened at Fotheringay Castle, on the 11th of October, or that he ever insisted there at all (n). Indeed, the management of that transaction was very wisely left in the hands of those who, with so much address, had conducted the antecedent business for the conviction of Anthony Babington, and his accomplices, upon the truth and justice of which, the proceedings against the Queen of Scots entirely depended (o). On the 25th of October the sentence was declared in the Star Chamber, things proceeding still in the same channel, and nothing particularly done by Secretary Davison (p). On the 29th of the same month the Parliament met, in which Serjeant Puckering was Speaker of the House of Commons; and, upon an application from both Houses, Queen Elizabeth caused the sentence to be published, which, soon after, was notified to the Queen of Scots (q): yet, hitherto, all was transacted by the other Secretary, who was considered, by the nation in general, as the person who had led this prosecution from beginning to end [C]. The true meaning of this long and solemn proceeding was certainly to [B] How he might transfer them into her own.] After the taking of Antwerp by the Spaniards, it became absolutely requisite for the Queen to determine what part she would take in the concerns of the Continent, and upon what terms she would agree to assist the Dutch in the defence of their liberties. The eyes of all Europe were then fixed upon her conduct, and many great Princes abroad thought she had better declined than accepted the offers of the States. Some of her own council were of that opinion, and it was the Earl of Leicester and his party who pressed her to this conjunction, that Earl himself intending to go, as he afterwards did, in a very high character to Holland (6). The treaty with the States, was negotiated between their Ministers, and a Committee of the Privy Council here; but the carrying it into execution was entirely remitted to the care of Mr. Davison. The Queen's instructions to him, countersigned by Secretary Walsingham, are still preserved, and consist of nine articles, but they are without date (7). It appears, however, that in September 1585, his negotiation was far advanced; for upon the 5th of that month, the Queen sent him a commission to take possession of Flushing in her behalf, and to put the Brill into the hands of the person whom General Norris should appoint (8). There are also letters extant from him to the Earl of Leicester and Secretary Walsingham, relating to these affairs; as also a very remarkable dispatch from the Commissioners, who had concluded this treaty, to Mr. Davison, dated October the 3d, in which they acquaint him of her Majesty's entire approbation of his conduct, and signify that the discontent which it seems had been already shewn about this treaty, did not in the least regard him, but referred to those who had the administration of affairs in Holland, who are said to have shewn a spirit of over-reaching; and as they were composed of traders and advocates, the former respecting nothing but their profit, and the latter flying naturally to quirks and tricks, there was no better to be expected from them (9). Upon the whole, it appears that no Minister could have greater trust reposed in him, or desire a more ample approbation of his services than he met with. In one thing only he seems to have been a little uneasy, and that was the narrowness of his allowance, which made him very desirous of returning to England, that the rise of his reputation might not be purchased with the ruin of his estate (10). He was not however recalled till after the Earl of Leicester went over thither; and we find the Lord Treasurer Burleigh intreating him to give his advice to his eldest son Mr. Thomas Cecil, appointed Governor of the Brill, at the same time that Sir Philip Sydney succeeded Mr. Davison in the command of Flushing (11).

[A] And to depend wholly upon aſſiſtance from England.] The great jealouſy Queen Elizabeth had of every thing that paſſed in Scotland, made her extremely careful in the choice of all ſuch perſons as, in the courſe of her reign, ſhe had occaſion to ſend thither. At this time, not only Mary Queen of Scots was priſoner in England, but her ſon James VI. was alſo a priſoner to ſome of his own ſubjects in Scotland. It was to facilitate the liberty of both, that the French King ſent ambaſſadors to England in the beginning of the year 1583, with inſtructions to try whether Queen Elizabeth might not be induced to conſent, that Mary Queen of Scots, being releaſed, ſhould return home and govern jointly with her ſon (1). The Queen ſeemed not averſe to this propoſal, in caſe ſhe had any reaſonable ſecurity, that the Queen of Scots and her ſon, would undertake nothing to her prejudice; and, as they were to go into Scotland, to preſs the ſame thing there, ſhe took care to join Mr. Daviſon on her part in the ſame journey, and with the ſame commiſſion (2). We have in the memoirs, which of thoſe times and that country are beſt eſteemed, a very extraordinary, though a very ſhort, account of this embaſſy, which it is neceſſary the reader ſhould ſee. 'About this 'time the Lord Burleigh, chief ruler in England, 'cauſed ſend in one Mr. Daviſon, to be an agent 'here, to ſee what buſineſs he could brew, who was 'afterwards made Secretary. For after the deceaſe 'of Walſingham, Secretary Cecil being advanced to 'be Lord Burleigh and Great Treaſurer of England, 'two Secretaries were choſen, one called Mr. Smith, 'and this Daviſon, whoſe predeceſſor was a Scotſman. Upon which conſideration, he was thought 'more able to conquer credit here. He had been 'in Scotland before, and was at my houſe in company with Sir Henry Killigrew, my old friend, 'when he was reſident in Scotland. At which time 'he acknowledged to me that he was come of Scotſmen, and was a Scotſman in his heart, and a favourer of the King's right and title to the Crown 'of England. He deſired me to keep all ſecret from 'Mr. Killigrew, promiſing, if he could find the means 'to be employed here, that he would do good office. 'His Majeſty was for the time at Falkland, and wrote 'for me to be directed to ride and meet the ſaid 'Daviſon; whom I was commanded to convey to 'Coupar, there to remain till his Majeſty had time 'to give him audience. Afterwards I convoyed him 'to my own houſe, and from that to Falkland, 'where his Majeſty found his commiſſion to ſmall 'avail. But becauſe Walſingham had refuſed at his 'being here to ſpeak with the Earl of Arran; albeit, 'the ſaid Earl had offered, by me, to give ſatisfaction to him in all his deſires, ſo that he would confer with him, which Walſingham ſtill refuſed; 'but Mr. Daviſon was directed at this time to deal 'with the Earl of Arran, to ſee what advantage 'might be had at his hand. For my Lord Burleigh 'was not content that Walſingham was ſo preciſe; 'therefore Daviſon entered into familiarity with him, 'and was made his goſſip, and heard his frank offers 'and liked well of them. For after that the Lords 'were fled to England and forefalted, the Council of 'England thought they had ſome ground to build a 'new faction upon, to trouble the King and his 'Eſtate. And whereas the ſaid Daviſon had promiſed before to ſhew himſelf a kind Scotſman, I 'perceived him clean altered, and a perfect practiſer 'againſt the quiet of this ſtate, whereof I advertiſed 'his Majeſty. After his return to England, not to 'have ſuch a fear as it formerly had of the Earl of 'Arran. For there was a meeting drawn on at the 'borders, betwixt the Earl of Hunſdon and the Earl 'of Arran, who had long and privy conference together, to keep a great friendſhip betwixt the two 'princes and countries, with a ſecret plot, that the 'Earl of Arran ſhould keep the King unmarried for 'three years; under this pretext, that there was a 'young maid of the blood in England, who about 'that time would be ready for marriage, whereupon 'the Queen would declare his Majeſty ſecond perſon (3).' This quotation ſufficiently ſhews how little credit is due, even to the beſt memoirs, when they are plainly written from memory, and not in the ſtrict way of journal; for in all that Sir James has ſet down, there is very little, if any, truth. All the world knows, that Lord Burleigh was Treaſurer long before the death of Sir Francis Walſingham, and that he was Joint Secretary with Mr. Daviſon, who was not ſent by Lord Burleigh, neither did he come after Walſingham, or treat with thoſe with whom Walſingham refuſed to treat, but almoſt a year before him (4). The King was in the hands of the Earl of Gowry, when Mr. Daviſon treated with him: afterwards the King made his eſcape, proſecuted thoſe who had confined him, and recalled the Earl of Arran, contrary to his promiſe; to expoſtulate with him, upon all which, Queen Elizabeth, ſome months after, ſent Sir Francis Walſingham (5): ſo that there is the ſtrangeſt confuſion in theſe memoirs, that ever appeared in a book written by a perſon of ſo great credit and capacity. It may however be true, that Mr. Daviſon had at this time altered his ſentiments; and there is very little reaſon to doubt what he ſays of his extraction, ſince it was not any evil intention that led him into theſe miſtakes; but the fault was entirely in his memory, which here, and in many other places, betrayed him.

[C] Who had led this prosecution from beginning to end.] Such as are acquainted with the history of those times, know, that the whole of Babington's conspiracy was detected by Sir Francis Walsingham, and that he suffered it to go on for some time after it was discovered, that he might the more effectually come at the bottom of it, and trace out all that were concerned in it (12). Upon this, it was resolved to remove the Queen of Scots, and to continue her closely, either in Hertford Castle, or at Fotheringay. When the last-mentioned place was resolved on, orders were sent to Sir Amias Pawlet, then her keeper, for to remove, as far as poſſible, any reflection upon Queen Elizabeth: and, that it might appear in the moſt conſpicuous manner to the world, that ſhe was urged, and even conſtrained, to take the life of the Queen of Scots, inſtead of ſeeking or deſiring it. This aſſertion is not founded upon conjecture, but is a direct matter of fact: for, in her firſt anſwer to the Parliament, given at Richmond the 12th of November, ſhe complained that the late act had brought her into a great ſtrait, by obliging her to give directions for that Queen's death; and, upon the ſecond application, on the 24th of the ſame month, the Queen enters largely into the conſequences that muſt naturally follow upon her taking that ſtep, and, on the conſideration of them, grounds her returning no definitive reſolution even to this ſecond application (r). The delay which followed after the publication of the ſentence, gave an opportunity for the French King, and ſeveral other Princes, to interpoſe, but more eſpecially to King James, whoſe Ambaſſadors, and particularly Sir Robert Melvile, preſſed the Queen very hard (s). Camden ſays, that his Ambaſſadors, unſeaſonably mixing threatenings with intreaties, they were not very welcome; ſo that, after a few days, the Ambaſſadors were diſmiſſed, with ſmall hopes of ſucceeding in what they came about (t). But we are elſewhere told, that, when Melvile requeſted a reſpite of execution for eight days, ſhe anſwered, Not an hour (u). This ſeemed to be a plain declaration of her Majeſty's final determination, and ſuch in all probability it was, ſo that her death being reſolved, the only point that remained under debate was, how ſhe ſhould die, that is, whether by the hand of an executioner, or otherwiſe (w). In reſpect to this, the two Secretaries ſeem to have been of different ſentiments. Mr. Daviſon thought the forms of juſtice ſhould go on, and the end of this melancholy tranſaction correſpond with the reſt of the proceedings (x). Upon this Sir Francis Walſingham pretended ſickneſs, and did not come to Court, and by this means the whole buſineſs of drawing and bringing the warrant to the Queen to ſign fell upon Daviſon, who, purſuant to the Queen's directions, went through it (y) in the manner that Camden has related [D]. But it is very remarkable, that, while theſe judicial ſteps were taking, the other method, for her removal, with inſtructions not to give her above two days warning, and not to let her know whither ſhe was going, till after ſhe had been two or three days upon the road. At length, when ſhe was brought to Fotheringay, Queen Elizabeth herſelf thought proper to write, or at leaſt to ſubſcribe with her own hand, the following letter to Sir Amias Pawlet, in gratitude, as Mr. Strype ſays, for his fidelity ſhewn in the management of that removal, which letter was tranſcribed from a copy taken by Michael Hickes, the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh's Secretary (13).

To my faithful Amyas.

AMYAS, my moſt careful and faithful ſervant, God reward thee trebleſold in the double, for thy moſt troubleſome charge ſo well diſcharged. If you knew, my Amyas, how kindly, beſides dutifully, my grateful heart accepteth your double labours and faithful actions, your wiſe orders, and ſafe conduct, performed in ſo dangerous and crafty a charge, it would eaſe your travel [trouble writ over head] and rejoice your heart. After which I charge you to carry this moſt juſt thought, that I cannot balance in any weight of my judgement, the value I prize you at; and ſuppoſe no treaſure to countervail ſuch a faith, and condemn myſelf in that fault which I have committed, if I reward not ſuch deſerts. Yea, let me lack, when I have moſt need, if I acknowledge not ſuch a merit with a reward; non omnibus datum.

But let your wicked miſtreſs know how, with hearty ſorrow, her vile deſerts compel theſe orders; and bid her from me, aſk God forgiveneſs for her treacherous dealing towards the ſaver of her life many years, to the intolerable peril of her own. And yet, not content with ſo many forgiveneſſes, muſt fall again ſo horribly far paſſing a woman, much more a princeſs. Inſtead of excuſing, whereof not one can ſerve, it being ſo plainly confeſſed by the authors of my guiltleſs death; let repentance take place, and let not the fiend poſſeſs, ſo as her beſt part be loſt. Which I pray, with hands lifted up to him that may both ſave and ſpill, with my loving adieu, and prayer for thy long life,

Your aſſured and loving ſovereign in heart,
by good deſert induced,
ELIZABETH Regina.

[D] In the manner that Camden has related] When one conſiders the many and great advantages this hiſtorian had, as himſelf declares, and as the papers he refers to prove, one cannot but pay a very high deference to his authority. But at the ſame time it cannot but afford the curious reader a very high pleaſure to compare his accounts of things, with the papers themſelves, from which he promiſes to have drawn them. We have on another occaſion inſerted his extract from Mr. Daviſon's apology (14): in a ſucceeding note we ſhall inſert that ſingular paper as it fell from our author's own hand (15). At preſent let us ſee how he choſe to repreſent the whole of this tranſaction (16), after weighing and conſidering thoſe authentick authorities which were in his poſſeſſion.

'In the midſt,' ſays he, 'of theſe doubtful and 'perplexing thoughts which ſo troubled and ſtag-'gered the Queen's mind, that ſhe gave herſelf 'wholly over to ſolitarineſs, ſate many times melan-'choly and mute, and frequently ſighing, muttered 'this to herſelf, Aut fer aut feri, that is, either bear 'or ſtrike; and out of I know not what emblem, 'Ne feriare feri, that is, ſtrike leſt thou be ſtricken; 'ſhe delivered a writing to Daviſon, one of her Se-'cretaries, ſigned with her own hand, commanding 'a warrant under the Great Seal of England, to be 'drawn up for the execution, which ſhould lie in 'readineſs if any danger chanced to break forth in 'that time of jealouſy and fear, and commanded 'him to acquaint no man therewith. But the next 'day, while fear ſeemed to be afraid of her own 'counſels and deſigns, her mind changed, and ſhe 'commanded Daviſon, by William Killigrew, that 'the warrant ſhould not be drawn. Daviſon came 'preſently to the Queen, and told her that it was 'drawn and under ſeal already. She was ſomewhat 'moved at it, and blamed him for making ſuch haſte. 'He notwithſtanding acquainted the Council both 'with the warrant and the whole matter, and eaſily 'perſuaded them, who were apt to believe what they 'deſired, that the Queen had commanded it ſhould 'be executed. Hereupon, without any delay, Beale, 'who in reſpect of religion, was of all others, the 'Queen of Scots' moſt bitter adverſary, was ſent 'down with one or two executioners, and a warrant, 'wherein authority was given to the Earls of 'Shrewſbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and 'others, to ſee her executed according to law, and 'this without any knowledge of the Queen at all. 'And though ſhe at that very time told Daviſon, 'that ſhe would take another courſe with the Queen 'of Scots, yet did not he for all that call Beale 'back.'

to which the Queen herſelf ſeemed to incline, proceeded alſo, and Secretary Walſingham, notwithſtanding his ſickneſs, wrote the very day the warrant was ſigned, which was Wedneſday, February 1ſt, 1586-7, to Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drew Drury, to put them in mind of the aſſociation, as a thing that might countenance at leaſt, if not juſtify, this other way of removing the Queen of Scots (z). It is true, that Mr. Daviſon ſubſcribed this letter, and wrote another to the ſame perſons two days after; but it appears plainly from the anſwer, that the keepers of the Queen of Scots conſidered the motion as coming from Walſingham. Theſe letters will be found in the notes [E]. The warrant being delivered to the Lords of the Council, they ſent it down by Mr. Beale, their Clerk, a man of ſour and ſtubborn temper, and who had always ſhewn a great bitterneſs againſt the Queen of Scots. The day of his departure does not appear; but Queen Mary had notice given her on the Monday to prepare for death on the Wedneſday, which ſhe accordingly ſuffered (a). As ſoon as Queen Elizabeth was informed of it, ſhe expreſſed great reſentment againſt her Council, forbad them her preſence, and the Court; and cauſed ſome of them to be examined, as if ſhe intended to call them to an account for the ſhare they had in this tranſaction (b). We are not told particularly who theſe Counſellors were, excepting the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh (c), who fell into a temporary diſgrace about it, and was actually a witneſs againſt Mr.

To Sir Amice Poulet.

AFTER our hearty commendations, we find by ſpeech lately uttered by her Majeſty, that ſhe doth note in you, both a lack of that care and zeal of her ſervice that ſhe looketh for at your hands, in that you have not in all this time, of yourſelves, without other provocation, found out ſome way to ſhorten the life of that Queen; conſidering the great peril ſhe is ſubject unto hourly, ſo long as the ſaid Queen ſhall live. Wherein, beſides a kind of lack of love towards her, ſhe noteth greatly, that you have not that care of your own particular ſafeties, or rather of the preſervation of religion and the publick good, and proſperity of your country, that reaſon and policy commandeth, eſpecially having ſo good a warrant and ground for the ſatisfaction of your conſcience towards God and the diſcharge of your credit and reputation towards the world, as the oath of aſſociation which you both have ſo ſolemnly taken and vowed, and eſpecially the matter wherewith ſhe ſtandeth charged, being ſo clearly and manifeſtly proved againſt her. And therefore ſhe taketh it moſt unkindly, that men profeſſing that love towards her, that you do, ſhould, in any kind of ſort, for lack of the diſcharge of your duties, caſt the burthen upon her; knowing as you do, her indiſpoſition to ſhed blood, eſpecially of one of that ſex and quality, and ſo near to her in blood as the ſaid Queen is. Theſe reſpects we find do greatly trouble her Majeſty, who, we aſſure you, has ſundry times proteſted, that if the regard of this danger of her good ſubjects and faithful ſervants did not more move her than her own peril, ſhe would never be drawn to aſſent to the ſhedding her blood. We thought it very meet to acquaint you with theſe ſpeeches lately paſſed from her Majeſty, referring the ſame to your good judgements, and ſo we commit you to the protection of the Almighty.

At London, Feb. 1, 1586. Your moſt aſſured friends,

FRANCIS WALSINGHAM,
WILLIAM DAVISON.

This letter was received at Fotheringay, the 2d of February, at five in the afternoon.

An abſtract of a letter from Mr. Secretary Daviſon, of the ſaid 1ſt of February, 1586, as followeth.

'I pray let this and the incloſed be committed to 'the fire, which meaſure ſhall be likewiſe meet to 'your anſwer, after it hath been communicated to 'her Majeſty for her ſatisfaction.'

A poſtſcript in a letter from Mr. Secretary Daviſon, of the 3d of February, 1586.

'I intreated you in my laſt, to burn my letters 'ſent unto you, for the argument ſake; which by 'your anſwer to Mr. Secretary (which I have ſeen) 'appeareth not to have been done. I pray you, let 'me intreat you to make heretiques of the one and 'the other, as I mean to uſe yours, after her Ma'jeſty hath ſeen it.'

In the end of the poſtſcript.

'I pray you let me hear what you have done with 'my letters, becauſe they are not fit be kept, that 'I may ſatisfie her Majeſty therein, who might other'wiſe take offence thereat; and if you entreat this 'poſtſcript in the ſame manner, you ſhall not erre a 'whit. '(A. Poulet, D. Drury.)'

A copy of a letter to Sir Francis Walſingham, of the 2d of February, 1586, at 6 in the afternoon, being the anſwer to a letter from him, the ſaid Sir Francis, of the 1ſt of February, 1586, received at Fotheringhay, the 2d day of February, at five in the afternoon.

SIR,

YOUR letters of yeſterday coming to my hands this preſent day at five in the afternoon, I would not fail, according to your directions, to return my anſwer with all poſſible ſpeed, which ſhall deliver unto you, with great grief and bitterneſs of mind in that I am ſo unhappy to have lyven to ſee this unhappy day, in the which I am required, by direction from my moſt gracious ſovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbiddeth. My good livings and life are at her Majeſty's diſpoſition, and am ready to loſe them this next morrow, yf it ſhall ſo pleaſe her; acknowledging that I hold them as of her meer and moſt gracious favour. I do not deſire them, to enjoy them, but with her Highneſſe's good liking: but God forbid that I ſhould make ſo fowle a ſhipwracke of my conſcience, or leave ſo great a blott to my poſteritie, or ſhed blood without law and warrant; truſting that her Majeſty, of her accuſtomed clemency, will take this my dutiful anſwer in good part (and the rather, by your good mediation) as proceeding from one who will never be inferior to any Chriſtian ſubject living, in duty, honour, love, and obedience towards his ſovereign. And thus I commit you to the mercy of the Almightie. From Fotheringhay, the 2d of February, 1586. Your moſt aſſured poore friends,

A. POULET.
D. DRURY.

Your letters coming in the plural number, ſeem to be meant as to Sir Drew Drewrye, as to myſelf; and yet, becauſe he is not named in them, neither the letter directed unto him, he forbeareth to make any anſwer, but ſubſcribeth in heart to my opinion.

Daviſon.

Daviſon. As for the Earl of Leiceſter and Secretary Walſingham, they had prudently withdrawn themſelves at the laſt act of the tragedy, and took care to publiſh ſo much by their letters into Scotland (d). As for Secretary Daviſon, upon whom it was reſolved the whole weight of this buſineſs ſhould fall, he was deprived of his office, and ſent priſoner to the Tower, at which nobody ſeems to have been ſo much alarmed as the Lord Treaſurer (e), who, though himſelf at that time in diſgrace, wrote thereupon to the Queen in ſtrong terms, and once intended to have written in much ſtronger [F]. This application had no effect; for the Queen having ſent her kinſman Mr. Cary, ſon to the Lord Hunſdon, into Scotland, to excuſe the matter to King James, charged with a letter to him, under her own hand, in which ſhe, in the ſtrongeſt terms poſſible, aſſerted her own innocence (f); there was a neceſſity of doing ſomething, that might carry an air of evidence, in ſupport of the turn ſhe had now given to the death of that Princeſs. On the 28th of March following, Daviſon, after having undergone various examinations, was brought to his trial in the Star Chamber, for the contempt of which he had been guilty, in revealing the Queen's counſels to her Privy Counſellors, and performing what he underſtood to be the duty of his office in quality of her Secretary. We have ſeveral accounts of this trial, which, in a variety of circumſtances, differ from each other [G]. In this, however, they all agree, that the Judges, who fined him ten thouſand marks, and impriſonment during the Queen's pleaſure, gave him a very high character, and declared him to be, in their opinions, both an able and an honeſt man (g). One thing is very remarkable, that, in the concluſion of this buſineſs, Sir Chriſtopher Wray, Chief Juſtice of the Queen's Bench, told the Court, that, though the Queen had been offended with her Council, and had left them to examination, yet now ſhe forgave them, being ſatisfied that they were miſled by this man's ſuggeſtions (b). Sir James Melvile, who wrote at that time, and who ſeems to have had ſome prejudice againſt Daviſon, ſaid very candidly and fairly, upon this occaſion, that he was deceived by the Council (i). As ſoon as the proceeding was over, the Queen, to put it out of doubt with the King of Scots, that his mother was put to death without her privity or intention, ſent him the judgement given againſt Daviſon, ſubſcribed by thoſe who had given it, and exemplified under the Great Seal, together with another inſtrument, under the hands of all the Judges of England, that the ſentence againſt his mother could not in the leaſt prejudice his title to the ſucceſſion (k). As for Mr. Daviſon, now left to a ſtrange

[F] And once intended to have written in much ſtronger.] We have ſhewn in its proper place, what degree of Queen Elizabeth's reſentment fell upon the Lord Treaſurer, who was not only forbidden the Queen's preſence and the court, but examined, when perhaps unwittingly he let fall ſomething, as if what Mr. Daviſon ſaid of the Queen's intention induced him and the reſt of the Council, to ſend the warrant by Beale. This ſeems to have thrown the ſtorm upon Daviſon, and to have occaſioned his being committed to the Tower; the news of which ſo much ſurprized the Treaſurer, that on Monday, February the 13th, he drew up a letter to the Queen, of which, as Mr. Strype aſſures us, the laſt paragraph ran in the following words (18). 'And having ended that con-

'mitted to the Tower, who beſt knoweth his own
'cauſe, the example will be ſorrowful to all your 'faithful ſervants, and joyful to your enemies. And 'as I can remember many examples in your father's,
'your brother's, your ſiſter's, yea your own time, of 'committing of counſellors either to other men's 'houſes, or to their own; ſo can I not remember
'any one example of a a counſellor committed to the 'Tower, but where they are attainted afterwards of 'high-treaſon: and what your Majeſty intendeth to'wards this your ſervant, I know not; but ſure I
'am, and I preſume to have ſome judgement therein,
'I know not a man in the land, ſo furniſhed univer-
'ſally for the place, and neither know I any that 'can come near him.'

Thus it was in the firſt minutes of this Lord's letter concerning Daviſon; but in his review thereof ſent to the Queen, it ran in theſe words with more reſerve.

'I beſeech your Majeſty pardon me, to remember
'to let you underſtand my opinion of Mr. Daviſon.
'I never perceived by him, that he thought your
'Majeſty would have miſliked to have had an end
'of the late capital enemy. And what your Majeſty
'minded to him in your diſpleaſure, I hear to my 'grief. But for a ſervant in that place, I think it 'hard to find a like qualified perſon. Whom to 'ruin in your heavy diſpleaſure, ſhall be more your
'Majeſty's loſs than his.' W. B.

[G] Which, in a variety of circumſtances, differ from each other.] The learned Camden has given a very ſuccinct and elegant detail of the proceedings (19), beſides which, there is a manuſcript account of the trial in Caius College in Cambridge (20), and a third in the Bodleian Library in Oxford, taken by one William Nutt (21), who was an eye-witneſs. Whoever ſhall compare theſe, will find the truth of what is aſſerted in the text; and that they very ſeldom agree preciſely in any thing, not ſo much as ſetting down in the ſame order the names of the Commiſſioners, a thing in itſelf very material, not only in regard to their precedency, but alſo as to their order in ſpeaking. Theſe commiſſioners were, Sir Chriſtopher Wray, Chief Juſtice of England, who for the time, ſat as Lord Privy Seal; the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Archbiſhop of York, the Earl of Worceſter, the Earl of Cumberland, and the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Grey, and Lord Lumley, Sir James Croft the Comptroller, Sir Gilbert Gerrard Maſter of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, Edmund Anderſon, Sir Roger Manwood the Lord Chief Baron, and Sir Walter Mildway the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Camden aſſerts, that the charge againſt him, by Popham the Attorney General, was, that the Queen from her innate clemency, never intended the Queen of Scots, though condemned, ſhould have been put to death, notwithſtanding which, ſhe ordered the warrant to be drawn up, and committed it to Daviſon's truſt and ſecrecy. Neither of the other trials come up to this, but ſay, only, that ſhe committed the warrant of ſpecial care and truſt, to Mr. Daviſon, that it might be ready on any ſudden occaſion. Mr. Daviſon's defence in the Cambridge manuſcript, differs in ſeveral things from Camden's account of it: the Oxford manuſcript differs from both, eſpecially in this, that it aſſerts, Mr. Daviſon affirmed therein, that when the Queen delivered him the warrant, ſhe did it with this expreſſion, 'Now you 'have it, let me be troubled no more with it.' It is in all the trials agreed, that the Lord Treaſurer's evidence, and Daviſon's own examinations, were all the proofs inſiſted upon; but that the Queen's Counſel refuſed to read thoſe examinations, as things improper to be divulged; nor is there a ſyllable of them in any of the trials. Yet they are ſtill preſerved, and the curious reader may have recourſe to them if he pleaſes.

reward for his paſt ſervices, a long impriſonment, which brought upon him downright indigence, he comforted himſelf with the thoughts of his innocence; and, to ſecure his memory from being blaſted by that judgement which had withered his fortune, he had long before written an Apology for his own conduct, which he addreſſed to Secretary Walſingham, as the man moſt intereſted in it, and who could beſt teſtify whether what he affirmed was truth or not. In this he gave a very clear and natural detail of the tranſaction which coſt him all his ſufferings [H]. It is allowed by all who have written on

Secretary Daviſon's Apology, addreſſed to Sir Francis Walſingham.

On Wedneſday the 1ſt of this preſent, about ten of the clock, came one of the Grooms of the Chamber to me, to let me underſtand, that her Majeſty had called for me by my Lord Admiral, who was in the Privy Chamber. I found his Lordſhip there, who told me the cauſe of my ſending for. Having firſt ſummarily diſcourſed unto me, ſome ſpeech that had paſſed that morning betwixt her Majeſty and him, touching the execution of the Scottiſh Queen, the concluſion of which was, that ſhe would no longer defer it, and therefore had commanded him to ſend expreſsly for me to bring the warrant unto her; whereupon, returning to my chamber, I took both that and divers other things to be ſigned for her ſervice, and returning back, ſent in Mr. Brook to ſignify my being there to her Majeſty, who immediately called for me. At my coming in, her Majeſty, firſt aſking me, Whether I had been abroad that fair morning, adviſing me to uſe it oftner, and reprehending me for the contrary, finally demanded, What I had in my hands? I anſwered, Divers warrants, and others things, to be ſigned for her Majeſty's ſervice. She enquired, Whether my Lord Admiral had not ſent for me, and whether I had not brought up the warrant for the Scots Queen? I anſwered, Yes, and thereupon calling for it, I delivered it into her hands. After the reading thereof, calling for pen and ink, ſhe ſigned it, and laying it from her, aſked me, Whether I was not heartily ſorry that it was done? Mine anſwer was, That I was ſorry a Lady ſo near in blood to herſelf, and of her place and quality, ſhould ſo far forget her duty to God and her Majeſty, as to give her this cauſe. But ſince this act of her Majeſty was in all mens opinion of that juſtice and neceſſity, that ſhe could not defer it without the manifeſt danger of her perſon and ſtate, I could not be ſorry to ſee her Majeſty take this courſe of removing the cauſe of that danger, which threatened the one and the other; proteſting nevertheleſs, that I was ſo far from thirſting after the blood of that unhappy Lady, that if there had been any other way to preſerve her Majeſty and the State from miſchief, than by taking her life, I could have wiſhed it. But the caſe ſtanding ſo in the opinion of all men, that either her Majeſty or ſhe muſt die, I muſt confeſs freely, that I preferred the death of the guilty before the innocent. After this ſhe commanded me to carry it to the Seal, and to give my Lord Chancellor order from her to uſe it as ſecretly as might be, and, by the way, to ſhow it to Mr. Secretary Walſingham, becauſe ſhe thought the grief thereof would kill him outright, for ſo it pleaſed her Majeſty to ſay of him. This done, ſhe called for the reſt of the warrants, and other things I had to ſign, and diſpatched them all with the beſt diſpoſition and willingneſs that could be. In the mean time, repeating unto me ſome reaſons why ſhe had ſo long deferred the matter, as namely, for her honour's ſake, that the world might ſee that ſhe had not been violently or maliciouſly drawn unto it, ſhe concluded, that ſhe was never ſo ill adviſed as not to ſee and apprehend her own danger, and the neceſſity ſhe had to proceed to this execution; and thereupon, after ſome intermingled ſpeech here and there, ſhe told me, ſhe would have it done as ſecretly as might be, and miſliking that it ſhould be executed in the open Court, or green of the Caſtle, expreſsly willed, that it ſhould be done in the hall; which I take to be a certain argument, both of her meaning it ſhould be done, and in the form preſcribed in the warrant. But after I had gathered up my papers, and was ready to depart, ſhe fell into ſome complaint of Sir Amias Paulet and others, that might have eaſed her of this burthen, wiſhing me yet to deal with Mr. Secretary, and that he would jointly write to Sir Amias and Sir Drury, to ſound their diſpoſitions, aiming ſtill at this, that it might be ſo done, as the blame might be removed from herſelf. And though I had always refuſed before to meddle therein, upon ſundry of her Majeſty's former motions, as a thing I utterly condemned, yet was I content, as I told her for her ſatisfaction, to let Sir Amias underſtand what ſhe expected at his hands; albeit I did beforehand aſſure myſelf it ſhould be ſo much labour loſt, knowing the wiſdom and integrity of the gentleman, who I thought would not do any unlawful act for any reſpect in the world: but finding her Majeſty deſirous to have him ſounded in this behalf, I departed from her Majeſty with promiſe to ſignify ſo much to Mr. Secretary, and that we would both acquaint Sir Amias of her pleaſure. And here repeating to me again, that ſhe would have the matter cloſely handled, becauſe of her danger, I promiſed to uſe it as ſecretly as I could; and ſo, for that time, departed. That afternoon I repaired to my Lord Chancellor, where I procured the warrant to be ſealed, having in my way viſited Mr. Secretary, and agreed with him about the form of the letter which ſhould be written for her Majeſty's ſatisfying to Sir Amias Paulet and Mr. Drury, which, at my returning to my Lord Chancellor, was diſpatched. The next morning I received a letter from Cranmer, my ſervant, whom I left at Court, ſignifying unto me her Majeſty's pleaſure, that I ſhould forbear going to my Lord Chancellor's till I had ſpoken with her. And within an hour after came William Killigrew, with the like meſſage from her, whom I returned with this anſwer, that I would be at the Court as ſoon as himſelf, and give her Majeſty an account of what I had done. At my coming to her, ſhe aſked me whether I had been at my my Lord Chancellor's? I anſwered her, Yes; ſhe demanded, What needed that haſt? I anſwered, That I had done no more than ſhe commanded, and thought it no matter to be dallied withal: but, faith ſhe, methinks the beſt and ſafeſt way for me is to have it otherways handled, particularizing a form, that ſhe, as ſhe pretended, liked better, naming unto me ſome that were of that opinion, whoſe judgements ſhe commended. I anſwered, That I took the honourable and juſt way to be the beſt and ſafeſt, if ſhe meant to have it done at all; whereto her Majeſty replying nothing for that time, left me, and went to dinner. Within a day or two after, her Majeſty being in the Privy Camber, called me unto her, and ſmiling told me, how ſhe had been troubled with me that night, upon a dream ſhe had that the Scots Queen was executed, pretending to be ſo troubled with the news, that if ſhe had had a ſword ſhe could have run me through. But this being delivered in a pleaſant and ſmiling manner, I anſwered her Majeſty, That it was good I was not near her ſo long as that humour laſted; but withal, taking hold of her ſpeech, I aſked her Majeſty in great earneſtneſs, What it meant, and whether, having proceeded thus far, ſhe had not a meaning to go forward with the execution? Confirming this with a ſolemn oath, and ſome vehemency, ſhe anſwered, Yes; but ſhe thought it might receive a better form, becauſe, ſaith ſhe, this caſteth the whole burthen upon myſelf; whereto I replied, That the form preſcribed by her warrant was ſuch as the law required, and the only form that was to be kept in honour and juſtice. She anſwered, there were wiſer men than myſelf of another opinion. I told her, I could not anſwer for other men; but this I was ſure of, that I never heard any man give ſound reaſon to prove it either honourable

on this ſubject, and more eſpecially by Camden, that he was a very unhappy, though, at the ſame time, a very capable and honeſt man. As ſuch we have ſeen him recommended able or ſafe for her Majeſty, to take any other courſe than that which ſtandeth with law and juſtice: ſo, without farther replication or ſpeech at that time, her Majeſty roſe up and left me.

The ſame afternoon (as I take it) ſhe aſked me if I had heard from Sir Amias Paulet. I told her no: but within an hour or two after, going to London, I met with letters from him in anſwer to thoſe that were written to him by Mr. Secretary and myſelf. The next morning having acceſs to her Majeſty, upon ſome other occaſion, I told her I had letters from Mr. Paulet, which her Majeſty, deſirous to ſee, took and read; but finding thereby that he was grieved with the motion made unto him, offered his life and all he had to be diſpoſed of by her Majeſty, but abſolutely refuſing to be an inſtrument in any ſuch action as was not warranted in honour or juſtice; her Majeſty falling into ſome terms of offence, complaining of the dainty (as ſhe called it) perjury of him and others, who, contrary to their oath of aſſociation, did caſt the burthen upon herſelf, ſhe roſe up, and, after a turn or two, went into the gallery, whither I followed her: and there renewing her former ſpeech, blaming the niceneſs of thoſe preciſe fellows, who in words would do great things for her ſafety, but in deed perform nothing: and concluded, ſhe would have it well enough done without them; and here, entering into particularities, named unto me, as I remember, one Wingfield, who, ſhe aſſured me, would, with ſome others, undertake it: which gave me occaſion to ſhew unto her Majeſty, how diſhonourable, in my poor opinion, any ſuch courſe would be; how far off ſhe would be from ſhunning the blame and ſtain thereof, which ſhe ſought ſo much to avoid; and here, falling particularly into the caſe of Sir Amias Paulet and Sir Drew Drury, told her, that it was a marvellous extremity ſhe would have expoſed theſe two gentlemen unto, for if, in a tender care for her ſecurity, they ſhould have done that which ſhe deſired, ſhe muſt either allow their act or diſallow it: if ſhe allowed it, ſhe took the matter upon herſelf, with her infinite diſhonour; if ſhe diſallowed it, ſhe overthrew thoſe faithful gentlemen, who, ſhe knew, did truly and faithfully love her; and not only themſelves, but their whole eſtate and poſterity; and therefore thought this a moſt dangerous and diſhonourable courſe, both for herſelf and them; and ſo, after ſome particular ſpeech of Mr. Secretary and others, touching ſome matters paſt heretofore, her Majeſty calling to underſtand whether it was time to go to the cloſet, brake off our diſcourſe.

At my next acceſs to her Majeſty, which I take was Tueſday, the day before my coming from Court, I having certain things to be ſigned, her Majeſty entered of herſelf into ſome earneſt diſcourſe of the danger ſhe daily lived in, and how it was more than time this matter was diſpatched, ſwearing a great oath, that it was a ſhame for them all that it was not done; and thereupon ſpake unto me to have a letter written to Mr. Paulet for the diſpatch thereof; becauſe the longer it was deferred, the more her danger increaſed; whereunto (knowing what order had been taken by my Lords in ſending the commiſſion to the Earls) I anſwered, that I thought there was no neceſſity of ſuch a letter, the warrant being ſo general and ſufficient as it was. Her Majeſty replied little elſe, but that ſhe thought Mr. Paulet would look for it. And this, as near as I can poſſibly remember, is a faithful and true report of what hath paſſed betwixt her Majeſty and me, from the day of ſigning the warrant, and the commandment given unto me to carry it unto the Seal, until the hour of my departure from the Court. In all which I muſt proteſt unfeignedly before God, that I neither remember any ſuch commandment given me by her Majeſty as is pretended, neither did ever I conceive ſuch an intent or meaning in her: and that my innocency herein may the better appear, let it be conſidered, firſt, what the commandment is; and next, upon what conſiderations it was granted. The commandment, as I underſtand it, hath two parts; one, that I ſhould conceal it from the reſt of her Majeſty's Council; another, that I ſhould retain it by myſelf until ſome tumultuary time, as a thing her Majeſty meant not otherwiſe to put in execution; both which, I muſt in all duty and humbleneſs, under her moſt gracious favour, abſolutely deny. And, for the firſt, I truſt, her Majeſty, in her princely and honourable nature, will not deny, but that ſhe firſt ſent for me by my Lord Admiral to bring the warrant unto her, which proveth that his Lordſhip was acquainted with her purpoſe: and next, that ſhe gave me expreſs word, both to carry it forthwith to the Seal, with a meſſage to my Lord Chancellor, who conſequently muſt be acquainted with it, and alſo by the way, to impart it to Mr Secretary; ſo that theſe three being made privy to it with her own good liking, and myſelf, as I ſay, not reſtrained from the contrary by any ſuch commandment as is pretended, what reaſon had I to conceal it from my Lord Treaſurer, to whom my Lord Admiral had firſt imparted it, or from my Lord Leiceſter, to whom her Majeſty had ſignified as much; as, likewiſe, to Mr Vice-Chamberlain; and, as they are all well acquainted with the reſt of the whole proceeding, and as far intereſted in the cauſe as myſelf or any of the others, unleſs her Majeſty had a meaning that Mr. Secretary and I ſhould have dealt alone in ſending of it to the Earls, which, for mine own part, I confeſs I never liked, knowing her Majeſty's purpoſe was often to myſelf to remove as much of the burthen as ſhe might from her own ſhoulders upon others, which I knew my own unfit to ſuſtain. Now, ſeeing the end of ſigning and ſealing this warrant, in all reaſonable probability and judgement, was to go forward; withal that the delay thereof did infinitely increaſe her Majeſty's peril, and thereby hazard the whole eſtate; ſeeing it was imparted to ſome by her Majeſty's own order, and no cauſe or poſſibility being ſealed to keep it from the reſt, as much intereſted in the cauſe as myſelf; and, finally, ſeeing I could neither, as I take it, in law nor duty of a good ſubject, conceal it from them, the cauſe importing ſo greatly her Majeſty's life as it did, and the diſpoſition both of the time and the ſtate of things at home and abroad being ſuch as it was, I truſt it ſhall ſufficiently appear, that I was both in reaſon, duty, and neceſſity, forced thereunto, unleſs I would have wilfully endangered myſelf, whoſe offence, if aught in the mean time had happened amiſs unto her Majeſty, muſt have been in my own cenſure worthy of a thouſand deaths; and as to my proceeding therein with the reſt of my Lords, after it was reſolved that it was neither fit nor convenient to trouble her Majeſty any farther with it, conſidering that ſhe had done all that the law required at her hands, and that ſhe had both to myſelf and others ſignified, at other times, her indiſpoſition to be acquainted with the particular circumſtances of time, place, &c. and that to detain the warrant, in expectation of any farther directions from herſelf, was both needleſs and dangerous, conſidering the hourly hazards her Majeſty lived in. And, finally, that my Lords knowing her Majeſty's unwillingneſs to bear all the burthen alone, were content moſt reſolutely, honourably, and dutifully, to eaſe her as much as they might; with what reaſon and juſtice ſhould I have hindered the courſe of juſtice, tending ſo greatly to her Majeſty's ſafety, and preſervation of the whole realm? and for the other part of keeping it by me to ſuch ends as is before alledged, I truſt the world doth not hold me ſo undutiful to her Majeſty, or ill adviſed for my particular, as to take ſuch a charge upon me, to the evident peril of her Majeſty's life, ſubverſion of the whole eſtate, and mine own utter overthrow; neither is there cauſe to think, I ſpeak in all reverence, and under her Majeſty's gracious favour, that her Majeſty having proceeded ſo far as ſhe had done, to the trial of that lady's fact, found her guilty, by a moſt honourable jury of her Nobility, aſſembled her Parliament only for that purpoſe, graciouſly heard their petitions, and diſmiſſed them with ſo great hope, publiſhed afterwards the proclamation for her diſablement, rejected the ſuits both of the French and Scottiſh mended to Queen Elizabeth by the Treaſurer Burleigh (l), and as ſuch he was ſtrongly recommended by the Earl of Eſſex to King James I. It ſeems, that noble perſon ſtuck faſt by him under his misfortunes, which plainly ſhews the party to which he had always adhered. That Lord loſt no opportunity of ſoliciting the Queen in his favour, and never let ſlip any occaſion of teſtifying for him the warmeſt and the ſincereſt affection (m). At length, it ſeems, he was not altogether unſucceſsful; for though, upon the death of Secretary Walſingham, the Queen abſolutely rejected his motion, that Mr. Daviſon ſhould come into his place, yet, afterwards, it ſeems, that ſhe yielded, in ſome degree, as plainly appears by the Earl's letter to King James, which, for that reaſon, is placed in the notes [I]. That we are under an incapacity of tracing him farther, is owing to the profound ſilence of the writers of thoſe times, who, while they celebrate the fortunate and great, leave the leſs happy in obſcurity, however virtuous or worthy. But, as it is, we have not only collected the ſcattered materials of his memoirs into a body, and thereby added a conſiderable character to this extenſive collection, but have alſo (which is one of the principal intentions of this work) detected a great deal of falſe hiſtory, which has been long obtruded on the world, to the prejudice of truth, and of this Gentleman's memory, who, by his contemporaries, was eſteemed worthy of all honours. We ſee he came not ſuddenly or ſurpriſingly into his high office, but eaſily, naturally, and gradually, in the very ſame way that his predeceſſors Cecil, Smith, and Walſingham, had done, and with the general approbation of all the Council. We ſee that, as he was no mean or obſcure perſon when called to that high employment, ſo he was not given to ſerve turns at the peril of his life and reputation; and that, notwithſtanding the Star Chamber ſentence, he very well knew how to make his innocence plain, both to that age

Kings for her life, and returned their Ambaſſadors hopeleſs; confirmed the impriſonment by her letters to both Princes, (ſome of which it pleaſed her to communicate with myſelf) proteſted many hundred times her neceſſity and reſolution to go through with all, (albeit for ſundry reaſons ſhe had ſo long deferred it) having given her commandment to me many days before, to bring up the warrant unto her, and then voluntarily ſent for it by my Lord Admiral, ſigning it as ſoon as I brought it, her expreſs commandment given me to carry it to the ſeal, and to have it ſecretly handled: and, finally, her particular direction, whilſt ſhe was ſigning other things, at the ſame time to have the execution done in the Hall, miſliking that it ſhould be done in the Green or open Court, with a number of other foregoing and following circumſtances, may ſufficiently teſtify her Majeſty's diſpoſition to have it proceeded in. Albeit ſhe had to myſelf and others declared her unwillingneſs to have been made acquainted with the time, and other circumſtances, having done all that the law required of her, or that in honour was fit and expedient for her to do.

[I] Which for that reaſon is placed in the notes.] We will, in this note, diſcuſs with as much a brevity as poſſible what relates to the character and fortune of Secretary Daviſon. After his account of his trial in the Star-Chamber, Camden winds up his relation in the following words (23). 'Thus Daviſon, a 'man of good ſenſe, but not at all ſkilled in court-'arts, having, as many thought, been introduced 'upon the ſtage purely to perform his part in this 'tragedy, was obliged to quit his ſtation now it was 'over, and thruſt behind the ſcene, not without 'general compaſſion, into a tedious impriſonment.' It appears plainly, that this was our author's own ſentiments of the matter, tho' introduced by him as the common opinion of the times. But if Daviſon was brought in only to act a part, it may be enquired who it was that recommended him as a fit perſon for ſuch a purpoſe? In the Oxford copy of his trial (24), it is ſaid, that Mr. Daviſon, in his defence, affirms, that he communicated it only to the Treaſurer, and the Treaſurer to the reſt of the Council; that Lord was alſo the only witneſs againſt him, and hence one would imagine, that he thought him fit to act his part, if his own letters, which the reader has ſeen, did not ſpeak a very contrary language. We have already ſhewn, that Daviſon was brought into buſineſs by the Earl of Leiceſter and his friends, but he was made Secretary by the Queen herſelf. The Earl of Eſſex in one of his letters to Mr. Daviſon, writes thus (25), 'I told her how 'many friends and well-wiſhers the world did afford 'you, and how for the moſt part, throughout the 'whole realm, her beſt ſubjects did wiſh, that ſhe 'would do herſelf the honour to repair you, and 'reſtore you to that ſtate which ſhe had overthrown. 'Your humble ſuffering of theſe harms, and reverend regard to her Majeſty, muſt needs move a 'princeſs, ſo noble and ſo juſt, to do you right; and 'more I had ſaid, if my gift of ſpeech had been 'any way comparable to my love. Her Majeſty, 'ſeeing her judgment opened by the ſtory of her 'own actions, ſhewed a very feeling compaſſion for 'you: ſhe gave you many praiſes, and amongſt 'the reſt, that which ſhe ſeemed to pleaſe herſelf 'in was, that you were a man of her own choice. 'In truth, ſhe was ſo well pleaſed with thoſe things, 'that ſhe ſpake and heard of you, as I dare, if of 'things future there be any aſſurance, promiſe to 'myſelf, that your peace will be made to your own 'content, and the deſires of your friends, I mean 'in her favour and your own fortune, to a better 'eſtate than, or at leaſt the ſame you had, which 'with all my power I will employ myſelf to effect.' It is not eaſy to make this agree with the ſtory of a man brought upon the ſtage to act a particular part, and then to be ſtripped and neglected. But farther ſtill, upon the death of Sir Francis Walſingham, in 1590 (26), the Earl of Eſſex again repreſented to the Queen, that Mr. Daviſon was the fitteſt perſon to ſucceed him, and that ſhe could not find a perſon in England, that in the ſpace of three or four years would know how to ſettle himſelf, to ſupport ſo great a burthen. How the Queen received this, take in his own words. 'She gave me leave to 'ſpeak, heard me with patience; confeſſed with 'me that none was ſo ſufficient, and could not deny, but that which ſhe lays to your charge was 'done without hope, fear, malice, envy, or any 'reſpect of your own, but merely for her ſafety 'both of ſtate and perſon. In the end, ſhe abſolutely denied to let you enjoy that place, and willed me to reſt ſatisfied, for ſhe was reſolved. 'Thus much I write to let you know, I am more 'honeſt to my friends, than happy in their cauſes. 'What you will have me do for your ſuit, I will as 'far as my credit is any thing worth. I have told 'moſt of the Council of my manner of dealing 'with the Queen. My Lord Chamberlain tells me, 'he hath dealt for you alſo; and they all ſay, they 'wiſh as I do, but in this world that is enough." It may be preſumed, that the principal ground of the Queen's reſolution was the conſequences which ſhe foreſaw muſt attend making Daviſon again Secretary, in reference to the King of Scots; and the apprehenſion of this very probably occaſioned the earl of Eſſex to write the following letter to that monarch (27).

'Moſt excellent King, for him that is already 'bound for many favours, a ſtile of thankfulneſs is 'much age and to poſterity. Whatever motives thoſe authors might have, who lived near theſe times, to palliate or conceal the circumſtances of that action, which proved the cauſe of Mr. Davyſon's fall, we lie under no temptation, and are as free from any inclination to hide or to throw a ſhade over truth. In removing all ſuch obſtructions, and bringing into open day theſe ſingular and intereſting points, we not only rectify the partial accounts which are contained in private memoirs, and ſupply the neceſſary deficiencies of general hiſtories, but apply to their proper uſe, and bring to the publick view, in an agreeable light, thoſe remains of theſe buſy times, which, otherwiſe, might lie hid in ſtudies, and be at moſt known only to a very few, who, either through indolence or timidity, decline any communication of what, by a long courſe of reading in this way, they have diſcovered.

'much fitter than the humour of ſuing; but ſo it 'falls out, that he, which to his own advantage 'would have ſought nothing in your favour, but 'your favour itſelf; doth now for another, become 'an humble petitioner to your Majeſty. Your 'Majeſty cannot be ſuch a ſtranger to the affairs of this country; but as you know what actions are done in this place, ſo you underſtand the minds of the men by whom they are done. Therefore I doubt not, but the man for whom I ſpeak, is ſomewhat known to your Majeſty, and being known, I preſume of greater favour (Mr. Secretary Daviſon) being fallen into your Majeſty's diſpleaſure and diſgrace, beloved of the beſt and moſt religious of this land, doth ſtand as barred from any preferment, or reſtoring in his place, except out of the honour and nobleneſs of your own royal heart, your Majeſty will undertake his cauſe. To leave the nature of his fault to your Majeſty's beſt judgment, and report of your own ſervant; and to ſpeak of the man, I muſt ſay truly, that his ſufficiency in Council and matters of ſtate, is ſuch as the Queen confeſſeth, in her kingdom ſhe hath not ſuch another. His virtue, religion, and worth, in all degrees, is of the world taken to be ſo great, as no man in his good fortune hath had more general love than this gentleman in his diſgrace: and if to a man ſo worthy in himſelf, and ſo eſteemed of all men, my words might avail, I would aſſure your Majeſty, you would get great honour and great love, not only here amongſt us, but in all places of Chriſtendom where this gentleman is any thing known, if you ſhould now be the author of his reſtoring to his place, which in effect he now is, but that as a man not acceptable to her Majeſty, he doth forbear to attend. I do in all humbleneſs, commend this cauſe to your Majeſty, having the warrant of a good conſcience, that I know to be both honourable and honeſt, and your Majeſty to the bleſſed protection of that mighty God, to whom will pray, for your Majeſty's happy and proſperous eſtate, he that will do your Majeſty all humble ſervice.'

 [Though our Predeceſſor has highly extolled Davyſon's abilities, and repreſented the influence they had in raiſing him to the office of Secretary of State, it does not appear that he was held in equal eſtimation by all his Contemporaries. Monſ. Fonteney, in a letter to the Queen of Scots, ſpeaks of him with no ſmall Degree of contempt (28). But this, probably, is only to be regarded as the language of prejudice and enmity. It is evident, by the way, from Fonteney's diſpatch, that Davyſon was in Scotland, in 1586.

(28) Murdin's Collection of State Papers, P. 552.

Some communications, which we are in poſſeſſion of, from a reſpectable correſpondent, and which are referred to this place, will, we apprehend, more properly occur in other articles, and eſpecially in thoſe of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leiceſter, and Sir Francis Walſingham.

It is not neceſſary to inform our readers, how much the conduct of Queen Elizabeth, with regard to the Queen of Scotland, and how warmly the character of that accompliſhed and unfortunate Princeſs, have lately been the objects of diſcuſſion. The advocates for Mary have been numerous and powerful, and, we muſt add, in many reſpects ſucceſsful. Even amongſt thoſe of our modern hiſtorians that are the moſt unfavourable to the memory of the Scottiſh Queen, we do not find one of them who does not explicitly acknowledge and deſcribe the abominable diſſimulation of Elizabeth with reſpect to the warrant for Mary's Execution, and the treatment of Davyſon. Nevertheleſs, in this very affair, the Engliſh Queen has recently found a writer who is not convinced of her guilt. We refer to a volume of "Eſſays, Philoſophical, Hiſtorical, and Literary," which has this year (1789) been publiſhed. The concluſion of the third eſſay, which is on the reign and character of Elizabeth, ſo directly belongs to the ſubject of the preſent article, that it cannot be omitted. "The Queen," ſays the ingenious Author, "does "not appear to me by any means ſo culpable in the "affair of Davidſon as ſhe is generally repreſented. "It would require a pamphlet inſtead of a paragraph "to enter into a full diſcuſſion of this queſtion. I "ſhall only ſay, that Davidſon appears to me much "more the dupe of Burleigh than of Elizabeth. It "ſeems evident, that the Secretary, at the ſuggeſtion "of that nobleman, diſpatched the warrant for the "execution of the unfortunate Mary without the "previous knowledge of the Queen, who could not "be brought to a final determination upon the matter.

"That her aſtoniſhment, anger, and indignation, "were real, not aſſumed, appears from ſeveral circumſtances. When the fatal intelligence was "communicated, her countenance, Camden tells us, "changed, her ſpeech faultered, and ſhe ſtood fixed, "for ſome minutes, like a ſtatue, till at length her "paſſion vented itſelf in a violent burſt of tears: if "this was diſſimulation, it muſt be confeſſed ſhe "had made a wonderful proficiency in that ſcience "indeed. Again, it is not pretended, that the "Queen's diſpoſition led her to unneceſſary acts of "injuſtice and cruelty; yet Davidſon was not only "puniſhed with great ſeverity at the time, but he "never could recover, in the ſmalleſt degree, any "ſhare of the Queen's favour and regard, when it "could no longer anſwer any end to keep up the "political farce. Even Burleigh himſelf, Davidſon's "principal adviſer on this occaſion, received ſuch "convincing proofs of the reality of the Queen's "reſentment, that he gave himſelf up for loſt, and "in great conſternation begged permiſſion to reſign "his employments and retire to his eſtate in the "country.

"This plainly proves, that Burleigh's advice to "Davidſon was given, not with any expectation of "making his court to the Queen, to whoſe ſentiments he cannot be ſuppoſed a ſtranger; but with "a view to his own intereſt and ſecurity, which he "never could be perfectly aſſured of as long as the "Queen of Scots was in being. We have alſo the "Queen's own ſolemn aſſeveration and appeal to "God, in her letter to King James on the occaſion, "that this tranſaction paſſed without her knowledge "or intention. 'She could never, ſurely,' ſhe af-"firms, 'be eſteemed ſo baſe and poor-ſpirited, as "that if ſhe had really given orders for this fatal execution, ſhe could on any conſideration be induced "to deny them. 'Though ſenſible of the juſtice of "the ſentence, ſhe had determined from motives of "clemency not to carry it into effect, and could not "but highly reſent the temerity of thoſe who had "diſappointed her merciful intentions.' Upon the "whole, it ſeems to me moſt probable, that the "miniſters of Elizabeth, I mean Burleigh, Walſingham, and Leiceſter, to whom the death of the "Queen of Scots was 'a conſummation devoutly to "be wiſhed,' not being able to bring Elizabeth to a "firm and ſettled reſolution on that point, ventured "to encourage Davidſon to ſend off the warrant for "execution " execution without her knowledge; hoping, per" haps, that ſhe would in her heart not be much

" diſpleaſed with their preſumption, or, at the worſt,
" in conſequence of the ſnare laid for the unfortu-
" nate Secretary, it was foreſeen that the chief
" weight of the Queen's reſentment would fall upon
" him; and they depended upon their own addreſs,
" and the degree of royal favour they enjoyed, to
" ſcreen them from any violent or laſting effects of " the Queen's diſpleaſure. If it can be ſuppoſed
" that the Queen herſelf was a party in this plot
" againſt Davidſon, it muſt be allowed, that her
" conduct in this inſtance was in the higheſt degree
" diſgraceful, barbarous, and unjuſt; but ſo far as I " am able to form a judgement of her diſpoſition,
" ſhe was not capable of ſuch a degree of depravity
" and deceit; nor do I think there is ſufficient ground
" to charge her with ſullying, by an action of ſuch
" complicated baſeneſs, that illuſtrious character to " which I have paid this willing, but inadequate,
" tribute of applauſe and admiration(29)."

(29) Eſſays, Philoſophical, Hiſtorical, and Literary, p. 72—75.

Various ſtrictures might be made on this paſſage; but we ſhall content ourſelves with obſerving, that it flies in the face of the moſt authentic hiſtory. If the Author had read, or recollected our predeceſſors article, we have no conception that he would have attempted to vindicate Queen Elizabeth with regard to the matter in queſtion. What could he have ſaid to the tranſaction with Sir Amias Pawlet? What could he have ſaid in anſwer to Davyſon's narrative, in his apology? We wiſh not to detract from the juſt praiſes of Elizabeth. None can be more ſenſible of her eminent abilities, her wiſe government, and her numerous excellencies; and we have read with no ſmall degree of pleaſure, the greater part of what the Eſſay-writer has alledged in her favour. But with reſpect to the warrant for Mary's execution, and her treatment of Davyſon, ſhe muſt be conſigned to indignation and abhorrence.

Mr. Whitaker, in his elaborate work, entituled, " Mary Queen of Scots Vindicated," has not forgotten Elizabeth's conduct with regard to Davyſon. In the firſt edition he took proper notice of it, and gave a general account of the unfortunate Secretary's apology. But in the ſecond edition he has inſerted the apology at large, and accompanied it with a number of notes that ſtrongly diſplay the unjuſt and cruel manner in which Davyſon was treated by his royal miſtreſs. The pointed obſervations of Mr. Whitaker's concluding note ſo directly relate to the character of Davyſon, that they cannot with propriety be omitted in this place.

" Let me here, at the end of the apology, remark finally concerning Daviſon, That, though he was not an honeſt man, yet he was ſo nearly one, as to be a very prodigy for the miniſtry of Elizabeth. He refuſed, it appears, to ſign that very bond of aſſociation, which was ſigned by all the nation, and which even the deſpairing Mary offered, on her liberty being granted, to ſign herſelf. Yet he refuſed, though Leiceſter puſhed on the aſſociation, and though Elizabeth urged him to ſign it. Among the pleas which he advances for himſelf in his other apology, he particularly ſtates " his former abſolute refuſal to ſign the band of " aſſociation, being earneſtly preſſed thereunto by her " Majeſty's ſelf," (Robertſon, ii. 483). This indeed is a very ſtrong evidence of a manly virtuouſneſs in him. But he did other things, in the ſame ſpirit of virtue. He declined to act as a commiſſioner on the examination of Babington and his accomplices for their conſpiracy in favour of Mary, and took a journey to Bath in order to ſave himſelf from acting, (Robertſon, ii. 483). He was a means too of preventing the commiſſioners, who were ſent to try Mary at Fotheringay Caſtle, from pronouncing ſentence upon her immediately after the trial, and of obliging them to return firſt to London and report their proceedings to Elizabeth, (Robertſon, ii. 483). We have already ſeen that he kept the warrant for the execution of Mary five or ſix weeks in his hands, without offering to preſent it to Elizabeth for her ſigning. We have equally ſeen that he actually neglected to obey a perſonal command of Elizabeth's for bringing the warrant to her, and that he thus neglected, for " many days," even till the Queen fired at his conduct, and ſent him a peremptory order to bring it. Even then, and even when Paulet's anſwer had been received, and all delay was now at an end for ever, he would not be concerned in ſending away the warrant himſelf, but returned it into the hands from which he had received it, and left Cecil and the council to ſend it. And, as in all the time " before her trial, he neither is nor can " be charged, to have had any hand at all in the cauſe " of the ſaid Queen, or done any thing whatſoever " concerning the ſame, directly or indirectly;" ſo, " after the return thence of the—commiſſioners, it is " well known to all her council, that he never was at " any deliberation or meeting whatſoever, in parliament or " council, concerning the cauſe of the ſaid Queen, till " the ſending down of her Majeſty's warrant unto the " commiſſioners by the lords and others of her coun-" cil," (Robertſon, ii. 481).

" Theſe deeds of honeſty, no doubt, had ſucceſſively marked him out for vengeance to the reſt of the miniſtry, and to the Queen. He was therefore ſelected by Cecil, " with her Majeſty's own privity," to be the Secretary with whom the warrant ſhould be lodged for ſigning, (Robertſon, ii. 481). He was thus expoſed to a train of deciſive trials. It would be ſeen whether he offered to preſent the warrant to Elizabeth for her ſignature. Should he not offer, a command might be given him by Elizabeth to bring it up. Should he heſitate to obey this, a ſharp rebuke and a peremptory order might be ſent him. If he was refractory in all theſe points, then the wrath of Elizabeth would burſt out upon him, and ſweep him away from her preſence for ever. If he complied in any, his farther compliance might be tried in ordering him to the great ſeal with the warrant, and in directing him to uſe the warrant, when ſealed, with ſecreſy. Should he be found pliable in this trial, the grand ſcheme of aſſaſſination, the favourite wiſh of Elizabeth's heart, which had repeatedly been talked over by her other miniſters before Elizabeth and him, which they all united to approve, though none of them offered to undertake, and which had been ſo talked over and ſo approved of merely to put Daviſon upon undertaking it, might finally be urged upon Daviſon in private by Elizabeth herſelf. Should he bend to this urgency and engage in the work of aſſaſſination, Elizabeth, as ſoon as ever the work was done, would have riſen upon him with an affected paſſion, and made his life the forfeit of his compliance. And ſhould he not bend, all his preſent, and all his former refractorineſs would be remembered at once againſt him, and unite to draw down the rage of Elizabeth in a ſtorm of real reſentment upon him. Either way the man was ſure to be ruined. He complied, though only in part. He brought up the warrant at the ſecond order. He carried it to the great ſeal. He even united with Walſingham to mention Elizabeth's propoſal of aſſaſſination to Paulet; but he would go no farther. He actually proteſted to Elizabeth herſelf againſt the propoſal before he mentioned it to Paulet. He proteſted to her againſt every ſcheme of aſſaſſination. And he was therefore ruined at laſt by Elizabeth in a moſt impudent ſtretch of falſhood, for doing what he did not do, and in truth and reality for not doing what he was wanted to do."

" Thus fell Daviſon a memorable evidence of the cunning, the perfidiouſneſs, and the barbarity of Elizabeth and her Cecil! But he was fully revenged of them both in his fall. He wrote the preſent apology which ſerves ſo greatly to expoſe the characters of both. It is very convincing in itſelf, is even drawn up with the air and addreſs of a fine writer, and is peculiarly valuable to the critical inveſtigators of Elizabeth's conduct. It differs very uſefully from that in Dr. Robertſon's Appendix in being written within the very month of all the main tranſactions recorded in it, and being therefore very full, circumſtantial, and accurate; while that was written many years afterward, is only general and ſhort, and is often inaccurate. It was not, however, as Camden ſays, a " private" apology ſent to " Walſingham," (Orig. i. 465. Tranſ. 392). It was evidently calculated, as I have ſhown before, for the inſpection of Elizabeth herſelf. And, as it would naturally be ſent to his brother-ſecretary for her inſpection, ſo was it a bold challenge to her for the truth and exactneſs of all his averments, and would ſerve only to increaſe the load already deſcending to cruſh him. The other was written, not only when the little particulars had faded off from the mind, when memory had confounded ſome circumſtances that were diſtinct in themſelves, and a regular narrative, if it could have been given, was no longer of conſequence; but, what is very ſurprizing, when Daviſon had loſt all copy, and even all minutes of this very apology. It was drawn up too when he was no longer afraid of ſhowing his forbearance in the cauſe of Mary, and indeed had reaſon for diſplaying it all at large. He therefore goes back much farther in the ſecond apology than in the firſt, to the return of Mary's judges from Fotheringay, to the moment of her trial, to the examination of Babington, &c. and to the times preceding all. In this whole period he ſhows us his ſecret attachment to Mary, by ſuch a train of incidents as ſeems peculiarly calculated for the eye of Mary's ſon on his acceſſion to the throne of England. Yet Elizabeth muſt have been alive at the writing of it, ſince ſhe is ſpoken of as ſtill Queen: and I therefore ſuppoſe it to be written at the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, when all the nation began to turn their eyes towards Scotland for a ſucceſſor to her; and when Daviſon would naturally endeavour to make that attachment to Mary, for which he had ſuffered ſo ſeverely from Elizabeth, promote his intereſt with James (30).”] K.

DAWES (Sir WILLIAM) Archbiſhop of York in the XVIIIth century, was the youngeſt ſon of Sir John Dawes, Baronet [A], by Jane his wife, the daughter and only child of Richard Hawkins, of Braintree, in the county of Eſſex, Gent. He was born Sept. 12, 1671, at Lyons, (a ſeat which came by his mother) near Braintree (a); and received the firſt rudiments of learning at Merchant-Taylors-School in London, from Mr. John Hartcliffe, and Mr. Ambr. Bonwicke, ſucceſſively maſters of that ſchool; under whoſe care he made great proficiency in the knowledge of the Claſſicks; and was a tolerable maſter of the Hebrew tongue, even before he was fifteen years of age; which was chiefly owing to the additional care that Dr. Kidder, afterwards Biſhop of Bath and Wells, was pleaſed to take of his education (b). In Act Term 1687, he became a ſcholar of St. John's College in Oxford, and after his continuance there two years or upwards, was made Fellow (c). But his father's title and eſtate deſcending to him, upon the death of his two brothers, which happened about the ſame time [B]; he left Oxford, and entering himſelf a Nobleman in Catherine-Hall, Cambridge, lived in his eldeſt brother's chambers; and, as ſoon as he was of fit ſtanding, took the degree of Maſter of Arts (d). His intention, from the very firſt, was to enter into holy orders; and therefore to qualify himſelf for that purpoſe, among other introductory works, he ſeems to have made ſome of our late eminent Divines a conſiderable branch of his ſtudy, even before he was eighteen years of age: and he ſhewed always a ſerious and devout temper of mind, and a true ſenſe and love of piety and religion (e). After he had taken his Maſter of Arts degree, not being of age to enter into holy orders, he thought it proper to viſit the eſtate he was now become owner of, and to make a ſhort tour into ſome other parts of the kingdom, which he had not yet ſeen. But his intended progreſs was, in ſome meaſure, ſtopped by his happening to meet with Frances, the eldeſt daughter of Sir Thomas Darcy, of Braxſtead-Lodge, in Eſſex, Baronet, a fine and accompliſhed woman, whom he made his addreſſes to, and, not long after, married (f). As ſoon as he came to a competent age, he was ordained Deacon and Prieſt by Dr. Compton, Biſhop of London [C]. Shortly after, he was created Doctor in Divinity, by a Royal Mandate, in order to be qualified for the Maſterſhip of Catherine-Hall; to which he was unanimouſly elected, in 1696, upon the death of Dr. John Echard (g). At his coming thither he found the bare caſe of a new chapel, begun by his predeceſſor; to the finiſhing, and fitting up of which, he contributed very liberally (h). And, among other beneficial acts to his College, he obtained, through his intereſt with Queen Anne, and her chief Miniſters, an act of Parliament for annexing the firſt prebend of Norwich, which ſhould become vacant, to the Maſterſhip of Catherine-Hall for ever (i). Not long after his election, he became Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, and diſcharged that dignity with univerſal applauſe (k). In 1696, he was made one of the Chaplains in ordinary to King William; and, ſhortly after, was preſented by his Majeſty to a Prebend of Wor-

[A] Was the youngeſt ſon of Sir John Dawes, Bart.] That family was once poſſeſſed of a very large eſtate: and Sir Abraham, our author's great grand-father, was accounted one of the richeſt commoners in his time, and in ſplendour and magnificence of houſekeeping lived up to the port of any nobleman. But, in the time of the civil wars, the family adhering to the royal cauſe ſuffered great loſſes and depredations in their fortune. An eſtate of theirs, particularly in one county (1), was ſequeſtered to the value of 1500l. per ann. and the family ſeat at Roehampton in Surrey, where the furniture amounted to ſeveral thouſand pounds, was plundered. To make the family ſome ſort of amends, K. Charles II. created, in 1663, Sir John (father of Sir William, of whom we are writing) a baronet; in memory of paſt ſervices and ſufferings, and eſpecially as an acknowledgment of the ſeveral conſiderable ſums of money, tranſmitted by him and his father to the royal family, during their exile. Sir John was a perſon of excellent qualities, every way ſuitable to the dignity he was promoted to: but his exaltation to honour would not have ſo well become the depreſſion of his fortune, had it not been his happineſs to marry a lady of a very plentiful one, Jane, the daughter and only child of Richard Hawkins, Gent. as is above mentioned; by whom he had ſeveral children, and among the reſt, three ſons, whereof Sir William was the youngeſt (2).

Their deaths were in a manner ſo coincident, that one and the ſame poſt brought the news of both (3).

On the 10th of November 1698, he was collated by Archbishop Tennison to the Rectory, and, the 19th of December following, to the Deanery, of Bocking in Essex (n): and behaved in that parish in a very charitable and exemplary manner [E]. After Queen Anne's accession to the throne, he was made one of her Majesty's Chaplains, and by his excellent behaviour came to be so great a favourite with her, that he had a reasonable expectation of being advanced to some of the highest dignities in the Church. Accordingly, though he happened accidentally to miss of the Bishoprick of Lincoln [F], which became vacant in the year 1705; yet her Majesty, of her own mere motion, named him to the see of Chester (o), in the year 1707, upon the death of Dr. Nicholas Stratford: and he was consecrated February 8, 1707-8 (p). In 1713-4, he was, by the recommendation of his worthy predecessor Dr. John Sharp, translated to the archiepiscopal see of York; being elected thereto February 26, and enthronized by proxy the 24th of March following (q). He continued above ten years in this eminent station [G], honoured and respected by all. At length a diarrhœa, to which he had been subject several times before, coming to be attended with a fever, and ending in an inflammation of his bowels, it put a period to his life April 30, 1724, in the fifty-third year of his age (r). He was buried in the chapel of Catherine-Hall, Cambridge, near his Lady, who died December 22, 1705, in the 29th year of her age. By her he had seven children, William, Francis, William, Thomas, who all died young; and Elizabeth, Jane, and Darcy, that survived him (s). He was author of several things; some whereof were published by himself [H], and others after his decease under this title, 'The whole Works of the most Reverend Father in God, Sir William Dawes, Baronet, late Lord Archbishop of York, Primate of England, and Metropolitan. [E] And behaved in that parish in a very charitable and exemplary manner.] The author of the preface to his Sermons informs us, that 'The care of mens 'souls was the principal ingredient of his character; 'but what gave an additional lustre to this, and 'made him indeed the darling of the whole neighbourhood, was the respect he likewise had to men's 'bodily wants and infirmities, in his kind condescension and liberality to the poor. For as he was 'a stranger to that supercilious disdain, which a 'sense of superiority, either in birth or fortune, is 'apt to create in weak heads, and an utter enemy to 'those little feuds about dues and perquisites, which 'are often known to embroil whole parishes, and 'breed confusion, wherever they are too rigidly insisted on; so, to preserve an harmony and good 'understanding with his people, his custom was, 'every sunday, to invite a certain number of the better sort to dine with him, when, all the while, such a 'freedom was visible, as made every one to think 'himself at home, and such a plenty withal, as 'shewed that his liberality was extended to many 'more than those, who had the honour to sit at his 'table (7).——He used to preach himself, constantly, while he continued Rector of that parish. 'And his usual method was, to make choice of 'some principal passage out of the gospel for the 'day, in the morning, and to preach upon the same 'text in the afternoon, by way of repetition and 'improvement. His discourses were usually plain 'and familiar, and such as were best adapted to a 'country audience (8): and yet, under his management and manner of expression, they far surpassed 'the most elaborate compositions of other men: for 'such was the comeliness of his person, the melody 'of his voice, the decency of his action, and the 'majesty of his whole appearance, that he might 'well be pronounced the most compleat Pulpit-Orator of his age (9).'

[F] Though he happened accidentally to miss of the Bishoprick of Lincoln.] The reason of his missing of it, was this: being appointed to preach before Queen Anne on the 30th of January, (whilst that Bishopric was vacant by the death of Dr. James Gardiner) Sir William was not afraid to utter some bold truths, which at that time were not so well relished by certain persons in power, who took occasion from thence to persuade the Queen (contrary to her inclination,) to give it to Dr. W. Wake, late Archbishop of Canterbury. This, however, made no impression upon Sir William: and therefore when he was told by a certain nobleman, that he lost a bishopric by his preaching, his reply was, 'That, as to that he had 'no manner of concern upon him, because his intention was never to gain one by preaching (10).'

[G] He continued above ten years in this eminent station.] Upon his being promoted thereto, he was made a Privy Counsellor. And after Queen Anne's demise, he was constituted one of the Lord's Justices of the kingdom, until the arrival of the late King George, by whom he was called again to his place in the Privy Council (11).

(11) Ibid. p. xxxi.

[H] He was author of several things; some whereof were published by himself.] Those published by himself, were, I. 'An Anatomy of Atheism,' London, 1693, 4to. being a Poem in five sheets; dedicated to Sir George Darcy, Bart. It has not indeed all the perfections of a poetic composition; a luculency of fancy, and pomp of expression may perhaps be thought wanting in it: but then it has this equivalent excellence, that the arguments both for and against the existence of a God, are urged and answered in a clear method, and easy diction, fitted for the comprehension of every common reader. This Poem was written by the author, before he was eighteen years of age (12). II. 'The Duties of the 'Closet,' &c. written by him before he was twenty-one years of age (13). III. 'The Duty of Communicating Explained and Enforced, &c.' composed for the use of his parish of Bocking, in order to introduce a monthly celebration of the Holy Communion; which used to be administred, before his coming thither, only at the three great festivals of the year (14). IV. 'Sermons preached upon several occasions before King William and Queen Anne,' London, 1707, 8vo. dedicated to Queen Anne. V. He also drew up the Preface to the works of Offspring Blackall, D. D. late Bishop of Exeter, London, 1723, fol. 2 volumes.

flowing immediately from his good ſenſe: his converſation lively without any tincture of levity, and chearful without betraying the dignity of his high ſtation. He had a genius well fitted for a ſcholar, a lively imagination, a ſtrong memory, and a ſound judgment. He was a kind and loving Huſband, a tender and indulgent Parent, and ſo extraordinary good a Maſter, that he never was obſerved to be in a paſſion; and took care of the ſpiritual as well as the temporal welfare of his domeſticks. In his epiſcopal capacity, he behaved in a moſt worthy and exemplary manner [I]: And, in general, was a kind Friend, a generous Patron, a devout Chriſtian, a laborious Prelate, a fine Gentleman, and a worthy Patriot. We ſhall give the reſt of his character in the note [K].

[I] In his epiſcopal capacity, he behaved in a moſt worthy and exemplary manner.] He viſited his large dioceſe with great diligence and conſtancy, Nottinghamſhire one year, and Yorkſhire another; but every third year he did not hold any viſitation. He performed all the offices of his function with becoming ſerioufneſs and gravity. He took great care and caution, to admit none but ſufficient labourers into the Lord's harveſt; and when admitted, to appoint them ſtipends adequate to their labour. He adminiſtered juſtice to all with an equal and impartial hand; being no reſpecter of perſons, and making no difference between the poor and rich, but eſpouſing all into the intimacy of his boſom, his care, his affability, his proviſion, and his prayers (15).

(15) Preface, &c. p. xliv. xlv.

[K] We ſhall give the reſt of his character in the note.] So ſtrict an obſerver was he of his word, that no conſideration whatever could make him break it; and ſo inviolable in his friendſhip, that without the diſcovery of ſome eſſential fault indeed, he never departed from it. A great point of conſcience it was with him, how he made promiſes for fear of creating fruitleſs expectances: but when, upon proper conſiderations, he was induced to do it, he always thought himſelf bound to employ his utmoſt intereſt to have the thing effected; and till a convenient opportunity ſhould preſent itſelf, was not unmindful to ſupport the petitioner (if in mean circumſtances) at his own expence: for charity indeed was the predominant quality of his ſoul (16).——Both as a Biſhop and Peer of the realm, he conſidered himſelf as reſponſible for the ſouls committed to his charge in one reſpect, and as intruſted with the lives and fortunes of his fellow ſubjects, in the other. If in ſome parliamentary debates (wherein he made a very conſiderable figure), he happened to diſſent from other great men, who might have the ſame common good in view, but ſeemed to purſue it in a method incongruous to his ſentiments; this ought to be accounted his honour, and a proof of his integrity, but cannot, with any colour of juſtice, be deemed party prejudice, or a ſpirit of contradiction in him; becauſe thoſe very men, whom he ſometimes oppoſed, at other times he joined himſelf to, whenever he perceived them in the right. The truth is, all parties he diſclaimed. His opinion was, that whoever enters the Senate-houſe, ſhould always carry his conſcience along with him; that the honour of God, the renown of his prince, and the good of his fellow ſubjects ſhould be, as it were, the Polar-ſtar to guide him; that no multitude, though never ſo numerous; no faction, though never ſo powerful; no arguments, though never ſo ſpecious; no threats, though never ſo frightful; no offers, though never ſo advantageous and alluring; ſhould blind his eyes, or pervert him to give any the leaſt vote, not directly anſwerable to the ſentiments of his own breaſt (17).

 [On account of Sir William Dawes's Anatomy of Atheiſm, Mr. Cibber has aſſigned him an article in his Lives of the Poets of Great Britain and Ireland. But the worthy prelate had very little title to be ranked in that catalogue. The piety of his work is unqueſtionable, and it is probably not defective in good ſenſe; but it has no claim to poetical excellence, nor has it even the merit of harmonious verſification. This will be apparent from the following lines, which have been produced as no unfavourable ſpecimen of the author's abilities:

" See then our Atheiſt all the world oppoſe,
" And like Drawcanſir make all men his foes.
" See with what ſaucy pride he does pretend,
" His miſer father's notions to amend;
" Huffs Plutarch, Plato, Pliny, Seneca,
" And bids even Cicero himſelf give way.
" Tells all the world, They follow a falſe light,
" And he alone, of all mankind, is right.
" Thus, like a madman, who when all alone,
" Thinks himſelf king, and every chair a throne,
" Drunk with conceit, and fooliſh impudence,
" He finds himſelf in his abounding ſenſe (18)."

 [DAWES (RICHARD), a learned critic, eſpecially in the Greek tongue, was born in the year 1708 (a). A reſpectable family of the name of Dawes had long been ſituated at Stapleton, between Market-Boſworth and Hinckley in Leiceſterſhire, and our critic was probably of the ſame family. But it does not appear, from the regiſter of the pariſh, that he was born at that place. There was a Dr. Dawes, who, early in this century, reſided at Stapleton, and is recollected to have been a great ſcholar, and a ſearcher after the philoſopher's ſtone (b) It has been ſuppoſed, that he might be father to the ſubject of the preſent article; but of this fact no deciſive evidence can be produced. All the traditions concerning Richard Dawes are, that the place of his birth was either Market-Boſworth, or the vicinity of that town. Whoever his parents were, or whatever was their condition in life, it is probable that they perceived ſuch marks of capacity in their ſon, as determined them to devote him to a literary profeſſion; and accordingly he was put to the free Grammar School at Boſworth, where he had the happineſs of receiving part of his education under the care of Mr. Anthony Blackwall, an excellent Grammarian, and well known in the world of letters by ſeveral critical publications [A]. [A] Where he had the happineſs of receiving part of his education under the care of Mr. Anthony Blackwall, an excellent grammarian, and well known in the world of letters by ſeveral critical publications.] We have ſaid, " Part " of his education;" for it was not till 1722, that Mr. Blackwall was appointed Maſter of Boſworth-ſchool, having removed thither from Derby; and we have no information that Mr. Dawes enjoyed the benefit of his inſtructions previouſly to that removal. As we have not given any article of Anthony Blackwall in the former part of our work, it may not be amiſs to take ſome notice of him in this place. He was a native of Derbyſhire, and on the 13th of Sept. 1690, was admitted a Sizar in Emanuel College, Cambridge (1). In 1694, he proceeded Bachelor of Arts, and took his Maſter's Degree in 1698 (2). Sometime after this, he was invited to Derby, where he was appointed Head-Maſter of the Free-ſchool in that town, and [illegible]urer of All Saints, which is the largeſt pariſh in the place. Here it was that Mr. Blackwall firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the literary world, by his publication, in octavo, of " Theog-" nidis

Under ſo able an inſtructor, Mr. Dawes laid the foundation of that exquiſite knowledge of the Greek language to which he afterwards attained. In 1725, he was admitted a Sizar

" nidis Magarenſis Sententiæ Morales, novâ Latinâ " Verſione, Notis et Emendationibus explanatæ et " exornatæ, unà cum variis Lectionibus." This work was publiſhed in 1706. Our Author's next Publication, which did not appear till the year 1718, was entitled " An Introduction to the Claſſics; " containing a ſhort Diſcourſe on their Excellencies, " and Directions how to ſtudy them to Advantage; " with an Eſſay on the nature and uſe of thoſe em- " phatical and beautiful figures which give ſtrength " and ornament to writing," 12mo. (3). There is great merit in this performance. Mr. Blackwall has diſplayed the beauties of the admirable Writers of antiquity with no ſmall degree of perſpicuity and energy: and, in the ſecond part of his tract, he has illuſtrated the grand figures of Rhetoric, not only by inſtances drawn from the ancient claſſic authors, but by many beautiful paſſages taken from the beſt Engliſh poets. Forty or fifty years ago the book was in conſiderable reputation, and was put into the hands of moſt young ſtudents. The preſent Biographer read it again and again, in early life, with pleaſure and improvement; and though it may now be thought to be ſuperſeded by more elaborate and philoſophical works, it might, nevertheleſs, ſtill be of ſervice to youth, by inſpiring them with a love for claſſical knowledge, and contributing to form their taſte.

(3) Univerſal Dictionary, ubi ſupra, pp. 217, 218.

In the year 1722, Mr. Blackwall removed from Derby to Market Boſworth, in Leiceſterſhire, having been appointed Head Maſter of the Free Grammar-ſchool in that place. As he had ſuſtained the ſame character at Derby, it may reaſonably be concluded, that the change came recommended to him by ſome ſuperior advantage in point of emolument. In 1725 he publiſhed in 4to, the firſt volume of his moſt celebrated work, and which, indeed, was the principal work of his life. The title of it is, " The Sacred " Claſſics defended and illuſtrated; or, an Eſſay " humbly offered towards proving the Purity, Pro- " priety, and Eloquence of the Writers of the New " Teſtament. In two Parts. In the firſt of which thoſe " Divine Writings are vindicated againſt the charge of " barbarous language, falſe greek, and ſoleciſms. In " the ſecond is ſhewn, that all the excellencies of " ſtyle, and ſublime beauties of language and ge- " nuine eloquence, do abound in the ſacred writers " of the New Teſtament. With an account of their " ſtyle and character, and a repreſentation of their " ſuperiority, in ſeveral inſtances, to the beſt claſ- " ſics of Greece and Rome. To which are ſubjoined " proper indexes." A ſecond edition of this work, in 8vo, was publiſhed in 1727. The ſubſequent volume did not appear till 1731, a year after the Author's deceaſe; but it had been left by him completely ready for the preſs. It is entituled, " The " Sacred Claſſics defended and illuſtrated. The " ſecond and laſt volume. In three parts. Con- " taining, I. A farther demonſtration of the pro- " priety, purity, and ſublime eloquence of the " language of the New Teſtament Writers. II. An " account of the wrong diviſion of chapters and " verſes, and faulty tranſlations of the Divine Book, " which weaken its reaſonings and ſpoil its eloquence " and native beauties. III. A diſcourſe on the " various readings of the New Teſtament. With a " Preface; wherein is ſhewn the neceſſity and uſe- " fulneſs of a new verſion of the Sacred Books. To " which is annexed, a copious Index," 8vo. There was prefixed to this volume a portrait of the Author, engraved by Vertue, from an original painting. Such was the reputation of Mr. Blackwall's performance, that the two volumes were tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed in 4to, at Leipſick, in the year 1736, under the following title. " Antonii Black- " walli inclyti Magnæ Britanniæ Philologi Auctores " Sacri Novi Teſtamenti defenſi et illuſtrati. Chriſ- " topherus Wollius, M. A. S. T. B. et Concionator " ad D. Nic. Sabbathicus, ex Anglico Latine vertit, " recenſuit, variis Obſervationibus locupletavit, et " Hermenenticam N. F. Dogmaticam adjunxit (4)."

(4) Ibid. pp. 218, 219.

Mr. Blackwall's vindication of the ſacred claſſics is, in various reſpects, a work of great merit. It diſplays a fund of genuine learning, and contains a number of uſeful and important obſervations. In many inſtances it is ſhewn, that ſeveral of the words and phraſes in the New Teſtament which have been condemned as barbarous, are to be found in Greek writers of the beſt reputation. Nevertheleſs, it is the opinion of ſome of the moſt judicious critics, that our Author has not ſucceeded in his main deſign, which is to prove the general purity and elegance of the language in which the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles have communicated their inſtructions to mankind. Of this opinion, in particular, is the learned Dr. George Campbell, who, in the preliminary Diſſertations to his excellent Tranſlation of the four Goſpels from the Greek, has made the following remarks on the ſubject.

" It is not to be diſſembled, that the ſacred pen- " men of the New Teſtament have, eſpecially in " modern times, had ſome ſtrenuous advocates, " both among foreigners and amongſt our own " countrymen, who have, in my opinion, with more " zeal than judgement, defended their diction, as " being, when judged by the rules of grammar and " rhetoric, and the practice of the moſt celebrated " writers in Greece, altogether pure and elegant. " They ſeem to ſuſpect, that to yield, even on the " cleareſt evidence, a point of this nature, though " regarding ornaments merely human and exterior, " might bring diſhonour on inſpiration, or render it " queſtionable. I cannot help thinking that theſe " people muſt have very indiſtinct ideas on this ſub- " ject, and may be juſtly ſaid to incur the reproof " which Peter, on a memorable occaſion, received " from his Maſter—that 'they ſavour more the " things of men than the things of God.' Are " words of any kind more than arbitrary ſigns? " And may not the ſame be ſaid with juſtice of " phraſes and idioms? Is there a natural fitneſs in " one word or phraſe more than in another, for de- " noting the thing ſignified? Is not the connexion " between ſounds and ideas merely artificial—the " reſult of human, though tacit conventions? With " regard to thoſe rules which conſtitute purity in " the language of any country, what are they in ef- " fect but the conventions which have happened to " obtain among the natives, particularly thoſe of " the higher ranks?—Vulgariſms and foreign " idioms, which may obtain among ſtrangers and " thoſe of the lower ranks, have no more natural " unfitneſs to convey the ſenſe which they that uſe " them intend to convey by them, than the terms " and phraſes which, in conſequence of the prefer- " ence given by their ſuperiors, may be regarded as " elegancies. It may be as reaſonably objected " againſt our religion, that the perſons by whom it " was propagated, were choſen from what men in " high life account the dregs of the people, as that " the Holy ſpirit ſhould accommodate himſelf to the " language of thoſe who were actually choſen. Nay, " language as well as dreſs being in fact no more " than a ſpecies of mode, it may with as good rea- " ſon be maintained, that the ambaſſadors whom " Chriſt ſent for promulgating his doctrine, ſhould " have been habited like gentlemen and men of " faſhion, as that they ſhould have ſpoken the dialect " of ſuch. Splendid ſtyle had no more connection " with the purpoſe of their miſſion, than ſplendid " apparel. The cloth which they wore, how coarſe " ſoever, anſwered all the eſſential purpoſes of " cloathing; the ſame may be ſaid of the language " which they ſpoke. And if it be argued, that good " language would create greater reſpect to their per- " ſons, and cloſer attention to what they ſaid, and " conſequently would contribute to its making a " deeper impreſſion; as much may be affirmed with " truth of a genteel appearance both of perſon and " of dreſs. Nothing ſerves more powerfully to " quaſh curioſity and expectation, and conſequently " to deſtroy attention, than ſuch an external figure " as generally accompanies poverty and ignorance, " and ſuggeſts a total want of the advantages of " education, and more eſpecially of that indiſpenſa- " ble advantage which the faſhionable world calls, " ſeeing good company.

a Sizar of Emanuel College, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he proceeded Bachelor of Arts in 1729. On the 2d of October, 1731, he became a Fellow of the College on the nomination of Sir Wolſton Dixie, Bart. In 1733, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts. The next year he was a candidate for the place of Eſquire Beadle of the Univerſity, but his application was not crowned with ſucceſs (b). Whilſt Mr. Dawes was at Cambridge, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſome peculiarities of conduct, which probably aroſe from a daſh of inſanity in his conſtitution; and in his converſation he occaſionally took ſuch liberties on certain topics as gave great offence to thoſe about him. Having indulged himſelf too much, at College, in an indolent ſedentary way of life, he, at length, found it abſolutely neceſſary to have recourſe to ſome kind of exerciſe. In this caſe, being of a ſtrong athletic frame of body, and not over delicate in the choice of his company, he took to the practice of ringing; and, as ſuch a genius could not ſtop at mediocrity, he quickly became the leader of the band, and carried the art to the higheſt perfection (c).

(c) Ibid.

Another circumſtance, though of a very different nature, by which Mr. Dawes rendered himſelf remarkable, was his taking a violent part againſt Dr. Bentley. He even went ſo far as to depreciate that great man's literature. In his Miſcellanea Critica, he endeavours, on ſeveral occaſions, to detract from Dr. Bentley's praiſes; and he did not ſcruple to aſſert, that the Doctor, nihil in Græcis cognoviſſe, niſi ex Indicibus petitum, knew nothing relative to Grecian Literature, but what he had drawn from indexes (d). It was impoſſible that any thing could be more unjuſt than ſuch an aſſertion; and it

"But theſe very diſadvantages or defects, both "in ſpeech and in outward figure, are aſſigned by "the inſpired writers as the reaſons of God's pre"ference, whoſe thoughts are not our thoughts, "nor are our ways his ways. Paul argues, that the "ſucceſs of the preachers of the Goſpel, in ſpite of "the abſence of thoſe accompliſhments in language "then ſo highly valued, was an evidence of the di"vine power and energy with which their miniſtry "was accompanied. He did not addreſs them, he "tells us, 'with the wiſdom of words'—with arti"ficial periods and a ſtudied elocution, 'leſt the "croſs of Chriſt ſhould be made of none effect'— "leſt to human eloquence that ſucceſs ſhould be aſ"cribed which ought to be attributed to the divinity "of the doctrine, and the agency of the Spirit, in "the miracles wrought in ſupport of it. There is "hardly any ſentiment which he is at greater pains "to enforce. He 'uſed none of the enticing' or "perſuaſive 'words of man's wiſdom.——Where"fore?—That their faith might not ſtand in the "wiſdom of men, but in the power of God.' "Should I aſk, What was the reaſon why our Lord "Jeſus Chriſt choſe for the inſtruments of that moſt "amazing revolution in the religious ſyſtems of "mankind, men perfectly illiterate, and taken out "of the loweſt claſs of the people? your anſwer to "this will ſerve equally for an anſwer to that other "queſtion—Why did the Holy Spirit chuſe to de"liver ſuch important truths in the barbarous idiom "of a few obſcure Galileans, and not in the politer "and more harmonious ſtrains of Grecian eloquence? "I repeat it, the anſwer to both queſtions is the "ſame—That it might appear beyond contradiction, "that the excellency of the power was of God and "not of man.'

"There are ſome collateral purpoſes which Pro"vidence has effected by the ſame means. One is, "that the writings of the New Teſtament carry, "in the very expreſſion and idiom, an intrinſic and "irreſiſtible evidence of their authenticity. They "are ſuch as, in reſpect to ſtyle, could not have "been written but by Jews, and hardly even by "Jews ſuperior in rank and education to thoſe "whoſe names they bear. And what greatly "ſtrengthens the argument is, that under this "homely garb we find the moſt exalted ſentiments, "the cloſeſt reaſoning, the pureſt morality, and the "ſublimeſt doctrine. The homelineſs of their dic"tion, when criticiſed by the rules of grammarians, "and rhetoricians, is what all the moſt learned and "judicious of the Greek fathers frankly owned. "And is it modeſt in us petty critics of modern "times to pretend to be nicer judges of purity and "elegance in the Greek language, than Origen and "Chryſoſtom, whoſe native tongue it was; and "who, beſides, were maſters of uncommon ſkill, "as well as fluency, in that language? I have heard "of a French critic who undertook to demonſtrate, "that Ariſtotle did not underſtand Greek, nor "Livy Latin. There is hardly an opinion ſo para"doxical or abſurd, as not to find ſome admirers. "What wonder then that we ſhould meet with peo"ple who eſteem a Pfochinius and a Blackwall "better judges of Greek than the greateſt orators "among the Grecians, and maintain that Paul's "ſtyle, in ſpite of his own verdict, is as claſſical as "Plato's. The writings of the ancient Greeks have "been rummaged for the diſcovery of words and "phraſes, which, in the import given them, might "appear to reſemble what has been accounted He"braiſm or Syriaſm in the New Teſtament. The "ſucceſs of ſuch endeavours has been far from giv"ing ſatisfaction to readers of diſcernment. It will "readily be acknowledged by the impartial, that ſe"veral idioms in the New Teſtament have been "miſtaken for Oriental, which may be as truly de"nominated Grecian. But there remains a much "larger number of thoſe brought under that claſs, "concerning which there can be no reaſonable "doubt (5)."

(5) The four Goſpels tranſlated from the Greek. With preliminary diſſertations, and notes critical and explanatory Vol. p. 13—17.

Theſe obſervations are ſucceeded by ſome particular ſtrictures on Mr. Blackwall's performance, with regard to which we muſt acknowledge, that our ſentiments, in general, concur with thoſe of Dr. Campbell (6).

(6) Ibid. p. 19—22.

Mr. Blackwall, in his ſeminaries at Derby and Boſworth, had the felicity of bringing up a number of excellent ſcholars beſides Mr. Dawes. Among theſe was Sir Henry Atkins, Bart, who, being patron of the church of Clapham in Surry, as a mark of his gratitude and eſteem, preſented our author, on the 12th of October, 1726, to that rectory, which was then ſuppoſed to be worth three hundred pounds a year. The Grammar which Mr. Blackwall made uſe of, for the purpoſe of initiating the young people under his care into the knowledge of the Latin Tongue, was of his own compoſition; and it was conſidered as ſo well adapted to that end, that he was prevailed upon to publiſh it in 1728. Such, however, was his modeſty, that it would not permit him to fix his name to it, becauſe he would not be thought to preſcribe to other inſtructors of youth. The title of it is, "A New Latin Grammar; being "a ſhort, clear, and eaſy Introduction of young "ſcholars to the knowledge of the Latin Tongue; "containing an exact account of the two firſt Parts "of Grammar." It is probable, that Mr. Blackwall's ſituation at Clapham did not altogether ſuit his diſpoſition; for, early in the year 1729, he reſigned the rectory of that place, and retired to Market-Boſworth, where his abilities and convivial turn of mind rendered him generally reſpected. At the School-houſe of this town he died, on the 8th of April, 1730. He left behind him two children, a ſon and a daughter. The ſon was an attorney at Stoke Golding, in the neighbourhood of Boſworth; and the daughter was married to Mr. Cantrell, a bookſeller at Derby (7).

could only proceed from extreme vanity, or perſonal diſlike, or a bigoted attachment to a party. Indeed, the contempt with which writers of diſtinguiſhed abilities ſometimes ſpeak of each other, is a diſgrace to the republic of letters; and it is much to be lamented that a ſpirit ſo contrary to the dictates of juſtice and urbanity, ſhould ſtill continue to prevail among men who would otherwiſe deſerve to be held in eſteem and reputation.

In 1736, Mr. Dawes publiſhed, Propoſals for printing by ſubſcription, "Paradiſi "amiſſi, a cl. Miltono conſcripti, Liber primus, Græcâ Verſione donatus, una cum An- "notationibus." Theſe propoſals were accompanied with a ſpecimen, which may be ſeen in the Great General Dictionary, under the article of Milton (e), and in the Preface to the Miſcellanea Critica, where our author explains his reaſons for not proceeding in his undertaking, and very ingenuouſly points out the errors of his own performance (f). It was cuſtomary with him, in converſation, humouroufly to expoſe his verſion to ridicule; and, therefore, though he had actually completed his deſign, by tranſlating the whole Firſt Book of the Paradiſe Loſt, it is no wonder that he did not commit it to the preſs. Indeed, every ſcholar muſt be ſenſible, how difficult it is for any modern to write ſuch Greek poetry as ſhall be totally free from animadverſion; and the truth of this remark will be particularly felt by thoſe who recollect the minute inveſtigations which have been the reſult of Mr. Huntingford's Monoſtrophics, and Mr. Glaſs's Tranſlation of the Samſon Agoniſtes. If the labours of theſe gentlemen can afford ſo much ſcope for critical diſcuſſion, it is highly probable that no future candidate for literary fame will ever ſeek for it in Grecian verſification.

On the 10th of July, 1738, Mr. Dawes was appointed Maſter of the Free Grammar-ſchool in Newcaſtle upon Tyne, in the room of Mr. Edmund Lodge, who had reſigned that office. The commencement of his duty was to take place at the Michaelmas following. In the ſame year, on the 9th of October, he was preferred, by Act of Common Council, to the Maſterſhip of the Hoſpital of the bleſſed Virgin Mary in Newcaſtle (g). The Buſineſs of Mr. Dawes's new ſtation did not prevent him from proſecuting his Enquiries into the nature, peculiarities, and elegancies of the Greek tongue; and accordingly, in 1745, he publiſhed his "Miſcellanea Critica." Mr. Hubbard, of Emanuel College, Cambridge, and Dr. Maſon, of Trinity, aſſiſted in the publication. It was Mr. Dawes's deſign in this work, to afford ſuch a ſpecimen of his critical abilities, as ſhould enable the learned world to judge what might be expected from him, in an edition which he had projected of all the Attic poets, as well as of Homer and Pindar (h). Though his ſcheme was never carried into execution, he has obtained, by his "Miſcellanea Critica," a very high place among thoſe who have contributed to the promotion of Greek learning in England, and, as ſuch, his name will be tranſmitted with honour to poſterity. Accordingly, the book has been ſpoken of in terms of diſtinguiſhed applauſe, by ſome of the firſt literary characters in Europe [B]. A ſecond edition of it, in octavo, was given in 1781, from the Clarendon Preſs, by the Rev. Mr. Burgeſs, of Corpus Chriſti College, Oxford, who has enriched the work with a learned preface, and a number of notes, the value and importance of which will be the beſt underſtood and felt by thoſe who are the moſt capable of entering into the depths of Grecian erudition, and the minute and curious refinements of the Grecian language.

Mr. Dawes's ſituation at Newcaſtle was neither ſo happy nor ſo uſeful as might have been expected. This was, in a great meaſure, owing to the excentricity of his diſpoſition, and, indeed, to his imagination's being in ſome reſpects diſturbed. Hence he fancied that all his friends had ſlighted him or uſed him ill; and of the jealouſy of his temper he has left a remarkable instance, on a very trifling occasion. His printer, by an unfortunate mistake, in a passage of Terentianus Maurus, which Mr. Dawes had produced in order to correct, had inserted a comma that destroyed the merit of the emendation. In consequence of this involuntary error, our author, in the Addenda to his Miscellanea, has expressed himself with great indignation. He declares, that he could not conjecture what fault he had committed against the printer, that he should envy him the honour, whatever it was, that was due to his correction; and he adds, that he knows not how it happened, that, for several years past, he had been ill used by those from whom he had deserved better treatment. With the Corporation of Newcastle he got involved in altercations, and he adopted a singular method of displaying his resentment, or rather his contempt; for in teaching the boys at school, he made them translate the Greek word for Ass into Alderman; which some of the lads did seriously, though otherwise well instructed. Such being the disposition of his mind, it is not surprising that his scholars were, at length, reduced to a very small number; so that it became expedient for him to consent to quit his station. Accordingly, at Midsummer, 1749, he resigned the Mastership of the Grammar-school, and the Mastership of St. Mary's Hospital; and, in consideration of these sacrifices, the Mayor and Burgesses of Newcastle, on the 25th of September following, executed a bond, by which they engaged to grant him an annuity of eighty pounds a year, during life (i).

(i) From Dr. Richardson's and Mr. Burgess's Communications.

Mr. Dawes, after his resignation of the above two offices, retired to Heworth-shore, about three miles below Newcastle, on the South side of the Tyne, where his favourite amusement was the exercise of rowing in a boat. In his conversation, he preserved, to the last, his splenetic humour; abusing every thing, and every person that he had formerly regarded. He departed this life, at Heworth, on the 21st of March, 1766, and, agreeably to his own desire, was buried in the church-yard of that place; where a common head-stone, little suited to the just reputation of so eminent a scholar, continues to mark his grave.

 [DAY (THOMAS, Esq.) (l) an ingenious poetical, political, and miscellaneous writer, was born in Wellclose Square, London, on the twenty-second day of June, 1748. His father, Thomas Day, Esq; was a collector outwards of the customs in the port of London, and was twice married. By his first wife he had no family. His second lady was Miss Jane Bonham, the only daughter of Samuel Bonham, Esq. an eminent merchant in the city. The sole issue of this marriage was the subject of the present article. When he was no more than thirteen months old his father died, leaving to his infant son a very considerable fortune, which was chiefly of his own acquisition. Mrs. Day, in a few years, married Thomas Phillips, Esq. who had also a situation in the Custom House, and who departed this life in 1782, at his house at Barehill in Berkshire, where Mrs. Phillips continues to reside. Her careful and affectionate, but judicious, conduct towards her son proved an ample compensation to him for the premature loss of his father; for she not only procured him every advantage of education, but taught him heroic fortitude by her own example, and accustomed him early to bodily exertions. His writings and his habits of life afterwards displayed the importance which he attached to the training up of youth in the labours of the body, and the endurance of the mind.

(l) For the materials of the former part of this article, we are indebted to the communications of Mrs. Day, the author's widow, and of her nephew, William Lowndes, Esq. of the Temple.

For the sake of her son's health, Mrs. Phillips removed out of London to Stoke Newington, where she put him to a child's school until he should attain the age when he might be admissible at the Charter House. Accordingly, at the proper time, he became a boarder in Dr. Crusius's own house, a master who was distinguished for his ability in grammatical and classical instruction, and for his attention to discipline in the management of his scholars. At the Charter House Mr. Day continued from about the age of nine to his sixteenth year, when he was sent to complete his studies at Oxford, where he was entered as a gentleman commoner at Corpus Christi College. He stayed at the University three years; but having no view to literary honours or promotions, he did not think it of importance to obtain any degree.

While Mr. Day resided at Oxford, he formed an intimacy with Mr. Jones, now Sir William Jones, one of the Supreme Court at Fort William in the East Indies, whose eminent abilities and writings, and whose deep and curious researches into oriental literature, are so universally known. Mr. Day's friendship with this gentleman was preserved through life. Another of his university friends was Richard Warburton Lytton, Esq. of North Church in Hertfordshire, to whose solid and extensive learning those who have the happiness of being personally acquainted with him are no strangers, and who is exceeded by no man in virtuous sentiment, benevolent character, and exemplary manners. Mr. Lytton has ever testified, with exultation, his fraternal attachment to Mr. Day, and a veneration of his uncommon abilities, and yet rarer virtues.

But of all Mr. Day's early connections, the closest and most intimate was with James Bicknell, jun. Esq. afterwards an ingenious barrister at law, who died in younger life.

This gentleman, whom we ſhall again have occaſion to mention, was, in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, the friend and companion of his youth.

As ſoon as Mr. Day came of age, his conduct and property devolved on himſelf. At an early period of life he manifeſted a particular fondneſs for ſcrutinizing the human character, and, in the year 1766, had taken a journey from Oxford into Wales, on foot, for that purpoſe. He judged, that by the manly exerciſe of walking he could have the eaſieſt and moſt intimate intercourſe with that claſs of men who, as ſtill treading the unimproved paths of nature, might be preſumed to have the qualities of the mind pure and unſophiſticated by art. In purſuit, therefore, of his favourite inclination to inveſtigate men and manners, he determined, on becoming maſter of himſelf, immediately to go abroad. One winter was ſpent by him at Paris, another at Avignon, and a third at Lyons. He paſſed one ſummer in the Auſtrian Netherlands, and another in Holland, always returning to devote the reſt of the year to his friends in England. Wherever he went he was diſtinguiſhed by his ſingular humanity and generoſity. His extraordinary liberality at Lyons made his departure thence long regretted by the lower claſſes of the people, as ſeveral gentlemen have ſince declared, who have viſited that city. It will not be unamuſing here to remark, that a large body of ſuch as he had relieved aſſembled together at his quitting Lyons, taking the characteriſtic precaution, whilſt they lamented, very pathetically, the grievous loſſes both of him and his bounty, to recommend ſtrongly, that he would leave a ſum of money behind, as a prudent ſupply for their future wants; and forgetting that he had already, by his paſt favours, far exceeded the reſt of his generous countrymen.

Not long after Mr. Day left college, he contracted an intimacy with Mr. Edgworth, an Iriſh gentleman of family and fortune, and a man of great ingenuity and knowledge, eſpecially in mechanical ſcience. With this gentleman he maintained an uninterrupted friendſhip and correſpondence for more than twenty years; and ſuch is the value which Mr. Edgworth has for his friend's letters, and his ſenſe of their excellence, that he intends to lay a ſelection of them before the public. Among other obligations which Mr. Day owed to Mr. Edgworth, one was, his being introduced by him to the acquaintance of Dr. Small, an ingenious and amiable phyſician, who was then ſettled at Birmingham. It was no hindrance to this connection, that Mr. Day was much younger, for the maturity and ſtrength of his underſtanding were far beyond his years. The reſpect and regard which he often expreſſed for Dr. Small's memory, prove, almoſt without a doubt, that his friendſhip for him was the cloſeſt and moſt affectionate that he ever entertained for any gentleman. The doctor was a man of great talents and learning, but poſſeſſed a gloom of mind, which, at that time, was not totally uncongenial to Mr. Day's own diſpoſition: for from his early life he had accuſtomed himſelf to reflect ſo deeply on human things, and eſpecially on the miſeries that were ſuffered by his fellow-creatures and inferior animals, as thence to derive a tincture of melancholy; which, however, the exertions of his underſtanding enabled him ſo entirely to get the better of, that at length he acquired a permanent and uncommon chearfulneſs of temper. His friendſhip with Dr. Small, which probably had not been a little ſtrengthened by their mutual ſympathetic feelings, was diſſolved by the death of that gentleman in the year 1775.

There were two other gentlemen to whoſe acquaintance Mr. Day was introduced by Mr. Edgworth. Theſe were Dr. Darwin, then of Lichfield, but now of Derby; and Mr. Keir, who reſided near Birmingham. Of the former we need not ſay how eminently he is diſtinguiſhed as a phyſician, a botaniſt, and a natural philoſopher in general; and how delightfully he has diſplayed his genius in a new and beautiful ſpecies of poetry: and the great abilities of the latter, eſpecially in chemical ſcience, are known to all the philoſophical world. Before this article will be publiſhed, Mr. Keir's affection and eſteem for Mr. Day will be ſeen in his becoming the biographer of his friend. Thus honourable were Mr. Day's youthful connections and friendſhips, which were continued to the end of life with unabated regard. According to the common acceptation of the word, he had various other friends, ſome of whom were of literary eminence.

So early as the twelfth of February, 1765, Mr. Day had been admitted of the Middle Temple; but he was not called to the bar until the fourteenth of May, 1779. Though he went through this ceremony, and his name was continued on the books of the ſociety till his deceaſe, he never appears to have entertained any poſitive ideas of entering ſeriouſly into the buſineſs of the profeſſion. Sometimes, indeed, he would amuſe himſelf with talking of this mode of life as one reſource from want that would be left to him, if ever he ſhould ſpend his fortune; but, though he was well acquainted with the general principles of Engliſh law, he had never acquired that knowledge of the forms and drudgery of it, which would have enabled him to be ſucceſsful in any branch of legal practice.

On the tenth of Auguſt, 1778, Mr. Day married Miſs Eſther Milnes, of Wakefield in Yorkſhire; a lady whoſe cultivated underſtanding, liberal ſentiments, and congenial diſpoſition, rendered the connection happy and endearing in the higheſt degree. The ceremony was performed at Bath. After their marriage, the firſt place of their ſtated reſidence was Stapleford Albots, in Eſſex; but the adjacent country being very wet, and Mr. Day having a deſire to occupy a larger extent of farm than he there poſſeſſed, he withdrew from that county, and ſettled at Anningſley, near Chertſey, in Surrey. From Anningſley he frequently went to London, but this was only at irregular intervals, and for a ſhort ſpace of time.

The ſingular retirement of Anningſley, which had been his chief inducement to fix there, was remarked by all his acquaintance. There was a wildneſs in the ſcene which gave him pleaſure, as the heath, contraſted with the incloſures, afforded a flattering proof of the induſtry of man, and of his importance in the creation. Mr. Day's internal reſources prevented the place of his reſidence from being dreary to the friends by whom he was viſited.

Like many ingenious men, Mr. Day had a fondneſs for experiment. His neighbours, of the loweſt claſs, being as rough and as wild as the commons on which they dwelt, he tried if by mutual attrition he could not poliſh both; and, though the event fell ſhort of his expectation, he was not wholly unſucceſsful. Many of the peaſants he took to work on his farm; and in his ſelection of them it was always his object to accommodate thoſe who could not find employment elſewhere, until they could meet with ſome freſh job. But ſo fond were they of their new maſter, that they wanted frequently to be reminded, that their ſtay was only intended to be temporary. During the winter ſeaſon they were ſo numerous, that it was ſcarcely in the power of a farm of more than two hundred acres, of a family on the ſpot, and of the contiguous neighbourhood, to raiſe for them a ſhadow of employment from day to day. Mr. Day, whenever he walked out, uſually converſed with them in the fields, and queſtioned them concerning their families. To moſt of them, in their turn, he ſent blankets, corn, and butchers meat. He gave advice and medicines to the ſick, and occaſionally brought them into his kitchen to have their meals for a few weeks among the ſervants. Once or twice he took them into his ſervice in the houſe, on the ſole account of their bad health, a circumſtance which by many perſons would have been deemed an ample cauſe for diſmiſſion. When the caſes of ſickneſs which came before him were difficult and critical, he frequently applied to London for regular advice; but good diet was often found more ſalutary than all the Materia Medica. Mrs. Day aided the benevolent exertions of her huſband, by employing the neighbouring poor in knitting ſtockings, which were occaſionally diſtributed amongſt the labourers.

Mr. Day's modes and habits of life were ſuch as the monotony of a rural retirement naturally brings upon a man of ingenuity and literary taſte. To his farm he gave a perſonal attention, from the fondneſs which he had for agriculture, and from its being a ſource to him of health and amuſement. It was an additional pleaſure to him, that hence was derived employment for the poor. He had ſo high an opinion of the ſalutary effects of taking exerciſe on horſe-back, that he erected a riding-houſe for the purpoſe of uſing that exerciſe in the rougheſt weather. Though he commonly reſided in the country during the whole of the winter ſeaſon, and was fond of ſhooting as an art, he for many years totally abſtained from field ſports, apprehending them to be cruel; but, at laſt, from the ſame motive of humanity, he reſumed the gun. He roſe about eight, and walked out into his grounds ſoon after breakfaſt. But much of the morning, and ſtill more of the afternoon, were uſually paſſed at his ſtudies, or in literary converſations when he was viſited by his friends. Theſe converſations were not a little enlivened by the animated explanations which he gave of his political or religious ſentiments, and the obſervations he made on men and manners. The uſual ſitting room of his houſe was converted by him into a library, that he might have his books always at hand; and he never thought of reading in any more private manner than with the family talking about him. This capacity of purſuing their cuſtomary ſtudies with ſucceſs, amidſt domeſtic converſe, is not, we believe, the general talent of learned men. Dr. Prieſtley is maſter of it in an eminent degree, with regard to writing as well as reading; and perhaps ſome others might be mentioned who have acquired the ſame attainment, which may juſtly be conſidered as the indication of a mind that has arrived to no ſmall proportion of perſpicuity, compoſure, and ſelf-poſſeſſion.

That a life, ſo eminently amiable, reſpectable, and uſeful as that of Mr. Day's, ſhould long be continued, muſt have appeared, in every human view of it, extremely deſirable. But in the ſupreme diſpoſition of events it was otherwiſe determined. On Monday the twenty-eighth of September, 1789, as he was returning from Anningſley to his mother's at Barehill, where he had left Mrs. Day, he was killed by a fall from his horſe, in the forty-ſecond year of his age. The place of his interment was Wargrave, Berks, in a vault which had been built for the family.

Mr. Day's ſhort life was one uniform ſyſtem of exertions in the cauſe of humanity. He thought nothing mis-ſpent or ill-beſtowed, which contributed, in any degree, to the general ſum of happineſs. In his purſuit of knowledge, though he deemed it highly valuable as a private and perſonal acquiſition, he had a particular view to the application of it to the purpoſes of philanthropy. It was to be able to do good to others, as well as to gratify the ardent curioſity and activity of his own mind, that he became an ingenious mechanic, a well-informed chemiſt, a learned theoretical phyſician, and an expert conſtitutional lawyer. But though his comprehenſive genius embraced almoſt the whole range of literature, the ſubjects to which he was the moſt attached, and which he regarded as the moſt eminently uſeful, were thoſe that are comprehended in hiſtorical and ethical ſcience. Indeed, every thing was important in his eyes, not merely as it tended to advance the individual, but in proportion to its ability in diſcloſing the powers, and improving the general intereſts, of the human ſpecies.

The political character of Mr. Day may be ſeen in his writings, hereafter to be mentioned. But it is proper here to obſerve, that though he wrote with warmth and energy, his ſentiments were tempered with a moderation dictated by humanity. To adopt his own words, he was unwilling to "make the great ſtate machine ſtand ſtill, for the mere experiment of greaſing its wheels." It was with horror that he heard of the coolneſs with which perſons ſometimes talked of civil wars, as if they imagined that every the leaſt profaneneſs at the ſhrine of Liberty was to be purged by ſtreams of innocent blood, and the overthrow of the conſtitution. Partly from the notions he had imbibed from Rouſſeau of the dignity of man, but ſtill more perhaps from the jealouſy with which he thought the ſacred temple of Freedom ought ever to be watched by its own prieſts, he declared, "that he never would, either by himſelf or agents, aſk for the vote of an elector in any part of the kingdom." From the ſame refined watchfulneſs over his own independence, as in the former inſtance over that of others, he withdrew from more than one overture to bring him into the public ſervice, though ſuch overtures were made in a very honourable manner. The pointed ſcrutiny with which he was accuſtomed to examine things threw a thouſand obſtacles in the way of his union with a party: and as he deſpiſed the proſpects of ordinary ambition, and ſought neither titles nor emolument, he perceived the more diſtinctly the ineſtimable privilege of retaining the good opinion of all mankind in the homely ſtation of an honeſt man.

In private life, Mr. Day was a faithful and tender huſband, an affectionate ſon, and a generous and ſympathiſing friend. Indeed, the unuſual patience with which he commonly liſtened to the accounts any in his company gave of their ſituation and circumſtances, and the earneſt advice, as well as ready pecuniary aſſiſtance, which he afforded them, made many ſuppoſe him to be more intereſted for their individual welfare, than from their relative connections, and his regards for the reſt of mankind, there could be juſt reaſon to expect. Benevolent as he was, he knew that both friendſhip and property have their limits.

Mr. Day was remarkably plain in his dreſs, and even negligent in that reſpect; but then it was only in ſuch points as he thought to be unconnected with health. In the choice of his food he was far from being nice and delicate; not, however, from the want of a very diſcriminating taſte, but becauſe he had obſerved that a faſtidiouſneſs of appetite is often productive of evil conſequences. His mode of travelling was as ſimple and unexpenſive as poſſible; the reaſon he aſſigned for which, was, that the leſs he ſpent upon himſelf, the more he could afford for the wants of his fellow-creatures. In fact, he not only applied great part of his income, but alſo ſome portion of his principal fortune to the calls and purpoſes of others. In conſequence of the wide range of his charity, and the unoſtentatious manner in which it was beſtowed, many of his beneficent actions are now totally unknown; and others it would not be proper to mention, as the objects of them are ſtill living. Few returned from him empty-handed; for he ſaid, "that he loved to give." It was a beautiful part of his character, that he would often ſeek for excuſes, why he might beſtow ſomething even on profligate poverty. The relief that might accrue to the families of unworthy perſons, the diſtance the petitioners came from, or other reaſons, were aſſigned by Mr. Day as apologies for the exerciſe of his generoſity. Indeed, human benevolence would be too much limited, if the extenſion of it were ſolely confined to moral excellence. There may be much compaſſionable diſtreſs, much diſtreſs that ought to be relieved, where there are great defects in point of character.

It has been thought that Mr. Day was reſerved in his manners to thoſe of his own degree in life; but this was not the caſe where he particularly eſteemed people for their moral qualities, whether he knew them by experience or report. His countenance and behaviour were then expreſſive of the natural openneſs and cordiality of his temper. The perſons he was moſt diſpoſed to treat with coldneſs and diſtance, were thoſe, who, preſuming upon their rank, faſhion, or fortune, ſeemed to lay claim to the univerſal homage of mankind. Such vain and empty pretenſions he undoubtedly regarded with ſupreme contempt. He enjoyed rational ſociety, and had very great talents for converſation; but he had a diſlike to mixed companies, and eſpecially thoſe which conſtitute what are commonly called the polite circles.

To merit, though unattended with ſhining talents, Mr. Day was much attached; nor was he unwilling to have the company of any orderly perſons of the lower ranks. Common farmers were frequently admitted to his table, and he converſed with them with the utmoſt freedom. It was a pleaſure to him to promote the chearfulneſs and happineſs of ſome part of that claſs of men, who, though overlooked in a country of opulence and luxury, may be conſidered as the centre pillar of the great fabric of ſociety, and who at this day are an emblem, more perhaps than any other ſet of people in the kingdom, of the old Engliſh character.

In his temper, Mr. Day was open and mild to an uncommon degree. Nevertheleſs, the rigour with which, at an early period, he had diſciplined his own conduct, induced him ſometimes to expreſs his indignation with harſhneſs, when perſons talked in a manner very inconſiſtent with what might juſtly be expected from their age, ſituation, or character. He deſpiſed the French for their effeminacy and affectation; but a delicate Engliſhman he regarded as doubly contemptible. Had he lived to ſee the progreſs of the late grand revolution in France, he would probably have adopted other ſentiments, and made uſe of different language concerning that nation.

Mr. Day ſpoke very indulgently of the failings of mankind, and maintained, that miſconduct aroſe more from inconſiderate folly than deliberate wickedneſs. The latter term he thought to be rarely applicable to the characters of men. His opinion of the preſent age was, that it was diſſipated and trifling; and he believed, that even the middling claſſes were in their full career to ruin: the great cauſe of which he aſcribed to the want of good advice and example. He hoped, however, that from ſowing the ſeeds of morality early, a new ſyſtem might ſtill ſpring up, if the reſpectable characters of the kingdom did but foſter their growth with genial care, until they had raiſed them above the reach of thoſe weeds with which French foppery and faſhionable folly have over-run the land.

We ſhall conclude our account of Mr. Day's private life with an extract from a letter with which Mrs. Day has favoured the writer of the preſent article. "I may, I hope, "without impropriety, freely expreſs my ſenſe of that merit, which, in my eſtimation, "was unequalled. The undeviating firmneſs, independance, and diſintereſtedneſs of "Mr. Day's character, in an age of ſuch venality, corruption, and effeminacy as the "preſent, might ſurely be conſidered as a ſingular phænomenon. As I, of all human "beings, was the moſt intimately acquainted with the extraordinary and invariable ſim-"plicity of his life and manners, I do not ſcruple to ſay, that this, united to his patriotic "ſpirit (with the opinion I entertained of his eloquence and abilities,) continually re-"minded me of thoſe great and virtuous characters of ancient times, who, deſpiſing the "common objects of ambition, cultivated their farms, and yet were ever ready, when "occaſion called, to exert themſelves in defence of the rights and liberties of their "country. My huſband's conduct was in a great meaſure conformable to that ſentiment "of Rouſſeau: "Whilſt there is one of our fellow-creatures who wants the neceſſaries "of life, what virtuous man will riot in its ſuperfluities?"

A character ſo excellent, uncommon, and uſeful as that of Mr. Day would have well deſerved to be recorded in a work which is conſecrated to diſtinguiſhed merit of every kind, had he never appeared before the public in the capacity of a writer. However, in that capacity he will be found entitled to very commendable notice in the Biographia Britannica. It is obſervable, with regard to his writings, that they did not reſult from the vain ambition of figuring in the world as an author, but ſprang entirely from the benevolence of his diſpoſition, and his deſire to promote the moſt important intereſts of his country and mankind. This will be apparent from all his compoſitions, whether poetical, political, or miſcellaneous. The firſt publication in which he was concerned, was "The Dying Negro." We ſay the firſt publication in which he was concerned, for Mr. Day was not the ſole author of it, the piece having been written in conjunction with his intimate friend, James Bicknell, jun. Eſq; before mentioned [A]. The event that [A] The piece having been written in conjunction with his intimate friend James Bicknell, jun. Eſq.] If any of our readers ſhould be deſirous of knowing what particular parts of the poem were of Mr. Day's compoſition, we are enabled, by the favour of Mrs. Day, to gratify their curioſity in this reſpect. In the firſt page the two laſt lines are of his writing, and the third and fourth, the ſeventh and eighth, the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth lines of the ſecond page. In the fifth page two lines are Mr. Day's, the third and the fourth. From the third verſe of the eighth page, to the fourth verſe of the thirteenth page, the whole is our Author's, two lines excepted in the tenth page. Two lines more in the thirteenth page are his, being the thirteenth and fourteenth. In the next page he has eight lines, from the third to the tenth. At the two laſt verſes of the ſame page he commences again, and carries on the poem to the ſecond line of the eighteenth page. From the four concluding verſes of the nineteenth page to the end of the poem, the whole is Mr. Day's, with the exception of two paſſages and a ſingle line. The firſt paſſage is in the twentieth page, from the eleventh to the ſixteenth verſe. The other paſſage begins with the fifteenth line of the twenty-ſecond, and ends with the fourth line of the twenty-third page.

That our readers may be able to judge of the general merit of the poem, and of the comparative excellence of the writers of it, we ſhall inſert two ſpecimens, the firſt by Mr. Bicknell, the ſecond by Mr. Day.

By Mr. Bicknell.

that gave riſe to the poem, which was printed in 4to, in 1773, is explained in the advertiſement prefixed to the later editions. It is as follows: "The following poem was "occaſioned by a fact which had recently happened at the time of its firſt publication. "—A negro, belonging to the captain of a Weſt Indiaman, having agreed to marry a "white woman, his fellow-ſervant, in order to effect his purpoſe, had left his maſter's "houſe, and procured himſelf to be baptized: but being detected and taken, he was "ſent on board the captain's veſſel then lying in the river; where, finding no chance "of eſcaping, and preferring death to another voyage to America, he took an oppor-"tunity of ſhooting himſelf. As ſoon as his determination is fixed, he is ſuppoſed to "write this epiſtle to his intended wife."

"On this foundation," ſay the Monthly Reviewers, "a generous ſon of Apollo has paid the tribute of humanity, and feelingly lamented the miſery of a fellow-creature, in ſtrains which are truly pathetic and harmonious. He expreſſes the higheſt ſenſe of human liberty, and vigorouſly aſſerts the natural and univerſal rights of mankind; in vindicating which, he, of courſe, condemns and execrates our Weſt Indian planters, &c. whoſe tyranny over their unhappy ſlaves, will, we are afraid, in many inſtances, but too amply juſtify the ſeverity of his muſe.——The fiery paſſion, and deſperate reſolution, which ſo ſtrongly mark the negro's general character, are well expreſſed in this epiſtle; the ſpirit and numbers of which equally manifeſt the philanthropy, and the poetical abilities of the writer (a)." We ſhall only add to this juſt account of the poem, that there is prefixed to it a dedication of conſiderable length, to Jean Jaques Rouſſeau; written with all the ardour of young men, warm in the cauſe of liberty, humanity, and virtue. So favourable was the reception which the "Dying Negro" met with from the public, that it paſſed through ſeveral editions.

Mr. Day's next production was, "The Devoted Legions," publiſhed in 1776, in 4to, and addreſſed to Lord George Germaine, and the commanders of the forces againſt America. This poem is founded on the ſtory of Atteius, the Roman Tribune; who, having in vain oppoſed the unjuſt war againſt the Parthians, placed himſelf at the gate of the city through which Craſſus led the troops, and there (arrayed in the veſtments uſed in the dreadful ceremonies of the Auſpices, and ſcattering incenſe from a fire which he had prepared in one of the ſacred veſſels,) he ſolemnly execrated the expedition, and devoted the army to deſtruction. Though no mention is made in the body of our Author's performance of the American conteſt, the intended application was too obvious to be miſtaken. "The poem," obſerved the Monthly Reviewers, "is nervous, harmonious, and pathetic:—but we hope the Britiſh Atteius, though a ſpirited poet, will not prove, as the Roman did, a true prophet (b)." On this occaſion, however, Mr. Day did truly unite in himſelf the double characters of the Vates, as was afterwards fully evinced in the captures of the two armies of General Burgoyne and Lord Cornwallis. A ſecond edition of the "Devoted Legions" was publiſhed ſoon after the appearance of the firſt.

(b) Ib. vol. LIV. p. 242.

Mr. Day's laſt poetical production, which was printed in 1777, in 4to, was entituled, "The Deſolation of America." Two characters are principally introduced in it; the firſt that of a mother, and the ſecond that of a father, each of them lamenting the Bade reaſon's ſons with nobler titles riſe,

Lift high their brow ſublime, and ſcan the ſkies.
What tho' the ſun in his meridian blaze
Dart on their naked limbs his ſcorching rays?
What tho' no roſy tints adorn their face,
No ſilken treſſes ſhine with flowing grace;
Yet of ethereal temper are their ſouls,
And in their veins the tide of honour rolls;
And valour kindles there the hero's flame,
Contempt of death, and thirſt of martial fame;
And pity melts the ſympathiſing breaſt,
Ah! fatal virtue!—for the brave diſtreſt (1).

(1) The Dying Negro, p. 8. Edition of 1787.

By Mr. Day.

—And I have lov'd thee with as pure a fire,
As man e'er felt, or woman could inſpire:
No pangs like theſe my pallid tyrants know,
Not ſuch their tranſports, and not ſuch their woe.
Their ſofter frames a feeble ſoul conceal,
A ſoul unus'd to pity or to feel;
Damp'd by baſe lucre, and repell'd by fear,
Each nobler paſſion faintly blazes here.
Not ſuch the mortals burning Afric breeds,
Mother of virtues and heroic deeds!
Deſcended from yon radiant orb, they claim
Sublimer courage, and a fiercer flame.
Nature has there, unchill'd by art, impreſt
Her awful majeſty on ev'ry breaſt.
Where'er ſhe leads, impatient of controul,
The dauntleſs Negro ruſhes to the goal:
Firm in his love, reſiſtleſs in his hate,
His arm is conqueſt, and his frown is fate.

What fond affection in my boſom reigns!
What ſoft emotions mingle with my pains!
Still as thy form before my mind appears,
My haggard eyes are bath'd in guſhing tears;
Thy lov'd idea ruſhes to my heart,
And ſtern deſpair ſuſpends the lifted dart——
O could I burſt theſe fetters which reſtrain
My ſtruggling limbs, and waft thee o'er the main,
To ſome far diſtant ſhore, where Ocean roars
In horrid tempeſts round the gloomy ſhores;
To ſome wild mountain's ſolitary ſhade,
Where never European faith betray'd;
How joyful could I, of thy love ſecure,
Meet ev'ry danger, ev'ry toil endure!
For thee I'd climb the rock, explore the flood,
And tame the famiſh'd ſavage of the wood;
When ſcorching ſummer drinks the ſhrinking ſtreams,
My care ſhould ſcreen thee from its ſultry beams;
At noon I'd crown thee with the faireſt flowers,
At eve I'd lead thee to the ſafeſt bowers;
And when bleak winter howl'd around the cave,
For thee his horrors and his ſtorms I'd brave;
Nor ſnows nor raging winds ſhould damp my ſoul,
Nor ſuch a night as ſhrowds the duſky pole;
O'er the dark waves my bounding ſkiff I'd guide,
To pierce each mightier monſter of the tide;
Thro' frozen foreſts force my dreadful way,
In their own dens to rouze the beaſts of prey;
Nor other bleſſing aſk, if this might prove calamities of their country. The difference of the two characters is well ſuſtained; and we think that the abilities of our Author, as a poet, appear to great advantage in this performance. He was ſtrongly animated by his awful theme, and has united pity and terror in no inconſiderable degree. As, from the local and temporary nature of the ſubject, and the changes of events, it is poſſible that the poem may not hereafter excite peculiar attention as a ſeparate publication, we ſhall give a few ſpecimens of it below [B].
How fix'd my paſſion, and how fond my love (2).

Hitherto Mr. Day had appeared only in the world as a poet, and in each caſe without his name; ſo that he continued to maintain that privacy of life and character which was the moſt agreeable to his taſte and inclinations. But in the year 1780 he was called to act on a more public ſcene. This was occaſioned by the diviſions which at that time ſubſiſted in the kingdom with regard to the American war. What were Mr. Day's ſentiments concerning the principles and conduct of that war we need not mention, after what has been ſaid of the "Devoted Legions," and the "Deſolation of America." In conſequence of the ill ſucceſs which had attended the conteſt, and eſpecially the immenſe expences with which it was accompanied, a great part of the nation took the alarm, and meetings were held in a number of towns and counties with the view of drawing up petitions, (3)

[B] We ſhall give a few ſpecimens of it below.] The poem opens in the following manner:

Through the dim ſhades by frantic terror led,
From ſcenes of blood a hoary parent fled;
A tender virgin breathleſs with her fears,
Hung on his arm, and bath'd him with her tears:
With wearied ſteps, and with diſtracted air,
Follow'd the faithful partner of his care.
Through the lone ſhadows of ſurrounding night
Trembling they fled, for death purſued their flight.
And oft they ſtopp'd, and oft they turned their eyes,
Where a vaſt flame ſhot raging to the ſkies,
While ev'ry gale that mov'd the duſky air,
Pierc'd their ſad ears with accents of deſpair.
Here horrid ſhouts of barbarous triumph flow,
Blended with groans, and mingling ſhrieks of woe:
There feebler wails and dying accents riſe,
And rage remorſeleſs thunders to the ſkies.—
Now ſilent had they reach'd a mountain's ſide,
Whoſe paths unviolated foreſts hide:
There paus'd awhile their ſteps, while each ſurvey'd
The diſtant ruin, from the friendly ſhade.—
At length the wretched mother thus began,
While down her cheeks the liquid ſorrows ran.
And art thou, miſerable daughter, preſt
Once more to thy afflicted parent's breaſt?
And do theſe cloſing eyes thy form behold;
Theſe tears bedew thee, and theſe arms infold?
Yet ah! what pangs, what horrors ſeize my mind.
Ruin and death purſuing cloſe behind!
I ſee, I ſee ſwift burſting thro' the ſhade,
The cruel ſoldier, and the reeking blade.

After a few lines ſhe proceeds thus:

Yet, yet a moment, the fell ſteel reſtrain;
Muſt Nature's ſacred ties all plead in vain?
Ah! while your kindred blood remains unſpilt,
And Heaven allows an awful pauſe from guilt,
Suſpend the war, and recognize the bands,
Againſt whoſe lives you arm your impious hands!—
Not theſe, the boaſt of Gallia's proud domains,
Nor the ſcorch'd ſquadrons of Iberian plains:
Unhappy men! no foreign war you wage,
In your own blood you glut your frantic rage;
And while you follow where Oppreſſion leads,
At ev'ry ſtep, a friend, or brother bleeds.—

The mother purſues her lamentation through a variety of affecting topics, after which ſhe thus exclaims:

Then, hope, farewell!—e'en now the fiends prevail,
And ſounds of horror ſadden ev'ry gale.
Lo! where the ſacrilegious flames ariſe,
And deſolation blazes to the ſkies!
Farewell, lov'd ſeats, whoſe ruins ſtrike my ear,
For ever ſacred, and for ever dear!
Where'er around I turn my mournful eyes,
Sad ſcenes of human miſeries ariſe.
Triumphant rage, revenge, and death are there,
And all the vanquiſh'd feel, and all the victors dare.

She afterwards goes on as follows:

Farewell the hearth, farewell the chearful board!
The humble roof with every comfort ſtor'd!
With all that bounteous Heav'n beſtow'd in vain,
To ſweeten being, and alleviate pain!
There, the wild rage of conflagration preys,
Wide-darting through the gloom it's angry rays.
Stern as the foe of nature in his walks,
Amid the wreck the horrid ſoldier ſtalks.
His unrelenting hand the wound prepares
For thoſe, whom e'en the fiery deluge ſpares:
Inſpires new fury to the ſinking flame;
Or ſtabs the ſuppliant babe, and calls it fame!

One paſſage more, which ſtrongly ſhews how capable Mr. Day was of pathetic deſcription, ſhall conclude our extracts from the mother's lamentation.

In vain, for food, the dying infant cries,
With ghaſtly viſage, and beſeeching eyes:—
The pious mother doom'd to certain death,
For his dear ſake, retains the fleeting breath;
But while, with fatal tenderneſs, ſhe drains
The milky treaſures, and exhauſts her veins;
She ſees her breaſt deny it's balmy flood,
And fills his guiltleſs mouth with ſtreaming blood.
Then with a burſting heart from pain retires,
Looks up to Heaven, and on her babe expires.

From the father's lamentation, which is carried on with equal energy and ſpirit, we ſhall only take ſome lines at the beginning.

She ceas'd, and ſunk upon her daughter's breaſt;
For grief unutterable choak'd the reſt;
When with ſuperior dignity of woes,
And more compos'd deſpair, the father roſe.
Thrice on the dreadful ſcene he turn'd his eyes,
Then thus with arms extended to the ſkies.
—Not that the victim of revenge and hate,
I periſh by an undiſtinguiſh'd fate,
Shall fear appal, or paſſion ſhake my mind;
For all the hopes and joys I leave behind.
Be witneſs, Heav'n! that my firm breaſt diſdains
To feel a ſorrow for its private pains.—
I ſee the horrors which around me wait;
Nor aſk nor hope to deprecate my fate.—
Caught in the ſweeping toil which covers all,
Alike unpitied, and unmark'd I fall.
My foot already trembles on the verge—
I hear from far the daſhing of the ſurge,
But ſtrive in vain to fly—ſo vaſt, ſo wide,
Deſtruction rolling on, impels it's waſteful tide.—
But oh! my country, when I turn my eyes
Upon thy fall, and view thy miſeries;
Thy ſlaughter'd warriors, and thy captive dames,
Thy roofs polluted, and thy towers in flames;
Thy ſacred walls by impious ſlaughter ſtain'd,
Thy rights invaded, and thy ſhrines prophan'd;
By tides of grief, and ſhame, and fury toſt,
The boaſted firmneſs of my ſoul is loſt:
Unmanly ſighs from my ſwoln boſom break,
And tears of anguiſh tremble on my cheek.— (3)

petitions, or forming reſolutions for the redreſs of public grievances. At this criſis, Mr. Day, who, as we have ſeen, had already manifeſted how much he deteſted the whole proceedings of Adminiſtration in the American buſineſs, thought it his duty to come forward. Accordingly he attended various meetings in different parts of the kingdom, and, to uſe his own language, delivered ſuch ſentiments as became him to ſpeak, and free-born men to hear. The places at which he appears more particularly to have diſtinguiſhed himſelf, were Cambridge and Chelmsford: at leaſt, the ſpeeches which he made there are the only ones that have fallen within the compaſs of our knowledge. They are preſerved among the tracts publiſhed by the Society for Conſtitutional Information. The firſt of them was ſpoken on the twenty-fifth of March, 1780, at a general meeting of the freeholders of the County of Cambridge; and the ſecond on the twenty-fifth of April following, at a general meeting of the freeholders of the County of Eſſex. The expreſs purpoſe of theſe meetings was, to petition for a reform in the public expenditure: but this did not ſatisfy the active patriotic mind of Mr. Day, who was for laying the axe to the root of national abuſes, by a renewal of the conſtitution. The grievances of the kingdom, he contended, could be effectually redreſſed in no other way than by ſhortening the duration of parliaments, and introducing a more equal repreſentation. "When "theſe points," ſays he, "have been obtained, the nation will be enabled to exert all "the wiſdom, valour, and reſolution it poſſeſſes in its own defence; and if we fail "then, we deſerve to fall for ever. Till then every inferior reformation is leſs than "nothing: it is ſhutting the gates when the enemy are in poſſeſſion of the walls, "or ſtopping a chink in the public mounds, when the tide of ſhame and ruin is pouring "in at a thouſand breaches." In conformity to theſe ſentiments, he concluded his ſpeech to the freeholders of the County of Eſſex, with the following motions: 1. "It "is reſolved by this meeting, that annual parliaments, and an equal repreſentation, are "the undoubted conſtitutional rights of the Engliſh people. 2. It is reſolved by this "meeting, that they will not ſupport any candidate to repreſent them who will not "publicly ſubſcribe to the following teſt: 'I, A. B. do hereby expreſs my full and "perfect approbation of annual parliaments, and an equal repreſentation, as the un-"doubted conſtitutional rights of the Engliſh people: and I do hereby voluntarily en-"gage myſelf, by every tie of honour, to promote, to the utmoſt of my power, influ-"ence, and abilities, the reſtoration of theſe fundamental rights to the Engliſh people." Even thoſe perſons, who leaſt of all agreed in opinion with Mr. Day, muſt have been ſenſible of the manly eloquence with which he ſupported his propoſitions; and they muſt have been equally ſenſible of the integrity of the views by which he was actuated: nor were there wanting many reſpectable and enlightened citizens, who approved of the wiſdom, as well as of the integrity of his principles. What he ſaid concerning himſelf in particular, at the cloſe of his ſpeech, affords ſo juſt a delineation of his character, that we ſhall preſent it to our readers. "After," ſays he, "having ſo boldly delivered "my ſentiments of others, it may perhaps be permitted me to ſay ſomething of my-"ſelf. The motives which have impelled me to the dangerous ſervice I have this day "choſen, are equally unmixed with intereſt or ambition. The uniform tenor of my "former life, voluntarily devoted to leiſure, ſtudy, and retirement, the independence "of my fortune, and the contempt I have always ſhewn for the pageantry of the world, "ought to be a ſufficient evidence of my ſincerity. All that is farther in my power, is "publicly to declare the reſolution which I long have taken; that under no pretext "whatever will I ſtoop to ſolicit favours from any party, or even to accept of wages "from my country; and when I ſhall be convicted of attempting to evade theſe pro-"feſſions, I will ſubmit, without appeal, to all the infamy I ſhall deſerve. A man that "acts upon principles like theſe, can have nothing to hope, even from the ampleſt ſuc-"ceſs, beyond the happineſs of his country, and the conſciouſneſs of having diſcharged "his duty. And this conſciouſneſs, whatever elſe be my fate, I truſt I ſhall bear with "me into retirement.——Amidſt the wrecks of public liberty, and the ruin of this na-"tion, there is little chance that I ſhall ever be deprived of at leaſt a competence; and "he that poſſeſſes that is a welcome gueſt in every land.—He may with impunity deſert "the falling fortunes of his country; and there is an aſylum now opened in the Weſt, "which will gather together the brave, the wiſe, the good, from all the winds of "Heaven. But it is you, my countrymen, with your children and your families, who "are chained down to the ſpot which you now inhabit, that will be bruiſed beneath "the iron hand of power, if you throw away your only remaining means of ſafety. "And if you ſuffer another Houſe of Commons to be elected without an expreſs ſtipu-"lation for your liberties, actum eſt de Republica, the commonwealth is loſt, the peo-"ple enſlaved for ever.—You ought to conſider yourſelves as deſperate gameſters, that "are playing for their laſt ſtake.—Manage it wiſely, defend it bravely, and may the "event be fortunate to yourſelves, and ſalutary to your country!" Should it be thought that the language of the latter part of this paragraph is too ſtrong, it ought to be remembered, that, when the ſpeech was delivered, the kingdom was in a very melancholy and dangerous ſituation; and that it was a fixed principle with Mr. Day, that real political freedom neither did, nor could ſubſiſt, without a ſhorter duration of parliaments, and a more equal repreſentation of the people.

Though Mr. Day was not ſucceſsful in the points which he had ſo greatly at heart, and which he had ſupported with ſo much ability, his ardour was not hence ſlackened in endeavouring to promote the welfare of his country. The fatal effects of the American war lay heavy on his mind, and he was anxious to contribute all that lay in his power to avert them. For this purpoſe he publiſhed, in 1782, in 8vo, a tract, entituled, "Reflections upon the preſent State of England, and the Independence of America." This is an admirable performance; and if, in delineating the Character of it, we borrow, in part, the language of a periodical critic, it is becauſe we cannot find better words wherein to expreſs our own ideas. Our Author began with a ſtriking picture of the critical ſituation of public affairs at that time; and after having reprobated, in a ſtrain of keen indignation, the unhappy and miſerable policy which had reduced the Engliſh grandeur nearly to annihilation, he proceeded to enquire into the moſt effectual and ſpeedy means for terminating the American war, and producing that peace which was become abſolutely neceſſary for the national ſalvation. Having illuſtrated with great power of argument the inflexible ſpirit of the Americans, and their determined reſolution to be free, he gave it as his opinion, that America ought to be declared independent. Great advantages, he conceived, would reſult from the meaſure; and his reaſonings in favour of it were ſolid and well ſupported. From the conſideration, that American independence was properly the object for which the nations of Europe were ſolicitous, he was induced to affirm, that England ought to yield with magnanimity what it could not with-hold by arms. Mr. Day ſupported his general argument for peace with great ingenuity, by ſtating the real condition of the confederacy which had been formed againſt us: after which he deſcribed the probable conſequences which the declaration of its unlimited independence would produce in America. As our Author looked towards a ſpeedy peace as the only means that could reſtore the fallen majeſty of England; ſo, from the prolongation of the war, he prognoſticated the moſt certain ruin. His remarks on this head were ſucceeded by an examination of the treaty of alliance between France and America; from which he was led to confirm his opinion, that the granting of American independence was a neceſſary preliminary of peace. He likewiſe added ſtrength to his argument by many additional and important conſiderations; and exhibited, in particular, with much ſpirit, juſtice, and accuracy, the thoughts and views of the friends of America. Mr. Day then apologized for having given way to the impulſe he felt for laying his reflections before the public; and concluded by explaining, with becoming fortitude, the motives which compelled him to deteſt the American war. On the whole, the Reviewers declared it to be their opinion, (and it is an opinion in which we entirely concur with them,) that our Author's reaſonings were cloſe, his manner keen without indiſcretion, and his language forcible (c). A remark is added, ſo honourable to Mr. Day's character and conduct, and ſo uſeful in itſelf, that it ſhall be given in the note [C].

(c) Monthly Review, vol. LXVII. p. 321—27.

How well the tract we are ſpeaking of was received, will be apparent to our readers, when they are informed, that it went through four editions in little more than a year's time. The ſentiments advanced in it were ſpeedily embraced by the greater part of the public; and it is probable that the reflections contributed to the event which followed, the acknowledgment of the independence of America. It cannot be ſuppoſed that the noble Lord who negotiated the proviſional treaty with the United States, could be a ſtranger to Mr. Day's publication. With regard to the wiſdom of the meaſure ſo warmly contended for by our Author, we may ſafely aſſert, that it will not now be called in queſtion; ſince the experience of a number of years hath evinced, that it has not been productive of the evil conſequences which many apprehended. On the contrary, Great Britain hath maintained her commerce in a moſt eminent degree, and hath ſuſtained all her former rank in the ſcale of empire: and we truſt, that, under the influence of wiſe and prudent, as well as manly counſels, ſhe will long continue to preſerve her proſperity and glory.

[C] A remark is added that ſhall be given in the note.]

"There is one obſervation," ſay the Reviewers, "which the example of Mr. Day has ſuggeſted to us, "and which we beg to throw out in the preſent "ſituation of affairs. The corruption of miniſters "has, of late years, been ſo great, that they have "bribed almoſt every man of letters into their ſer-"vice, and have diſcovered an extreme ſolicitude "to deceive the public by their venal publications. "Hence it has naturally followed, that anonymous "pamphlets have ſunk into ſo much diſcredit, that "they are ſeldom read, and that no faith or truſt "is repoſed in them. Unlike to ſuch writers, and "unawed by the terrors of power, the Author, "whoſe reflections are now before us, gives his name "to the world, and ſtands forward to avow the ſen-"timents he has publiſhed. It were to be wiſhed "that all political writers would imitate his diſin-"tereſtedneſs. The liberty of the preſs would then "appear in its brighteſt glory. Motives of pru-"dence would then repreſs the unprincipled inſo-"lence of hired rhetoricians; and miniſters would "not dare to affect a contempt of the cenſures of "reſpectable men and incorrupt citizens. The fer-"vour of the people would be kept alive: they "would be exactly informed of their due and pro-"per importance, and be able to ſound thoſe "alarms which give inſtructions to kings. They "would be taughts to deſpiſe and to puniſh thoſe "abominable ſtateſmen, who are eager to exerciſe "their rapacity and not their virtues; whoſe ſelf-"iſhneſs is their only idol; and who, diſregard-"ing the fortunes of the nation which they are "called to govern, are contented with the conſe-"quence and gratifications that are afforded by "the pride of office and the trappings of great-"neſs (4)."

(4) Ibid. pp. 327, 328.

Mr. Day's next political publication, which appeared in 1784, in 8vo, was entituled, "The Letters of Marius: or, Reflections upon the Peace, the East India Bill, and the preſent Criſis." Theſe letters were originally intended for the news-papers; but, before our Author had finiſhed the ſixth of the ſeries, the bulk was ſo far increaſed beyond his expectation, that he determined to lay them before the public in the form of a pamphlet, though the variety of their ſubjects rendered it impoſſible for him to give them the uniformity of a continued eſſay. The letters are eight in number, and the three former of them are addreſſed to Dr. John Jebb. In the firſt, he pays a high and juſt tribute of applauſe to the Doctor for his zeal and exertions in the cauſe of the public; and in the ſecond and third he vindicates the rights of the people to a voice in every free government, and urges the expediency of a parliamentary reform. The fourth and fifth letters are addreſſed to the Earl of Stair, who is attacked with ſpirit on account of the gloomy forebodings which appeared in his political writings, and particularly for his wiſh, that the Euthenaſia of the Engliſh Conſtitution might be a mild deſpotiſm. His Lordſhip is farther cenſured as a ſcoffer at public meaſures, a railer againſt public characters, and a ſecret friend to arbitrary government. In the ſixth letter, which is to the Earl of Shelburne, Mr. Day vindicates, with great ability, that nobleman's peace, without uſing the language of flattery. The ſubject of the ſeventh and eighth letters, which are addreſſed to Mr. Burke, is Mr. Fox's India Bill. With regard to this famous bill, our Author particularly inſiſts on the inconſiſtency and injuſtice of attempting to ſeize upon the rights of the India Company, after a renewal of their charter had been granted in 1781; ſince the allegations againſt them were for male adminiſtration prior to that period. In the eighth letter, the character of Mr. Haſtings is touched with a very maſterly hand. If, upon the whole, the "Letters of Marius" ſhould not be deemed equal to the treatiſe on the Independence of America, it ſhould be remembered, that the circumſtances of the times called for their ſpeedy publication, and that they contain many ingenious, ſpirited, and important obſervations. They diſplay, likewiſe, the writer's inflexible ingenuity, which could not be drawn into the vortex of any party (d).

(d) Letters of Marius paſſim. Monthly Review, p. 435—440.

A few weeks after the appearance of this work, Mr. Day publiſhed, in 8vo, the "Fragment of an original Letter on the Slavery of the Negroes." The letter had been written in the year 1776, at the requeſt of an American gentleman, who had deſired to know our Author's ſentiments upon the ſubject, and profeſſed his intention of reſtoring all his own ſlaves to liberty, could he be convinced that duty required the ſacrifice. Mr. Day did not chooſe to produce the eſſay during the progreſs of the American conteſt. But, after that diſaſtrous war was happily terminated, having ſhewn it to ſome particular friends, they ſolicited him to conſent to its publication. "After reflecting," ſays he, "upon the ſubject, I have choſen to comply with their wiſhes, and preſent this fragment to the public; becauſe, whatever diſcredit it brings upon my head, it may contribute to eſtabliſh the ſincerity of my heart; and if a ſingle human being ſhould by my means be reſtored to happineſs, it is an ample recompence for all the dangers I may incur as an author. Should this eſſay ever reach America, it may perhaps diſpleaſe thoſe who have not learned to diſcern friends from flatterers, and to diſtinguiſh between the language of truth and calumny. Thoſe, on the contrary, who are enlightened by a more extenſive knowledge of human nature, may perhaps reſpect an Engliſhman, who, after daring to aſſert their cauſe through all the varied events of the late revolution, dares now with equal intrepidity aſſert the cauſe of truth and juſtice, and of that part of the human ſpecies whoſe wrongs are yet unredreſſed, and almoſt unpitied (e)." We need not ſay with what energy and ſpirit Mr. Day would write upon ſuch a ſubject. "With what face, Sir," ſays he to his correſpondent, "can he who has never reſpected the rights of nature in another, pretend to claim them in his own favour? How dare the inhabitants of the ſouthern colonies ſpeak of privileges and juſtice? Is money of ſo much more importance than life? Or have the Americans ſhared the diſpenſing power of St. Peter's ſucceſſors, to excuſe their own obſervance of thoſe rules which they impoſe on others? If there be an object truly ridiculous in nature, it is an American patriot, ſigning reſolutions of independence with the one hand, and with the other brandiſhing a whip over his affrighted ſlaves (f)."

(e) Advertiſement prefixed to the Fragment.

(f) Fragment, p. 33.

Another political tract publiſhed by our Author in 1784, but which, on account of its coming out at the cloſe of the year, was, according to the cuſtom of book-ſellers, dated in the title page 1785, was, "A Dialogue between a Juſtice of Peace and a Farmer," in 8vo. The two grand objects of this performance were to evince the neceſſity of a more equal repreſentation of the people, and to vindicate the rights of juries in matters of libels. Under the firſt of theſe heads, Mr. Day took occaſion to expoſe, with ſpirit, and with ſome degree of ſeverity, the poſitions advanced by Mr. Soame Jenyns, in his "Thoughts on a Parliamentary Reform," and in his "Diſquiſitions." He has likewiſe defended Mr. Locke's principles of government againſt the objections of Dean Tucker. On the ſecond head, our Author maintains, with his uſual ability, that it is the duty of a jury to inveſtigate the nature and tendency of the publication before them, that they may fulfil their oaths, and do juſtice to the accuſed; and that they ought to find a general verdict, unleſs ſomething ariſes which involves them in irreſiſtible doubt.

This, however, he does not think to be a caſe which will oftener occur in the conſideration of libels, than in that of any other crime. A third edition of the Dialogue was publiſhed in 1786.

Mr. Day's laſt political publication, which appeared in 1788, was a Letter to Arthur Young, Eſq; on the bill then depending in parliament to prevent the exportation of wool. Mr. Young, in his Annals of Agriculture, had ſtrongly diſplayed the evil tendency of this bill; and Mr. Day took up the pen on the ſame ſide of the queſtion. The act propoſed he conſidered as replete with miſchief and danger, and was of opinion, that it it might ſafely challenge the moſt oppreſſive regulations of the moſt deſpotic countries, without fearing to ſee its own merit impaired by the compariſon (g). Such having been his ſentiments concerning it, it is no wonder that he wrote againſt it with peculiar animation. If we miſtake not, the efforts of Sir Joſeph Banks and other gentlemen, and the light diffuſed by various publications, were ſo far ſucceſsful, that the bill which actually paſſed was in a great meaſure deprived of the original malignity of its nature.

(g) Letter to Arthur Young, Eſq. p. 2.

We now advert to the character of Mr. Day as a miſcellaneous writer, or, to ſpeak more properly, as a writer on the ſubject of education. This was a ſubject in which his heart was deeply engaged, and the right management of which he was very ſolicitous to promote. He had a particular diſlike to the faſhionable modes of education that prevail in this country. Youth, he thought, ſhould be inſpired with a hardy ſpirit, both of paſſive and active virtue, and led to form ſuch habits of induſtry and fortitude as would produce a manly independence of character, and a mind ſuperior to the enticements of luxurious indulgence. With this view he wrote "The Hiſtory of Sandford and Merton, in 12mo:" a work intended for the uſe of children; and the firſt volume of which appeared in 1783. In this volume he relates a variety of tales chiefly drawn from former ſources, but arranged and expreſſed in his own manner. Theſe narratives he has interwoven with a ſtory, in which two children and their tutor are the principal characters. The language is elegant without departing from the ſimplicity which was neceſſary to render it intelligible to children; and the incidents are both well diverſified, and extremely pleaſing and inſtructive. In this work the method of teaching by experience is diſplayed in ſeveral ſtriking inſtances, and adopted with good effect (b). It has been thought that our author has inſiſted too much on the utility of employing children, even in the higher ranks of life, in manual operations. This object did not occur to us in reading the performance. The ſtory is hence rendered more intereſting and uſeful; and it muſt be acknowledged, that the bringing up of young perſons to the ability of doing as much as poſſible for themſelves, may be of ſingular ſervice in the varied courſe of human events. In a converſation between Mr. Merton, ſen. and the tutor, there are ſome obſervations concerning the excellency of the Chriſtian Religion as adapted to the inſtruction and comfort of the poor, which we ſhould have inſerted with peculiar pleaſure, had not the book been ſo well known, and of ſuch eaſy acceſs.

(b) Monthly Review, vol. LXX. pp. 126, 127.

The ſecond volume of "The Hiſtory of Sandford and Merton" appeared in 1786. In this volume, Mr. Day added to the reputation he had gained by the former one; and it will be the fault of young perſons if they do not receive from it much improvement. "The ſenſible and ingenious author," ſay the Monthly Reviewers, "poſſeſſes in great "perfection the happy art of conveying uſeful information, juſt and manly ſentiments, "and important precepts, in the form of dialogue and ſtory. Excellent leſſons of "hardy temperance, activity, humanity, generoſity, and piety; rational views of Soci-"ety; and, withal, many articles of inſtruction in ſcience, are, in this little volume, "agreeably wrought up into the form of a narration (i)." We cannot help mentioning, that the account of young Merton's viſit at his father's houſe, of the influence of polite company upon him, and of his ill uſage of his friend Sandford, is admirably written, and exhibits a fine picture of the ſentiments and manners that too much prevail in faſhionable life. The fourth edition of the firſt volume of Sandford and Merton was publiſhed in 1787, and the ſecond edition of the ſecond volume in 1788.

(i) Ibid. vol. LXXV. p. 361.

Mr. Day's next production was "The Hiſtory of Little Jack," which was inſerted in "The Children's Miſcellany," printed for Mr. Stockdale; and the preface to which was drawn up by our Author, with his uſual good ſenſe and ſolicitude for the welfare of the riſing generation. Soon after (in 1788) "Little Jack" was ſeparately given to the public, in a ſmall volume, embelliſhed with twenty-two wooden cuts. The moral of the ſtory, which is entertaining, and diſplays the good effects of activity, induſtry, ſobriety, and honeſty, is, "that it is of very little conſequence how a man comes into the world, "provided he behaves well, and diſcharges his duty when he is in it (k)."

(k) Hiſtory of Little Jack, p. 112.

In 1789, a few weeks before Mr. Day's deceaſe, was publiſhed the third volume of "The Hiſtory of Sandford and Merton;" with regard to which it is ſufficient to ſay, that the ſtory is carried on with the ſame ability, variety, entertainment, and inſtruction that were diſplayed in the preceding volumes. The reconciliation between Sandford and Merton is begun and completed in a moment; the bad habits of the latter are corrected; and he returns to his father's houſe with this concluſion; that he had been taught, and particularly by Sandford's example, "how much better it is to be uſeful than rich or fine; how "much more amiable to be good than to be great."

If

If Mr. Day's life had been continued, he would undoubtedly have exerted his talents in farther productions for the benefit of mankind. Perhaps he might have reſumed "The Hiſtory of Sandford and Merton," and have conducted them up to years of manhood. But though his premature death muſt ever be regreted, his ſurviving friends will have the conſolation of reflecting, that he lived long enough to exhibit a pattern of diſintereſted virtue, and ardent philanthropy, which, it is hoped, cannot be uſeleſs to the world.] K.

DEE (JOHN) a perſon famous in the XVIth century for his extenſive learning, more eſpecially in the Mathematical Sciences; but withal extremely credulous, extravagantly vain, and a moſt deluded enthuſiaſt. He was deſcended from an ancient family of that name in Radnorſhire (a): his father's name was Rowland Dee, a perſon in good circumſtances, and, as Mr. Wood tells us, a Vintner in Londer (b). He was born July 13th, 1527 (c), at London, and, after ſome time ſpent at ſchool there, and at Chelmſford in Eſſex, he was, in the year 1542, ſent to St. John's College at Cambridge, where he applied himſelf, as he aſſures us, with wonderful diligence to his ſtudies (d) [A]. In the month of May 1547, he went into the Low-Countries, on purpoſe to converſe with Gemma Friſius, Gerardus Mercator, Gaſper à Mirica, Antonius Gogava, &c.; and, either at the cloſe of that year, or the beginning of the next, returned to Cambridge (e), where, upon the erecting of Trinity College by King Henry the VIIIth, he was choſen one of the Fellows (f), and entered the new College with great applauſe; which fair reputation he held not long [B]. In 1548 he had the degree of Maſter of Arts (g); but being poſſeſſed with a roving diſpoſition, diſturbed with the injurious reports that were ſpread of him, or deſirous of making the Mathematical Knowledge he had acquired, by indefatigable diligence, more conſpicuous, he again left England the ſame year, and went to the Univerſity of Louvain, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf extremely, ſo that he was viſited by the Duke of Mantua, by Don Lewis de la Cerda, afterwards Duke of Medinaceli, and other perſons of great rank (h). While he remained there, Sir William Pickering was his pupil (i); and in this Univerſity, it is probable, he had the degree of Doctor of Laws conferred upon him, though it does not certainly appear. July 15th, 1550, he went from thence to Paris, where, in the College of Rheims, he

[A] With wonderful diligence to his ſtudies]. We have the life of this extraordinary perſon written in ſeveral languages and by various hands, which ſhews, that, notwithſtanding all his errors and follies, it was thought a point of conſequence, not to our own only, but to the literary hiſtory of all Europe, that a juſt account of his life and labours ſhould be preſerved (1). This may apologize for the pains taken in this article, which we dare aſſure the reader, is both fuller and more correct than any thing that has been yet publiſhed concerning him; but, at the ſame time we muſt readily acknowledge, that the greateſt part of it is founded on that excellent Latin life of this author, publiſhed by Dr. Thomas Smith, compared, however, throughout with many other writers of our own and other nations, and with Mr. Dee's own writings. He appears from them, as from every thing elſe that relates to him, to have been a man vain and conceited in the higheſt degree, of which it will be judged no ſmall proof, that he drew and exhibited to his friends an ample ſcheme of his pedigree, which he pretended to deduce from Roderick the Great, Prince of Wales. Anthony Wood ſays, that his father Rowland Dee was a Vintner, as is mentioned in the text. Dr. Smith, who was much better informed, contents himſelf with obſerving, and that, perhaps, from conjecture only, this Rowland Dee was a man in good circumſtances; but we are elſewhere told, which is probably the truth, that his father was a menial ſervant to King Henry VIII, and that ſome way or other he had been indifferently treated at Court, which recommended his family in a peculiar manner to the deſcendants of this Monarch (2). A very learned perſon, who was acquainted with our author's perſon and family, tells us, that he was deſcended from the Dees of Nanty Groes, and that the name was originally written Du, which in the Britiſh language ſignifies black (3). It appears from ſome of our author's correſpondencies, that he was ſometimes ſtiled by others, and perhaps wrote himſelf, Dey inſtead of Dee. As to the life he led at Cambridge, take it in his own words (4): 'Anno 1542, I was ſent 'by my father Rowland Dee to the univerſitie of 'Cambridge, there to begin with Logick, and ſo to 'proceed in the learning of good arts and ſciences, 'for I had before been meetly well furniſhed with un-'derſtanding of the Latin tongue, I being then ſome-'what above fifteen years old. In the years 1543, '1544, 1545, I was ſo vehemently bent to ſtudie, 'that for thoſe years I did inviolably keep this order, 'only to ſleep four hours every night; to allow to 'meat and drink, and ſome refreſhing after, two hours 'every day; and of the other eighteen hours, all, 'except the time of going to, and being at the divine 'ſervice, was ſpent in my ſtudies and learning.'

[B] Which fair reputation he held not long.] He brought over with him from the Low Countries ſeveral mathematical inſtruments, made by the direction of Gemma Friſius, together with a pair of great globes made by Gerard Mercator, with other things of conſiderable value; of all which he not only freely granted the uſe to his fellow ſtudents, but made a preſent of them to his college at his departure (5). However, his aſſiduity in making aſtronomical obſervations, which, in thoſe days, were always underſtood as connected with the deſire of penetrating into futurity, brought ſome ſuſpicion upon him, which was ſo far increaſed by a very ſingular accident that befel him, as to draw the imputation of a Conjurer, which he could never ſhake off in the ſpace of threeſcore years after. As to this accident it happened ſoon after his removal from St. John's, and being choſen one of the Fellows of Trinity, and he relates it thus (6): 'I was out of St. 'John's College, choſen to be one of the Fellows of 'Trinity-college, at the firſt erection thereof by King 'Henry VIII. I was alſo aſſigned there to be the 'Under Reader of the Greek tongue, Mr. Pember being 'the Chief Greek Reader then in Trinity-college. 'Hereupon, I did ſet forth, and it was ſeen of the 'univerſity, a Greek Comedy of Ariſtophanes, named 'in Greek Εἰρήνη, in Latin Pax, with the performance 'of the Scarabœus, or beetle, his flying up to Jupiter's 'palace with a man and his baſket of victuals on her 'back, whereat was great wondering, and many vain 'reports ſpread abroad, of the means how that was 'effected.'——He adds—— 'In that college alſo by 'my advice and my endeavours divers ways uſed with 'all the other colleges, was their Chriſtmas Magiſtrate, 'firſt named and confirmed an Emperor. The firſt 'was one Mr. Thomas Dun, a very goodly man of 'perſon, ſtature, and complexion, and well learned 'alſo. They which yet live, and were hearers and 'beholders then, can teſtify more than is meet here to 'be written of theſe my boyiſh attempts, and exploits 'ſcholaſtical.'

read lectures upon Euclid's Elements, with prodigious applauſe; and very great offers were made him in caſe he would have accepted a Profeſſorſhip in that Univerſity; which, however, he refuſed (k). In 1551 he returned into England, was well received by Sir John Cheke, introduced to Mr. Secretary Cecil, and even to King Edward himſelf, from whom he firſt received a penſion of one hundred crowns a year, which was afterwards exchanged for a grant of the Rectory of Upton upon Severne, his Majeſty's preſentation to which he received May 9th, 1553 (l). In the next reign he was, for ſome time, very kindly treated, as having, in his youth, been fellow-ſtudent with ſome of Queen Mary's principal Miniſters; but, however, it was not long that he continued in this ſituation, a charge being brought againſt him, of a very high nature, upon which he was committed to ſafe cuſtody, and in very great danger of his life (m) [C]. At length, however, through the juſtice and clemency of King Philip and Queen Mary, he obtained his liberty, and preſented a memorial to Queen Mary, for preſerving ancient writings and monuments (n), and for recovering ſuch as were in danger of periſhing; which, aſſuredly, was a very good deſign, and would have been attended with conſequences very favourable to literature, if it had taken effect. By what accident it was hindered we have not any account: yet, that Mr. Dee was a perſon well qualified to execute what he propoſed, and ſupported his requeſt by very weighty and rational arguments, the reader may perceive by his Memorial, which is inſerted in the notes [D]. [C] And in very great danger of his life.] At the very entrance of Queen Mary's reign, Mr. Dee entered into ſome correſpondence with ſeveral of the Lady Elizabeth's principal ſervants, while ſhe was at Woodſtock and at Milton, which being obſerved, and the nature of his correſpondence not known, two informers, whoſe names were Ferrys and Prideaux, charged him with practiſing againſt the Queen's life by inchantments, upon which he was ſeized at Hampton-Court, while his lodgings in London were ſearched and ſealed, and, after being ſome time in confinement, he was examined upon four articles by Sir John Bourne, then Secretary of State; afterwards upon eighteen more, before the Privy Council; next he was transferred to London, and underwent an examination before the Lord Chief-Juſtice Brooke of the Common-Pleas, which did not prevent his being brought into the Star-Chamber, where, after a trial, being diſcharged of all ſuſpicion of treaſon, he was turned over to Biſhop Bonner, to ſee if he could find any hereſy in him. In the Biſhop of London's priſon he was bedfellow to Barthlet Green who was burned for his firm adherence to the Proteſtant faith. As to Mr. Dee, his religious notions did not lead him to burning; ſo that after this tedious perſecution, Auguſt 19, 1555, he was, by an order of Council, reſtored to his liberty; entering into a recognizance, however, to appear the firſt and laſt days in the enſuing term, and for his good behaviour (7).

[D] By his memorial, which is inſerted in the notes.] The reaſons which may juſtify our inſerting the following paper are mentioned in the text, to which we will add here, that, if our author may be relied upon, that famous treatiſe of Cicero, the loſs of which is ſo much regretted by the learned world, was once extant in this kingdom, which is a fact not generally known. In this our author Dee followed the example of the celebrated John Leland, who was very zealous and active for the ſame purpoſe: neither is poſterity barely indebted to them for their good intentions, but owes them likewiſe much in their private capacities, for preſerving many valuable manuſcripts, that have come down even to our time. But to return to the point.

A ſupplication to Queen Mary by John Dee, for the recovery and preſervation of antient writers and monuments. Dated the fifteenth of January, 1556 (8).

(8) In the Cotton Library, Vitellius, c. vii.

To the Queen's Moſt Excellent Majeſty.

IN moſt humble wiſe complaining, beſeecheth your Highneſs, your faithful and loving ſubject John Dee, Gent. to have in remembrance how, that among the exceeding many moſt lamentable diſpleaſures that have of late happened unto this realm, through the ſubverting of religious houſes, and the diſſolution of other aſſemblies of godly and learned men, it hath been, and for ever, among all learned ſtudents, ſhall be, judged not for the leaſt calamity, the ſpoil and deſtruction of ſo many and ſo notable libraries, wherein lay the treaſure of all antiquity, and the everlaſting ſeeds of continual excellency, within this your Grace's realm. But albeit that in thoſe days, many a precious jewel, and antient monument, did utterly periſh, as at Canterbury did that wonderful work of the ſage and eloquent Cicero, de Republica; and in many other places the like: yet if in time great and ſpeedy diligence be ſhewed, the remanents of ſuch incredible ſtore, as well of writers theological, as in all other liberal ſciences, might be ſaved and recovered, which now, in your Grace's realm, being diſperſed and ſcattered, yea, and many of them, in the unlearned men's hands, do ſtill yet in this time of reconciliation daily periſh, and perchance of purpoſe by ſome envious perſon encloſed in walls, or buried in the ground, to the great injury of the famous and worthy authors, and the pitiful hindrance of the learned in this your Highneſs's realm, whoſe travailes, watchings, and pains, might greatly be relieved and eaſed, for that ſuch doubts and points of learning as much cumber and vex their heads, are moſt pithily, in ſuch old monuments, debated and diſcuſſed. Therefore your ſaid ſuppliant maketh moſt humble petition unto your Majeſty, that it might ſtand with your good-will and pleaſure, ſuch order and means to take place, as your ſaid ſuppliant hath deviſed, for the recovery and continual preſervation of all ſuch worthy monuments as are yet extant, either in this your Grace's realm of England, or elſewhere in the moſt part of all Chriſtendome. Whereby your Highneſs ſhall have a moſt notable library, learning wonderfully be advanced, the paſſing excellent works of our fore-fathers from rot and worms preſerved, and alſo hereafter, continually, the whole realm may, through your Grace's goodneſs, uſe and enjoy the whole incomparable treaſure ſo preſerved, where now no one ſtudent, no, nor any one college, hath half a dozen of thoſe excellent jewels; but the whole ſtock and ſtore thereof drawing nigh to utter deſtruction and extinguiſhing, will here and there, by private men's negligence, and ſometimes malice, many a famous and excellent author's book is rent, burnt, or ſuffered to rot and decay. And your ſaid ſuppliant is ſo much the more willing to move this ſuit unto your Highneſs, for that by his ſaid device, your Grace's ſaid library might, in very few years, moſt plentifully be furniſhed, and that without any one penny charge unto your Majeſty, or doing injury to any creature. Finally, in the erecting of this your Library Royal, your Grace ſhall follow the footſteps of all the famous and godly princes of old time, and alſo do like the worthy Governors of Chriſtendom at theſe days, but far ſurmounting them all, both in the ſtore of rare monuments, and likewiſe in the incredible fruit, which of this your Highneſs's act, will follow ere it be long. The merit whereof ſhall redound to your Majeſty's honourable and everlaſting fame here on earth, and undoubtedly in Heaven be highly rewarded, as knoweth God, whom your ſaid ſuppliant moſt heartily beſeecheth, long to preſerve your Grace in all proſperity. Amen.

Imprimis, The Queen's Majeſty's commiſſion to be granted for the ſeeing and peruſing of all places within this her Grace's realm, where any notable or excellent of Queen Elizabeth, at the deſire of Lord Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leiceſter, he delivered ſomewhat upon the principles of the ancient Aſtrologers, about the election of a fit day for the coronation of the Queen (o); and, as ſtrange and ridiculous as this may ſeem in our times, yet it is very certain, that, by theſe notions, he recommended himſelf to the potent favourite before mentioned, and to ſeveral others of the Nobility, nay, and to the Queen herſelf, in ſuch a degree, that ſhe promiſed to be kinder to him than her brother King Edward had been, and actually afforded ſome very extraordinary marks of her notice and favour [E]. He was, by this time, become an author; but, as the learned author of his life very well obſerves, a little unluckily; for his books were ſuch as ſcarcely any pretended to underſtand; and though he tells us himſelf, that Queen Elizabeth condeſcended to be his ſcholar (p), and to receive his inſtructions, as to the concealed ſenſe of them, yet it does not appear that ſhe reaped any great benefit from this aſſiduity. As his talent lay, in a great meaſure, in treating myſterious ſubjects in ſo obſcure manner, that his words ſeem ſcarcely to convey any meaning, ſo the rewards that were beſtowed upon him proved of the like nature, the Queen making him a promiſe of the Deanery of Glouceſter, which was, notwithſtanding, conferred upon Mr. Man, when he was ſent Ambaſſador to Spain; and other gifts, of the like kind, to Mr. Dee proved of no ſervice to him, though it is likely that, from time to time, he had preſents made him in ready money (q). In the ſpring of the year 1564, he went abroad again, to preſent the book which he dedicated to the then Emperor Maximilian, and returned into England in the ſummer (r); in the courſe of which journey he was ſo ſerviceable to the Marchioneſs of Northampton, that ſhe remained his conſtant patroneſs ever after. In 1568, by the advice, as he ſays, of Secretary Cecil, he engaged the Earl of Pembroke to preſent the Queen with his Propædumata Aphoriſtica (s), which was graciouſly received; and, on his preſenting one to the Earl himſelf, he gave him twenty pounds (t). In 1570 Sir Henry Billingſley's tranſlation of Euclid appeared, with our author's preface before it, and enriched throughout with his notes, which did him much more honour than all his other performances, as they furniſhed inconteſtible proofs of a more than ordinary ſkill in the Mathematicks (u). In 1571 we find him in Lorrain, where falling grievouſly ſick, and in great danger of death, the Queen was graciouſly pleaſed to ſend him two Phyſicians, and to afford him other marks of royal beneficence (w). After his return to England, he ſettled himſelf in his houſe at Mortlake, where he continued to proſecute his ſtudies with extraordinary diligence; and with great induſtry, and at a large expence, collected a noble library, conſiſting of the moſt curious books in all ſciences, and a very numerous and valuable collecmonument may be found, or is known to be. And the ſaid monument, or monuments, ſo found and had by the ſaid Commiſſioner, then of the former poſſeſſor in the Queen's Majeſty's name to be borrowed, and ſo, nevertheleſs, to be reſtorable to the ſaid former poſſeſſor, after ſuch convenient time, wherein, of every ſuch monument, one fair copy may be written, if the ſaid former poſſeſſor be diſpoſed to have his ſaid monument or monuments again; and thereupon, either he or his aſſigns, do, at the ſaid library, the place whereof is by the Queen's Grace to be appointed, demand the ſaid monument or monuments by bill aſſigned with the hand of the ſaid Commiſſioner, wherein both the name or names of the ſaid monument or monuments, is, or are, particularly expreſſed; and alſo the convenient time for the ſaid reſtitution preſcribed.

That it may be referred to my Lord Cardinal's Grace, and the next Synod, to conclude an order for the allowance of all neceſſary charges, as well toward the riding and journeying for the recovery of the ſaid worthy monuments, as alſo for the copying out of the ſame, and framing of neceſſary ſtalls, deſks, and preſſes, meet for the preſervation and uſe of the ſaid monuments, in the Queen's Majeſty's library aforeſaid.

That the ſaid commiſſion be with ſpeed diſpatched, for three cauſes eſpecially: Firſt, leſt after this motion made, the ſpreading of it abroad might cauſe many of them to hide, and convey their good and antient writers, which, nevertheleſs, were very ungodly done, and a certain token that ſuch are not ſincere lovers of good learning. Secondly, that by the travel of theſe three months, February, March, and April next, going before the Synod in May next appointed, the ſaid Synod may have good proof, whereby to conjecture how this matter will take ſucceſs. And thirdly, upon the ſaid trial of three months, the proportion of the charges in riding and writing, may the better be weighed what they will in manner amount unto.

A meet place to be forthwith appointed for the ſaid monuments to be ſent unto, until the ſaid library may be made apt in all points neceſſary; and that, in this ſaid place, before, or at, the ſaid Synod time, the ſaid monuments may be viewed and peruſed, according to the pleaſure of my Lord Cardinal's Grace, and the ſaid next Synod.

Finally, that by farther device of your ſaid ſuppliant John Dee, God granting him his life and health, all the famous and worthy monuments that are in the notableſt libraries beyond the ſea, (as in the Vatican at Rome, S. Marci at Venice, and the like at Bononia, Florence, Vienna, &c.) ſhall be procured unto the ſaid library of our Sovereign Lady and Queen, the charges thereof, beſide the journeying, to ſtand in the copying of them out and the carriage into this realm only. And as concerning all other authors printed, that they likewiſe ſhall be gotten, in wonderful abundance, their carriage only into this realm to be chargeable.

[E] Some very extraordinary marks of her notice and favour.] That account which our author has given us of his own life, very juſtly claims entire credit, for reaſons that will appear hereafter. In this he affirms, that William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, and Lord Robert Dudley, carried him to Queen Elizabeth at Whitehall before her coronation, when ſhe took him to her ſervice, and promiſed that where her brother had given him a crown ſhe would give him a noble. Her Majeſty alſo gave directions to Dr. Matthew Parker Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to grant Mr. Dee a diſpenſation for enjoying the rectories of Upton and Long Lednam for ten years, as well as any other that he ſhould obtain within that term. The Queen alſo promiſed him the Maſterſhip of St. Catherine's, upon the removal or death of Dr. Mallet who was then poſſeſſed of it, notwithſtanding which, however, it was afterwards given to Dr. Wilſon. One may hence collect, that he had frequent employment given him, upon which theſe pretenſions were founded, but that, notwithſtanding, his credit at Court was not ſufficient to overcome the publick odium he lay under, and which was the true cauſe of his miſſing theſe and other greater preferments (9).

tion of manuſcripts, moſt of which were afterwards diſperſed and loſt (x) [F]. In 1572 the appearance of a new ſtar, occaſioned, according to the humour of that age, many ſtrange, and ſome very ſuperſtitious ſpeculations, the true principles of Aſtronomy being but indifferently underſtood. We need not wonder, when ſo fair an opportunity offered, that our author ſhould make a diſplay of his abilities among the reſt (y); but it certainly deſerves to be remembered to his honour, that the learned Camden, taking notice, in his hiſtory of this phænomenon, was pleaſed, at the ſame time, to ſpeak of Mr. Dee with great reſpect (z) [G]. On the 16th of March, 1575, the Queen, attended by many of her Nobility, went to Mr. Dee's houſe, in order to have ſeen his library; but being informed, that his wife had been buried but a few hours before, ſhe declined going into the houſe, yet deſired him, however, to bring out a glaſs, but of what kind we find no where expreſſed, which had occaſioned much diſcourſe; which he accordingly did; ſhewed her the properties of it, and explained to her Majeſty their cauſes, in order to wipe off the aſperſion under which he had ſo long laboured, of being a Magician (a). In 1577 a comet appeared, which ſtruck weak minds with great apprehenſions, and made way for many wild and groundleſs predictions, which met with much more notice than they deſerved. Upon this occaſion Queen Elizabeth ſent for Mr. Dee to Windſor, where, for three days together, according as ſhe had leiſure, ſhe heard his diſcourſes upon that ſubject (b). He made many obſervations of this comet, and intended to have publiſhed the reſult of them, but his papers are loſt, and Dr. Smith very truly obſerves, that Aſtronomy will not much ſuffer by their miſcarriage (c); for, with all his learning, he was certainly one of the moſt ſuperſtitious and credulous men that age produced. The Queen, however, was ſo well pleaſed with the pains he took upon this occaſion, that ſhe gave him her promiſe he ſhould not be interrupted in his lucubrations, and that, notwithſtanding the vulgar reports to his prejudice, he might depend upon her royal protection in the proſecution of his ſtudies (d). In the ſucceeding year her Majeſty, being greatly indiſpoſed, he was ſent abroad to confer with the German Phyſicians, and upon this and other occaſions, received, as he has left inconteſtible evidence to prove, ſome very memorable tokens of the Queen's affording countenance to his endeavours; though certainly they were none of the wiſeſt, and could be excuſed only by the honeſty of his intention (e) [H]. [F] Moſt of which were afterwards diſperſed and loſt.] This library of his conſiſted of four thouſand books, of which above a fourth part were manuſcripts. He had ſpent nearly forty years in collecting them, and they had been valued by thoſe who were good judges at two thouſand pounds (10). Amongſt his inſtruments there was a quadrant made by the famous Richard Chancellor, of five foot ſemidiameter; two globes of Mercator's, a loadſtone of great value, a very curious clock, a great collection of original Iriſh records, the like collection of Welſh records, grants, donations, and pedigrees; a box full of ſeals, and other curioſities of the ſame kind. A great part of theſe he ſays he took out of the corner of a church, where many of them had been ſpoiled and rotted, by the falling of the rain continually upon them through the decayed roof. He does not tell us what church this was, but I have reaſon to believe that it was Wigmore chapel, becauſe I find that he applied himſelf to Sir William Cecil afterwards Lord Burleigh, for an order to Mr. Harley, Keeper of the Records in that chapel, to be allowed the liberty of examining and tranſcribing them (11). He had likewiſe a large chemical laboratory, the materials of which coſt him upwards of two hundred pounds. It was upon his leaving the kingdom in 1583, as is afterwards related in the text, that the populace, who always believed him to be a conjurer, and one who dealt with the devil, broke into his houſe at Mortlake, where they tore and deſtroyed many things, and diſperſed the reſt, part of which, with great difficulty, and by the help of publick authority, he recovered, but the reſt were totally loſt, at leaſt to him. We may judge from the expence he was at in making and procuring this collection, that he obtained occaſionally, very conſiderable bounties from the Queen, or from her Miniſters, ſince it does not appear that any great fortune was left him by his father, and he was beſides, as might be very eaſily proved, a very expenſive man (12).

[G] Was pleaſed at the ſame time to ſpeak of Mr. Dee with great reſpect.] This paſſage in Camden, being both ſingular and ſhort, the reader will perhaps be pleaſed to ſee, as it gives us ſome light into our author's notions as an aſtronomer (13). 'I know not whether 'it be worth while, ſays he, to mention that which all 'Hiſtoriographers of our time have recorded, viz. 'That in November, a new Star appeared in Caſſiopea's Chair, which, as myſelf obſerved, in brightneſs 'exceeded Jupiter in the perigee of his excentrick 'and epicycle. It continued in the ſame place full 'ſixteen months, being carried about with the diurnal 'motion of the Heaven. Thomas Diggs and John 'Dee, two famous mathematicians amongſt us, have 'learnedly proved, by the doctrine of parallaxes, that 'it was in the celeſtial, not in the elementary region, 'and were of opinion, that it diſappeared by a little 'and little, by aſcending. 'Tis certain, that after 'eight months, all men perceived it to grow leſs 'and leſs. Theodore Beza, wittily, applied it to the 'ſtar which appeared at the birth of Chriſt, and the 'ſlaughter of the infants under Herod, and admoniſhed 'Charles IX, King of France, who had acknowledged 'himſelf author of the maſſacre of Paris, to beware in 'this verſe,

'Tu vero, Herodes ſanguinolente, time.

'Nor was he out in his conjecture. For in the 5th 'month after the diſappearing of this ſtar, after long 'and horrible pains, he died of exceſſive bleeding.'

[H] By the honeſty of his intention.] It is certain, that, according as manners and cuſtoms vary in ſeveral ages, people are apt to change the notions of things, which muſt be an excuſe for our venturing to cenſure that ſingular reſpect which was paid to our author by Queen Elizabeth, and the principal perſons of her court. To juſtify theſe cenſures, we muſt have recourſe to his own pen, where ſpeaking, or rather writing, of what he did in the year 1577, and the next year, he delivers himſelf thus (14). 'My careful and faith-'ful endeavour was with great ſpeed required, as by 'divers meſſages ſent to me one after another in one 'morning, to prevent the miſchief which divers of her 'Majeſty's Privy-Council ſuſpected to be intended a-'gainſt her Majeſty's perſon, by means of a certain 'image of wax, with a great pin ſtuck into it, about 'the breaſt of it, found in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, &c. 'wherein I did ſatisfie her Majeſty's deſire, and the 'Lords of the honourable Privy-Council within few 'hours, in godly and artificial manner, as the honour-'able Mr. Secretary Wilſon, whom at the leaſt I re-'quired to have by me a witneſs of the proceedings, 'which his Honour, before me, declared to her Ma-'jeſty, then ſitting without the Privy Park, by the 'landing place at Richmond, the honourable Earl of 'Leiceſter being alſo by.

to this, the Queen muſt have been very thoroughly ſatisfied; and, as ſhe was a very wiſe Princeſs, and could judge perfectly of the diſpoſitions of men, ſhe knew how to diſpoſe them to her ſervice, of what kind ſoever they were; and of this it may be, that few better inſtances can be given than in our author, whoſe parts, learning, and application were equally extraordinary, and might have performed great things, if under the direction of a ſound and ſolid judgment. This, certainly, the Queen ſometimes laboured to ſupply; for September 17, 1580, as ſhe came from Richmond to London in her coach, ſhe took Mortlake in the way, and ſeeing Mr. Dee at his door, beckoned him to come to her, and, when he was at the coach-ſide, pulled off her glove, gave him her hand to kiſs, deſired him to come oftener to Court, and to let her know, by ſome of her Privy-Chamber, that he was there (f). At this time it is highly probable that ſhe gave him a hint of her deſire to be thoroughly informed as to her title to countries diſcovered in different parts of the globe, by ſubjects of England, or perſons employed in the ſervice of any of her predeceſſors; to which the indefatigable Mr. Dee applied himſelf with ſuch vigour, that, on the 3d of October following, he preſented to the Queen, in her garden at Richmond, two large rolls, in which thoſe countries were geographically deſcribed, and hiſtorically explained; with the addition of all the teſtimonies and authorities neceſſary to ſupport them from records, and other authentick vouchers. Theſe the Queen very graciouſly received, and, after dinner, the ſame day, conferred with Mr. Dee about them in the preſence of ſome of the Privy Council, and of the Lord Treaſurer eſpecially (g). That wiſe man ſeemed not to have an high opinion of them, but the Queen directed him to peruſe and examine them, which he did, and then returned them to Mr. Dee, on the 10th of the ſame month; and the ſame day, about five in the afternoon, the Queen came to our author's houſe, called for him, and told him, that the Treaſurer highly approved of the pains he had taken, and of what he had performed in this reſpect for her ſervice (h). This work of his, for a copy of which, he aſſures us, he was offered one hundred pounds, but refuſed it, as a thing improper for him to grant, is ſtill preſerved in the Cotton Library (i). His next employment, of conſequence enough to be remembered, was about the reformation of the Calendar, which, though it never took effect, yet was one of the beſt of his performances, did him the moſt credit with thoſe who were the beſt judges (k), and procured him the honour of many converſations with the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, who not only vouchſafed to read his book very carefully, but alſo wrote his ſentiments upon it to his ſon Sir Robert Cecil (l), who likewiſe made notes upon it; and, though it was never publiſhed, yet it has paſſed through the hands of ſeveral of our moſt eminent Mathematicians with ſingular approbation, conſidering the time in which it was compoſed [I].

‘ My dutiful ſervice was done in the diligent conference, which, by her Majeſty's commandment, ‘ I had with Mr. Dr. Bayley, her Majeſty's phyſician, about her Majeſty's grievous pangs and pains, ‘ by reaſon of tooth-ache, and the rheume, &c. A. ‘ 1578, October.

‘ My very painful and winter journey, about a ‘ thouſand five hundred miles by ſea and land, was ‘ undertaken and performed, to conſult with the ‘ learned phyſicians and philoſophers beyond the ‘ ſeas, for her Majeſty's health recovering and preſerving, having by the Right Honourable Earl of ‘ Leiceſter, and Mr. Secretary Walſingham, but one ‘ hundred days allowed unto me to go and come ‘ again in, A. 1578. My paſſport may ſomewhat ‘ give evidence, and the journal little book of every ‘ day's journey or abode for thoſe hundred days account may ſuffice.’ It is not at all impoſſible, that Mr. Dee might render other, and thoſe too, more conſiderable ſervices than any of theſe which he has mentioned, and which he might have his reaſons for not inſerting. Such as are acquainted with Leiceſter's Common-Wealth, and other ſecret hiſtories of thoſe times, will eaſily allow this to be credible, and may perhaps form a ſhrewd gueſs at the nature of thoſe ſervices (15).

[I] Conſidering the time in which it was compoſed.] The reader will find the title of this, amongſt the reſt of the works of Mr. Dee, in a ſubſequent note. It was addreſſed to the Lord Burleigh, but without any epiſtle dedicatory or apology whatever. At the end of it there was a petition to the Queen, that this reformation of his might receive the ſanction of publick authority; to facilitate which, there is added a ſcheme of the year, 1583, as it would have ſtood, if, as our author flattered himſelf, his propoſal had taken place (16). We know not by what means this learned treatiſe came into the hands of Mr. Thomas Allen of Glouceſter-Hall, but very probably it might be by gift, ſince Mr. Dee was his particular friend, and both of them favourites with the Earl of Leiceſter. He diſpoſed of it by will to Sir Kenelm Digby, who, notwithſtanding he gave a large number of manuſcripts to the Bodleian Library, kept this nevertheleſs in his own hands, till in the year 1635 he beſtowed it upon Mr. John Barber, from whom it was purchaſed by Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; and remains ſtill amongſt the manuſcripts beſtowed by him on the Univerſity of Oxford (17). At the time it was compoſed and preſented to the Lord Treaſurer, it was referred by the Privy-Council to the peruſal and examination of three of the beſt Mathematicians in the kingdom; and their report, as it is a curioſity, the reader will perhaps be glad to ſee. It runs thus (18).

‘ It was agreed by Mr. Digges, Mr. Savile, and ‘ Mr. Chambers, that upon their ſeveral peruſal of ‘ the book written by Mr. Dee, as a diſcourſe upon ‘ the Reformation of the Vulgar Calendar for the ‘ Civil Year, that they do allow of his opinion; that ‘ whereas in the late Roman Calendar reformed, there ‘ are ten days cut off to reduce the Civil Year to the ‘ ſtate it was eſtabliſhed in at the Council of Nice; ‘ the better reformation had been to have cut off ‘ eleven days, and to have reduced the Civil Year according to the ſtate it was in at the Birth of Chriſt. ‘ And ſo they all agree, that ſuch a reformation had ‘ been more agreeable to the account of Chriſt. And ‘ ſo they do alſo aſſent, that having agreed to the ‘ Council of Nice, the ſubſtraction of ten days is ‘ agreeable to truth: And therefore, the better to ‘ agree with all countries adjacent, that have received their reformation of ſubſtracting ten days only, ‘ they think it may be aſſented unto without any ‘ manifeſt error; having regard to obſerve certain ‘ rules hereafter, for omitting ſome leap-years. And ‘ for the ſubſtracting of ten days, Mr. Dee has compiled a form of a calendar, beginning at May and ‘ ending at Auguſt, wherein every of theſe four ‘ months, May, June, July Auguſt, ſhall have in ‘ the ends of them ſome days taken away, without ‘ changing of any feaſt of holiday, moveable or fixed, ‘ or without altering the courſes of Trinity Term, ‘ that

We come now to that period of Mr. Dee's life, by which he has been moſt known to the world, though for matters which have rendered him very juſtly leaſt to be regarded, inaſmuch as they ſhew, that he had not only a boundleſs curioſity, but likewiſe a depraved judgment. His ambition to ſurpaſs all men in knowledge, carried him, at length, into a deſire of knowing beyond the bounds of human faculties, and, in order thereto, of having recourſe to methods equally contrary to the laws of God, and to the rules of right reaſon (m). In ſhort, he ſuffered himſelf to be deluded into a firm opinion, that, by certain invocations, an intercourſe of communication with ſpirits might he obtained, whence he flattered himſelf he might gain great inſight into thoſe which are ſtiled occult ſciences, and which, in truth, are no ſciences at all. He found, very unluckily for him, a young man, who had dipped more deeply into the practice of theſe follies than himſelf, one Edward Kelley, a native of Worceſterſhire, and who readily undertook to be his inſtrument in theſe matters, for which he was to give him fifty pounds a year (n). December 2, 1581, they began their incantations; in conſequence of which Edward Kelley was, by the inſpection of a certain table, conſecrated for that purpoſe, with many ſuperſtitious ceremonies, enabled to acquaint Mr. Dee with what the ſpirits thought fit to ſhew and diſcover. Theſe conferences were continued for about two years, during which ſpace he ſeems to have totally deſerted his former ſtudies, and to have addicted himſelf entirely to theſe ſpecious and deluſive arts, to which, though ſome inſinuate that he was invited and encouraged by Edward Kelley, yet there ſeems to be no clear proof of this, but rather the contrary; for Mr. Dee ſeems to have ſought out Kelley for his purpoſe, retained him long afterwards when he was deſirous of leaving him, and had recourſe to the ſame methods ſome years after Kelley and he were parted (o). The ſubjects of theſe converſations he committed to writing, and they are ſtill preſerved, though they were never publiſhed [K]. In the mean time there came over hither a Poliſh Lord, one Albert

'that is to ſay, May to conſiſt of twenty-eight days, 'taking from it three days; June to have twenty-'nine days, taking from it but one day; July to 'conſiſt of twenty eight days, taking from it three 'days; Auguſt to conſiſt of twenty-eight days, tak-'ing from it three days; all which days ſubſtracted, 'make ten days. In the which four months, no 'feſtival day is changed, but remain upon the ac-'cuſtomed days of their months. And becauſe the 'Roman Calendar hath joined to it a great company 'of rules, of which only are capable the ſkilful com-'putiſts of aſtronomers, it is thought good to make 'a ſhort table, like an Ephemerides, to continue 'the certainty of all the feaſts movable, depending 'only upon Eaſter, and agreeing with the Roman 'Calendar, which may ſerve for an hundred or two 'hundred years, and ſo eaſily renewed as we ſee yearly 'almanacks are, if the ſins of the world do not haſten 'a diſſolution.

'Whereupon her Majeſty may pleaſe, upon re-'port to commit it to conſideration of counſel, whe-'ther ſhe will have this reformation publiſhed, 'which if ſhe will, it were expedient that it were 'done by proclamation from her Majeſty, as there-'unto adviſed and allowed by the Archbiſhops 'and Biſhops, to whoſe office it has always be-'longed to determine and eſtabliſh the cauſes be-'longing to eccleſiaſtical government. March 25, '1583.'

I intended to have added here the ſentiments of the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh upon Mr Dee's project, which not only ſhew the great opinion that able ſtateſman had of our author's learning; but do alſo much honour to that Miniſter's memory, as they clearly demonſtrate how much attention he ſhewed to whatever came before him, and had any tendency to the publick benefit (19). But conſidering that this life has already ſwelled beyond the bounds which I deſigned it, I ſhall content myſelf with pointing out where the papers of Lord Burleigh, and of his ſon Sir Robert Cecil, may be ſtill found by the inquiſitive reader. I think myſelf, however, obliged to add, that whenever this matter has been in later times brought upon the carpet, we never fail of finding Mr. Dee's opinion mentioned, and his treatiſe upon this ſubject conſulted. As for inſtance, when this matter was propoſed at Oxford in 1645, the celebrated Mr. John Greaves, then the ableſt man in theſe matters, conſidered and commended what John Dee had written; and in 1699, when moſt people expected that ſomething of this kind would have been done, the very judicious Dr. Wallis, though he was againſt any alteration, and actually hindered it, yet approved clearly of what our author had delivered (20). This abundantly ſhews, that with all his whims and weakneſſes, Mr. Dee was a man of learning and ſenſe, and that there is no reaſon for burying his memory or his writings in oblivion. Yet as impartiality and truth ought ever to appear in collections of this kind, it is but juſt this note ſhould be concluded with an intimation that poſſibly Mr. Dee himſelf might derive great aſſiſtance from a treatiſe written long before by the incomparable Roger Bacon (21) upon this ſubject.

[K] Though they were never publiſhed.] We ſhall have occaſion hereafter to mention the collections ſent abroad by the learned Meric Caſaubon, out of the Cottonian Library, which begin in the month of May, 1583. At preſent we are to take notice of what are ſtill preſerved, though not publiſhed (22). Theſe conſiſt of the firſt five books of Dr. Dee's tranſactions with ſpirits, all written with his own hand, with as much care and exactneſs as poſſible. They begin with what was performed upon the 22d of December, 1581, and have an appendix, in which the hiſtory is continued to the 23d of May, 1583; and as Caſaubon's book begins with the 28th of the the ſame month, there is nothing more evident than that the entire hiſtory of what paſſed while Dee and Kelley were together, is yet in being. This firſt part was very near being burnt in the cheſt which contained it, in the great fire of London, in 1666; but being preſerved by accident, and without any body's knowing what the contents of that cheſt were, the diſcovery of them, when they came to be opened, made ſo much noiſe, as reached the ears of Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; a great collector of curious papers, and indeed of ſingularities of every kind. By him they were purchaſed, cleanſed, digeſted into their proper order, and, together with many more valuable monuments of the knowledge and induſtry of our anceſtors, are repoſited in his noble Muſeum (23). The reaſon of my being thus particular, in which however I follow the example of Dr. Smith, is this: there has been, as the reader will be informed hereafter, a very ſtrong ſuſpicion (though, for my own part, I muſt confeſs I think there is little ground for it) that this regular hiſtory of Mr. Dee's intercourſe with ſpirits is a mere mummery; that we are the dupes, not he; and that the whole ought to be conſidered as a journal of private intelligence, which he received and tranſmitted to the Court of Queen Elizabeth, in the ſpace of between ſix and ſeven years, that he continued in thoſe parts. Now if any ingenious and inquiſitive perſon ſhould ever be able to make this out, or ſo much as ſhew it to be probable, it would become a matter of great conſequence to know where the unprinted part of theſe tranſactions is, and to what period of time it extends, a due ſenſe of which gave occaſion to this note.

(22) Vita Joannis Dee, p. 23.

(23) In the 3d Vol. of Papers written by, and relating to, Mr. Dee.

Laſki, Palatine of Siradia, a perſon diſtinguiſhed by his great parts and extenſive learning, no leſs than by his high birth, and the honourable ſtation he held in his own country. He was very kindly received, treated with the utmoſt reſpect, and, in a very extraordinary degree, careſſed by perſons of the firſt rank during his ſtay in England, and, amongſt the reſt, by Robert Earl of Leiceſter, the Queen's great favourite, and our Author's chief patron (p). To contribute more effectually to this foreigner's ſatisfaction, that Earl ſent for Mr. Dee to Court, July 31, 1583, and told him, that, in two days time, he would bring that Poliſh Lord to dine with him, which obliged Mr. Dee to diſcloſe his circumſtances plainly to the Earl, importing no leſs than that, without ſelling his plate, he was not able to provide them with a dinner; which declaration procured him, that very day, upon the Queen's coming to Sion from Greenwich, a preſent of forty angels in gold (q). This foreigner being once introduced, became a conſtant viſitant to Mr. Dee, and, having himſelf a biaſs to thoſe ſuperſtitious arts that, in thoſe times, were but in too much credit in almoſt all the Courts in Europe, he became wonderfully taken with the company of one whom he eſteemed to be ſo great a man, in poſſeſſion of ſuch high and valuable ſecrets, and who, as he perſuaded himſelf, had a conſtant communication with the Angels and ſpiritual Beings (r). After much intreaty, he was received, by Mr. Dee, into their company, and into a participation of their ſecrets (s). But, within a ſhort ſpace of time, all their affairs running into great diſorder, the Palatine of Siradia propoſed that they ſhould accompany him, with their families, into his own country; to which, upon aſſurance of being provided for there, Mr. Dee and Mr. Kelley yielded; and accordingly, September the 21ſt, in the ſame year, they went all privately away from Mortlake, in order to embark for Holland (t)[L]. After running great hazards at ſea, they landed at the Brill, and thence travelled by land through Germany into Poland, where, February 3, 1584, they arrived at the principal caſtle belonging to Albert Laſki (u), whom, together with all his family, they miſerably abuſed with their fanatical pretences to a converſation with ſpirits. But, at length, wearied with theſe deluſions, the Palatine of Siradia found means to engage them to leave that country, to go and pay a viſit to the Emperor Rodolph the IId, at the city of Prague, the capital of his kingdom of Bohemia, which they accordingly did; and, in the month of Auguſt, the ſame year (w), by the recommendation of the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, Mr. Dee had an audience of that Prince, who was thought to ſpend too much of his time with chemiſts, and ſuch ſort of people, and to allow them a greater meaſure of reſpect than they deſerved (x). It is no wonder, therefore, that Rodolph was inclined to hear what a man, who had made ſo much noiſe over Europe, had to offer; the rather, as he pleaded the protection of his father, the Emperor Maximilian, to whom he had dedicated one of his books (y); but Dee entered into ſuch a tedious diſplay of his own importance, and ſuch extravagant ſtories of the chryſtal that was brought him by an angel (z), that he was quickly diſguſted, and declined all farther interviews (a). Upon this Mr. Dee, who had made a tour into Poland (b), and brought away his wife and family from thence, finding himſelf in deep diſtreſs, and not knowing how to ſubſiſt, applied himſelf to his old patron Albert Laſki (c), whom he prevailed upon to introduce him to Stephen King of Poland; which accordingly he did, April 17, 1585, at Cracow (d). But that Prince, after hearing what he had to propoſe, detected his deluſions ſo clearly, that, deſparing of making any great figure in that Court, he reſolved, in a few months, to return to Prague (e), his pride being ſuch, that he could not bear ſtaying long in a place, where thoſe honours were refuſed, which he had the vanity to think were due even from the greateſt Potentates, to a perſon of his extraordinary merit. He did not remain long in that high credit he ſo much affected, on his return to the Emperor's Court; for the Pope's Nuncio inter-

[L] In order to embark for Holland.] In this note I ſhall endeavour to give ſome particulars, as to the ſtate and condition of the ſeveral perſons in this company, as being very neceſſary for the better apprehending the facts ſtated in the text. Albert Laſki was a learned man, middle-aged, well-ſhaped, of a graceful appearance, and who wore a very long beard. He had been received with all imaginable reſpect here in England, and feaſted and careſſed by the Univerſity of Oxford; but after ſtaying about four months in this kingdom, he privately withdrew, ſays the hiſtorian, being got deeply into debt (24). It is not at all improbable, that he might have been drawn into theſe bad circumſtances through his acquaintance with Dee and his family; for, as we have ſeen, they were in extreme want when this Poliſh gentleman arrived. That they flattered him in a high degree is very apparent, ſince it is owned that they promiſed him the kingdom of Poland, with the addition of Moldavia, and deviſed a pedigree for him, as if he had deſcended from the noble Houſe of Lacy, allied, by their intermarriages with the Mortimers, to the blood-royal of England (25). As for John Dee, he was now in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age, and on the 5th of February, 1578, had married Jane Fromond, his ſecond wife, who had formerly lived in the family of the Lady Howard, wife to the Lord High-Admiral. His ſon Arthur was then in the fourth year of his age, and beſides, he had two or three other children (26). Edward Kelley was in the twenty-ninth year of his age, and had lately married a wife, by whom he had no children. They went in boats down to Graveſend, where they embarked on board a Daniſh ſhip bound for Holland, their houſhold-ſtuff and effects being on board another ſhip; but meeting with very tempeſtuous weather, they were obliged to go on ſhore again at Queenborough in Kent, and in their paſſage from the ſhip, were in the utmoſt danger of periſhing. On the 3d of October, they ſet out from the Brill for Rotterdam; on the 17th of the ſame month they came to Emden; and on the 26th to Bremen, where they ſtaid for ſome time. On the 7th of November they came to Lubeck, and on the 14th of December to Roſtoch, from thence on Chriſtmas-day to Stetin in Pomerania, and on the 3d of February, 1584, to the town of Laſki (27).

fering, and giving the Emperor to underſtand how ſcandalous it appeared to the Chriſtian world, that he ſhould entertain two ſuch notorious magicians as Dee and Kelley, his Imperial Majeſty, at laſt, reſolved to baniſh them his dominions (f), which he accordingly did; but, notwithſtanding this, William Count of Roſenbergh, a young nobleman, who had great power, and a vaſt eſtate in Bohemia, one of their pupils, gave them ſhelter in the caſtle of Trebona (g), which belonged to him, and where they not only remained in ſafety, but lived in ſplendour, Kelley having, in his poſſeſſion, (as is reported) that philoſophical powder of projection, by which they were furniſhed with money, not competently only but profuſely (h) [M]. While they were in this ſituation, Mr. Dee was ſtill very earneſt in the proſecution of their commerce with ſpirits, notwithſtanding that Kelley, from time to time, expreſſed great reluctancy, gave him frequently to underſtand that he was in a miſerable ſtate of deluſion, and that thoſe which he took for angels were evil ſpirits, and from the profligate actions, and ſcandalous impurities, which, by their ſuggeſtions, (if the whole are not downright romances) they were drawn into manifeſtly appeared (i). But Kelley, in the mean time, made frequent journies to different places, once into Poland, and often elſewhere, to confer with the moſt famous chemiſts, of which there were many at that time in Germany; and from them it is thought he learned many things about the powder (k) which they brought out of England, that he did not communicate to his friend Mr. Dee. This ſeems to be certain, that there were great quarrels and diſputes between them, and ſuch jealouſids and heart-burnings in their families, as brought on, at length, an abſolute rupture. But, in this tranſaction, Kelley ſeemed to have acted a much wiſer part than his companion, ſince it appears, from an entry in Mr. Dee's Diary, that he was ſo far intimidated, as to deliver up to Kelley, January 4, 1589, the powder, the books, the glaſs, with ſome other things; and thereupon received his diſcharge in writing, under his hand and ſeal (l). This tranſaction, of which no footſteps remain but what is contained in the entry before-mentioned, there is good reaſon to believe, proved the foundation of Kelley's future fortunes, and the ſource of Dee's ſubſequent miſeries (m). The noiſe that their adventures made in the world, if not ſome ſecret and more material reaſon, induced Queen Elizabeth and her Miniſters to invite Mr. Dee home, to which he was at length perſuaded; and on the 1ſt of May, 1589 (n), he ſet out from Trebona in his way to England. On the 9th of April he arrived at Breame, where he received a letter of compliment from the Landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, to whom, in return, he made a preſent of twelve Hungarian horſes. November the 16th he came to Staden, where he met with Mr, afterwards Sir Edward Dyer, who was going as the Queen's Ambaſſador to Denmark, and who had been ſent the year before to him from the Court. Beſides all this, he was attended by a guard of horſe (o), whom he paid very liberally, and, beſides waggons for his goods, had no leſs than three coaches for the uſe of his family; ſo that the whole of his charges, in this ſhort journey, as he ſtated it to the Queen's Commiſſioners, fell ſhort only by four of the ſum of eight hundred pounds (p). Upon the 23d of November following he landed at Graveſend, and, on the 9th of December, preſented himſelf to the Queen at Rich-

[M] Not competently only, but profuſely.] It is very remarkable that in all Dr. Dee's book of Tranſactions with Spirits, though there is mention more than once of the powder, and of Kelley's finding it in the earth, yet there is not the leaſt circumſtance of their making projection. But from the time of their coming to Trebona we find no more lamentations for want of money, and that before his departure Mr. Dee delivered up the powder to Kelley; yet, perhaps, not without ſome ſmall reſerve, as we ſhall ſee hereafter reaſon to believe. Mr. Aſhmole found in Dee's private diary ſome hints as if Kelley (28) had communicated the great ſecret to him, of which, however, there is not the leaſt probability. Anthony Wood tells us, that at this time Arthur Dee, who was about eight years old, played at quoits with pieces of gold made by projection, as the young Count Roſenbergh did with pieces of ſilver. This is very certain, that Sir Edward Dyer, Queen Elizabeth's Miniſter, firmly believed that Kelley had the powder at leaſt, if not the ſecret, and made Queen Elizabeth, and even the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh believe it, which coſt Sir Edward a ſhort confinement at Prague; and Kelley, who was then become a Baron by the Emperor's patent, his life. Sir Thomas Brown, the famous phyſician of Norwich, gave the following account in a letter to Anthony Wood, of what he had learned from the mouth of Dr. Arthur Dee, ſon to John Dee, upon this ſubject (29).

'That he, the ſaid Arthur, hath affirmed to him 'with an oath, that he had ſeen projection made by 'his father and Kelley, and tranſmutation of pewter 'diſhes and flaggons into ſilver, which the gold-'ſmiths of Prague bought of them.—That the ſaid 'tranſmutation was made by a ſmall powder they 'had found in ſome old place, and a book lying by 'it containing nothing but Hieroglyphicks, which 'book his father beſtowed much time upon, but he 'could not hear that he could make it out. He 'ſaid alſo, that Kelley dealt not juſtly with his fa-'ther, and that he went away with the greateſt part 'of the powder, and was afterwards impriſoned 'by the Emperor in a certain caſtle, from whence 'attempting an eſcape, he fell and broke his leg, 'and was impriſoned again: That his father, Dr. 'John Dee, preſented Queen Elizabeth with a little 'part of the powder, who, having made trial thereof, 'ſhe attempted to get Kelley out of priſon, and ſent 'certain perſons for that purpoſe, who, giving opium-'drink to the keepers, laid them ſo faſt a ſleep that 'Kelley found an opportunity to attempt an eſcape, 'and there were horſes ready to carry him away, 'but the buſineſs unhappily ſucceeded. Arthur Dee 'was a youth when he ſaw the projection made in 'Bohemia, with which he was ſo inflamed, that he 'fell wholly upon that ſtudy, and read not much 'all his life but books of that ſubject.—Two years 'before his death he contracted with John Huni-'ades, or Hans Hungar, in London, to be his ope-'rator. This Hans Hungar having lived long in 'London, and growing in years, he reſolved to re-'turn to Hungary; whereupon going firſt to Am-'ſterdam, he had orders given him to remain there 'till Dr. Arthur Dee came to him.—The Doctor, 'to my knowledge, was ſerious in this matter, and 'had provided all things in readineſs to go, but ſud-'denly he heard that Hans Hungar was dead, and 'ſo deſiſted, &c.'

mond, and was very graciouſly received (q). He retired ſoon after to his own houſe at Mortlake, which he found in a very ſad condition, and, by the aſſiſtance of perſons in power, began to collect together the ſcattered remains of his library, and the furniture belonging to it; in which he was more ſucceſsful than he could well expect, ſince he recovered about three-fourths of his books, and did not eſtimate his whole loſs at full four hundred pounds (r). It is amazing to find how ſoon he was in wants again, of which the Queen had quickly notice, as well as of the vexations he ſuffered on account of the averſion the common people had conceived againſt him (s). To diſpel the former, the Queen, in 1590, promiſed to give him two hundred angels to keep his Chriſtmas; one half of which ſum he received, and gives a broad hint, that the Queen and himſelf were cheated of the other (t). To quiet his apprehenſions as to the latter, ſhe ſent him a meſſage by Thomas Cavendiſh, Eſq; that he might freely purſue his ſtudies, and depend upon her protection and favour; of which indeed he received, from time to time, continual proofs (u) [N]. He yet retained as much credit as ever with ſuch of his old friends as were living (w); for as to the Earl of Leiceſter, and many other of his former patrons, they were taken away by death during his abſence. Of thoſe that were left he received frequent viſits, ſome preſents, and very kind offers, particularly from Sir Thomas Jones (x), who would have given him his caſtle of Emlin in Wales, with all neceſſary accommodations to live in; which, however, he did not think fit to accept, as depending upon far greater helps from the Queen (y). At length, however, after meeting with many diſappointments, his creditors growing impatient, and ſome of his friends leſs ready to grant him their aſſiſtance than he had formerly found them, he took a reſolution of applying in ſuch a manner to the Queen as might, at laſt, procure him ſome ſettled ſubſiſtence. Accordingly, November 9th, 1592, he ſent the Queen a memorial by the Counteſs of Warwick (z), in which he very earneſtly preſſed, that commiſſioners might be appointed to hear his pretenſions, to ſee and examine the teſtimonies he was able to exhibit in ſupport of his ſeveral claims, to receive a juſt ſtate of his affairs, to know what would relieve, and give him ſatisfaction, and, finally, to report all theſe to her Majeſty. This had a good effect: for, upon the 22d of the ſame month, Mr Wolley, who was the Queen's Secretary for the Latin tongue, and Sir Thomas Gorge, went, by her Majeſty's command, to Mortlake (a), where Mr Dee exhibited a book, containing a diſtinct account of all the memorable tranſactions of his life, thoſe which occurred in his laſt journey abroad only excepted; and as he read this hiſtorical narration, he produced all the letters, grants and other evidences requiſite to confirm them, and, where theſe were wanting, named living witneſſes (b). This original book falling into the hands of the learned Dr Thomas Smith, induced him to write his Latin life of our author (c); and, though theſe memoirs are but uncouthly drawn up, as from the quotations the reader will ſufficiently diſcern, yet there ſeems to be no juſt ground to queſtion the truth of the matters of fact which they contain [O]. The point he chiefly laboured to carry, by this appli-

[N] He received from time to time continual proofs:] The Queen graciouſly recommended Mr Dee to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſiring that ſome proviſion might be made for him, and ſignified to him at the ſame time that Mr Dee's laſt journey abroad was not without her alliance (30), which is a point worthy of remark, becauſe the contrary ſeems apparent from all who have written any thing about him. In conſequence of this there was a grant made to Dr Aubrey, Maſter of Requeſts, of five advowſons of rectories in the dioceſe of St David's, to the amount in the whole of near one hundred pounds per Annum, in truſt for Mr Dee, which Grant ſerved only to raiſe a clamour againſt him as if he had received vaſt things from the Crown, and yet this Grant, like the reſt, never produced him a ſingle penny, though he obſerves that he paid all the fees that were uſually paid for paſſing it (31). It was the Archbiſhop alſo that thought of the Hoſpital of St Croſſe, affirming that it was a fit living for him, and Mr. Dee a fit man to have it. This induced our author to apply himſelf to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, November 6, 1592, in hopes of having his aſſiſtance, who uſed him very civilly, and told him, That if he could procure any other friend to move it to her Majeſty, he would do as much as in him lay to ſupport his demand with the Queen, which was all he could deſire; and upon theſe motives he reſolved to petition the Queen for this Maſterſhip of St Croſſe, which the Queen herſelf had once before promiſed him, and ſhe had even given him room to hope that he ſhould be made Provoſt of Eaton (32).

'The Compendious Rehearſal of John Dee, his du'tiful Declaration and Proof of the Courſe and Race
'of his ſtudious Life for the Space of half an hundred
'Years, now by God's Favour and Help fully ſpent,
'and of the very great Injuries, Damages, and In'dignities, which for theſe laſt nine Years he hath in 'England ſuſtained, contrary to her Majeſty's very 'gracious Will and expreſs Commandment made unto
'the two honourable Commiſſioners by her moſt Ex'cellent Majeſty thereto aſſigned, according to the In'tent of the moſt humble Supplication of the ſaid
'John, exhibited to her moſt Gracious Majeſty at
'Hampton-Court, Ann. 1592, Nov. 9.

This book is divided into fourteen chapters, with an appendix, which brings it down to the year 1593. In theſe he ſets forth the ſeveral facts that had been recited in the text; the offers made to him by the Univerſity of Oxford, and various foreign Univerſities, to have engaged him to have accepted of a Profeſſor's Chair; Letters upon particular occaſions from her Majeſty, the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Leiceſter, the Lord Chancellor Hatton, the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, Sir Henry Sidney, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and many others. He ſhews in what manner he had been injured; the ways he had ſubſiſted for ſeveral years, receiving in gifts five hundred pounds, and having run into debt to the amount of three hundred and three; the conſtant ſervices he had rendered the Queen; the many diſappointments he had met with, in which, to the preferments before mentioned, he adds the Wardenſhip of Winchester College and the Maſterſhip of Sherborne; nor does he forget what offers had been made him by Princes beyond the ſea, which, as a ſpecimen of this ſingular memorial of his own merit, be pleaſed to take in his own words (34).

application, was a grant of the Maſterſhip of St. Croſſe, then poſſeſſed by Dr. Bennet, when he ſhould be promoted to a Biſhoprick; and many reaſons he alledged, why that preferment would be more convenient, as well as more acceptable, to him than any other (d). Upon the report made by the Commiſſioners to the Queen, her Majeſty deſired the Lady Howard to comfort Mrs Dee by a letter and preſent, which Letter was brought by Mr. Secretary Wolley, on the 2d of December following, with a preſent of one hundred marks from the Queen, a promiſe of his having the preferment he deſired when it ſhould become vacant, and a penſion of two hundred pounds a year out of the revenues of the Biſhoprick of Oxford, till ſuch time as he could be put in poſſeſſion of it (e). Theſe promiſes, like the former, coming to nothing, he, on the 15th of February, 1593, having firſt conſulted his friend Sir John Wolley, engaged his patroneſs the Counteſs of Warwick to preſent another ſhort Latin petition to the Queen; but what followed upon that does not appear (f). However, December 8th, 1594, he obtained a grant of the Chancellorſhip of St. Paul's (g); but this not anſwering his end, he applied himſelf next by letter to Dr. Whitgift, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in which he inſerted a large account of all the books he had either publiſhed or written, of which ſome account will be given in the notes [P]. 'ſtudious race I might have ſerved five Chriſtian Emperors, namely, Charles the Vth, Ferdinand, Maximilian, this Rodolph, and this preſent Moſcovite, 'of every one their ſtipend, directly or indirectly, offered, and mounting greater each than other, as from 'five hundred dollars yearly ſtipend, to a thouſand, 'two thouſand, three thouſand, and, laſtly, by a meſſenger from this Ruſſia or Muſcovite Emperor, purpoſely ſent with a very rich preſent unto me at Trebona Caſtle, and with proviſion for the whole journey, (being above twelve hundred miles from the 'caſtle where I lay) of my coming to his court at Moſkow, (with my wife, children, and my whole 'family), there to enjoy at his Imperial hands two 'thouſand pounds ſterling, yearly ſtipend; and of his 'Protector yearly, a thouſand rubles, with my diet 'alſo to be allowed me free out of the Emperor's own 'kitchen, and to be in dignity with authority amongſt 'the higheſt ſort of the Nobility there, and of his 'Privy Councellors, &c. Of this laſt great preferment offered, many Engliſhmen yet living, and in 'this kingdom, be witneſſes: the Landgrave of Heſſe 'Caſſel his letter is ready to be ſhowed, and other letters of men of credit can be ſufficient teſtimonies, 'beſides the fore-runner to ſeek me, and the Embaſſadors or Meſſengers their own writings thereof here 'lying.

'Note, That the Commiſſioners jointly read two of 'the Teſtimonies.'

The laſt line of the quotation was left on purpoſe to ſhew the manner in which Mr. Dee proceeded; for he or one of his ſervants read the book, and then the letters, inſtruments, books, and other evidences were put into the Commiſſioners hands. It is indeed true, that we have only Dr. Dee's word for this: but then we muſt conſider that the book was not written to be publiſhed, conſequently not to impoſe upon the world, and the rewards afterwards promiſed, and more eſpecially the preferments obtained in conſequence of the Commiſſioners report, are an unexceptionable teſtimony that it was believed. One thing by the way: there was an entry of this matter in Mr. Dee's Diary, copied from thence by Mr. Aſhmole, but ſo as that if the work of Dee's had not remained, it might have rendered his whole hiſtory ſuſpicious; for Mr. Aſhmole has ſet down (35) Secretary Walſingham inſtead of Wolley, as one of the Commiſſioners, who was dead nearly two years before, miſled no doubt by Mr. Dee's writing only the initial letter of his name.

consequence of this letter, and, perhaps, of other applications, he obtained a grant of the Wardenship of Manchester-College, vacant by the promotion of Dr. Hugh Bellot to the Bishoprick of Chester, his patent passing the Great Seal May 25th, 1595 (b); and, on the 14th of February, 1596, he arrived, with his wife and family, in that town; and, on the 20th of the same month, was installed in his new charge (i). He continued there about seven years; but, whether through his own ill management and haughty behaviour, or, as he alledged, through the restless and unquiet disposition of the Fellows of that College, so it was, that the greatest part of that time he lived but an unquiet life; to which, perhaps, it might not a little contribute, that, during the whole space he remained there, he was looked upon, by the inhabitants of the place, and of all the country round, as a person who had a kind of supernatural skill, and who could afford them relief in a variety of cases that lay out of the reach of Physick (k). However this might be, so uneasy he grew, from the disputes in the College, and from the reports that prevailed abroad, that, June 5th, 1604, he prefented a petition to King James, earnestly desiring him that he might be brought to a trial, that, by a judicial sentence, he might be delivered from those suspicions and surmises under which he had now laboured for upwards of fifty years (l); and, on the eighth of the same month, he addressed the like supplication to the Parliament (m); but the King having been informed, by the Earl of Salisbury, as to the nature of his studies, was very far from giving him any mark of royal countenance (n) or favour, which must have made a very deep impression upon a man of his vain and ambitious spirit, which all his misfortunes could never alter or amend. In the month of November, in the same year, being then in a very weak and bad state of health, he quitted Manchester (o) with his family in order to return to his house at Mortlake, lake, but came first to London, where he remained but a short time; and finding himself now very old, infirm, and destitute of any powerful protector (the Earl of Salisbury, to whom he had offered his service, having slighted him), he had recourse to his former invocations, and so came to deal again, as he believed, with spirits (p). He pursued the same practices at Mortlake, where we find him in the year 1607, having procured one Bartholomew Hickman to serve him in the same manner as Edward Kelly had formerly done (q). His friend John Pontoys also returned out of Poland, and was admitted into his confidence (r). These transactions were continued to Monday the 7th of September 1607, which is the last date in that journal published by Casaubon (s) [Q]. As this book made a very great noise upon its first publication, so, many years after, the credit of it was revived by one of the wisest and ablest Mathematicians of his time, the celebrated Dr. Hooke, who believed, that not only Dr. Casaubon, but Archbishop Usher, and other learned men, were entirely mistaken in their notions about this book, and that, in reality, our author Dee never fell under any such delusions, but was a man of great art and intrigue (t), and made use of this strange method of writing to conceal things of quite another nature, as the reader shall be acquainted in the notes [R]. [Q] In that Journal published by Casaubon.] The title of this work at large runs thus;

'A true and faithful Relation of what passed for 'many years between Dr. John Dee, a Mathematician 'of great fame in Queen Elizabeth and King James 'their reigns, and some Spirits, tending, had it succeeded, to a general Alteration of most States and 'Kingdoms in the world. His private Conferences 'with Rodolph, Emperor of Germany; Stephen, 'King of Poland; and divers other Princes about it. 'The Particulars of his Cause, as it was agitated in 'the Emperor's Court by the Pope's intervention. 'His Banishment and Restoration in part; as also the 'Letters of sundry great men and Princes, some whereof 'were present at some of these Conferences; and Apparitions of Spirits to the said Dr. Dee, out of the 'original Copy written with Dr. Dee's own hand; 'kept in the Library of Sir Thomas Cotton, Knt. 'Baronet, with a Preface confirming the Reality (as to 'the point of Spirits) of this Relation, and shewing 'the several good uses that a sober Christian may make 'of all. By Meric Casaubon, D. D.' Lond. 1659, fol.

We shall give the reader a short passage out of Dr. Casaubon's Preface, to justify the pains we have taken in a former note to shew, that the piece which he apprehended was totally lost is still preserved, and if any use can be made of it (for which I would not be willingly bound) may be produced to publick view as well as the rest. The passage is this, which gives a fair account of what he published. 'In the year of 'our Lord 1584, September the 3d, being a Mon'day, Dr. Dee first appeared, being presented by 'honourable persons, and expected before the Em'peror Rodolph. Among other things he then told 'him, that, for these two years and a half, God's 'holy angels had used to inform him. Our book or 'first action here beginneth, 28 May, 1583, accord'ing to this reckoning it must be, that, above a year 'and three months before began the first apparition. 'The account then of fifteen months from the first 'apparition we want. How much in bulk that might 'come to I cannot tell, neither will I warrant all per'fect from this 28 May, 1583, to the fourth of April, '1587, though, for the most part, the coherence is 'right enough to that time; but, from thence to the 'twentieth of March, 1607, there is a vast chasm or 'hiatus of no less than twenty years; how this hath 'happened I cannot tell certainly: what I guess is 'this; some years after Dr. Dee's death, about anno 'Dom. 1608, Sir Robert Cotton bought his library '(what then remained of it), with his Magical Table, 'and the original manuscript written with his own 'hand, whereof this is a copy. The book had been 'buried in the earth, how long years or months I 'know not; but so long, tho' it was carefully kept, 'since, yet it retained so much of the earth, that it 'began to moulder and perish some years ago, which 'when Sir T. Cotton aforementioned observed, he 'was at the charges to have it written out before it 'should be too late; Now full fifty years, or not many 'wanting, being passed since this original came to Sir 'Robert, it is very likely, that, had any more in all 'that time been heard of, Sir Robert, or Sir Thomas 'his son and heir, would have heard of it, and got 'it as soon as any body else; And because no more 'hath been heard of all this while, it is more than 'probable, that no more is extant not in England, 'nor I think any where else; haply the rest might 'perish some part (if not all) even whilst the Doctor 'lived.'

[R] Shall be acquainted in the notes.] We are told by Dr. Hooke, that what first put him upon suspecting that there was somewhat concealed under the strange relations contained in Dr. Dee's book, was his vehement protestation, upon the peril of his soul if he lied, in his letter to the Archbishop (37), that he had never meddled with unlawful arts, or deviated into any practices unbecoming of a Christian. What confirmed him in his opinion cannot be either better or more briefly expressed than in his own words, which are these; 'Upon turning it over, and comparing several 'particulars in it one with another, and with other 'writings of the said Dr. Dee, and considering also 'the life, actions and estate, of the said author, so far 'as I can be informed, I do conceive that the greatest 'part of the said book, especially all that which re'lates to spirits and apparitions, together with their 'names, speeches, shews, noises, clothing, actions, 'and the prayers and doxologies, &c. are all Cryp'tography, and that some parts also of that which 'seems to be a Journal of his voyage and travels into 'several parts of Germany are also cryptographical, 'that is, that under those feigned stories which he 'there seems to relate as matters of fact, he hath con'cealed relations of quite another thing, and that he 'made use of this way of absconding it, that he might 'the more securely escape discovery if he should fall 'under suspicion as to the true designs of his travels, 'or that the same should fall into the hands of any 'spies, or such as might be employed to betray him, 'or his intentions concerning the inquisition that 'should be made, or prosecution, if discovered, would 'be more gentle for a pretended enthusiast than for a 'real spy. What his designs or business with the 'Emperor, the King of Poland, and others, was, it is 'hard to determine, i. e. first, Whether he were sent 'upon some private message by the Queen, or any of 'the then Ministers of State, to enquire into, and dis'cover, the secret designs or actions of that Court, is 'hard now to determine; but 'tis likely. For in his 'apology he alledges, that the Lord Treasurer had, 'by the Queen's orders, written to the Archbishop to 'signify, that he went beyond sea by her good favour 'and licence; and we find also, that the Queen did 'send several letters and messengers to call him home; 'and that upon his return the Queen received him 'kindly at Richmond, and that she used to call at his 'house at Mortlack, and shewed herself courteous to 'him upon all occasions.——When he returned he 'left Kelley with the Emperor, who for several years 'afterwards kept correspondence with Dr. Dee here, 'which might possibly continue to execute the same 'design, Kelley being now grown Sir Edward Kelley, 'and end of his life he became miſerably poor, as we are told by Anthony Wood, and was obliged to diſpoſe of his books to procure ſubſiſtence, which, at certain times, when, through his own ill management, he brought himſelf into ſuch diſtreſs, might be true; but there ſeems to be good ground to believe that he held his preferment to the laſt, and did not ſell his houſe at Mortlake, which was his own, and which ſeems to have been of ſome conſiderable value, ſince, in his former diſtreſſes, he had thoughts of mortgaging it for four hundred pounds (u). It is highly probable, that he remained under theſe deluſions to his end, and was actually providing for a new journey into Germany, when, worn out by age and diſtempers, he breathed his laſt ſome time in the year 1608, being in the eighty-firſt year of his age (w). He was buried in the chancel of the church at Mortlake, but without any tomb-ſtone, or other memorial; and yet the ancient inhabitants of that place were able, in 1672, to ſhew the very ſpot where he was interred (x). He left behind a numerous poſterity, both male and female, and, amongſt theſe, his eldeſt ſon Arthur, who was bred at Weſtminſter-ſchool under the learned Camden (y), applied himſelf to Phyſick, and became Phyſician in ordinary, firſt to the Grand Duke of Muſcovy, and afterwards to King Charles the Firſt (z). 'and the Emperor's Chemiſt. And, in probability, 'Dr. Dee might have ſufficiently furniſhed him with 'Cryptography enough to ſend what intelligencies he 'pleaſed without ſuſpicion, which was eaſily con-'ceived under any other feigned ſtory. I will not 'determine whether this were his buſineſs, I ſay, or 'whether it might not be upon his own account, to 'ſee if he could make a fortune under the Emperor, 'by means of Chemiſtry, or Mathematicks, or Aſtro-'logy, or Mechanicks, all which I find by his writ-'ings he was well verſed in, and eſpecially in the 'buſineſs of Opticks, Perſpective, and Mechanick 'contrivances, an effect of which I conceive his cry-'ſtal, or angelick ſtone, or Chryſtallum Sacratum, as 'he terms it, to have been, for that it was of a con-'ſiderable bigneſs, and was placed upon a pedeſtal or 'table, which he calls a Holy Table, which might 'contain the apparatus to make apparitions, when he 'had a mind, to be ſeen in it, as likewiſe to produce 'noiſes and voices if there were occaſion. All which 'might be done by art, as hath been ſhewn both for-'merly by Roger Bacon, and of late by the echoing 'head.——He was likewiſe well verſed in Caba-'liſtical learning and Cryptography, as appears by the 'title of a treatiſe written by him upon that ſubject, 'and by that book which he ſeems to have prized ſo 'much, and calls the book of Enoch, which I take to 'be of no other uſe than for Cryptography and Caba-'liſms. I will not determine, I ſay, whether his 'deſign might not be by theſe, and ſome other ſuch in-'genuities, as particularly a glaſs which he mentions, 'p. 256, the ſecret of which he opened to Dr. Curtz, 'the Emperor's Phyſician, for battering in a dark 'night, &c. which what he means by it I underſtand 'not; but Dr. Curtz told him, that concluſion would 'be very acceptable to the Emperor. He had alſo 'written ſix books de Speculis Comburentibus; two books 'of the aſtronomical ring, or ring dial; and two 'books alſo of clock-work, to find entertainment and 'encouragement from the Emperor. But I do rather 'conjecture that he was employed by the Queen for 'ſome private affairs of State, and that he made uſe 'of theſe his inventions in order to obtain the freer 'and more unſuſpected acceſs to the Emperor, which 'having not ſucceeded as might have been expected, 'he was recalled and returned into England in No-'vember, 1589. That a great part of this treatiſe is 'Cryptography, I conceive is very probable from 'theſe and divers other conſiderations; Firſt, for that 'he took ſuch care to preſerve the book of Enoch, 'which I conjecture to contain the methods and keys 'of what was concealed in this book; next, for that 'the method and manner thereof is ſo like to that of 'Trithemius his Cryptography, that I conceive, were 'it worth while, it would not be difficult to decypher 'a great part of it by analogy thereunto. Now tho' 'at that time the key or method of that book were not 'ſo well and commonly known, yet I do not doubt 'but this inquiſitive man had got knowledge of it in 'his travels and enquiries in Germany, poſſibly when 'he preſented his Monas Hieroglyphica to the Emperor 'Maximilian, 1564; and poſſibly it might be upon the 'ſame account that he made choice of his way of invo-'cations and revelations to conceal his meaning that I 'ſhewed before Trithemius had done in his Cryptogra-'phy. Trithemius alſo pretended to revelation, as may 'be ſeen in the Hiſtory of his Life, though not ſo 'frequent as this author has done in this book, at 'leaſt if the ſenſe thereof be underſtood literally; 'but that I conceive to be nothing but the outward 'form, appearance, or dreſs, of the ſubſtance and 'ſubject of the book, which lay abſconded from com-'mon diſcovery under that maſk or diſguiſe, though 'yet I am apt to believe, he had ſome artificial con-'trivances to perform this alſo when he ſaw cauſe. 'Thirdly, for that there are very many plain inſtances 'of Cryptography, both by changing and putting 'ſome letters for others, and numbers for letters, and 'numbers alſo for words, and tables ſo diſpoſing or 'placing letters according to ſeveral orders and me-'thods, to be ſeen in the book itſelf: and the book 'which he calls the book of Enoch ſeems to be nothing 'elſe. Beſides, the words that he ſets down as deli-'vered by his ſpirits, are many of them inarticulate 'according to the commonly accepted ſounds or pro-'nunciation of thoſe characters they are written with, 'and therefore were not put to ſignify thoſe letters. 'It would be too long to give inſtances out of the 'book itſelf of theſe particulars, and 'tis needleſs, 'ſince they are ſo very many and frequent in every 'part of the book. He hath likewiſe divers polygonal 'figures, as I conceive, for the ſame purpoſe, and 'many other ſuch indications of Cryptography.' There is, without doubt, ſomething very plauſible, as well as highly ingenious, in this learned gentleman's conjectures, in which, if he had made a trial of decyphering, and had ſucceeded even in the ſmalleſt part, he would have put his ſentiment beyond coutradiction. As it is, there ſeems to be three reaſons, that, duly weighed, will ſcarcely allow us to ſubſcribe to his judgment of this book. The firſt is, that Mr. Dee began theſe actions in England, for which, if we ſuppoſe the whole treatiſe to be written in cypher, there is no account can be given, any more than for purſuing the ſame practices in King James's time, who cannot be imagined to have uſed him as a ſpy. The ſecond, that he admitted Albert Laſki, Francis Puccius, and William Roſenbergh (38), to be preſent at theſe conſultations, which is not very reconcileable to the notion, that the whole is no more than an allegorical hiſtory; for then all that they did muſt have been mere artifice and impoſture, which, in ſo long a ſpace of time, and under the inſpection of ſo many witneſſes, would certainly have been diſcovered. Laſtly, upon the return of Mr. Dee from Bohemia, Mr. Edward Kelley (39) did actually ſend an account to the Queen, of practices againſt her life; but then this was in a plain and open manner, and in conſequence of his publick declarations of his unſhaken loyalty towards her Majeſty's perſon and government, which declarations were not only unneceſſary, but very inexpedient for him to make at Prague, if he had been employed there as a ſpy, neither would he have taken this way of informing the Queen, if there had been any ſuchmyſterious correſpondence between Dee and her Miniſters as Dr. Hooke ſuggeſts.

 [DE FOE (DANIEL), an ingenious writer, author of a great variety of pieces different ſubjects, was born in London, about the year 1663. He was the ſon of James Foe [A], of the pariſh of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, London, butcher (a). As his father was a Proteſtant Diſſenter, he was brought up in the ſame perſuaſion, to which he adhered throughout his whole life. He was educated at an academy at Newington Green, which was kept by Mr. Charles Morton [B], who was a diſſenting miniſter (b). How long he continued there, or whether he received any conſiderable inſtruction in the learned languages, is not aſcertained; but he appears early to have applied himſelf to literature, for he commenced author before he had attained his twenty-firſt year. In 1683, he publiſhed a political pamphlet, relative to the war which then ſubſiſted [C] between the Turks and the Auſtrians (c). He ſeems early to have imbibed a great zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and the intereſts of civil liberty; and this excited in him ſo great an averſion to the adminiſtration of king James II. that, before he was twenty-three years of age, he went down into the Weſt of England, and bore arms under the duke of Monmouth (d). On the failure of that unfortunate enterprize, he returned again to the metropolis; and it is not improbable, but that the circumſtance of his being a native of London, and his perſon not being much known in that part of the kingdom where the inſurrection took place, might facilitate his eſcape, and be the means of preventing his being brought to any trial, for his ſhare in that tranſaction. After his return to London, he wrote a piece to warn the Diſſenters againſt concurring in thoſe ſchemes [D] which were adopted by king James in favour of Popery, under the pretence of introducing a general toleration; and he afterwards manifeſted great zeal in ſupport of the Revolution [E]. On the 26th of January, 1687-8, he was admitted a freeman of the city of London by patrimony, as the ſon of a freeman (e). But ſome time before this he had engaged in trade; and for about ten years he is ſaid to have acted as a hoſe-factor in Freeman's yard, Cornhill (f). He continued, however, to apply himſelf to politics and literature; and publiſhed a variety of pieces during that period. But, as a trader, he was not ſucceſsful; though, beſides acting as a hoſe-factor, he engaged in carrying on ſome brick and pantile works near Tilbury-fort in Eſſex. In 1692, he was obliged to abſcond from his creditors; and an angry creditor took out a commiſſion of bankruptcy. But this was ſoon ſuperſeded, on the petition of thoſe to whom he was moſt indebted, who accepted a compoſition on his ſingle bond (g). This, by the efforts of unwearied diligence, he afterwards punctually paid, and otherwiſe behaved very honourably to his creditors [F]. As, therefore, notwithſtanding his misfortunes, he ſtill retained a good character, an offer was made to ſettle him as a factor at Cadiz [G], where he had ſome

[A] He was the ſon of James Foe.] His father was the ſon of Daniel Foe, of Elton, in the county of Northampton, yeoman (1). It is probable, that our author changed his name to De Foe from a diſlike to his original name Foe, which ſeemed not a very eligible one. But his enemies pretended, that he changed his name from Foe to De Foe that he might not be thought an Engliſhman; though this notion ſeems to have had no other foundation, than the circumſtance of his having, in conſequence of his zeal for king William, attacked the prejudices of his countrymen in his True-Born Engliſhman.

(1) Life of Daniel De Foe, by George Chalmers, Eſq. affixed to Stockdale's Edition of Robinſon Cruſoe, p. 6.

[B] An academy at Newington-green, which was kept by Mr. Charles Morton.] Whether he was any conſiderable time under this gentleman's care, we have no certain account. De Foe himſelf ſpoke highly of Mr. Morton; and it appears that the Rev. Mr. Richard Lardner, father of the celebrated Dr. Lardner, was educated under him for the miniſtry (2).

(2) Dr. Kippis's Life of Dr. Lardner, Appendix, No. VI.

[C] A political pamphlet relative to the war, &c.] Whether this was his firſt performance, does not appear; but he himſelf mentions the publication of it, as the firſt inſtance of his differing in opinion from the Whigs, whoſe general ſentiments he adopted. He ſays, in his Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, 'It has been 'the diſaſter of all parties in this nation to be very hot 'in their turn; and, as often as they have been ſo, I 'have differed with them all, and ever muſt and ſhall 'do ſo.'—'The firſt time I had the misfortune to 'differ with my friends was about the year 1683, 'when the Turks were beſieging Vienna, and the 'Whigs in England, generally ſpeaking, were for the 'Turks taking it; which, I having read the hiſtory 'of the cruelty and perfidious dealings of the Turks 'in their wars, and how they had rooted out the name 'of the Chriſtian religion in above threeſcore and ten 'kingdoms, could by no means agree with; and 'though then but a young man, and a younger author, 'I oppoſed it, and wrote againſt it; which was taken 'very unkindly indeed (3).'

(3) Appeal, P. 51.

[D] He wrote a piece to warn the Diſſenters &c.] Referring to this publication, he ſays, in his Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, 'I differed with my friends when 'king James was wheedling the Diſſenters to take off 'the Penal Laws and Teſt, which I could by no means 'come into. And as in the firſt I uſed to ſay, I had 'rather the Popiſh houſe of Auſtria ſhould ruin the 'Proteſtants in Hungary, than the infidel houſe of 'Ottoman ſhould ruin both Proteſtant and Papiſt, by 'over-running Germany; ſo, in the other, I told the 'Diſſenters, I had rather the church of England ſhould 'pull our cloaths off by fines and forfeitures, than the 'Papiſts ſhould fall both upon the Church and the Diſ'ſenters, and pull our ſkins off by fire and faggot (4).'

(4) Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, p. 51, 52.

[E] Manifeſted great zeal in ſupport of the Revolution, King William and Queen Mary dined with the Lord-mayor and Corporation of London at the city-feaſt on the 29th of October, 1689. A regiment of volunteers, compoſed of the chief citizens, and commanded by the earl of Peterborough, attended their Majeſties on this occaſion, from Whitehall to Guildhall. In order to teſtify his zeal for king William, and the Revolution, Daniel De Foe is ſaid to have appeared among theſe troopers, gallantly mounted, and richly accoutred (5). This is a circumſtance not improper to be mentioned here; though De Foe had certainly given much better evidence of his zeal for the Revolution, and the principles upon which it was grounded.

(5) Chalmers, ut ſupra, p. 9.

[F] Behaved very honourably to his creditors.] Mr. Chalmers obſerves, that ſome of thoſe creditors, who had been ſatisfied by his compoſition, 'falling afterwards into diſtreſs themſelves, De Foe voluntarily 'paid them their whole claims, being then in riſing 'circumſtances from king William's favour. This is 'ſuch an example of honeſty, as it would be unjuſt to 'De Foe and to the world to conceal. Being re'proached in 1705 by lord Haverſham with mercena'rineſs, our author feelingly mentions, that, "with "a numerous family, and no helps but his own in"duſtry, he had forced his way with undiſcouraged "diligence through a ſea of misfortunes, and re"duced his debts, excluſive of compoſition, from ſeven"teen thouſand to leſs than five thouſand pounds (6)."

(6) Life of De Foe, p. 10.

[G] An offer was made to ſettle him as a factor at Cadiz.] Of this he gives himſelf the following account. 'Misfortunes in buſineſs having unhinged me 'from matters of trade, it was about the year 1694, 'when ſome previous correſpondence. But he was unwilling to leave his native country; and was, without ſolicitation, appointed accomptant to the commiſſioners for managing the duties on glaſs, in which office he continued about four years, when thoſe duties were ſuppreſſed by act of parliament (b).

(b) Chalmers, ut ſupra, p. 12.

As De Foe poſſeſſed a very vigorous mind, he was much of a projector. He wrote, as he informs us himſelf, many ſheets about the coin; he propoſed a law for regiſtering ſeamen; he projected county banks, factories for goods, a commiſſion of inquiry into the eſtates of bankrupts, and a penſion-office for the relief of the poor (i); and in 1697 he publiſhed, in one volume, 8vo, "An Eſſay upon Projects [H]." The ſame year he

'when I was invited by ſome merchants, with whom 'I had correſponded abroad, and ſome alſo at home, 'to ſettle at Cadiz in Spain, and that with offers of 'very good commiſſions; but Providence, which had 'other work for me to do, placed a ſecret averſion in 'my mind to quitting England upon any account, and 'made me refuſe the beſt offers of that kind, to be 'concerned with ſome eminent perſons at home, in 'propoſing ways and means to the government for 'raiſing money to ſupply the occaſions of the war then 'newly begun. Some time after this, I was, without 'the leaſt application of mine, and being then ſeventy 'miles from London, ſent for to be accomptant to 'the commiſſioners of the glaſs duty, in which ſer-'vice I continued to the determination of their com-'miſſion (7).'

[H] An Eſſay upon Projects.] A ſecond edition of this was publiſhed in 1702, under the title of "Eſſays upon ſeveral Projects;" but upon inſpecting it, we find that it differs from the firſt in nothing but the title. In the introduction to this Work, De Foe obſerves, that Neceſſity, which is allowed to be the mother of Invention, had ſo violently agitated the wits of men at that time, that it ſeemed "not at all "improper, by way of diſtinction, to call it, The "Projecting Age." He conſidered this as partly ariſing from the loſſes and depredations which many merchants and traders had ſuſtained during the war in which the nation was then engaged. 'Theſe,' ſaid he, 'prompted by neceſſity, rack their wits for new 'contrivances, new inventions, new trades, ſtocks, 'projects, and any thing to retrieve the deſperate 'credit of their fortunes.'——'If induſtry be in any 'buſineſs rewarded with ſucceſs, 'tis in the merchan-'dizing part of the world, who indeed may be more 'truly ſaid to live by their wits than any people what-'ſoever. All Foreign Negoce, though to ſome 'tis a 'plain road by the help of cuſtom, yet it is in its 'beginning all project, contrivance, and invention. 'Every new voyage the merchant contrives is a pro-'ject; and ſhips are ſent from port to port, as mar-'kets and merchandizes differ, by the help of ſtrange 'and univerſal intelligence; wherein ſome are ſo ex-'quiſite, ſo ſwift, and ſo exact, that a merchant, 'ſitting at home in his counting-houſe, at once con-'verſes with all parts of the known world. This, 'and travel, makes a true-bred merchant the moſt 'intelligent man in the world, and conſequently the 'moſt capable, when urged by neceſſity, to contrive 'new ways to live. And from hence, I humbly con-'ceive, may very properly be derived the projects, ſo 'much the ſubject of the preſent diſcourſe. And to 'this ſort of men it is eaſy to trace the original of 'Banks, Stocks, Stock-jobbing, Aſſurances, Friendly 'Societies, Lotteries, and the like. To this may be 'added, the long annual enquiry in the Houſe of 'Commons for Ways and Means, which has been a 'particular movement to ſet all the heads of the na-'tion at work; and I appeal, with ſubmiſſion, to the 'gentlemen of that honourable houſe, if the greateſt 'part of all the Ways and Means, out of the common 'road of land-taxes, polls, and the like, have not 'been handed to them from the merchant, and in a 'great meaſure paid by them too (8).

(8) Eſſay upon Projects, p. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9.

De Foe afterwards ſays, 'Projects, of the nature I 'treat of, are doubtleſs in general of public advan-'tage, as they tend to improvement of trade, and 'employment of the poor, and the circulation and 'increaſe of the public ſtock of the kingdom; but 'this is ſuppoſed of ſuch as are built on the broad 'baſis of ingenuity and improvement; in which, 'though I'll allow the author to aim primarily at his 'own advantage, yet with the circumſtances of pub-'lic benefit added. Wherefore it is neceſſary to 'diſtinguiſh among the projects of the preſent times 'between the honeſt and the diſhoneſt (9).'

(9) Ibid. p. 10, 11.

De Foe afterwards makes ſome remarks upon fraudulent projectors; but he obſerves, that though there were ſuch impoſitions upon the public, yet that was 'no reaſon why inventions upon honeſt foundations, 'and to fair purpoſes, ſhould not be acknowledged; 'no, nor why the author of any ſuch fair contri-'vances ſhould not reap the harveſt of his own in-'genuity. Our acts of parliament, for granting pa-'tents to firſt inventors for fourteen years, is a ſufficient 'acknowledgment of the due regard which ought to 'be had to ſuch as find out any thing which may be 'of public advantage. New diſcoveries in trade, in 'arts and myſteries, of manufacturing goods, or im-'provement of land, are without queſtion of as great 'benefit as any diſcoveries made in the works of na-'ture by all the Academies and Royal Societies in the 'world.

'There is, 'tis true, a great difference between 'new inventions and projects, between improvements 'of manufactures or land, which tend to the imme-'diate benefit of the public, and employing of the 'poor, and projects framed by ſubtle heads, with a 'ſort of a Deceptio Viſus, and Legerdemain, to bring 'people to run needleſs and unuſual hazards. I grant 'it, and give a due preference to the firſt; and yet 'ſucceſs has ſo ſanctified ſome of thoſe other ſorts of 'projects, that it would be a kind of blaſphemy 'againſt Fortune to diſallow them. Witneſs, Sir 'William Phips's voyage to the wreck; it was a 'mere project, a lottery of a hundred thouſand to 'one odds; a hazard, which, if it had failed, every 'body would have been aſhamed to have owned them-'ſelves concerned in; a voyage that would have been 'as much ridiculed as Don Quixote's adventure upon 'the windmill.'—'But ſtill ſome projects hit even 'of the moſt unlikely, of which this was one of Sir 'William Phips, who brought home a cargo of ſilver 'of near 200,000l. ſterling, fiſhed up out of the open 'ſea, remote from any ſhore, from an old Spaniſh 'ſhip, which had been ſunk above forty years (10).'

(10) Ibid. p. 14—18.

Among other topics diſcuſſed by De Foe in this book one is that of Banks; and in treating on this ſubject he gives it as his opinion, that the Bank of England is eſtabliſhed upon too contracted a plan, and that it might be rendered much more extenſively uſeful and beneficial to the public; and he points out the methods by which he ſuppoſes this might be done (11). He alſo propoſes the eſtabliſhment of what he calls a Court Merchant, for determining cauſes and matters of litigation between merchants. He obſerves, that affairs of this kind, when they come to be argued by lawyers at the bar, 'are ſtrangely 'handled.' 'I myſelf have heard,' ſays he, 'very 'famous lawyers make ſorry work of a cauſe between 'the merchant and his factor; and when they come 'to argue about Exchanges, Diſcounts, Proteſts, De-'murages, Charter-Parties, Freights, Port-charges, Aſ-'ſurances, Barratries, Bottomries, Accounts-current, Ac-'counts in commiſſion, and Accounts in company, and the 'like, the ſolicitor has not been able to draw a brief, 'nor the counſel to underſtand it.'——'The affairs of 'merchants are accompanied with ſuch variety of cir-'cumſtances, ſuch new and univerſal contingencies, 'which change and differ in every age, with a mul-'titude of niceties and punctilios, and thoſe again 'altering as the cuſtoms and uſages of countries and 'ſtates do alter, that it has been found impracticable 'to make any laws that could extend to all caſes: 'and our law itſelf does tacitly acknowledge its own 'imperfection in this caſe, by allowing the cuſtom of 'merchants to paſs as a kind of law, in caſes of dif-'ficulty. Wherefore it ſeems to me a moſt natural 'proceeding,

(11) Ibid. p. 45—57.

he alſo publiſhed, in 4to. " An enquiry into the Occaſional Conformity of Diſſenters, in " Caſes of Preferment [I];" which gave riſe to a controverſy between him and Mr. John Howe [K]. He likewiſe publiſhed, " An Argument, ſhewing, that a ſtanding Army, " with ' proceeding, that ſuch affairs ſhould be heard be' fore, and judged by ſuch as by known experience

' and long practice, in the cuſtoms and uſages of ' Foreign Negoce, are of courſe the moſt capable to

He alſo propoſed an academy, to be inſtituted by the king, whoſe object ſhould be, ' to encourage
' polite learning, and to poliſh and refine the Engliſh (14) Ibid. p. 233. ' tongue (14).' Referring to this, Mr. Chalmers remarks, that ' Prior offered in 1700 (which was ' four years after) the ſame project to king William,
' in his Carmen Seculare; Swift mentioned in 1710 to
' lord Oxford a propoſal for improving the Engliſh
' tongue; and Tickell flatters himſelf, in his Proſpect
' of Peace, that our daring language—ſhall ſport no
(15) Life of De Foe, p. 12. ' more in arbitrary ſound (15)'.

One of De Foe's projects was an academy for the education of women. Of the effects of education in women, and the evils reſulting from the want of it, he expreſſes himſelf in the following terms: ' A ' woman well bred, and well taught, furniſhed with
' the additional accompliſhments of knowledge and ' behaviour, is a creature without compariſon. Her
' ſociety is the emblem of ſublimer enjoyments; her
' perſon is angelic, and her converſation heavenly.
' She is all ſoftneſs and ſweetneſs, peace, love, wit,
' and delight. She is every way ſuitable to the ſub-
' limeſt wiſh; aud the man, that has ſuch a one to ' his portion, has nothing to do but to rejoice in ' her, and be thankful. On the other hand, ſup-
' poſe her to be the ſame woman, and rob her of ' the benefit of education, and it follows thus: If ' her temper be good, want of education makes her
' ſoft and eaſy. Her wit, for want of teaching,
' makes her impertinent and talkative. Her know' ledge, for want of judgement and experience, makes ' her fanciful and whimſical. If her temper be bad,
' want of breeding makes her worſe; and ſhe grows
' haughty, inſolent, and loud. If ſhe be paſſionate,
' want of manners makes her termagant, and a ſcold,
' which is much at one with lunatic. If ſhe be ' proud, want of diſcretion (which ſtill is breeding)
' makes her conceited, fantaſtic, and ridiculous.
' And from theſe ſhe degenerates to be turbulent,
(16) Ibid. p. 294, 295, 296. ' clamorous, noiſy, naſty, and the devil (16).'

[I] An Enquiry into the Occaſional Conformity of Diſſenters, in Caſes of Preferment.] To this piece a preface was prefixed, addreſſed " to the Lord-mayor, " occaſioned by his carrying the ſword to a conven- " ticle." The Lord-mayor was Sir Humphrey Edwin, who, as Mr. Chalmers remarks, ' having ' carried the regalia to a conventicle, gave riſe to
' ſome wit in the Tale of a Tub, and occaſioned ſome
(17) Life of De Foe, p. 17. ' clauſes in an act of parliament (17).' In the Tale of a Tub, the Lord-mayor, who was a Diſſenter, carrying the city regalia to the meeting-houſe, or rather Diſſenters becoming Lord-mayors, is repreſented under the idea of Jack's " getting upon a
(18) Tale of a Tub, ſect. xi. " great horſe, and eating cuſtard (18)." It was formerly the cuſtom for the Lord-mayor of London to ride, not, as at preſent, in a ſtate-coach, but on a kind of ſtate-horſe; and to this De Foe alludes, in the following line, in one of his poems:

(19) Works, vol. I. p. 74. " To ride the city horſe, and wear the chain (19)."

De Foe contended, ' That he who diſſents from
' the eſtabliſhed church, except from a true principle
' of conſcience, is guilty of a great ſin: That he ' who conforms to the eſtabliſhed church againſt his ' conſcience, is guilty of a great ſin: That, he who ' both diſſents and conforms at the ſame time, and in
' the ſame point of religion, muſt be guilty of one of (20) Collection of the Writings of the Author of the True-born Engliſhman, vol. I. p. 332. ' thoſe great ſins (19).'

De Foe alſo ſays, ' Sincerity is the glory of a ' Chriſtian, the native luſtre of an honeſt heart is
' impoſſible to be hid; it will ſhine through all his ' life in one action or another, in ſpite of ſcandal;
' and it wants no artifice to ſet it out. If the prac' tice we diſcourſe of be to be defended, let it be a
' practice; I mean, let it be voluntary, let it be free
' and ſpontaneous; and if gentlemen, who have
' ſuch a latitude in their opinions, would not have it
' thought that they are moved to it by their intereſts,
' let them practiſe it openly, and not time it ſo to
' the very eve of an election as to have it ſpeak of
' itſelf, and, as it were, force men to believe it done
' on purpoſe (21).' (21) Ibid. p. 340.

' There is a ſort of truth, which all men owe to
' the principles they profeſs, and generally ſpeaking,
' all men pay it; a Turk is a Turk zealouſly and
' entirely; an Idolater is an Idolater, and will ſerve
' the Devil to a tittle. None but Proteſtants halt be' tween God and Baal; Chriſtians of an amphibious
' nature, who have ſuch prepoſterous conſciences as ' can believe one way of worſhip to be right, and ' yet ſerve God another way themſelves. This is a
' ſtrange thing in Iſrael! all the hiſtories of religion
' in the world do not ſhew ſuch a caſe. 'Tis like a
' ſhip with her ſails haled ſome back, and ſome full.
' 'Tis like a workman that builds with one hand, and
' pulls down with the other. 'Tis like a fiſherman,
' who catches fiſh with one hand, and throws them
' into the ſea with the other (22).' (22) Ibid. p. 311.

[K] A controverſy between him and Mr. John Howe.] De Foe reprinted his " Enquiry into the Occaſional " Conformity of Diſſenters," in 1701, and then added to it a preface, ſigned with the initials of his name, addreſſed to Mr. Howe; in which he obſerved, that he had two reaſons for addreſſing his piece to him, the firſt was, that he was " not unjuſtly " eſteemed one of the moſt learned and judicious of " the Diſſenting miniſtry;" and the ſecond was, that he had a " more immediate relation to the then " Lord-mayor, who was, or had been, a member of " the Church of Chriſt under his charge." He remarked, that the piece was the ſame which had been before publiſhed in the mayoralty of Sir Humphrey Edwin; and then adds, ' The debate was then ' young, and the practice of this ſcandalous confor' mity was new, Sir John Shorter being the firſt in' ſtance of it. But it is now growing a received
' cuſtom, to the great ſcandal of the Diſſenters in ' general, the offence of ſuch whoſe conſciences for' bid them the ſame latitude, and the ſtumbling of ' thoſe who, being before weak and irreſolute, are led
' aſide by the eminency and frequency of examples.'

De Foe afterwards proceeds, addreſſing himſelf to Mr. Howe; ' Sir, if you knew the author, you ' would eaſily be ſatisfied, that the reaſon of this ' preface is not that he covets to engage in contro-
' verſy with a perſon of your capacity and learning,
' being altogether unfit for ſuch a taſk, and no way
' a match to your talent that way. But he deſires,
' in the name of himſelf, and a great many honeſt
' good Chriſtians, who would be glad to ſee this
' caſe decided, that you will by yourſelf, or ſome
' other hand, as you pleaſe, declare to the world,
' whether this practice of alternate communion be ' allowed, either by your congregation in particular,
' or the Diſſenters in general. And if not ſo allowed,
' then he conjures you by the honour you owe to ' your profeſſion, and the tenderneſs you have for ' the weakneſs of others; by the regard you have to ' God's honour, and the church you ſerve; that
' ſuch proceedings may receive their due cenſure,
' though the perſons wear the gay cloaths, and the
' gold ring; that the ſincerity and purity of Diſſent-
' ing Proteſtants may be vindicated to the world,
' both in their diſcipline as well as doctrine, and
' that without reſpect of perſons. If, on the other ' hand, it be allowed, it is deſired that it may be de' fended by ſuch arguments as you think convenient;
' which the author promiſes, if deſired, never to ' reply to; or, if you give him that liberty, ſhall do
' it ſo, as you ſhall eaſily ſee is in order only to be ' informed, and always ſuitable to the reſpect which ' is due to your perſon; for whom none has a ' greater eſteem. If none of theſe requeſts ſhall be ' granted, the world muſt believe, that Diſſenters do
' allow

" with conſent of Parliament, is not inconſiſtent with a free Government [L];" " Rea-
" ſons againſt a War with France, or an Argument, ſhewing, that the French King's " owning the Prince of Wales as King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, is no ſuffi-
" cient Ground of a War [M];" and, " The Original Power of the Collective Body

'allow themſelves to practiſe what they cannot 'defend (23).'

(23) Ibid. p. 303, 304.

The ſame year Mr Howe publiſhed in 4to. an anſwer to De Foe's Preface, under the title of " Some Conſideration of a Preface to an Enquiry " concerning the Occaſional Conformity of Diſſen-" ters." In this piece Mr. Howe avoids entering regularly into the argument, but indirectly apologizes for Occaſional Conformity in the following paſſage: 'Thoſe Chriſtians that agree in all the 'eſſentials of Chriſtianity, agree in far greater things 'than it is poſſible for them to diſagree in. He muſt 'have mean and miſhapen thoughts of Chriſtian 'religion, that thinks not the great doctrines of 'Faith, ordinances of worſhip, and rules of daily 'practice (common to us all), unſpeakably more va-'luable, than this or that external mode or form of 'religion, that is but accidentally, and mutably, 'adherent thereto. And what if ſome have thought 'that alone a ſufficient reaſon for their occaſional 'communion with a church with which they have not 'conſtant communion, that they may do it, and 'themſelves, that right before the world as to te-'ſtify, they decline it not as no church, but ſo far 'practically own it, as the reaſon of the thing re-'quires: why may they not be ſuppoſed to do this, 'as thinking it a good reaſon, whether it really be 'ſo or no, without going againſt conſcience herein? 'And yet the ſame perſon may, perhaps, think the 'communion of another church preferable, and for 'ordinary reſort, rather to be choſen, as wherein he 'finds the ſame eſſence, with more regular, grateful, 'and advantageous, modes, and ways of adminiſtra-'tion (24).'

(24) Some Conſideration of a Preface, p. 12.

Mr. John Howe was a Diſſenting miniſter of eminent abilities and learning, and of an excellent character; but in his controverſy with De Foe he gained no credit. He was diſpleaſed with De Foe for having publickly introduced his name upon the ſubject, and he loſt his temper too much upon the occaſion. De Foe had at firſt addreſſed Mr. Howe in very civil terms, but finding himſelf treated roughly, and ſomewhat contemptuouſly, in Mr. Howe's " Conſiderations of a Preface," &c. he treated him leſs ceremoniouſly, and defended himſelf with great ſpirit, in " A Letter to Mr. Howe, " by way of Reply to his Conſiderations of the Pre-" face to an Enquiry into the Occaſional Conformity " of Diſſenters." In this letter he ſays to Mr. Howe,

When I addreſſed the preface to you, I thought I 'had ſo carefully reviſed both it and the book, that, 'as I mentioned to you, I could no where be taxed 'with exceeding the rules of charity and good 'manners. And though I would always make them 'both my rule, yet I thought myſelf obliged to it 'more now than ordinarily, by how much the per-'ſon to whom, and the perſons of whom I wrote, 'were equally known, and very much valued by 'me; and I did not queſtion but I ſhould either 'not be replied to at all, or it would be done with 'the charity of a Chriſtian, the civility of a gentle-'man, and the force and vigour of a ſcholar. But 'ſince it ſeems good to you, Sir, to deſcend ſo far 'below yourſelf as to quit the diſpute offered, and 'fall upon me perſonally, and to mix raillery and 'reproach with your argument, which, I am ſure, 'you know too well to think it betters the cauſe; 'you muſt blame yourſelf, Sir, for obliging me, in 'my own defence, to be a little freer with you than 'otherwiſe I ſhould have thought had become 'me (25).'

(25) Ibid. p. 324.

De Foe remarks, that Mr. Howe had written againſt him not only as an Independent, but alſo as if he had been a Fifth-monarchy-man, and a Leveller; to which he replies, 'I aſſure you I am no 'Independent, nor Fifth-monarchy-man, nor Le-'veller. You have ſhewn your learning, Sir, and 'confuted an error inconſiſtent with civil ſociety very 'well: but this had better been done by itſelf. It 'had no more relation to the caſe in hand, than a 'lecture againſt the Alcoran; and you may as well 'conjecture me to be a Mahometan, as a Fifth-mo-'narchy-man, from any thing in the book that 'looks like either. But, Sir, ſince I am led by you 'to give an account of my profeſſion, which, I hope, 'I ſhall always be ready to do, I ſhall do it in few 'words: That I am of the ſame claſs, and in the 'ſame denomination of a Diſſenter, with yourſelf, 'your office excepted, and am willing to be guided 'by, and to practiſe the great rule of Chriſtian cha-'rity, in all the proper and legal extents of it (26).'

(26) Ibid. p. 327.

Mr. Howe having intimated, that De Foe had written his piece on Occaſional Conformity in order to reflect upon Sir Thomas Abney, he ſays, in order to vindicate himſelf againſt that charge; 'Sir, the 'Enquiry was publiſhed in the mayoralty of Sir 'Humphrey Edwin, three years ago, and therefore 'could not be deſigned as a perſonal invective againſt 'the gentleman you ſpeak of; and this the preface 'told you, if you had pleaſed to read it. All that 'can be ſaid is, that the cauſe being again given, 'the reprinting it was deſigned as a reproof to the 'practice, and ſo much I own. As for perſons, I 'am indifferent; if the coat fits any body, let them 'wear it.'—'I declare myſelf, if of any party, I am, 'and ever was for the Engliſh liberty, and for the 'putting ſuch men into magiſtracy, who in con-'currence with the king, our ſupreme magiſtrate, 'would protect and preſerve that liberty. And, as 'a perſon every way qualified to execute a truſt of 'ſo much honour, whether profitable or not, I won't 'examine, I gave my vote for Sir Thomas Abney, 'and ſhould have done ſo, if I had the power of ten 'thouſand voices; and no man has more reſpect for, 'or opinion of, his honeſty and ability than myſelf. 'Nor have I, God be thanked, any occaſion to ſay 'this to flatter him; for I neither want his favour, 'nor fear his anger (27).'

(27) Ibid. p. 328, 329.

[L] An argument, ſhewing, that a ſtanding army, with conſent of Parliament, &c.] De Foe admitted, that the arguments in ſupport of a ſtanding army were only of a temporary nature; but he contended, that, in the then ſtate of public affairs, ſome troops were neceſſary to be kept up, for the ſupport of our allies, and for maintaining our conſideration in the ſcale of European power; and that this was not dangerous to liberty, if the mercenary troops kept up were not too numerous, if the militia were kept up at the ſame time, if the mercenary troops were kept up only by the authority of parliament, and no longer than the parliament ſhould think proper (28).'

(28) Ibid. p. 202—223.

[M] Reaſons againſt a War with France, &c.] De Foe very much diſapproved of the addreſſes that were preſented to king William, after the French king had given the title of king of England to the pretender, on the death of king James II. and of the great deſire which ſeemed then to be manifeſted by the nation for a war with France. He obſerved, that natural antipathies were 'no juſt ground of a 'war between nations. Nor popular opinions. Nor 'is every invaſion of right a good reaſon for a war, 'at leaſt till redreſs has firſt been demanded in a 'peaceable way (29). He remarked, that it was not his deſign to 'vindicate the honour of the 'French king, whoſe punctual obſerving of treaties 'was not reckoned among the beſt of his royal vir-'tues. But,' he added, 'I cannot agree with 'thoſe people who ſay, in their addreſſes, that his 'owning the prince of Wales, as they called him, 'to be the ſucceſſor of the late king James, is di-'rectly contrary to the ſtipulations of the treaty of 'Ryſwick. I am not writing againſt a war with 'France, provided it be on juſtifiable grounds. 'But methinks the Engliſh nation are not ſo in-'conſiderable in the world, as to fly to ſhifts and 'ſtrained conſtructions, in order to pick quarrels 'with our neighbours (30).'

(29) Ibid. p. 184, 185.

(30) Id. ibid.

He afterwards entered into an examination of the treaty of Ryſwick, and endeavoured to prove, that the French king had not been guilty of any expreſs violation of that treaty. There is not, ſays he, 'one 'word to enjoin the king of France not to continue 'the title of king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, 'to king James, or any of his poſterity, as a titular 'honour,

" of the people of England examined and afferted [N];" which he dedicated to King William [O].

At

'honour, only that he will not give or afford any 'assistance; and this assistance is explained afterwards, 'to be either of arms, ammunition, ships, provisions, 'or money; the giving them such empty titles as they 'should please themselves with was, and must justly be 'accounted a thing so trivial, that it was not thought 'worth the stipulation of a treaty. Some people are 'willing to make a constructive breach of it, and say 'this is assisting him, as it is encouraging him and his 'party. To such I hope I may have liberty to say, a 'war is not to be begun, and the blood and treasure 'of a nation exposed upon constructive breaches, but 'direct literal infractions of a treaty. And let the 'encouragement to that new-made king, and his 'drooping party, be what it will, unless the king of 'France does directly or indirectly aid or assist them 'with arms, ammunition, ships, provisions, or money, 'and thereby disturb his present majesty in the free 'possession of the kingdoms, countries, lands, or 'dominions, which he now enjoys, I see no breach of 'that treaty at all, in his complimenting the young 'gentleman in whatsoever titles he has given him-
(31) Ibid. p. 187, 188. 'self (31).'

Dr. Smollett says, that before the death of James II. 'he was visited by the French king, who seemed 'touched with his condition, and declared, that, in 'case of his death, he would own his son as king of 'England. This promise James's queen had already 'extorted from him, by the interest of madam de 'Maintenon and the dauphin. Accordingly, when 'James died, the pretended prince of Wales was pro-'claimed king of England at St. Germain's, and treated 'as such at the court of Versailles. His title was 'likewise recognized by the king of Spain, the duke 'of Savoy, and the Pope. William was no sooner 'informed of this transaction, than he dispatched a 'courier to the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the 'treaty of Ryswick, to complain of this manifest vio-'lation. At the same time, he recalled the earl of 'Manchester from Paris, and ordered him to return 'without taking an audience of leave. That noble-'man immediately withdrew, after having intimated 'to the marquis de Torcy the order he had received. 'Lewis, in vindication of his own conduct, dispersed 'through all the courts of Europe a manifesto, in 'which he affirmed, that in owning the prince of 'Wales as king of England he had not infringed any 'article of the treaty of Ryswick. He confessed, that, 'in the fourth article, he had promised that he would 'not disturb the king of Great Britain in the peaceable 'possession of his dominions; and he declared his 'intention was to observe that promise punctually. 'He observed, that his generosity would not allow 'him to abandon the prince of Wales or his family; 'that he could not refuse him a title which was due 'to him by birth; that he had more reason to com-'plain of the king of Great Britain, and the States-'General, whose declarations and preparations in fa-'vour of the emperor might be regarded as real con-'traventions to treaties: finally, he quoted some in-'stances from history, in which the children enjoyed the
(32) Hist. of England from the Revolution, vol. I. p. 395. edit. 1735. 'titles of kingdoms which their fathers had lost (32).'

De Foe says, 'If the giving titles to the late king, 'or his posterity, had been any matter considerable 'in the case, it would no doubt have been considered 'in the treaty (of Ryswick); but since it was wholly 'left out, the French king might reasonably be sup-'posed thereby to be left at liberty to call him by what 'name or title he thought fit to desire. As to the 'personal affront of the king, with all humble sub-'mission to his majesty's conduct, I only say, that I 'wish, before his majesty had recalled his ambassador, 'he had been pleased to have ordered him to demand 'satisfaction in that case; in answer to which demand 'the king of France might possibly have given his rea-'sons, and made such a declaration, as might have 'been a sufficient reparation to the honour of his 'majesty; and if not, then there had been more room 'for a public resentment than now there seems to be.' ——'If a war be necessary, it is just, and if so, why 'should we be afraid of it? if it be not so, we ought 'not to seek occasions, and make constructive breaches, 'and personal affronts, the pretences of it. The 'French are not so inconsiderable in power, that we 'should be fond of a war without reason; nor we so 'inconsiderable, that we need be afraid of a just and 'honourable war. A war, which must cost the blood 'of our countrymen, and the treasure of our inhabi-'tants, is not a thing of so little consequence as may 'be undertaken upon slight occasions; nor of so great 'consequence, that we should be afraid to enter upon 'it with just and honourable reasons (33).'
(33) De Foe's Works, vol. I. p. 188, 189.

In this piece De Foe wrote against the views and conduct of the court, and against what then seemed to be the prevailing sense of the nation. He appears, however, to have been perfectly right, to have exhibited on this occasion great political discernment, and to have been influenced by no motives but those of public spirit.

[N] The Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England, &c.] This is a piece of considerable merit, and contains a great variety of excellent political observations. Among other positions which he lays down in it are the following:

'Salus Populi suprema Lex; all government and con-'sequently our whole constitution, was originally de-'signed, and is maintained, for the support of the 'people's property, who are the governed.

'All the members of government, whether king, 'lords, or commons, if they invert the great end of 'their institution, the public good, cease to be in the 'same public capacity.

'No collective, or representative body of men what-'soever, in matters of politics any more than religion, 'are or ever have been infallible (34).'
(34) Ibid, p. 138, 139.

'The good of the people governed is the end of all 'government, and the reason and original of govern-'ment; and upon this foundation it is, that it has 'been the practice of all nations, and of this in par-'ticular, that if the mal-administration of governors 'have extended to tyranny and oppression, to de-'struction of right and justice, overthrowing the con-'stitution, and abusing the people, the people have 'thought it lawful to re-assume the right of govern-'ment into their own hands, and to reduce their gover-'nors to reason (35).'
(35) Ibid. p. 142.

De Foe also says, 'The people of England have 'delegated all the executive power in the king; the 'legislative in the king, lords, and commons; the 'sovereign judicature in the lords; the remainder is 'reserved in themselves, and not committed, no not 'to their representatives. All powers delegated are to 'one great end and purpose, and no other, and that is, 'the public good. If either or all the branches to 'whom this power is delegated, invert the design, the 'end of their power, the right they have to that power 'ceases; and they become tyrants and usurpers of a 'power they have no right to (36).'
(36) Ibid. p. 147.

'The power vested in the three heads of our con-'stitution is vested in them by the people of England, 'who were a people before there was such a thing as 'a constitution. And the nature of the thing is the 'reason of the thing: it was vested in them by the 'people, because the people were the only original of 'their power, being the only power prior to the con-'stitution.

'For the public good of the people a constitution 'and government was originally formed; from the 'mutual consent of these people the powers and au-'thorities of this constitution are derived; and for the 'preservation of this constitution, and enabling it to 'answer the ends of its constitution in the best manner 'possible, those powers were divided.'—'At the final, 'casual, or any other determination of this constitution, 'the powers are dissolved, and all authority must de-'rive de novo from the first fountain, original, and 'cause of all constitutions, the governed (37).'
(37) Ibid. p. 146

'In this universal right of the people consists our 'general safety: for, notwithstanding all the beauty 'of our constitution, and the exact symmetry of its 'parts, about which some have been so very elegant, 'this noble well-contrived system has been over-'whelmed, the government has been inverted, the 'people's liberties have been trampled on, and par-'liaments have been rendered useless and insignificant. 'And what has restored us? The last resort has been

At the beginning of the year 1701, he publiſhed his ſatire, called, " The True-born " Engliſhman

'the people; Vox Dei has been found there, not in the 'repreſentatives, but in their original the repreſented.'

'There muſt be ſome power prior to the power of 'king, lords, and commons, from which, as the 'ſtreams from the fountain, the power of king, lords, 'and commons, is derived. And what are all the 'different terms which ſtateſmen turn ſo often into fine 'words to ſerve their ends; as, Reaſons of State, Public 'Good, the Common wealth, the Engliſh Conſtitution, 'the Government, the Laws of England, the Liberties 'of England, the Fleets, the Armies, the Militia of 'England, the Trade, the Manufactures of England? 'All are but ſeveral terms drawn from, and reducible 'to the great term, the People of England. That is the 'general, which contains all the particulars, and which 'had all power before any of the particulars had a 'being. And from this conſideration it is, that ſome, 'who yet would be oppoſers of this doctrine, ſay, when 'it ſerves their turn, that all the great offices which 'have the title of England annexed to them ought to 'be nominated and approved by the people of England, 'as the high chancellor of England, high admiral of 'England, and the like (38).'

(38) Ibid. p. 144, 145.

De Foe afterwards ſays, 'I hope, I cannot offend 'any free repreſentative of the people of England in 'ſaying, that what power they have they receive from 'the people they repreſent, and that ſome powers do 'ſtill remain with the people, which they never either 'diveſted themſelves of, or committed to them. Nor 'can I be ſenſible of offending, if I ſay, that 'tis poſſible 'for even a houſe of commons to be in the wrong. 'Tis poſſible for a houſe of commons to be miſled by 'factions and parties; 'tis poſſible for them to be 'bribed by penſions and places; and by either of 'theſe extremes to betray their truſt, and abuſe the 'people who entruſt them: and if the people ſhould 'have no redreſs in ſuch a caſe, then would the nation 'be in the hazard of being ruined by their own re-'preſentatives. And 'tis a wonder to find it aſſerted, 'in a certain treatiſe, " That it is not to be ſuppoſed " that ever the houſe of commons can injure the peo-" ple who entruſt them." There can be no better 'way to demonſtrate the poſſibility of a thing, than by 'proving that it has been already. And we need go 'no farther back than to the reign of king Charles the 'Second, in which we have ſeen liſts of an hundred 'and eighty members who received private penſions 'from the court; and if any body ſhould aſk whether 'that parliament preſerved the balance of power, in 'the three branches of our conſtitution, in the due 'diſtribution ſome have mentioned, I am not afraid to 'anſwer in the negative (39).'

(39) Ibid, p. 151, 152.

'Reaſon and juſtice allow, that when all delegated 'powers fail or expire, when governors devour the 'people they ſhould protect, and when parliaments, if 'ever that unhappy time ſhall come again, ſhould be 'either deſtroyed, or, which is as bad, be corrupted, 'and betray the people they repreſent; the people 'themſelves, who are the original of all delegated 'power, have an undoubted right to defend their 'lives, liberties, properties, religion, and laws, againſt 'all manner of invaſion or treachery, be it foreign or 'domeſtic (40).'

(40) Ibid. p. 154, 155.

'The houſe of commons are our ſanctuary againſt 'the oppreſſion of princes, the nation's treaſurers, 'and the defenders of their liberties; but all theſe 'titles ſignify, that at the ſame time they are the na-'tion's ſervants. The houſe of commons alſo are 'mortal, as a houſe; a king may diſſolve them; they 'may die, and be extinct; but the power of the peo-'ple has a kind of eternity with reſpect to politic dura-'tion. Parliaments may ceaſe; but the people re-'main. For them they were originally made; by 'them they are continued and renewed; from them 'they receive their power; and to them in reaſon they 'ought to be accountable (41).'

(41) Ibid. p. 163, 164.

In this piece De Foe intimates it to have been his opinion, that, at the Revolution, all the old laws ſhould have been confirmed by the authority of the people (42); and he maintained, that the houſe of commons had no right to proceed rigorouſly againſt thoſe who petitioned them, in terms which they did not like, under any pretence of indecency of expreſſion (43). Such treatment of perſons, who had petitioned the houſe of commons in offenſive language, was juſtified by the example of the court of chancery, in caſes wherein that court ſuppoſed itſelf to be inſulted; but, ſaid De Foe, 'the freeholders of England 'ſtand in a different capacity to the members of the 'houſe, who are their truſtees, their attornies, their 'repreſentatives, from that of a complainant in chan-'cery to the judge of that court (44).'

(42) Ibid. p. 147.

(43) Ibid. p. 143.

(44) Ibid. p. 143.

De Foe did not approve of the choice of very young men to be members of the houſe of commons. He ſays, in another piece, 'Though 'tis confeſſed, that 'wiſdom makes a young man old, yet the houſe of 'commons is not a place for boys. We have ſeen too 'many young men in the houſe, and raſh counſels are 'generally the effect of young heads. Fools and boys 'would do leſs harm in the houſe, and grow wiſer by 'being there, were they but allowed to ſit, and not 'give their votes. But while a boy may do as much 'miſchief as a man, and a fool as a man of ſenſe, it 'is hard that the material parts of a nation's happineſs 'ſhould be committed either to young or weak heads '(45).'——'The houſe of commons is not a place for 'fools. The great affairs of the ſtate, the welfare of 'the kingdom, the public ſafety, the religion, liber-'ties, and trade, the wealth and honour of the nation, 'are not things to be debated by green heads. The 'ſaying we have, that the houſe of commons is a 'ſchool for ſtateſmen, is an error. In my opinion, 'they ſhould be all well-taught, and thoroughly learned 'in matters of the higheſt moment, before they come 'there (46).'

[O] Dedicated to King William.] This dedication, which deſerves to be preſerved, is as follows:

To the KING.

" Sir,

" 'TIS not the leaſt of the extraordinaries of Your Majeſty's character, that as You are King of Your people, ſo you are the people's King.

" This title as it is the moſt glorious, ſo is it the moſt indiſputable in the world.

" God himſelf appointed, the prophet proclaimed, but the people's aſſent was the finiſhing the Royal Authority of the firſt King of Iſrael.

" Your Majeſty, among all the bleſſings of your reign, has reſtored this, as the beſt of all our enjoyments, the full liberty of original right in its actings and exerciſe.

" Former reigns have invaded it, and the laſt thought it totally ſuppreſt; but, as liberty revived under Your Majeſty's juſt authority, this was the firſt flower ſhe brought forth.

" The author of theſe ſheets humbly hopes, that what Your Majeſty has ſo graciouſly reſtored, what our laws and conſtitution have declared and ſettled, and what truth and juſtice openly appear for, he may be allowed to vindicate.

" Your Majeſty knows too well the nature of govern-ment, to think it at all the leſs honourable, or the more precarious, for being devolved from, and centered in, the conſent of your people.

" The pretence of patriarchal authority, had it really an uninterrupted ſucceſſion, can never be ſupported againſt the demonſtrated practice of all nations; but being alſo diveſted of the chief ſupport it might have had, if that ſucceſſion could have been proved: The authority of governors, Jure Divino, has ſunk ignominiouſly to the ground, as a prepoſterous and inconſiſtent forgery.

" And yet, if Vox Populi be, as 'tis generally allowed, Vox Dei, Your Majeſty's right to theſe kingdoms Jure Divino is more plain than any of Your predeceſſors.

" How happy are theſe nations, after all the oppreſ-ſions and tyranny of arbitrary rulers, to obtain a King who reigns by the univerſal voice of the people, and has the greateſt ſhare in their affections that ever any Prince enjoyed, Queen Elizabeth only excepted.

" And how vain are the attempts of a neighbouring Prince, to nurſe up a contemptible impoſture, upon the pretence of forming a claim on the foundation of but a pretended ſucceſſion, againſt the conſent of the general ſuffrage of the nation.

" To what purpoſe ſhall all the proofs of his Legiti-macy be, ſuppoſing it could be made out, when the uni-verſal voice of the people already expreſſed in enacted laws, ſhall anſwer, We will not have this man to reign over us.

" May

" May this affection of Your Subjects continue to the lateſt hour of Your Life, and may Your ſatisfaction be ſuch as may convince the world, That the chiefeſt felicity of a Crown conſiſts in the affections, as the firſt authority of it derives from the conſent of the people (47)."

(47) Ibid. p. 133.

Beſides his dedication to the king, De Foe added another dedication " to the Lords Spiritual and " Temporal, and the Commons of England," in which are the following paſſages:

' My lords and gentlemen,

' The vindication of the original right of all men ' to the government of themſelves, is ſo far from a ' derogation from, that it is a confirmation of, your ' legal authority.'—' You are the conſervators of ' our liberties, the expoſitors of our laws, the levyers ' of our taxes, and the redreſſers of our grievances, ' the king's beſt counſellors, and the people's laſt ' refuge. But if you are diſſolved, for you are not ' immortal; or if you are deceived, for you are not ' infallible; 'twas never yet ſuppoſed, till very lately, ' that all power dies with you. You may die, but ' the people remain; you may be diſſolved, and all ' immediate right may ceaſe; power may have its ' intervals, and crowns their interregnum; but ori- ' ginal power endures to the ſame eternity the world ' endures to: and while there are people, there may ' be a legal authority delegated, though all ſucceſ- ' ſion of ſubſtituted power were at an end (48).'

(48) Ibid, p. 134, 136.

[P] His ſatire, called " The True-born Engliſhman."] He appears to have been induced to write this by his attachment to king William. In his Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, he ſays, ' There came out a vile, ' abhorred pamphlet, in very ill verſe, written by ' one Mr. Tutchin, and called the Foreigners; in ' which the author, who he was I then knew not, ' fell perſonally on the king himſelf, and then upon ' the Dutch nation; and after having reproached ' his majeſty with crimes, that his worſt enemy ' could not think of without horror, he ſums up all ' in the odious name of Foreigner. This filled me ' with a kind of rage againſt the book, and gave ' birth to a trifle, which I never could hope ſhould ' have met with ſo general an acceptation as it did; ' I mean, The True-born Engliſhman (49).' In the Explanatory Preface to this piece, prefixed to the edition of it publiſhed in his works, he alſo expreſſes himſelf thus: ' When I ſee the town full of ' lampoons and invectives againſt Dutchmen, only be- ' cauſe they are foreigners, and the king reproached and ' inſulted by ignorant pedants, and ballad-making ' poets, for employing foreigners, and for being a ' foreigner himſelf, I confeſs myſelf moved by it to ' remind our nation of their own original, thereby ' to let them ſee what a banter is put upon ourſelves ' in it; ſince ſpeaking of Engliſhmen ab origine, we ' are really all foreigners ourſelves. I could go on ' to prove 'tis alſo impolitic in us to diſcourage ' foreigners; ſince it is eaſy to make it appear, that ' the multitudes of foreign nations, who have taken ' ſanctuary here, have been the greateſt additions ' to the wealth and ſtrength of the nation, the ' eſſential whereof is the number of its inhabitants. ' Nor would this nation ever have arrived to the de- ' gree of wealth and glory which it now boaſts of, ' if the addition of foreign nations, both as to ma- ' nufactures and arms, had not been helpful to it.'

(49) P. 6.

Part of the character, which De Foe gives of his countrymen in the True-born Engliſhman, is contained in the following lines:

' Fierce as the Briton, as the Roman brave,
' And leſs inclin'd to conquer than to ſave;
' Eager to fight, and laviſh of their blood;
' And equally of fear and fore-caſt void.
' The Pict has made 'em ſour, the Dane moroſe,
' Falſe from the Scot, and from the Norman worſe.
' What honeſty they have, the Saxons gave them,
' And that, now they grow old, begins to leave them.
' The climate makes them terrible and bold,
' And Engliſh beef their courage does uphold.
' No danger can their daring ſpirit pall,
' Always provided that their belly 's full (50).'

(50) Works, Vol. I. p. 14.

' Chearful in labour, when they have undertook it,
' But out of humour, when they're out of pocket.
' But, if their belly and their pocket 's full,
' They may be phlegmatic, but never dull:
' And if a bottle does their brains refine,
' It makes their wit as ſparkling as their wine (51).'

(51) Ibid. p. 20.

' The meaneſt Engliſh ploughman ſtudies law,
' And keeps thereby the magiſtrates in awe;
' Will boldly tell them what they ought to do,
' And ſometimes puniſh their omiſſion too (52).'

(52) Ibid, p. 21.

Of the Females of England, De Foe expreſſes himſelf in the following terms:

' Nor ſhall my verſe the brighter ſex defame;
' For Engliſh beauty will preſerve her name.
' Beyond diſpute, agreeable and fair,
' And modeſter than other nations are:
' For where the vice prevails the great temptation
' Is want of money more than inclination.
' In general, this only is allow'd,
' They 're ſomething noiſy, and a little proud (53).'

(53) Ibid. p. 20.

Referring to the Revolution, and the abdication of king James, De Foe ſays,

' When kings the ſword of juſtice firſt lay down,
' They are no kings, though they poſſeſs the crown.
' Titles are ſhadows, crowns are empty things,
' The good of ſubjects is the end of kings:
' To guide in war, and to protect in peace:
' Where tyrants once commence, the kings do ceaſe.
' For arbitrary power's ſo ſtrange a thing,
' It makes the tyrant, and unmakes the king (54).'

(54) Ibid. p. 25.

In the following lines, De Foe refers to the treatment which the Earl of Portland, and the Duke of Schomberg received from many of the Engliſh:

' Great Portland ne'er was banter'd when he ſtrove
' For us his maſter's kindeſt thoughts to move.
' We ne'er lampoon'd his conduct when employ'd
' King James's ſecret councils to divide:
' Then we careſs'd him as the only man,
' Which could the doubtful oracle explain:
' The only Huſhai able to repel,
' The dark deſigns of our Achitophel.
' Compar'd his maſter's courage to his ſenſe,
' The ableſt ſtateſman, and the braveſt prince.
' Ten years in Engliſh ſervice he appear'd,
' And gain'd his maſter's, and the world's regard:
' But 'tis not England's cuſtom to reward.
' The wars are over, England needs him not,
' Now he 's a Dutchman, and the Lord knows what.
' Schomberg, the ableſt ſoldier of his age,
' With great Naſſau did in our cauſe engage:
' Both join'd for England's reſcue and defence,
' The greateſt captain, and the greateſt prince.
' With what applauſe his ſtories did we tell?
' Stories which Europe's volumes largely ſwell.
' We counted him an army in our aid:
' Where he commanded, no man was afraid.
' His actions with a conſtant conqueſt ſhine,
' From Villa-Vitioſa to the Rhine.
' France, Flanders, Germany, his fame confeſs,
' And all the world was fond of him, but us.
' Our turn firſt ſerv'd, we grudg'd him the command,
' Witneſs the grateful temper of the land (55).'

(55) Ibid. p. 32, 33.

The True-born Engliſhman alſo contains an high panegyric upon king William; and De Foe concludes his poem with the following lines:

' Could but our anceſtors retrieve their fate,
' And ſee their offſpring thus degenerate;
' How we contend for birth and names unknown,
' And build on their paſt actions, not our own;
' They 'd cancel records, and their tombs deface,
' And openly diſown the vile degenerate race.
' For fame of families is all a cheat;
' TIS PERSONAL VIRTUE ONLY MAKES US GREAT (56).

(56) Ibid. p. 40

[Q] Paſſed through many editions.] In the preface to the ſecond volume of his Works, he ſays, that, if he had been permitted to enjoy the profit of his own labour, he ſhould have gained more than a thouſand pounds by his True-born Engliſhman. Nine editions were printed for himſelf; beſides which, there were twelve pirated editions. Thoſe printed under his own the notice and favour of the king, by whom he was very graciouſly received, and in ſome manner employed and rewarded [S]; but of the particulars we are not informed. He afterwards publiſhed another ſatire, in verſe, entituled "Reformation of Manners [T];" and about the ſame time ſome other ſmall pieces both in verſe and in proſe. He own direction, which, as he ſays, were "fairly "printed, and on good paper," were ſold for one ſhilling each; but of the pirated editions, moſt of which were wretchedly and incorrectly printed, on a ſmall type, and bad paper, and ſometimes with large omiſſions, he ſays, that eighty thouſand were "ſold in the ſtreets for two-pence, or at a penny." But ſome of the pirated editions were better printed, and ſold at 6d. each.

De Foe's works were often pirated, which he juſtly complained of, as a great injury done to him; and it has been ſaid, that his repreſentations and remonſtrances on the injuſtice of ſuch practices were a principal cauſe of the act being paſſed, in the ninth year of the reign of queen Anne, "for the en-"couragement of learning, by veſting the copies of "printed books in the authors, or their aſſigns."

[R] Severely cenſured by ſome.] He was charged, he ſays, with abuſing the Engliſh nation, "by diſ-"covering the meanneſs of our original, in order to "make the Engliſh contemptible abroad and at "home." But in juſtification of himſelf he ſays, 'The intent of the ſatire is pointed at the vanity of 'thoſe who talk of their antiquity, and value them-'ſelves upon their pedigree, their antient families, 'and being true-born; whereas it is impoſſible we 'ſhould be true-born; and, if we could, we ſhould 'have loſt by the bargain. Theſe ſort of people, 'who call themſelves true born, and tell long ſtories 'of their families, and, like a nobleman of Venice, 'think a foreigner ought not to walk on the ſame 'ſide of the ſtreet with them, are owned to be 'meant in this ſatire. What they would infer from 'their long original, I know not; nor is it eaſy to 'make out whether they are the better or the worſe 'for their anceſtors. Our Engliſh nation may value 'themſelves for their wit, wealth, and courage, and 'I believe few nations will diſpute it with them; 'but for long originals, and antient true-born fami-'lies of Engliſh, I would adviſe them to wave the 'diſcourſe. A true Engliſhman is one that deſerves a 'character, and I have no where leſſened him, that 'I know of; but as for a true-born Engliſhman, I 'confeſs I do not underſtand him (57).'

(57) Explanatory Preface.

De Foe maintained, that the Engliſh were the better for being a mixed race: 'Had we been an un-'mixed nation,' ſays he, 'I am of opinion, that it 'had been to our diſadvantage. For to go no far-'ther, we have three nations about us as clear from 'mixtures of blood as any in the world, and I know 'not which of them I could wiſh ourſelves to be 'like; I mean the Scots, the Welch, and the Iriſh: 'and if I were to write a reverſe to the ſatire, I 'would examine all the nations of Europe, and 'prove, that thoſe nations which are moſt mixed are 'the beſt, and have leaſt of barbariſm and brutality 'among them; and abundance of reaſons might be 'given for it, too long to bring into a preface. 'But I give this hint to let the world know, that I 'am far from thinking, 'tis a ſatire upon the Engliſh 'nation to tell them, they are derived from all the 'nations under heaven; that is, from ſeveral nations. 'Nor is it meant to undervalue the original of the 'Engliſh, for we ſee no reaſon to like them the worſe, 'being the relicts of Romans, Danes, Saxons, and 'Normans, than we ſhould have done, if they had 'remained Britons; that is, than if they had been 'all Welch-men (58).'

(58) Ibid.

[S] Introduced him to the notice and favour of the King, &c.] He ſays, in his Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, 'How this poem (the true-born Engliſhman) 'was the occaſion of my being known to his majeſty; 'how I was afterwards received by him; how em-'ployed; and how, above my capacity of deſerving, 'rewarded, is no part of the preſent caſe; and is 'only mentioned here, as I take all occaſions to do, 'for the expreſſing the honour I ever preſerved for 'the immortal and glorious memory of that greateſt 'and beſt of princes, and whom it was my honour 'and advantage to call maſter as well as ſovereign; 'whoſe goodneſs to me I never forgot, neither can 'forget; and whoſe memory I never patiently heard 'abuſed, nor ever can do ſo; and who, had he lived, 'would never have ſuffered me to be treated as I 'have been in the world (59).'

(59) P. 6, 7.

[T] Reformation of Manners.] This poem is divided into two parts, and is a ſatire on the vices of the age; but it contains too much perſonality, and too much bitterneſs of invective. The ſeverity, however, with which De Foe ſpeaks of the ſlave-trade, in the following lines, deſerves no cenſure:

'Some fit out ſhips, and double freight enſure,
'And burn the ſhips to make the voyage ſecure;
'Promiſcuous plunders thro' the world commit,
'And with the money buy their ſafe retreat.
'Others ſeek out to Africk's Torrid Zone,
'And ſearch the burning ſhores of Serralone:
'There in unſufferable heats they fry,
'And run vaſt riſks to ſee the gold, and die.
'The harmleſs natives baſely they trepan,
'And barter baubles for the ſouls of men.
'The wretches they to Chriſtian climes bring o'er,
'To ſerve worſe Heathens than they did before.
'The cruelties they ſuffer there are ſuch,
'Amboyna's nothing, they 've out-done the Dutch.
'Cortez, Pizarro, Guzman, Penaloe,
'Who drank the blood and gold of Mexico,
'Who thirteen millions of ſouls deſtroyed,
'And left one third of God's creation void,
'By birth for Nature's butchery deſign'd,
'Compar'd to theſe are merciful and kind.
'Death could their crueleſt deſigns fulfil,
'Blood quench'd their thirſt, and it ſufficed to kill;
'But theſe the tender coup-de-grace deny,
'And make men beg in vain for leave to die;
'To more than Spaniſh cruelty inclin'd,
'Torment the body, and debauch the mind;
'The ling'ring life of ſlavery preſerve,
'And vilely teach them both to ſin and ſerve.
'In vain they talk to them of ſhades below,
'They fear no Hell but where ſuch Chriſtians go.
'Of Jeſus Chriſt they very often hear,
'Often as his blaſpheming ſervants ſwear:
'They hear and wonder what ſtrange Gods they be,
'Can bear with patience ſuch indignity.
'They look for famines, plagues, diſeaſe, and death,
'Blaſts from above, and earthquakes from beneath.
'But when they ſee regardleſs Heaven looks on,
'They curſe our Gods, or think that we have none (60).'

This poem alſo contains the following lines in praiſe of virtue:

'Virtue's a native rectitude of mind,
'Vice the degeneracy of human kind.
'Virtue is wiſdom ſolid and divine:
'Vice is all fool without, and knave within.
'Virtue is honour circumſcribed by grace;
'Vice is made up of every thing that's baſe.
'Virtue has ſecret charms which all men love, appears also to have been the author of the Memorial, presented to the House of Commons in 1701 (k), commonly called "The Legion Letter [U]."

After the death of King William, he published a poem, entituled, "The Mock-Mourners, a Satire, by way of Elegy on King William [W]." Besides doing honour to the memory

[U] Commonly called the Legion Letter.] Towards the close of the reign of King William, when the Tories had acquired a considerable ascendancy in the House of Commons, Lord Somers and some other of the Whig ministers were impeached; and such other opposition was made by the House to the King's measures, as seemed at that period to give general offence to the nation. In consequence of this dissatisfaction, a petition, signed by the deputy lieutenants, above twenty justices of the peace, the grand jury, and freeholders of the county of Kent, was presented to the House of Commons on the 18th of May, 1701, by five gentlemen of fortune and distinction. In this petition the House of Commons were earnestly exhorted to have a regard to the voice of the people, and sincerely to endeavour to answer the great trust reposed in them by their country. But this petition gave such umbrage to the House, that they voted, very absurdly, 'That 'the said petition was scandalous, insolent, and seditious, tending to destroy the constitution of Parliaments, and to subvert the established government of these realms (62);' and all the gentlemen who presented the petition were imprisoned in the Gate-house, Westminster. This violent and unconstitutional measure justly excited a great alarm throughout the nation, and gave rise to what was called "The Legion Letter," but which was entituled, "A Memorial from "the Gentlemen, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of "the Counties of ——, in Behalf of themselves and "many Thousands of the good People of England, to "the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament "assembled." This Memorial appears to have been written by De Foe, and is said to have been presented by himself, disguised in women's apparel, to the Speaker of the House of Commons (63). In this memorial, among other passages addressed to the House of Commons, are the following: 'Though there are no 'stated proceedings to bring you to your duty, yet 'the great law of reason says, and all nations allow, 'that whatever power is above law is burthensome and 'tyrannical, and may be reduced by extrajudicial 'methods. You are not above the people's resentments. They that made you members may reduce 'you to the same rank from whence they chose you; 'and may give you a taste of their abused kindness, 'in terms you may not be pleased with.

'To imprison men who are not your own members, 'by no proceedings but a vote of your House, and 'to continue them in custody sine die, is illegal, a 'notorious breach of the liberty of the people, setting 'up a dispensing power in the House of Commons 'which your fathers never pretended to; bidding defiance to the Habeas Corpus act, which is the bulwark of personal liberty; destructive of the laws, and 'betraying the trust reposed in you.

'Committing to custody those gentlemen who, at 'the command of the people (whose servants you are) 'came in a peaceable way to put you in mind of your 'duty, is illegal and injurious; destructive of the 'subject's liberty of petitioning for redress of grievances, which has, by all Parliaments before you, 'been acknowledged to be their undoubted right.

'Voting a petition from the gentlemen of Kent insolent, is ridiculous and impertinent; because the 'freeholders of England are your superiors; and is a 'contradiction in itself, and a contempt of the English 'freedom, and contrary to the nature of parliamentary 'power.

'We do hereby claim and declare,

'That it is the undoubted right of the people of 'England, in case their representatives in Parliament 'do not proceed according to their duty, and the 'people's interest, to inform them of their dislike, 'disown their actions, and to direct them to such 'things as they think fit, either by petition, address, 'proposal, memorial, or any other peaceable way.

'That the House of Commons, separately, and otherwise than by bill legally passed into an act, have no 'legal power to suspend, or dispense with, the laws 'of the land, any more than the King has by his prerogative:

'That the House of Commons have no legal power 'to imprison any person, or commit them to the 'custody of serjeants, or otherwise, (their own members excepted), but ought to address the King to cause 'any person, on good grounds, to be apprehended: 'which person so apprehended ought to have the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act, and be fairly brought 'to trial by due course of law:

'That if the House of Commons, in breach of the 'laws and liberties of the people, do betray the trust 'reposed in them, and act negligently, arbitrarily, 'and illegally, it is the undoubted right of the people of England to call them to an account for the 'same; and by convention, assembly, or force, they 'may proceed against them as traitors and betrayers of 'their country.

'These things we think proper to declare, as the 'undoubted right of the people of England, whom 'you serve. And in pursuance of that right (avoiding 'the ceremony of petitioning our inferiors, for such 'you are by your present circumstances, as the person 'sent is less than the sender), we do publickly protest 'against all your aforesaid actions.' The Memorial ended with the following words: 'Englishmen are no 'more to be Slaves to Parliaments than to Kings.

'Our name is LEGION,
'And we are MANY.'

The following Postscript was subjoined. 'If you 'require to have this Memorial signed with our names, 'it shall be done on your first orders, and personally 'presented (64).'

[W] The Mock-Mourners, &c.] This poem begins with the following lines:

'Such has been this ill-natur'd nation's fate,
'Always to see their friends and foes too late;
'By native pride and want of temper led,
'Never to value merit till 'tis dead:
'And then immortal monuments they raise,
'And damn their former follies by their praise (65).'

Part of the character given by him of King William is contained in the following lines, which are supposed to be spoken by Britannia:

'Of British blood, in Belgian plains he liv'd,
'My only foreign offspring that surviv'd.
'Batavian climates nourish'd him a while,
'Too great a genius for so damp a soil:
'And freely then surrender'd him to me;
'For wise men freely will the fates obey.
'Yet in my William they had equal share,
'And he defended them with equal care.
'They were the early trophies of his sword,
'His infant hand their liberty restor'd.
'His nurse, the Belgick lion, roar'd for aid,
'And planted early laurels on his head.
'His easy victories amaz'd mankind;
'We wonder'd what the dreadful youth design'd.
'Fearless he fought, his country to set free,
'And with his sword cut out their liberty.
'The journals of his actions always seem'd
'So wonderful, as if the world had dream'd;
'So swift, so full of terror he went on,
'He was a conqueror before a man.
'The Bourbon sword, though it was brighter far,
'Yet drawn for conquest, and oppressive war,
'Had all the triumphs of the world engross'd,
'But quickly all those triumphs to him lost.
'Justice to William early trophies brought;
'William for Truth and Justice always fought.'
'The greatest Captains of the ages past
'Debauch'd their fame with cruelty at last:
'William the Tyrants only would subdue;
'These conquer'd Kings, and then the People too.
'The subjects reap'd no profit for their pains,
'And only chang'd their masters, not their chains.
'Their victories did for themselves appear,
'And made their peace as dreadful as the war:

memory of the late King, this piece was intended to satirize those persons who had been violent opposers of that Prince, and his Administration, while he was living, and yet affected a great respect for him after he was dead. About the end of the year 1702, he published, in 4to; "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters: or, Proposals for the "Establishment of the Church." This was an ironical performance, by which he intended to expose the bigotry, uncharitableness, and rancour of the High Church party [X], and

'But William fought oppression to destroy,
'That mankind might in peace the world enjoy.
'The Pompeys, Cæsars, Scipios, Alexanders,
'Who crowd the world with fame, were great com'manders.
'These too brought blood and ruin with their arms;
'But William always fought on other terms.
'Terror, indeed, might in his front appear,
'But peace and plenty follow'd in his rear:
'And, if oppression forc'd him to contend,
'Calmness was all his temper, Peace his end (66).'

[X] An ironical performance, by which he intended to expose the bigotry, &c.] In this piece, in which De Foe throughout speaks in the character of a High Churchman, are the following passages: 'It is now 'near fourteen years that the glory and peace of the 'purest and most flourishing Church in the world has 'been eclipsed, buffetted, and disturbed, by a sort of 'men, whom God in his providence has suffered to in-'sult over her and bring her down. These have been 'the days of her humiliation and tribulation. She 'has borne with an invincible patience the reproach 'of the wicked, and God has at last heard her prayers, 'and delivered her from the oppression of the stranger '(67).'

(67) De Foe's Works, vol. I. p. 425.

'Had King James sent all the Puritans in England 'away to the West Indies, we had been a national, 'unmixed Church; the Church of England had been 'kept undivided and entire. To requite the lenity of 'the father, they take up arms against the son; con-'quer, pursue, take, imprison, and at last put to 'death, the Anointed of God, and destroy the very 'being and nature of government, setting up a sordid 'impostor, who had neither title to govern, nor un-'derstanding to manage, but supplied that want with 'power, bloody and desperate councils, and craft, 'without conscience (68).'

(68) Ibid. p. 427.

'And to prevent the distant cloud, which they per-'ceived to hang over their heads from England, with 'a true Presbyterian policy, they put in for a union 'of nations, that England might unite their Church 'with the Kirk of Scotland, and their Presbyterian 'members sit in our House of Commons, and their 'Assembly of Scotch canting Long-cloaks in our con-'vocation. What might have been, if our fanatic 'Whiggish statesmen had continued, God only knows; 'but we hope we are out of fear of that now (69).'

'Let us examine the reasons they pretend to give, 'why we should be favourable to them; why we 'should continue and tolerate them among us.—They 'are very numerous, they say. They are a great 'part of the nation, and we cannot suppress them. 'To this it may be answered, 1. They are not so 'numerous as the Protestants in France, and yet the 'French king effectually cleared the nation of them 'at once, and we don't find that he misses them at 'home. —— 2dly. The more numerous the more 'dangerous, and therefore the more need to suppress 'them; and God has suffered us to bear them as 'goads in our sides, for not utterly extinguishing 'them long ago. —— 3dly. If we are to allow them, 'only because we cannot suppress them, then it ought 'to be tried whether we can or no; and I am of 'opinion, that 'tis easy to be done, and could pre-'scribe ways and means, if it were proper; but I 'doubt not that the government will find effectual 'methods for the rooting the contagion from the face 'of the land.

He afterwards remarked, that it had been objected, that the Queen had promised to continue the Dissenters in their tolerated liberty, and had said, that she would be a religious observer of her word. But to this he replies, still keeping up the character of a High Churchman: 'What her majesty will do, we cannot 'help; but what, as the head of the Church, she 'ought to do, is another case. Her Majesty has pro-'mised to protect and defend the Church of England; 'and, if she cannot effectually do that without the de-'struction of the Dissenters, she must of course dis-'pense with one promise to comply with another.

'Perhaps it may be said, that the Church is in no 'immediate danger from the Dissenters, and there-'fore it is time enough. But this is a weak answer. 'For, first, if a danger be real, the distance of it is no 'argument against, but rather a spur to quicken us 'to prevention, lest it should be too late hereafter. 'And, secondly, here is the opportunity, and the 'only one that ever the church had to secure 'herself and destroy her enemies. The representa-'tives of the nation have now an opportunity: the 'time is come which all good men have wished for, 'that the gentlemen of England may serve the 'Church of England, now they are protected and 'encouraged by a Church of England Queen. What 'will you do for your sister, in the day that she shall be 'spoken for? If ever you will establish the best Chri-'stian Church in the world; if ever you will suppress 'the spirit of Enthusiasm; if ever you will free the 'nation from the viperous brood that have so long 'sucked the blood of their mother; if ever you will 'leave your posterity free from faction and rebellion; 'this is the time. This is the time to pull up this 'heretical weed of sedition, that has so long disturbed 'the peace of our Church, and poisoned the good 'corn.

'But, says another hot and cold objector, this is 'renewing fire and faggot, reviving the Act de hæretico 'comburendo. This will be cruelty in its nature, and 'barbarity to all the world. I answer, 'Tis cruelty 'to kill a snake or a toad in cold blood; but the poi-'son of their nature makes it a charity to our neigh-'bours to destroy those creatures; not for any per-'sonal injury received, but for prevention; not for 'the evil they have done, but the evil they may do. Ser-'pents, toads, vipers, &c. are noxious to the body, and 'poison sensitive life; these poison the soul, corrupt 'our posterity, ensnare our children, destroy the vitals of 'our happiness, our future felicity, and contaminate the 'whole mass. Shall any law be given to such wild 'creatures? Some beasts are for sport, and the hunts-'men give them advantages of ground; but some are 'knocked on the head by all possible ways of violence 'and surprize. I do not prescribe fire and faggot, 'but, as Scipio said of Carthage, Delenda est Carthago. 'They are to be rooted out of this nation, if ever we 'will live in peace, serve God, or enjoy our own. As 'for the manner, I leave it to those hands who have 'a right to execute God's justice on the nation's and 'the Church's enemies (71).'

(71) Ibid. p. 433. 434, 435.

'How many millions of future souls we save from 'infection and delusion, if the present race of poi-'soned spirits were purged from the face of the land. 'Tis vain to trifle in this matter; the light foolish 'handling of them by mulcts, fines, &c. is their glory 'and their advantage: if the gallows instead of the 'counter, and the gallies instead of the fines, were the re-'ward of going to a conventicle to preach or hear, there 'would not be so many sufferers. The spirit of 'martyrdom is over. They that will go to church, 'to be chosen sheriffs and mayors, would go to forty 'churches rather than be hanged. If one severe law 'were made, and punctually executed, that whoever and to ſhew the lengths to which ſome of them were inclined to proceed againſt the Diſſenters, after the acceſſion of Queen Anne [Y]. But his irony was not univerſally underſtood, and the deſign of his pamphlet was miſtaken even by ſome of the Diſſenters [Z]. The leaders, however, of the High Church party ſufficiently comprehended the intention of De Foe's piece; and, by their influence, a proſecution was commenced againſt him, and a proclamation publiſhed in the Gazette, offering a reward of fifty pounds for his apprehenſion [AA]. Complaint was alſo made of De Foe's publication in the Houſe of Commons; and ſome paſſages in it being read, it was reſolved, on the 25th of February, 1702-3, that the book was full of falſe and ſcandalous reflections on the Parliament, tending to promote ſedition; and it was ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, on the day following, in New Palace Yard (l). When De Foe found with how much rigour himſelf and his pamphlet were about to be treated, he at firſt ſecreted himſelf; but his printer and bookſeller being taken into cuſtody, he ſurrendered himſelf, being reſolved, as he expreſſes it, "to throw himſelf upon the favour of government, "rather than that others ſhould be ruined for his miſtakes (m)." He was at length brought to a trial, in July, 1703; and acknowledging the piece to be written by him, he was found guilty by the jury of compoſing and publiſhing a ſeditious libel, and was ſentenced to be impriſoned, to ſtand in the pillory, [BB] to pay a fine of two hundred marks, and to find ſureties for his good behaviour for ſeven years. This, for ſuch a publication, was a very infamous ſentence, and reflected much more diſhonour upon the Court by which it was pronounced, than upon De Foe on whom it was inflicted. He endured the pillory with great fortitude [CC]; and ſoon after publiſhed a poem in 4to, called,

(72) Ibid. p. 436.

[Y] Inclined to proceed againſt the Diſſenters, after the acceſſion of Queen Anne.] Dr. Smollett remarks, that, at this period, 'The Tories affected to diſtinguiſh 'themſelves as the only true friends to the Church and 'monarchy; and they hated the Diſſenters with a 'mixture of ſpiritual and political diſguſt. They 'looked upon theſe laſt as an intruding ſect, which 'conſtituted great part of the Whig Faction that ex'torted ſuch immenſe ſums of money from the nation 'in the late reign, and involved it in pernicious en'gagements, from whence it had no proſpect of de'liverance. They conſidered them as encroaching 'ſchiſmatics that diſgraced and endangered the hier'archy; and thoſe of their own communion who re'commended moderation, they branded with the epi'thets of lukewarm Chriſtians, betrayers, and apo'ſtates. They now reſolved to approve themſelves 'zealous ſons of the Church, by ſeizing the firſt op'portunity that was in their power to diſtreſs the 'Diſſenters. In order to pave the way to this per'ſecution, ſermons were preached, and pamphlets were 'printed, to blacken the character of the ſect, and 'enflame the popular reſentment againſt them (73).'

(73) Hiſtory of England, from the Revolution, vol. I. p. 442.

Mr. Cunningham ſays, 'At that time ſome of the 'clergy, whoſe numbers ſtill encreaſed, exerted the 'utmoſt of their eloquence in preaching not only 'againſt the Diſſenters, the Whigs, and the Miniſtry, 'but even againſt the Queen herſelf, and the prin'ciples of moderation. They alſo expatiated at large 'in their ſermons to the people upon the old princi'ples of Cromwell's time, and the dire misfortunes 'of King Charles; and he who inveighed the moſt 'bitterly, and filled his flock with the moſt dreadful 'apprehenſions, was the moſt highly applauded by 'his party (74).'

(74) Hiſtory of Great Britain, from the Revolution, &c. vol. I. p. 319, 320.

[Z] His irony was not univerſally underſtood.] De Foe had imitated the language of ſome of the High Churchmen ſo well, that many perſons thought the piece to be written ſeriouſly; and when he found, that he was not only miſunderſtood, but that a proſecution was commenced againſt his printer and bookſeller, he publiſhed, "A brief Explanation of a late Pamphlet, "entituled, The Shorteſt Way with the Diſſenters." In this piece he ſays, 'The author profeſſes he 'thought, when he wrote the book, he ſhould never 'need to come to an explication, and wonders to find 'that there ſhould be any reaſon for it. If any man 'take the pains to reflect ſeriouſly upon the contents, 'the nature of the thing, and the manner of the 'ſtyle, it ſeems impoſſible to imagine, that it ſhould 'paſs for any thing but a banter upon the high-flying 'Churchmen (75).' As to thoſe Diſſenters who were of opinion, that his book was written with a deſign "to have all the Diſſenters hanged, baniſhed, or de"ſtroyed, and that the gallows and the gallies ſhould "be the penalty of going to a conventicle," they forget, ſays he, "that, at the ſame time, I muſt de"ſign to have my father, my wife, ſix innocent "children, and myſelf, put into the ſame condition. "All the fault I can find in myſelf as to theſe people "is, that, when I had drawn the picture, I did not, "like the Dutchman, with his man and bear, write "under them, This is the Man, and This is the Bear, "leſt the people ſhould miſtake me. I confeſs, I did "not foreſee an occaſion for this, and having, in 'compliment to their judgments, ſhunned ſo ſharp "a reflection upon their ſenſes, I have left them at "liberty to treat me like one that puts a value upon "their penetration at the expence of my own (76)."

'St. James's. Jan. 10, 1702-3.

'Whereas Daniel De Foe, alias De Fooe, is 'charged with writing a ſcandalous and ſeditious 'pamphlet, entituled "The Shorteſt Way with the 'Diſſenters:" he is a middle-ſized ſpare man, 'about 40 years old, of a brown complexion, and 'dark-brown coloured hair, but wears a wig, a 'hooked noſe, a ſharp chin, grey eyes, and a large 'mole near his mouth; was born in London, and 'for many years was a hoſe-factor, in Freeman's-'yard, in Cornhill, and now is owner of the brick 'and pantile works near Tilbury-fort in Eſſex: 'whoever ſhall diſcover the ſaid Daniel De Foe, to 'one of her Majeſty's principal Secretaries of State, 'or any of her Majeſty's Juſtices of Peace, ſo as 'he may be apprehended, ſhall have a reward of '£ 50, which her Majeſty has ordered immediately 'to be paid upon ſuch diſcovery (77).'

[BB] Was ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory.] Whether De Foe ſtood more than once in the pillory, we have met with no account; but it appears from the Trial of John Tutchin, in 1704, for writing and publiſhing the Obſervator, printed in the State Trials, that De Foe was ſentenced to ſtand three times in the pillory. It is there ſaid, that Daniel De Foe 'was indicted, 'on the 24th of February, in the firſt year of the 'Queen, before the Juſtices of Oyer and Terminer, 'at the Old Bailey, London; and that in July follow'ing he was convicted upon his own confeſſion, for 'compoſing and publiſhing a ſeditious libel, entituled, 'The Shorteſt Way with the Diſſenters; or, Propoſals for 'the Eſtabliſhment of the Church;' and that the judge'ment againſt him was, 'to pay a fine of 200 marks, 'and to ſtand three times in the pillory, and to find 'ſecurity for his good behaviour for ſeven years (78).'

[CC] He endured the pillory with great fortitude.] It ſeems to have been with ſome reference to the firmneſs called, " A Hymn to the Pillory [DD];" and ſome time after, " An Elegy on the Author of the True-born Engliſhman [EE];" in the preface to which he ſtates himſelf as being " metaphorically dead," on account of his being compelled to give ſecurity for his good behaviour for ſeven years. " If being tied," ſays he, " under ſureties and " penalties not to write, at leaſt not to write what ſome people may not like, be not " equivalent to being dead, as to the pen, I know not what is (n)."

(n) De Foe's Works, vol. II. p. 66.

During his confinement, being repeatedly attacked in the publications of the times, he defended himſelf with great ſpirit; and in one of his pieces he ſays, " I have not been " a man of vice; and whatever malice may have the ill-nature to ſuggeſt, I venture to " ſay, without pride, no man can charge me with it (o)." Before the cloſe of the year 1703, he publiſhed ſome of his pieces together, in one volume, 8vo. under the title of " A true Collection of the Writings of the Author of the True born Engliſhman. with which De Foe behaved on this occaſion, that Pope ſays, in his Dunciad,

(79) Dunciad, Book ii. l. 147.

Earleſs on high ſtood unabaſh'd De Foe (79).

In truth, De Foe had leſs reaſon to be aſhamed than thoſe who had placed ſo ingenious a man in ſuch a ſituation, on ſo contemptible a charge; and, indeed, the pillory for ſuch offences appears to be a relick of the Star-chamber, and is not ſuited to the manners of any liberal or enlightened age. It is a ſpecies of puniſhment that ought to be inflicted only for actions that are really infamous.

(80) Book I. l. 103. Book II. l. 415.

Pope has introduced De Foe into one or two other places in his Dunciad (80). But De Foe had no juſt claim to a place either in the pillory, or in the Dunciad; nor did Pope do himſelf any credit by his introduction of him into the latter. It is only one of thoſe inſtances of injuſtice and malignity which too frequently occur in the Dunciad.

[DD] A Hymn to the Pillory.] In this piece, addreſſing the Pillory, he ſays,

' Men that are men in thee can feel no pain,
' And all thy inſignificants diſdain.
' Contempt, that falſe new word for ſhame,
' Is without crime an empty name:
' A ſhadow to amuſe mankind,
' But never frights the wiſe or well-fix'd mind.
' Virtue deſpiſes human ſcorn,
' And ſcandals innocence adorn.'

Referring to a deſign, that he intimates was at one time formed, of putting Selden in the pillory, probably for his Hiſtory of Tythes, he ſays,

' Even the learned Selden ſaw
' A proſpect of thee thro' the law.
' He had thy lofty pinnacles in view,
' But ſo much honour never was thy due.
' Had the great Selden triumph'd on thy ſtage,
' Selden the honour of his age;
' No man would ever ſhun thee more,
' Or grudge to ſtand where Selden ſtood before.'

The poem ends with the following lines, referring to himſelf:

' Tell them, the men that plac'd him here
' Are ſcandals to the times,
' Are at a loſs to find his guilt,
' And can't commit his crimes (81).'

(81) Works, vol. II. p. 102, 103, 117.

[EE] An Elegy on the Author of the True-born Engliſhman.] In this piece are the following lines:

' I laugh at all the anger of mankind,
' Who, loth to bear the Truth, my pen confined.
' I ſmile at human policy, who always ſtop that mouth whoſe words they can't deny.
' Yet let them not their crimes conceal,
' New ſatires will their crimes reveal.
' More poets from my monument ſhall riſe,
' Who ſhall like me their power deſpiſe;
' Who ſhall condemn a vicious court,
' And make the nation's knaves the nation's ſport (82).'

(82) Works, vol. II. p. 71.

' Why am I doom'd to write no more,
' If ſomething wa'n't too true I wrote before?
' Why ſhould they thus deny
' To let me write my truer hiſtory?
' Why ſeven long years of ſilence now impoſe,
' If I had nothing to diſcloſe,
' Nothing to make appear,
' Nothing to ſay they cannot bear to hear (83)?'

(83) Ibid. p. 86. 87.

He expreſſes in this poem his regret, that he did not make a more vigorous defence at his trial, but, by the advice of his lawyers, had readily acknowledged the publication of the piece with which he was charged, which was conſidered as pleading guilty. He ſays,

' Law is a great machine of ſtate,
' With hooks and ſcrews to make it operate;
' Which, as they are wound up by art,
' With eaſe perform the fatal part;
' Exactly anſwer to the workman's ſkill,
' This way 'twill work to ſave, or that to kill.
' Crime in this management has no concern,
' No man can right from wrong diſcern,
' The movement is ſo ſubtile and ſo ſure,
' And does ſuch certain fate procure.
' The mathematics are in vain,
' Defenſive ſtudy uſeleſs does remain.
' This monſter whom it pleaſes will devour,
' For law is but a Heathen word for power:
' A metaphor, invented to confeſs
' The methods by which men oppreſs;
' By which with ſafety they deſtroy mankind,
' While Juſtice ſtands before, and Fraud behind.
' Thouſands of little wheels, and unſeen parts
' Of perjur'd promiſes, and wheedling arts,
' This mighty thing compoſe,
' And no man half its crooked turnings knows.
' The wild meanders none can trace,
' And no man knows it by its face.
' It learns to change with every turn of times,
' And rings the time 'tis ſet to, like the chimes.
' I that did on fair quarter yield,
' Laid down my arms, and left the field,
' Did from my own defence withdraw,
' Thinking that Honeſty was Law,
' Have loſt my rhiming life by this deceit,
' And I deſerve it for my want of wit.
' Had I remember'd days of yore,
' When we complain'd of arbitrary power,
' When lawyers were the tools of ſtate,
' And hurried men to haſty fate;
' When the great engine was ſcrew'd up too high,
' And men were hang'd they know not why;
' Had I remember'd Scroggs's fame, {fame;
' And known that lawyers are in every reign the
' I ne'er had ventur'd to believe,
' Men whoſe profeſſion's to deceive.
' Memento Mori here I ſtand,
' With ſilent lips, but ſpeaking hand,
' A walking ſhadow of a poet,
' But bound to hold my tongue, and never ſhow it;
' A monument of injury,
' A ſacrifice to legal tyranny.
' I beckon to mankind to have a care,
' And pointing, tell how I was loſt, and where.
' I ſhow the dangerous ſhore,
' Where I have ſuffer'd ſhipwreck juſt before.
' If among poets there remains a fool,
' That ſcorns to take this notice for a rule,
' But ventures the fidelity
' Of thoſe whoſe trade and cuſtom 'tis to lie,
' Let men no pity to him ſhow,
' Let him to Bedlam, not to Newgate, go (84).'

[FF] A true Collection of the Writings of the Author of the True-born Engliſhman.] He ſays, in his Preface, that he had been induced to print this Collection, becauſe a piratical printer, and a bookſeller of the ſame claſs,

Vandergucht, from a painting of Taverner. Early in the following year, he commenced a new publication, entitled, "The Review," of which Mr. Chalmers has given the following account: 'This is a periodical paper in quarto, which was firſt publiſhed 'on the 19th of February, 1703-4; and which was intended to treat of news, foreign 'and domeſtic; of politics, Britiſh and European; of trade, particular and univerſal. 'But our author foreſaw, from "the natural averſion of the age to any tedious affair," 'that, however profitable, the world would never read, if it were not diverting. With 'this deſign, both inſtructive and amuſing, he ſkilfully inſtitutes a Scandal Club, which 'diſcuſſes queſtions in divinity, morals, war, trade, language, poetry, love, marriage, 'drunkenneſs, and gaming. Thus, it is eaſy to ſee, that The Review pointed the way 'to the Tatlers, Spectators, and Guardians, which may be allowed however to have 'treated thoſe intereſting topics with more delicacy of humour, more terſeneſs of ſtyle, 'and greater depth of learning: yet has De Foe many paſſages, both of proſe and poetry, 'which, for refinement of wit, neatneſs of expreſſion, and efficacy of moral, would do 'honour either to Steele or to Addiſon.'——'The Review began to be publiſhed on 'the 19th of February, 1703-4, every Saturday and Tueſday, till the 24th of March, '1705, when it was publiſhed alſo on Thurſday. Thus it continued to be publiſhed 'every Tueſday, Thurſday, and Saturday, till May, 1713, when it was diſcontinued. 'The whole Collection forms nine thick volumes in quarto; but, from the inquiries 'which I have made, I doubt whether a complete ſet of De Foe's Reviews any where 'exiſts (p).'

(p) Life of De Foe, p. 21, 22; 72, 73.

De Foe continued in Newgate about ſix months after the commencement of the Review; but was releaſed from his impriſonment, in Auguſt, 1704, by the interpoſition of Mr. Harley, then ſecretary of ſtate [GG], who appears not to have been inſenſible of the merit of De Foe, and probably thought that he might render his talents ſubſervient to ſome of his own political views. Queen Anne herſelf alſo ſeems to have been convinced of the injuſtice of his ſentence [HH]; for ſhe inquired into his circumſtances, and ſent, claſs, had joined together to publiſh a volume of pieces under his name, ſome of which were not his, and thoſe which were, very erroneouſly printed.

Among the pieces in this pirated edition, one was, "The Shorteſt Way with the Diſſenters;" and referring to this publication, De Foe ſays, "It ſeems "a little hard, that I ſhould ſuffer for printing a "book, and another print it in the face of the go-"vernment to get money by it."

The pieces contained in this Collection, in De Foe's own edition, are the following:

1. The True-born Engliſhman, a ſatire.
2. The Mock-Mourners, a ſatire.
3. Reformation of Manners, a ſatire.
4. The Character of Dr. Samuel Anneſley, by way of Elegy.
5. The Spaniſh Deſcent, a poem.
6. The Freeholder's Plea againſt Stock-jobbing Members of Parliament.
7. Reaſons againſt a War with France, &c.
8. An Argument ſhewing, that a Standing Army, with Conſent of Parliament, is not inconſiſtent with a Free Government.
9. The Danger of the Proteſtant Religion, from the preſent Proſpect of a religious War in Europe.
10. The Villainy of Stock-jobbers detected, and the Cauſes of the late Run upon the Bank, and Bankers, diſcovered and conſidered.
11. The ſix diſtinguiſhing Characters of a Parliament-man.
12. The poor Man's Plea.
13. An Enquiry into the Occaſional Conformity of Diſſenters, in Caſes of Preferment, with a Preface to Mr. Howe.
14. A Letter to Mr. Howe, by way of Reply to his Conſideration of the Preface to an Enquiry into the Occaſional Conformity of Diſſenters.
15. The two great Queſtions conſidered. Firſt, What the French king will do with reſpect to the Spaniſh Monarchy? Second, What Meaſures the Engliſh ought to take?
16. The two great Queſtions farther conſidered, with ſome Reply to the Remarks.
17. An Enquiry into Occaſional Conformity, ſhewing that the Diſſenters are no ways concerned in it.
18. A New Teſt of the Church of England's Loyalty, or Whiggiſh Loyalty and Church Loyalty compared.
19. The Shorteſt Way with the Diſſenters, or Propoſals for the Eſtabliſhment of the Church.
20. A brief Explanation of a late Pamphlet, entituled, The Shorteſt Way with the Diſſenters.
21. The Shorteſt Way to Peace and Union.

A ſecond edition of this Volume, with ſome additions, was publiſhed by De Foe in 1705.

[GG] By the interpoſition of Mr. Harley.] Of Mr. Harley's interference in his favour, we have the following account from De Foe himſelf: 'While I lay 'friendleſs and diſtreſſed,' ſays he, 'in the priſon 'of Newgate, my family ruined, and myſelf without hope of deliverance, a meſſage was brought 'me from a perſon of honour, who, till that time, 'I never had the leaſt acquaintance with, or knowledge of, other than by fame, or by ſight, as we 'know men of quality by ſeeing them on public occaſions. I gave no preſent anſwer to the perſon 'who brought it, having not duly weighed the import of the meſſage. The meſſage was by word 'of mouth, thus: Pray aſk that gentleman what I can 'do for him? But in return to this kind and generous 'meſſage, I immediately took my pen and ink, and 'wrote the ſtory of the blind man in the Goſpel, who 'followed our Saviour, and to whom our bleſſed 'Lord put the queſtion, What wilt thou that I ſhall 'do unto thee? Who, as if he had made it ſtrange 'that ſuch a queſtion ſhould be aſked, or, as if he 'had ſaid, Lord, doſt thou ſee that I am blind, and 'yet aſk me what thou ſhalt do for me? My anſwer 'is plain in my miſery, Lord, that I may receive my 'ſight. I needed not to make the application; and 'from this time, although I lay four months in 'priſon after this, and heard no more of it, yet 'from this time, as I learned afterwards, this noble 'perſon made it his buſineſs to have my caſe repreſented to her Majeſty, and methods taken for my 'deliverance (85).' At the time when Mr. Harley firſt ſent a meſſage to De Foe, he was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, but at the time of his diſcharge he was Secretary of State.

(85) Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, p. 11, 12.

[HH] Queen Anne herſelf alſo ſeems to have been convinced of the injuſtice of his ſentence.] De Foe ſays, 'When her Majeſty came to have the truth of the 'caſe laid before her, I ſoon felt the effects of her 'royal goodneſs and compaſſion. And, firſt, her 'Majeſty declared, that ſhe left all that matter to a 'certain perſon, and did not think he would have 'uſed me in ſuch a manner. Perhaps theſe words 'may ſeem imaginary to ſome, and the ſpeaking 'them to be of no value, and ſo they would have 'been, if they had not been followed with farther ſent, by lord Godolphin, a conſiderable ſum to his wife and family, and alſo tranſmitted money to him in Newgate, to pay his fine, and the expences of his diſcharge. After he obtained his liberty, he retired for ſome time to St. Edmund's Bury (q); but, within a few days after he came out of priſon, he publiſhed, "A Hymn to Victory." To this piece, which was occaſioned by the ſucceſs of the Duke of Marborough that year, he prefixed a poetical dedication, addreſſed to the Queen. In 1705, he publiſhed "The "Conſolidator; or, Memoirs of Sundry Tranſactions, from the World in the Moon (r)." In this piece he ſatirized a variety of characters, and introduced ſome political obſervations. He makes his lunar politicians debate the policy of Charles XII. in purſuing the Saxons and Poles, while the Muſcovites were ravaging his own country. This is ſuppoſed to have given riſe to a complaint that was exhibited againſt him by the Swediſh ambaſſador. The ſame year, he collected together ſome more of his pieces, in 8vo. under the title of "A ſecond Volume of the Writings of the Author of the True-born Engliſh-"man [II]." He alſo publiſhed, about this time, "The High Church Legion; or, "the Memorial examined. Being a New Teſt of Moderation; as it is recommended to "all that love the Church of England and the Conſtitution." This is an anſwer to Dr. Drake's Memorial of the Church of England (s). In the courſe of this year he made a journey to Exeter; and it appears that, before he ſet out, ſome ſchemes of violence and injuſtice were formed reſpecting him [KK], by perſons who from party motives had conceived an animoſity againſt him.

(r) Id. ibid.

(s) Ibid. p. 73.

In 1706, he publiſhed, by ſubſcription, both in folio, and in octavo, "Jure Divino, "a ſatire, in twelve books [LL]." To this a head of him was prefixed, and the motto to

'and more convincing proofs of what they imported,
'which were theſe, That her Majeſty was pleaſed
'particularly to inquire into my circumſtances and 'family, and, by my Lord-treaſurer Godolphin, to
'ſend a conſiderable ſupply to my wife and family,
'and to ſend me to the priſon money to pay my
'fine, and the expences of my diſcharge (86).'

(86) Ibid. p. 13.

[II] A ſecond Volume of the Writings of the Author of the True-born Engliſhman.] This volume contains the following pieces:

1. A New Diſcovery of an Old Intrigue. A ſatire levelled at treachery and ambition.
2. More Reformation. A ſatire upon himſelf.
3. An Elegy on the Author of the True-born Engliſhman.
4. The Storm, an eſſay.
5. A Hymn to the Pillory.
6. A Hymn to Victory.
7. The Pacificator.
8. The Double Welcome. A Poem to the Duke of Marlborough.
9. The Diſſenters' Anſwer to the High Church Challenge.
10. A Challenge of Peace, addreſſed to the whole Nation.
11. Peace without Union. By way of Reply to Sir Humphrey Mackworth's Peace at Home.
12. More Short Ways with the Diſſenters.
13. A New Teſt of the Church of England's Honeſty.
14. A ſerious Enquiry into this grand Queſtion, Whether a Law to prevent the Occaſional Conformity of Diſſenters would not be inconſiſtent with the Act of Toleration, and a Breach of the Queen's Promiſe?
15. The Diſſenter miſrepreſented and repreſented.
16. The Parallel; or, Perſecution of Proteſtants the Shorteſt Way to prevent the Growth of Popery in Ireland.
17. Giving Alms no Charity, and employing the Poor a Grievance to the Nation: being an Eſſay upon this great queſtion, Whether Work-houſes, Corporations, and Houſes of Correction for employing the Poor, as now practiſed in England; or Pariſh-ſtocks, as propoſed in a late Pamphlet, entituled, A Bill for the better Relief, Employment, and Settlement of the Poor, &c. are not miſchievous to the Nation, tending to the Deſtruction of our Trade, and to encreaſe the Number and Miſery of the Poor.
18. Royal Religion: being ſome Enquiry after the Piety of Princes; with Remarks on a Book entituled, A Form of Prayers uſed by King William.

[KK] Schemes of violence and injuſtice were formed reſpecting him.] Mr. Chalmers ſays, 'When his buſineſs, 'of whatever nature, led him to Exeter, and other 'Weſtern towns, in Auguſt, September, and Octo-'ber, 1705, a project was formed to ſend him as a 'ſoldier to the army, at a time when footmen were 'taken from the coaches as recruits: but conſcious 'of his being a freeholder of England, and a 'liveryman of London, he knew that ſuch characters 'could not be violated, in this nation, with impu-'nity. When ſome of the Weſtern juſtices, of more 'zeal of party than ſenſe of duty, heard from his 'opponents of De Foe's journey, they determined 'to apprehend him as a vagabond. But our author, 'who, among other qualities, had perſonal courage 'in a high degree, reflected, that to face danger is 'moſt effectually to prevent it. In his abſence, real 'ſuits were commenced againſt him for fictitious 'debts; but De Foe advertiſed, that genuine claims 'he would fairly ſatisfy. If all theſe uncommon 'circumſtances had not been publiſhed in The Review, 'we ſhould not have ſeen this ſtriking picture of 'ſavage manners. So much more free are we at 'preſent, that the editor of a news-paper, however 'obnoxious to any party, may travel peaceably about 'his affairs over England, without fear of interrup-'tion. Were a juſtice of peace, from whatever 'motive, to offer him any obſtruction, ſuch a magi-'ſtrate would be overwhelmed by the public indig-'nation, and puniſhed by the higher guardians of 'our quiet and our laws (87).'

(87) Life of De Foe, p. 28, 29.

[LL] Jure Divino, a ſatire, &c.] In this work De Foe examines the different claims on which the divine right of Kings is ſuppoſed to be founded, and proves that they are all repugnant to reaſon. Referring to the argument that was made uſe of by ſome of the advocates for this divine right, that regal government was of divine appointment, he gives an account of the origin of this mode of government among the Iſraelites. He admits,

'That Saul was king by Heaven's immediate hand,
'But 'twas in judgment to afflict the land.
'To have his anger plainly underſtood,
'And Samuel's black predictions to make good;
'In granting he corrected the requeſt,
'Gave them the man, but he withheld the reſt.
'He gave what they pretended to require,
'But in the gift he puniſh'd the deſire.
'He gave a plague, the very ſelf-ſame thing
'They aſked, when they petition'd for a King.
'For 'tis remarkable when Samuel ſaw,
'They'd have a king in ſpite of ſenſe or law;
'He drew the picture of a monſter crown'd (88),
'Aſk'd them, if ſuch a villain could be found,
'Whether they'd like him, and their tribute bring?
'They anſwer, Yes: let ſuch a one be King.
'And is a tyrant King your early choice?
'Be Kings your plague, ſaid the Eternal Voice;
'And with this mighty curſe he gave the crown,
'And Saul to Iſrael's terror mounts the throne (89).'

In

to the print, from Juvenal, is Laudatur et alget. He was induced to publiſh this book, to which he prefixed a Preface [MM] of conſiderable length, by the zeal which was then manifeſted,

In another place, ſpeaking of the ſame tranſactions relative to the appointment of a king among the Iſraelites, he ſays,

'This the Almighty to their judgment brings,
'And aſk'd them twice if they'd deſire ſuch kings.
'Twice the affirmative they blindly gave,
'Till, twice provok'd by thoſe he thought to ſave,
'He gives the judgment they too blindly crave.
'But that they might be ſelf-condemn'd at laſt,
'And double the regret of actions paſt,
'He drew the picture of the tyrant's reign,
'Bid them prepare to mourn their fate in vain.
'Told them the conſequences to their land,
'And all the miſchiefs that the word contain'd.
'How a crown'd mortal would inſult their peace,
'And plunder them of all their happineſs.
'How he'd ſupport his luxury and pride,
'Their wealth among his favourite rakes divide;
'Quarter his troops upon their freehold land,
'And murder ſuch by law as ſhould withſtand:
'Make unjuſt wars his neighbours to deſtroy,
'And force them out to fight they know not why.
'To pride and conqueſt ſacrifice their lives,
'Raviſh their daughters, and debauch their wives.
'Subject their perſons to unlawful power,
'And all their ſubſtance by his luſt devour.
'Theſe are the conſequences Heaven foretold;
'But men are always wiſeſt when they're old.
'They ſcorn'd to learn, tho' the Almighty taught,
'Experience teaches beſt when dearеſt bought.
'They aſk'd, he gave, and quickly they perceiv'd;
'But bleſſings loſt are not ſo ſoon retriev'd.
'They gain'd the tyrant Heaven had ſo foretold,
'And all their hopes, and all their freedoms ſold (90).'

(90) Jure Divino, Book V. p. 15, 16.

De Foe alſo ſtates the caſe of Rehoboam, from whom the ten tribes of Iſrael revolted, to prove that no claim of divine right can be a juſtification of tyranny, or lay an obligation on any nation to ſubmit to it.

'If Rehoboam had no ſacred line,
'Shew me a king like him for right divine.
'But Heaven the ten revolting tribes defends,
'And Judah's numerous troops himſelf diſbands:
'Owns the juſt claim of right to liberty,
'And leaves the brand of fool on tyranny (91).'

(91) Ibid. p. 22.

In a note to this paſſage De Foe ſays, 'The right 'Rehoboam had to the crown of Iſrael, was, doubtleſs, as divine as ever prince had, God having 'ſingled out his father's family from all the world, 'by his own hand, and annexed an entail of the 'Meſſiah upon his blood, and yet he forfeits for 'tyranny. The people riſe in arms, and God Almighty juſtifies the inſurrection, as done by his 'particular influence (92).'

(92) Id. Ibid.

In his ſixth book he ſays,

'When Kings againſt the King of Kings rebel,
'And the crown'd Chriſtian turns an Infidel;
'When mortal man his Maker once defies;
'We may the man, tho' not the King, deſpiſe.
'Here the diſtinction may be wiſely ſhown,
'Betwixt the man that wears it, and the crown.
'But, if to blood and murder they deſcend,
'And by their right divine their crimes defend;
'Trample on juſtice, and ſuppreſs the law,
'And think their crown muſt injured ſubjects awe;
'Nature directs the people what to do,
'And nature's dictates people will purſue.
'Freedom's the native right of all mankind,
'And they that ſlight it leave their ſenſe behind (93).'

(93) Ibid. p. 14.

In the courſe of his poem De Foe enumerates ſome of the moſt remarkable revolutions in nations, and introduces the characters of many of the tyrants of antiquity. He alſo ſhews, from many inſtances in hiſtory, that the common ſenſe of mankind, in different ages and nations of the world, has naturally led them to dethrone their princes for tyranny. He likewiſe takes a view of the Engliſh hiſtory, from the earlieſt times, and proves, that a claim of hereditary right can be very ill ſupported by the hiſtory of this country.

'Of all the nations in the world, there's none,
'Have leſs of true ſucceſſion in their crown.
'We ſhould be laſt of all that ſhould pretend
'The long deſcent of princes to defend;
'Since, if hereditary right's the claim,
'The Engliſh crown has forty times been lame.
'The crown was, like the people, always mix'd,
'Seldom was well beſtow'd, and never fix'd (94).'

(94) Book X. p. 220.

In his twelfth book he has the following panegyric on lord Somers.

'Somers, by nature great, and born to riſe,
'In counſel wary, and in conduct wiſe;
'His judgment ſteady, and his genius ſtrong,
'And all men own the muſic of his tongue;
'Capacious thought, and unencumber'd brain,
'That mines of undiſcover'd wealth contain:
'Eternal circulating wonders there,
'In conſtant flux of prodigy appear.
'With eaſe he thinks, with ſwifteſt art receives,
'And without pain brings forth what he conceives;
'Exempt from nature's curſe, his teeming head
'Without the throws of travail 's brought to bed;
'His fruitful fancy feels no pangs of birth,
'Antæus-like, he's help'd from his own earth,
'The midwife Nature all defect ſupplies,
'And fills the world with wonder and ſurprize.
'Nor are the ſwift productions of his thought
'Leſſen'd by all that eaſe by which they're wrought.
'But, as when teeming hills in travail groan'd,
'Their trifling births th' expecting world confound;
'So we're amaz'd, when without noiſe we ſee
'Others bring forth the mouſe, the mountain he (95).'

(95) Ibid, p. 267.

It appears, that De Foe had written another volume of this work, but he never publiſhed it. He ſays in his Preface, 'The preſent publication of 'this ſatire has obliged me to conſider of circumſtances; and as there are ſome truths which do not 'ſuit all times, I have laid by a ſecond volume; not 'that I think there is any thing in it which is not as 'fit to ſee the light as this; but I ſay of it, as the 'apoſtle in another caſe, I have many things to ſay, but 'you cannot bear them now (96).'

(96) Pref. to JureDivino, p. 5.

[MM] To which he prefixed a Preface.] De Foe maintained in his Preface, that thoſe perſons were extremely inconſiſtent, who pretended to approve of the Revolution, and to conſider King William, or even Queen Anne, as rightfully poſſeſſed of the throne, and yet aſſerted the doctrines of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, and the divine right of kings. He alſo contended, that ſo far as the Church of England, as a Church, had aſſerted theſe doctrines, the Church was certainly miſtaken, and had ſhewn, by its late conduct, that theſe doctrines were untenable and indefenſible. 'Was King James,' ſays he, 'treated like a man that could do no wrong, 'and was not accountable? Let thoſe who blame 'ſome people for the inconſiſtency of their princi'ples, reconcile, if they can, the doctrine of paſſive 'obedience, non-reſiſtance, and the king's being 'not accountable, to the practice of the High Church 'of England in the primitive part of the late Revo'lution. I think myſelf unconcerned to enlarge 'here upon the incoherent nonſenſe that this doctrine 'abounds with. The Church of England is bound 'to ſhew it, to juſtify her own actings in dethroning 'the late King, and it is a double ſatire upon the 'Church to pretend to vindicate it; it being impoſſible to reconcile the principle of paſſive obedience 'with the whole proceeding of the late Revolution. 'If the doctrine be true, if the King can do no wrong, 'if it be lawful on no account whatever to reſiſt his 'power, or take up arms in defence of liberty, law, 'religion, or property, however oppreſſed or en'dangered, theſe are ſome of the moſt inevitable 'conſequences; all the nobility, gentry, clergy, 'and commons of England, who either invited over, 'or joined with the Prince of Orange, and afterwards 'conſented to his being made King; all thoſe who 'ſwore to him when he was King, or that have ſince 'concurred in the new eſtabliſhments; are all per'jured rebels; abominable, and to be abominated

'by manifeſted, by many of the Tories, to propagate the doctrines of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, and the divine right of kings. The ſentiments in this performance are generally juſt; but it was compoſed under very diſadvantageous circumſtances, and the poetry is not entitled to much commendation. His verſification is often rough and inharmonious, and his language inelegant: he ſeems to have allowed himſelf little time to poliſh his numbers, and was more attentive to ſenſe than to ſound; but he ſometimes produces lines that are very ſmooth and very nervous. From ſome paſſages in the preface to this poem, and from other parts of his writings, it appears that De Foe was too much tinctured with religious bigotry, and that though he thought accurately on the ſubject of civil liberty, he had not the ſame juſt ideas with reſpect to religious liberty. A great number of notes [NN] are added to this poem, hiſtorical, political, and explanatory.

About

'by all good men; are never to be truſted, or be'lieved again, neither when they ſay, nor when they 'ſwear. The crime ought never to be forgotten by 'men, nor without repentance will be forgiven in 'Heaven: and till ſome general act of revocation be 'made by the whole united authority of the king'dom, and juſtice done, the Engliſh ſhould be ſtig-
'matized, through all the world, as a nation without 'faith, honeſty, or principle. But if the people of 'England were in the right, if the depredations
'made on the antient rights of the nation, were a
'juſt foundation of ſuſpending the general allegiance,
'and applying to a foreign prince, for the redreſſing
'the nation's grievances; if the Engliſh nation had

'and both he and his counſellors may be puniſhed
'for the ſame; he by making war againſt him, and 'they by the axe and the halter; in a word, if the
'preſent eſtabliſhment of the late King, or preſent
'Queen, if the late or preſent Parliament are fixed
'on any juſtice, law, or reaſon; then this ſatire is
'juſt, the Engliſh have done no wrong, and the ar'gument is good, that Kings are not Kings Jure Di-
'vino, that, when they break the laws, trample on 'property, affront religion, invade the liberties of 'nations, and the like, they may be oppoſed and
'reſiſted by force (97).'

(97) Preface to Jure Divino, p. 4, 5.

In another part of this Preface De Foe ſays, 'I
'profeſs myſelf a dutiful ſubject to the crown of 'England; and in that word I mean, to what head
'ſoever on which the Parliament of England ſhall
'place the crown; but I own no King who ſhall
'ever wear it without conſent of Parliament; no
'King, who ſhall after ſuch conſent employ the 'powers of it to the deſtruction of the law, and con-
'ſtitution of the nation, who ſhall invade the proper'ty of the ſubject, invert the public juſtice, or over'throw the religion and liberty of England. Such 'a prince is a tyrant, and may be depoſed by the 'ſame power that placed him upon the throne; any
'hereditary ſucceſſion, pretended divine right, ſu-
'preme power or other matter, cauſe, or thing, to
'the contrary, in any wiſe notwithſtanding (98).'

(98) Preface, ut ſupra, p. 7.

Towards the cloſe of the Preface, De Foe makes the following apology for the defects of his poem: 'I ſhall ſay but very little in the defence of the per'formance but this: It has been wrote under the 'heavieſt weight of intolerable preſſures; the great-
'eſt part of it was compoſed in priſon; and as the 'author has unhappily felt the moſt violent and con-
'ſtant efforts of his enemies to deſtroy him ever
'ſince that, the little compoſure he has had muſt be 'his ſhort excuſe for any thing incorrect. Let any 'man, under millions of diſtracting cares, and the 'conſtant ill treatment of the world, conſider the 'power of ſuch circumſtances over both invention
'and expreſſion, he will then allow that I had been 'to be excuſed, even in worſe errors than are to be 'found in this book (99).'

(99) Ibid. p. 38, 39.

[NN] Number of notes.] In one of theſe notes he obſerves, that 'the doctrine of abſolute undiſputed
'obedience was never ſo publickly profeſſed, and ſo
'far extended, as in England, where the very Clergy
'preached, that the King's command extended even 'to the lives and liberties, as well as the eſtates of 'his ſubjects, and his attempts muſt not be reſiſted,
'but ſubmitted to as a judgment from God.' He remarks, however, that the Clergy did not act in conformity to their principles, when their own rights were invaded. 'Not one,' ſays he, 'of 'our preachers of the paſſive doctrine ever gave an
'inſtance of it in themſelves, but unanimouſly op-
'poſed their ſovereign, as ſoon as he began to touch
'their particular rights.'——'Tis to be obſerved,
'that in the late Revolution, ſome of thoſe gentlemen
'who were the open profeſſors of the doctrine of 'divine right, and abſolute ſubjection, were the
'firſt that threw off the maſk, when the practice of
'royal impoſition came to bear hard upon them-
'ſelves. And even ſtill ſome of thoſe that now preach
'up this doctrine afreſh, and pretend Kings can do
'no wrong, and muſt not be reſiſted, were ſome of
'the loudeſt exclaimers againſt the affair of Mag-
'dalen College, and the impoſitions of the late King
'James (100).'

(100) Jure Divino, Book IV. p. 78, 79.

In another note, ſpeaking of regal claims from a line of anceſtors, or a right of ſucceſſion, he ſays, 'length of time, or continuance of poſſeſſion, can 'make no title good, that was not ſo in itſelf. For
'if a race of Kings had poſſeſſed a nation ever ſince
'the firſt ſettled nation in the world, yet if the firſt
'king of that race obtained the crown, or govern'ment, by wrong means, whether by uſurpation,
'force, fraud, or legal ſucceſſion, the injury re'mains hereditary, and the right receives no ſanction
'from the length of time. All thoſe people, there'fore, that would build titles upon length of time
'in poſſeſſion, build them upon a wrong foundation,
'ſince no preſcription will ſerve in this caſe; and
'the length of time in which an uſurping family has 'reigned, rather aggravates than extenuates the 'crime, and leaves the plea of right the more eaſy
'to be overthrown (101).'

(101) Book IX. p. 194, 195.

In another of his notes, ſpeaking of the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, he refers to the caſe of Algernon Sydney, and ſays, that 'the 'authors of this notion ſhewed one of the moſt exact
'ſpecimens of their abſolute doctrine that theſe lat'ter ages had ever known: and from whence the 'ſtrength and force of their principle may be fairly
'determined, as follows: Sir Robert Filmer, being
'the great champion of this doctrine, had defended
'it in print. Algernon Sydney, an antient branch 'of the noble family of the Sydneys, and brother to
'the then Earl of Leiceſter, drew out a true ſyſtem
'of original power, and the ſtated bounds of go'vernment and ſubjection by the laws of God, na'ture, and reaſon; and though it might be deſigned
'for the preſs in anſwer to Sir Robert Filmer, it 'was not yet perfected or finiſhed for the preſs, nor
'had it been expoſed to view; but the manuſcript
'being ſeized, and the ſubject examined, it was 'thought fit, inſtead of anſwering him with the pen,
'to anſwer him with the axe, and conquer his ar'gument by the extent of that very power he ex'ploded. This muſt paſs for an admirable way of 'diſputing, and is ſo natural to the thing, that it
'may paſs for a maxim, that arbitrary power is 'only to be defended by arbitrary power, and paſ-
'ſive abſolute ſubjection can only be exemplified by 'itſelf. He that, when he is argued againſt, can
'anſwer with his ſword inſtead of his pen, has cer'tainly a full power in his hand to confirm this 'doctrine, and need no other method; nor is it any 'other way to be defended. When, therefore, they 'found Algernon Sydney's argument unanſwerable
'by words, the only way left them was to lay aſide
'debating with the book, and fall upon the man.
'So they cut off his head, merely becauſe they could 'not anſwer his book. The book has ſince been 'printed,

About this time De Foe was employed in what he ſtyles "ſeveral honourable, though "ſecret ſervices (t)," by Queen Anne; and it appears alſo that he had before been employed in a ſimilar manner, ſoon after his diſcharge from his impriſonment. What was the nature of theſe ſervices, we are not informed; but his conduct on theſe occaſions gave ſatisfaction [OO] both to the Queen, and to the miniſtry. In October, 1706, he was ſent into Scotland [PP], in order to aſſiſt in thoſe meaſures, which were then adopted for eſtabliſhing an Union between that kingdom and England. The promotion of the Union was a ſervice in which De Foe could honeſtly engage, as it was an event which he believed would be beneficial to both nations; and it appears, that he had formerly had ſome converſation with King William upon this ſubject [QQ]. Mr. Chalmers remarks, that De Foe's "knowledge of commerce and revenue, his powers of inſinuation, and "above all his readineſs of pen, were deemed of no ſmall utility in promoting the "Union (u)." He frequently attended the committees of Parliament, and for their uſe made a variety of calculations on the ſubject of trade and taxes (w). He alſo wrote anſwers to Hodges and Webſter [RR], and other Scottiſh writers againſt the Union. It

'printed, and remains unanſwerable to this day; and 'a man would deſire no better conqueſt over the adverſaries of Liberty, than to deſire them to reply to 'it now, when they have freedom to ſpeak, and will 'not be anſwered, as the author was, by the ſcaffold 'or the gibbet (102).'

(102) Ibid, B. IV. p. 90, 91.

[OO] His conduct on theſe occaſions gave ſatisfaction, &c.] 'I had the happineſs,' he ſays, 'to diſcharge 'myſelf, in all theſe truſts, ſo much to the ſatisfaction 'of thoſe who employed me, tho' often with difficulty 'and danger, that my Lord Treaſurer Godolphin, 'whoſe memory I have always honoured, was pleaſed 'to continue his favour to me, and to do me all good 'offices with her Majeſty, even after an unhappy 'breach had ſeparated him from my firſt benefactor '(Mr. Harley): the particulars of which may not 'be improper to relate; and as it is not an injuſtice to 'any, ſo I hope it will not be offenſive. When, upon 'that fatal breach, the Secretary of State was diſmiſſed 'from the ſervice, I looked upon myſelf as loſt; it 'being a general rule in ſuch caſes, when a great officer falls, that all who came in by his intereſt fall with him. And reſolving never to abandon the 'fortunes of the man, to whom I owed ſo much of 'my own, I quitted the uſual applications which I 'had made to my Lord Treaſurer. But my generous 'benefactor, when he underſtood it, frankly told me, 'that I ſhould by no means do ſo; for, ſaid he, in the moſt engaging terms, my Lord Treaſurer will employ you in nothing but what is for the public ſervice, 'and agreeable to your own ſentiments of things. 'And, beſides, it is the Queen you are ſerving, who 'has been very good to you. Pray apply yourſelf as 'you uſed to do; I ſhall not take it ill from you in 'the leaſt.

'Upon this I went to wait on my Lord Treaſurer, 'who received me with great freedom, and told me, 'ſmiling, he had not ſeen me a long while. I told 'his Lordſhip very frankly the occaſion, that the unhappy breach that had fallen out had made me 'doubtful whether I ſhould be acceptable to his Lordſhip. That I knew it was uſual, when great perſons fell, that all who were in their intereſt fell with 'them. That his Lordſhip knew the obligations I was 'under; and I could not but fear my intereſt in his 'lordſhip was leſſened on that account. "Not at all, 'Mr. De Foe," replied his Lordſhip; "I always think "a man honeſt till I find to the contrary."

'Upon this I attended his Lordſhip as uſual; and 'being reſolved to remove all poſſible ground of ſuſpicion that I kept any ſecret correſpondence, I never 'viſited, or wrote to, or any way correſponded with, 'my principal benefactor (Mr. Harley) for above 'three years; which he ſo well knew the reaſon of, 'and ſo well approved that punctual behaviour in me, 'that he never took it ill from me at all.

'In conſequence of this reception, my lord Godolphin had the goodneſs not only to introduce me for 'the ſecond time to her Majeſty, and to the honour 'of kiſſing her hand, but obtained for me the continuance of an appointment, which her Majeſty had 'been pleaſed to make me in conſideration of a former 'ſpecial ſervice I had done, and in which I had run 'as much riſque of my life as a grenadier upon the 'counterſcarp; and which appointment however was 'firſt obtained for me at the interceſſion of my firſt 'benefactor, and is all owing to that interceſſion, and 'her Majeſty's bounty. Upon this ſecond introduction her Majeſty was pleaſed to tell me, with a goodneſs peculiar to herſelf, that ſhe had ſuch ſatisfaction 'in my former ſervices, that ſhe had appointed me for 'another affair, which was ſomething nice, and that 'my Lord Treaſurer ſhould tell me the reſt; and ſo I 'withdrew. The next day his Lordſhip having commanded me to attend, told me, that he muſt ſend me 'to Scotland; and gave me but three days to prepare 'myſelf (103).'

(103) Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, p. 14, 15, 16.

[PP] Was ſent into Scotland.] At the cloſe of the preceding note, we have given De Foe's own account of his converſation with Queen Anne, and the Lord Treaſurer Godolphin, previouſly to his being ſent into Scotland; for this was the affair which the Queen ſaid "was ſomething nice," and which the Lord Treaſurer was to explain to him. After mentioning theſe particulars, De Foe ſays, 'Accordingly I went to Scotland, where neither my buſineſs, nor the manner of 'my diſcharging it, is material to this tract: nor will 'it be ever any part of my character that I reveal what 'ſhould be concealed; and yet my errand was ſuch, 'as was far from being unfit for a Sovereign to direct, 'or an honeſt man to perform; and the ſervice I did 'on that occaſion, as it is not unknown to the greateſt 'man now in the nation under the King and the 'Prince, ſo I dare ſay his grace was never diſpleaſed 'with the part I had in it, and I hope will not forget 'it (104).'

(104) Appeal, p. 16, 17.

[QQ] Had ſome converſation with King William upon this ſubject.] In his Hiſtory of the Union, De Foe ſays, 'At the Revolution, and ſeveral times during the 'reign of the late King William, motions had been 'made frequently, both on the King's ſide and on the 'People's alſo, to come to a treaty; but that prince 'had always one thing or other caſt in his way, to 'prevent his good deſign. The King was often heard 'to ſay, that this iſland could never be eaſy without 'an Union, and if either of them underſtood their own 'happineſs, they would never reſt till it was brought 'to paſs. And, as I had the honour to mention it 'once among other things, in a ſcheme of general 'peace among the Proteſtant intereſts in Europe, I 'cannot forget, that his Majeſty, expreſſing ſome concern at it, returned, "I have done all I can in that "affair; but I do not ſee a temper in either nation "that looks like it;"—and added, after ſome other 'diſcourſe, "It may be done, but not yet." During 'the whole reign of this prince, the breaches between 'the two kingdoms rather widened and encreaſed, than 'tended to a cloſe; and ſeveral national unkindneſſes 'paſſed between them, which prepared both ſides, as 'it were, to reflect upon and reproach the other; 'there wanted not alſo a ſet of wicked inſtruments 'always to blow the coals of diſcord between the kingdoms into a flame, and, if poſſible, to bring the 'nations to a rupture (105).'

(105) Hiſt. of the Union, p. 64. edit. 1786.

[RR] Wrote anſwers to Hodges, &c.] He obſerves of Hodges, that he wrote 'a large book againſt an 'incorporate union, in which he abuſed and reproached England, as a faithleſs, wicked, treacherous, and abominable nation; and that to unite 'with her, was to entail God's judgement on Scotland 'for her national ſins (106).'

(106) Hiſt. of the Union, p. 223

 appears,

appears, that he printed ſix pieces upon this ſubject [SS]. But, notwithſtanding his employments at Edinburgh, he ſtill continued to publiſh his Reviews; and at this time he very particularly informed the public, that, wherever he might happen to be, the Reviews were wholly written with his own hand, no other perſon ever having had any concern in them (x). During his ſtay in Scotland, his zeal for the Union expoſed him to ſome perſonal danger [TT]. However, before the concluſion of the year 1706, he publiſhed, at Edinburgh, in folio, "Caledonia, a Poem, in Honour of Scotland, and the "Scots Nation. In three Parts." The Duke of Queenſberry, the Queen's High Commiſſioner to the Parliament of Scotland, and the Lords of the Privy Council, granted De Foe a licence for the excluſive publication of it [UU], for the ſpace of ſeven years. An octavo edition of it was publiſhed at London early in the following year. In this poem De Foe celebrates the courage of the Scots, and enumerates ſome of their military exploits. He endeavours to prove, that the ſituation of Scotland rendered it well adapted for trade [WW]; he ſpeaks honourably of the abilities of the inhabitants; he commends them for their learning, and their attention to religion; and he hints at the advantages which they might derive from an union with England. But though De Foe's poem was a panegyric on Scotland and Scotſmen, it did not wholly conſiſt of commendation. He takes notice of the evils that the common people ſuffered from their vaſſalage to their chiefs, and from their ignorance of the bleſſings of liberty. He alſo cenſures the Scots for not improving the natural advantages which their country poſſeſſed, and for neglecting their fiſhery; and he gives them ſome excellent advice [XX].

De Foe returned to England in February, 1706-7 (y); and, in a few weeks after, publiſhed, in 4to, "The Diſſenters Vindicated; or, a Short View of the preſent State "of the Proteſtant Religion in Britain, as it is now profeſſed in the Epiſcopal Church of "England, the Preſbyterian Church in Scotland, and the Diſſenters in both. In Anſwer "to ſome Reflections in Mr. Webſter's two Books publiſhed in Scotland." He was induced to publiſh this piece by ſome ſevere invectives againſt the Engliſh Diſſenters [YY], which had been thrown out by Webſter. In what manner De Foe was rewarded by the government, for his ſervices reſpecting the Union, we meet with no particular account; but, in 1709, he publiſhed, in one volume, folio, "The Hiſtory of the Union between

(107) Chalmers, p. 75.

[TT] His zeal for the Union expoſed him to ſome perſonal danger.] He ſays himſelf, ſpeaking of a great riot which took place at Edinburgh on the 23d of October, 1706, 'The author of this (the Hiſtory of 'the Union) had his ſhare of the danger in this tumult, 'and, though unknown to him, was watched and ſet 'by the mob, in order to know where to find him, 'had his chamber windows inſulted, and the windows 'below him broken by miſtake. But by the pru'dence of his friends, the ſhortneſs of its continuance, 'and God's providence, he eſcaped (108).'

(108) Hiſt of the Union, p. 239.

[UU] A licence for the excluſive publication of it.] The licence, which is prefixed to the poem, is as follows:

'At Holyrood-houſe, the 3d of December, 1706.

'His Grace, her Majeſty's High Commiſſioner, 'and Lords of Privy Council, having conſidered a 'Petition given in to them by Daniel De Foe, Eſq; 'and the ſame being read in their preſence, his Grace, 'and the ſaid Lords do hereby grant licence to the Pe'titioner and his Aſſignees, to publiſh the poem, en'tituled, CALEDONIA, a poem in honour of Scot'land, and the Scots nation; and diſcharges any other 'perſon to print, vend, import, or ſell the ſaid poem, 'during the ſpace of ſeven years, without the Peti'tioner, or his Aſſignees, warrant or commiſſion, under 'the pain of forefaulting and ſeizing the copies ſo 'printed, imported, vended, or ſold, for the uſe of 'the Petitioner and his Aſſignees, and under the pe'nalty of ten pounds ſterling for each hundred of the 'ſaid copies imported, printed, vended, or ſold in 'manner aforeſaid, and proportionably for a greater 'or leſſer number.

'Extracted by me, A. Maitland, Cl. Scti. Concilii.'

[WW] Well adapted for trade.] In one of his notes De Foe obſerves, that 'Scotland is equally qualified 'for trade with any nation in the world; whether we 'conſider her openneſs to all parts of the trading 'world, or the convenience of her harbours, ſafe 'roads, and neighbourhood both to the German and 'Atlantic oceans (109).'

(109) Caledonia, p. 6. edit. Lond. 1707.

In his Poem, he alſo ſays of Scotland, that it was,

'Fitted for commerce, and cut out for trade,
'The ſeas the land, the land the ſeas invade.
'The promontory clifts, with heights emboſs'd,
'And large deep bays adorn thy dang'rous coaſt:
'Alternately the pilot's true relief,
'Theſe warn at diſtance, thoſe receive him ſafe.
'The deep indented harbours them invite,
'Firſt court by day, and then ſecure at night;
'The wearied ſailor's true and ſafe receſs,
'A full amends for wild tempeſtuous ſeas (110).'

(110) Caledonia, p. 6.

[XX] Gives them ſome excellent advice.] Towards the cloſe of his poem, he ſays,

'Wake, Scotland, from thy long lethargic dream,
'Seem what thou art, and be what thou ſhalt ſeem;
'Shake off the poverty, the ſloth will die,
'Succeſs alone can quicken induſtry.
'No more the bondage of reproach endure,
'Or bear thoſe harms thou canſt ſo quickly cure.

[YY] Some ſevere invectives againſt the Engliſh Diſſenters.] One of the charges brought by Webſter againſt the Diſſenters was, that, 'by the tenour of their addreſs in King James's reign, they countenanced the 'diſpenſing power; and that to reſcue themſelves from 'the ſeverity of our law, they would give a blow to 'all laws.' De Foe acknowledges, that when James II. courted the Diſſenters, and granted them an indulgence, in order to promote his own views, ſome few of the Diſſenters did addreſs and thank the King for their liberty. This, ſays De Foe, 'I do not, nor 'ever did approve, becauſe that liberty was their 'native right (112).' But he maintained, that the great body of the Diſſenters had reſolutely refuſed to concur in the meaſures of James, and had manifeſted their readineſs rather to be ſufferers themſelves by the penal laws againſt them, than to ſupport the King's claim of a right to diſpenſe with them merely by his own authority (113).

"England

"England and Scotland. With an Appendix of original Papers." To this work he prefixed two dedications, one to the Queen, and another to the Duke of Queensberry; and also an account of all the former attempts to effectuate an union between England and Scotland, and a view of the state of affairs in both kingdoms previous to the treaty of Union in the reign of Queen Anne. A second edition of "The History of the Union" was published at London in 1712, and a third in 1786, in 4to, with an index, and a life of the author, written by George Chalmers, Esq.

In 1709, De Foe published, in 8vo, "The History of Addresses," of which he published a second part two years after. About this time, as Mr. Chalmers observes, he "lived at Newington, in comfortable circumstances, publishing the Reviews (z)." But his tranquillity was somewhat disturbed by the invectives that were frequently thrown out against him in different publications; and the number of attacks he met with, from periodical and other writers, led him to propose a kind of literary truce [ZZ] with J. Dyer, a person who was then employed by the leaders of the Tories, "in circulating news and "insinuations through the country (a)." De Foe complained, that he was frequently charged with being the author of works in which he had no concern [AAA]: 'Very often,' says he, 'the first knowledge I have had of a book's being published, has been from 'seeing myself abused for being the author of it, in some other pamphlet published in 'answer to it.—Finding myself treated in this manner, I declined writing at all; and for 'a great part of a year never set pen to paper, except in the public paper called the Re- 'view (b).' He was accused of being a party writer, and of writing on any side on which he was paid. But in his Appeal, he says, "In all my writing, I ever capitulated for my 'liberty to speak according to my own judgement of things. I ever had that liberty 'allowed me; nor was I ever imposed upon to write this way or that against my judge- 'ment by any person whatsoever (c)." It is, indeed, a proof of De Foe's independence and integrity as a political writer, that, notwithstanding his personal obligations to Harley, he wrote against the peace of Utrecht [BBB]. And in his History of the Union he says, "I have never loved any parties, but with my utmost zeal have sincerely espoused "the great and original interest of this nation, and of all nations, I mean Truth and Li- "berty; and whoever are of that party, I desire to be with them (d)."

In

[ZZ] A kind of literary truce.] De Foe's letter to Dyer, containing this proposal, is preserved in the British Museum, Harl. MSS. No. 7001, fol. 269 It was first published by Mr. Chalmers, and is as follows:

'Mr. Dyer,

'I have your letter. I am rather glad to find you 'put it upon the trial who was aggressor, than justify 'a thing which I am sure you cannot approve; and 'in this I assure you I am far from injuring you, and 'refer you to the time when long since you had wrote 'I was fled from justice: one Sammon being taken up for 'printing a libel, and I being then on a journey, nor the 'least charge against me for being concerned in it by 'any body but your letter:—also many unkind per- 'sonal reflections on me in your letter, when I was in 'Scotland, on the affair of the Union, and I assure you, 'when my paper had not in the least mentioned you; 'and those I refer to time and date for the proof of.

'I mention this only in defence of my last letter, 'in which I said no more of it than to let you see I 'did not merit such treatment, and could nevertheless 'be content to render any service to you, though I 'thought myself hardly used.

'But to state the matter fairly between you and I, '[me] as writing for different interests and so possibly 'coming under an unavoidable necessity of jarring in 'several cases: I am ready to make a fair truce of 'honour with you, viz. that if what either party are 'doing, or saying, that may clash with the party we 'are for, and urge us to speak, it shall be done with- 'out naming either's name, and without personal re- 'flections; and thus we may differ still, and yet pre- 'serve both the Christian and the gentleman.

'This I think is an offer may satisfy you. I have 'not been desirous of giving just offence to you, nei- 'ther would I to any man, however I may differ from 'him; and I see no reason why I should affront a 'man's person, because I do not join with him in prin- 'ciple. I please myself with being the first proposer 'of so fair a treaty with you, because I believe, as 'you cannot deny its being very honourable, so it is 'not less so in coming first from me, who I believe 'could convince you of my having been the first and 'most ill-treated—for further proof of which I refer 'you to your letters, at the time I was threatened by the 'Envoy of the King of Sweden.

'However, Mr. Dyer, this is a method which may 'end what is past, and prevent what is future; and if 'refused, the future part I am sure cannot lie at my 'door.

'As to your letter, your proposal is so agreeable to 'me, that truly without it I could not have taken the 'thing at all: for it would have been a trouble in- 'tolerable, both to you as well as me, to take your 'letter every post, first from you, and then send it to 'the post house.

'Your method of sending to the black box, is just 'what I designed to propose, and Mr. Shaw will 'doubtless take it of you; if you think it needful 'for me to speak to him it shall be done—what I want 'to know is only the charge, and that you will order 'it constantly to be sent, upon hinting whereof I 'shall send you the names. Wishing you success in 'all things (Your opinions of Government excepted)

'I am,

'Newington, June 27, 1710. 'Your humble servant, 'De Foe.'

[AAA] Charged with being the author of works in which he had no concern.] Among other pieces with which he was falsely charged, one was, "The Se- "cret History of the White Staff (114)." It was also asserted, by Abel Boyer, that he was the author of a paper, called Mercator, which was published three times a week, and that he received for it a large weekly allowance from the Treasury. De Foe acknowledged, that he had written some papers in the Mercator; but asserted, that he was neither the author of that periodical publication, nor had the property or printing of it; and solemnly declared, that he never had any payment, or reward, for writing any part of it (115).

[BBB] He wrote against the peace of Utrecht.] He says, in his Appeal, 'No man can say, that ever I 'once said in my life, that I approved of the peace. 'I wrote a public paper at that time, and there it re- 'mains upon record against me; I printed it openly, 'and that so plainly, as others durst not do, that I 'did not like the peace, neither that which was made, 'nor that which was before making; that I thought 'the Protestant interest was not taken care of in either; 'that the peace I was for, was such as should neither 'have given the Spanish Monarchy to the House of 'Bourbon,

In 1711, De Foe publiſhed, in 8vo. "An Eſſay at an Explanation of that difficult "phraſe, A good Peace." The ſame year he alſo publiſhed, "An Eſſay on the South "Sea Trade, with an Enquiry into the Grounds and Reaſons of the preſent Diſlike and "Complaint againſt the Settlement of a South-Sea Company." A ſecond edition of this was printed the following year (e). About this period he went for ſome time into the North of England [CCC] (f); and what he obſerved of the diſpoſitions of the people there, led him, from his zeal for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the Houſe of Hanover, to publiſh a pamphlet, in 8vo, called "A Seaſonable Caution;" which was intended to operate as an antidote againſt thoſe inſinuations, in favour of the Pretender, which were then propagated by the Jacobites (g). He afterwards wrote three other pamphlets in ſupport of the ſame cauſe [DDD]; but theſe pieces were written in an ironical ſtyle, a mode of writing the effects of which to De Foe were peculiarly unfortunate, and he again found himſelf involved in a very rigorous and unjuſt proſecution. He was accuſed, in conſequence of theſe publications, of writing ſeditious libels, in order to promote the intereſt of the Pretender [EEE]. He was taken into cuſtody, an information being filed againſt him by the attorney-general [FFF], and obliged to give eight hundred pounds bail.

'Bourbon, nor to the Houſe of Auſtria; but that this 'bone of contention ſhould have been broken to pie-'ces, that it ſhould not have been dangerous to Europe 'on any account, and that the Proteſtant powers, (viz.) 'Britain, and the States, ſhould have ſo ſtrengthened 'and fortified their intereſt, by their ſharing the com-'merce and ſtrength of Spain, as ſhould have made 'them no more afraid either of France, or the Em-'peror: ſo that the Proteſtant intereſt ſhould have 'been ſuperior to all the powers of Europe, and been 'in no more danger of exorbitant power, whether 'French or Auſtrian. This was the peace I always 'argued for, purſuant to the deſign of King William 'in the Treaty of Partition, and purſuant to that article 'of the grand alliance which was directed by the 'ſame glorious hand at the beginning of this laſt war, '(viz.). that all we ſhould conquer in the Spaniſh 'Weſt Indies ſhould be our own. This was with a 'true deſign that England and Holland ſhould have 'turned their naval power, which were eminently 'ſuperior to thoſe of France, to the conqueſt of the 'Spaniſh Weſt Indies, by which the channel of trade, 'and return of bullion, which now enriches the ene-'mies of both, had been ours; and as the wealth, ſo 'the ſtrength of the world, had been in Proteſtant 'hands. Spain, whoever had it, muſt then have 'been dependent upon us; the Houſe of Bourbon 'would have found it ſo poor without us, as to be 'ſcarce worth fighting for; and the people ſo averſe 'to them for want of their commerce, as not to make 'it ever likely that France could keep it. This was 'the foundation I ever acted upon with relation to the 'peace. It is true, that when it was made, and could 'not be otherwiſe, I thought our buſineſs was to make 'the beſt of it, and rather to inquire what improve-'ments were to be made of it, than to be continually 'exclaiming at thoſe who made it.'—'While I 'ſpoke of things in this manner, I bore infinite re-'proaches from clamouring pens of being in the 'French intereſt, being hired and bribed to defend a 'bad peace, and the like; and moſt of this was upon 'a ſuppoſition of my writing, or being the author of, 'abundance of pamphlets which came out every day, 'and which I had no hand in (116).'

[CCC] Went for ſome time into the North of England.] It is ſaid, that he was ſome time at Halifax in York-ſhire. Mr. Watſon, in his "Hiſtory of Halifax," obſerves, 'that Daniel De Foe, being forced to abſcond, 'on account of his political writings, reſided at Hali-'fax, in the Back-lane, at the ſign of the Roſe and 'Crown, being known to Dr. Nettleton, the phy-'ſician, and the Rev. Mr. Prieſtley, miniſter of a 'Diſſenting congregation there (117).'

(117) Chalmers, p. 45.

[DDD] Other pamphlets in ſupport of the ſame cauſe.] He ſays, in his Appeal, 'In order to detect the in-'fluence of Jacobite emiſſaries, the firſt thing I wrote 'was a ſmall tract, called, A Seaſonable Caution: a 'book ſincerely written to open the eyes of the poor, 'ignorant, country people, and to warn them againſt 'the ſubtle inſinuations of the emiſſaries of the Pre-'tender; and, that it might be effectual to that pur-'poſe, I prevailed with ſeveral of my friends to give 'them away among the poor people all over England, 'eſpecially in the North; and ſeveral thouſands were 'actually given away, the price being reduced ſo low, 'that the bare expence of paper and preſs was only 'preſerved, that every one might be convinced, that 'nothing of gain was deſigned, but a ſincere endea-'vour to do a public good, and aſſiſt to keep the peo-'ple entirely in the intereſt of the Proteſtant ſucceſ-'ſion. Next to this, and with the ſame ſincere de-'ſign, I wrote two pamphlets, one entituled, What if 'the Pretender ſhould come? the other, Reaſons againſt 'the Succeſſion of the Houſe of Hanover. Nothing can 'be more plain, than that the titles of theſe books 'were amuſements, in order to put the books into the 'hands of thoſe people whom the Jacobites had de-'luded, and to bring the books to be read by them. 'Previous to what I ſhall farther ſay of theſe books, I 'muſt obſerve, that all theſe books met with ſo gene-'ral a reception and approbation among thoſe who 'were moſt ſincere for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, that 'they ſent them all over the kingdom, and recom-'mended them to the people's reading as excellent 'and uſeful pieces, inſomuch that about ſeven editions 'of them were printed, and they were reprinted in 'other places: and I do proteſt, had his preſent 'Majeſty, then Elector of Hanover, given me a thou-'ſand pounds to have written for the intereſt of his 'ſucceſſion, and to expoſe and render the intereſt of 'the Pretender odious and ridiculous, I could have 'done nothing more effectual to thoſe purpoſes than 'theſe books were (118).'

(118) Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, p. 26, 27.

Beſides theſe pamphlets, De Foe publiſhed another, with the ſame views, entituled, "An Anſwer to a "Queſtion that nobody thinks of, viz. What if the "Queen ſhould die?"

[EEE] To promote the intereſt of the Pretender.] De Foe obſerves, in his Appeal, that 'Nothing can 'be ſeverer in the fate of a man, than to act ſo between 'two parties, that both ſides ſhould be provoked 'againſt him. It is certain, the Jacobites curſed thoſe 'tracts and the author; and when they came to read 'them, being deluded by the titles according to the 'deſign, they threw them by with the greateſt indig-'nation imaginable. Had the Pretender ever come to 'the throne, I could have expected nothing but death, 'and all the ignominy and reproach that the moſt in-'veterate enemy of his perſon and claim could be ſup-'poſed to ſuffer. On the other hand, I leave it to 'any conſidering man to judge, what a ſurprize it 'muſt be to me to meet with all the public clamour 'that informers could invent, as being guilty of writ-'ing againſt the Hanover ſucceſſion, and as having 'written ſeveral pamphlets in favour of the Pretender. 'No man in this nation ever had a more rivetted aver-'ſion to the Pretender, and to all the family he pre-'tended to come of, than I; a man that had been in 'arms under the Duke of Monmouth, againſt the 'cruelty and arbitrary government of his pretended 'father; and that for twenty years had, to my utmoſt, 'oppoſed him (King James) and his party after his 'abdication (119).'

(119) Appeal, p. 28.

[FFF] An information being filed againſt him, &c.] It has been aſſerted, that this proſecution was com-menced againſt him by the abſurd zeal of William Benſon, Eſq; auditor of the Impreſt. De Foe him-ſelf obſerves, in his Appeal, that perſons of ſome con-ſequence, who were concerned in the proſecution, had been heard to ſay, that they knew the books were written bail. During the profecution, he vindicated himſelf in his Review; which gave offence to the judges of the Court of King's Bench, who committed him to Newgate, in Eaſter term, 1713. But he was afterwards releaſed, on making a ſubmiſſion. This proſecution involved him in great expences; but it was at length put an end to by another interpoſition in his favour of his old friend Harley, who was now Earl of Oxford, and Lord-treaſurer, who procured for him the Queen's pardon [GGG], which was dated on the 13th of November, 1713, and ſigned by Lord Bolingbroke. During his confinement he put an end to the publication of his Review, which had been continued nine years; ſo that, as Mr. Chalmers remarks, "in Newgate it began, and in Newgate it ended (b)."

(b) Life of De Foe, p. 43.

De Foe had been very zealous for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the Houſe of Hanover, and had been a great ſufferer by his writings in ſupport of it; but after the acceſſion of King George I. he appears never to have received the leaſt countenance or encouragement from the Court, or from any perſons in adminiſtration. Much undeſerved abuſe was alſo thrown out againſt him in various publications of the times. His zeal for the principles of liberty, and the Hanover ſucceſſion, had naturally rendered him obnoxious to the Tories and the Jacobites; but his moderation in certain points, and his connexions with Harley, alſo rendered him ſuſpected by the Whigs, and he was charged with having abandoned his former principles. In March, 1715, he publiſhed, "The Family "Inſtructor [HHH];" and about the ſame time he wrote a vindication of his character, from the unjuſt charges which were frequently brought againſt him, under the following title: "An Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, though it be of his worſt enemies [III]. By "Daniel written againſt the Pretender, but De Foe had diſobliged them in other things, and they reſolved to take this advantage to puniſh him. He had procured evidence, he ſays, to prove this fact, if the trial had proceeded.

[GGG] Procured for him the Queen's pardon.] Of the patent for this purpoſe the following is the preamble: 'Whereas, in the term of the Holy Trinity laſt paſt, 'our Attorney-General did exhibit an information, in 'our Court of King's Bench at Weſtminſter, againſt 'Daniel De Foe, late of London, Gent. for writing, 'printing, and publiſhing, and cauſing to be written, 'printed, and publiſhed, three libels, the one entituled, "Reaſons againſt the Succeſſion of the Houſe "of Hanover; with an Enquiry, how far the Abdica"tion of King James, ſuppoſing it to be legal, ought "to affect the Perſon of the Pretender." One other, 'entituled, "And what if the Pretender ſhould "come? or, Some Conſiderations of the Advantages "and real Conſequences of the Pretender's poſſeſſing "the crown of Great Britain." And one other, 'entituled, "An Anſwer to a Queſtion that nobody "thinks of (viz.), What if the Queen ſhould die?" 'And whereas the ſaid Daniel De Foe hath, by his 'humble petition, repreſented to us, that he, with a 'ſincere deſire to propagate the intereſt of the Hano'ver ſucceſſion, and to animate the people againſt the 'deſigns of the Pretender, whom he always looked 'on as an enemy to our Sacred Perſon and Govern'ment, did publiſh the ſaid pamphlets: in all which 'books, although the titles ſeemed to look as if 'written in favour of the Pretender, and ſeveral ex'preſſions, as in all ironical writing it muſt be, may 'be wreſted againſt the true deſign of the whole, and 'turned to a meaning quite different from the inten'tion of the author, yet the petitioner humbly aſſures 'us, in the ſolemneſt manner, that his true and only 'deſign in all the ſaid books was, by an ironical diſ'courſe of recommending the Pretender, in the ſtrongeſt 'and moſt forcible manner to expoſe his deſigns, and 'the ruinous conſequences of his ſucceeding therein; 'which, as the petitioner humbly repreſents, will 'appear to our ſatisfaction by the books themſelves, 'where the following expreſſions are very plain, '(viz.) "that the Pretender is recommended as a "perſon proper to amaſs the Engliſh liberties into his "own ſovereignty, ſupply them with the privileges "of wearing wooden ſhoes; eaſing them of the trou"ble of chooſing Parliaments; and the nobility and "gentry of the hazard and expence of winter jour"nies, by governing them in that more righteous "method of his abſolute will, and enforcing the laws "by a glorious ſtanding army; paying all the nation's "debts at once, by ſtopping the funds, and ſhutting "up the Exchequer; eaſing and quieting their dif"ferences in religion, by bringing them to the union "of Popery, or leaving them at liberty to have no "religion at all." That theſe were ſome of the very 'expreſſions in the ſaid books, which the petitioner 'ſincerely deſigned to expoſe, and oppoſe, as far as in 'him lies, the intereſt of the Pretender, and with no 'other intention. Nevertheleſs, the petitioner, to his 'great ſurprize, has been miſrepreſented, and his ſaid 'books miſconſtrued, as if written in favour of the 'Pretender, &c.——We, taking the premiſes, and 'the circumſtances aforeſaid, into our royal conſider'ation, are graciouſly pleaſed, &c. (120).'

(120) Appeal, p. 33, 34, 35.

[HHH] The Family Inſtructor.] This was divided into three parts, 1. Relating to Parents and Children; 2. to Maſters and Servants; and 3. to Huſbands and Wives. The deſign of this work, which has paſſed through many editions, was to impreſs upon the minds of parents the obligations they were under to inſtruct their children in the principles of religion and virtue; to lead children to receive with docility the religious admonitions of their parents; to induce maſters to communicate proper inſtruction in religion to their ſervants; and huſbands and wives to concur with each other in the performance of the duties of family worſhip. It is written in a very natural and eaſy manner; and much of it is thrown into a kind of dramatic form. De Foe obſerves in his preface, that 'the whole work 'being deſigned both to divert and inſtruct, the author 'has endeavoured to adapt it as much as poſſible to 'both theſe uſes: from whence ſome have called it a 'religious play.' This book contains much of real piety, grounded upon the principles of natural and revealed religion, with ſome mixture of ſuperſtition, and of irrational theology. Mr. Chalmers informs us, that the family of George I. were inſtructed by the copy of the Family Inſtructor which is now in the Britiſh Muſeum (121).

(121) Life of De Foe, p. 51.

De Foe afterwards publiſhed a ſecond volume of the Family Inſtructor, in two parts: 1. Relating to family breaches, and their obſtructing religious duties; 2. to the great miſtake of mixing the paſſions in the managing and correcting of children: with a great variety of caſes relating to ſetting ill examples to children and ſervants.

[III] An Appeal to Honour and Juſtice, &c.] We have already made various extracts from this piece. Towards the beginning of it, he ſtates the following reaſons for its publication: 'I think I have long 'enough been made Fabula Vulgi, and borne the 'weight of general ſlander; and I ſhould be wanting 'to truth, to my family, and to myſelf, if I do not 'give a fair and true ſtate of my conduct for impartial 'men to judge of, when I am no more in being to 'anſwer for myſelf. But by the hints of mortality, and 'by the infirmities of a life of ſorrow and fatigue, I 'have reaſon to think, that I am not a great way off 'from, if not very near to, the great ocean of eternity; 'and the time may not be long before I embark on 'the laſt voyage. Wherefore, I think, I ſhould 'even accounts with this world before I go, that no 'actions (ſlanders) may lie againſt my heirs, admini'ſtrators, and aſſigns, to diſturb them in the peaceable

"Daniel De Foe. Being a true Account of his Conduct in public Affairs." In this piece he very ably and satisfactorily exculpated himself from the ill-grounded accusations that were thrown out against him. But while a part of this was in the press, and before he had quite finished it, he was struck with an apoplexy [KKK]. He languished for some time in a very low and weak state; but appears afterwards to have completely recovered; for he lived upwards of fifteen years after, and produced many other works.

As De Foe's political writings had involved him in great inconveniences, and much persecution, he appears, after his recovery, almost wholly to have quitted politics, [LLL], and to have turned his attention to such subjects, and writing such books, as would best procure him a subsistence. In 1719, he published, in 8vo. the most celebrated of all his works, under the following title: "The Life and strange surprizing Adventures of "Robinson Crusoe [MMM], of York, Mariner; who lived Eight-and-twenty years all "alone

'possession of their father's (character) inheritance '(122).'

(122) Appeal to Honour and Justice, &c. p. 50.

Of his general principles and conduct in politics he says, 'I was, from my first entering into the knowledge of public matters, and have ever been to this day, a sincere lover of the constitution of my country; zealous for liberty and the Protestant interest; but a constant follower of moderate principles, a vigorous opposer of hot measures in all parties. I never once changed my opinion, my principles, or my party; and, let what will be said of changing sides, this I maintain, that I never once deviated from the Revolution principles, nor from the doctrine of liberty and property, on which it was founded '(123).

(123) Ibid. p. 50.

In the course of his pamphlet, De Foe takes notice of the injustice that was done even to his private character. 'I cannot forbear,' says he, 'giving one 'example of the hard treatment I receive, which has 'happened even while I am writing this tract. I 'have six children; I have educated them as well as 'my circumstances will permit, and so as I hope shall 'recommend them to better usage than their father 'meets with in the world. I am not indebted one 'shilling in the world for any part of their education, 'or for any thing else belonging to bringing them up, 'yet the author of the Flying Post published lately, 'that I never paid for the education of any of my 'children. If any man in Britain has a shilling to 'demand of me for any part of their education, or 'any thing else belonging to them, let them come for 'it (124).'

(124) Ibid. p. 56, 57.

Besides vindicating his own public and private character, De Foe makes some general political observations: and he appears to have thought, that more moderation ought to have been manifested by George I. and his ministers towards the friends and adherents of the abdicated family. 'It is,' says he, 'and ever was my opinion, that moderation is the 'only virtue by which the peace and tranquillity of 'this nation can be preserved: even the King himself, 'I believe his Majesty will allow me that freedom, 'can only be happy in the enjoyment of the crown 'by a moderate administration. If his Majesty should 'be obliged, contrary to his known disposition, to 'join with intemperate councils, if it does not lessen 'his security, I am persuaded it will lessen his satisfaction. It cannot be pleasant or agreeable; and, 'I think, it cannot be safe to any just prince, to rule 'over a divided people, split into incensed and exasperated parties. Though a skilful mariner may 'have courage to master a tempest, and go fearless 'through a storm, yet he can never be said to delight 'in the danger. A fresh, fair gale, and a quiet sea, 'is the pleasure of his voyage; and we have a saying worth notice, to them who are otherwise minded, 'Qui amat periculum periibat in illo. To attain at the 'happy calm, which, as I say, is the safety of Britain, is the question which should now move us all; 'and he would merit to be the nation's physician, 'that could prescribe the specific for it. I think I may 'be allowed to say, a CONQUEST OF PARTIES will 'never do it; a BALANCE OF PARTIES may (125).'

(125) Ibid. p. 3, 4.

[KKK] He was struck with an apoplexy.] De Foe's "Appeal to Honour and Justice" was published in 1715, in 8vo. by J. Baker, at the Black Boy in Paternoster-row. At the end of it was the following addition by the publisher: 'While this was at the 'press, and the copy thus far finished, the author was 'seized with a violent fit of an apoplexy, whereby 'he was disabled from finishing what he designed in 'his farther defence; and continuing now for above 'six weeks in a weak and languishing condition, neither able to go on, nor likely to recover, at least in 'any short time, his friends thought it not fit to delay the publication of this any longer. If he recovers, he may be able to finish what he began; if 'not, it is the opinion of most that know him, that 'the treatment which he here complains of, and some 'others that he would have spoken of, have been the 'apparent cause of his disaster.'

[LLL] To have quitted politics.] Mr. Chalmers says, 'The death of Anne, and the accession of 'George I. seem to have convinced De Foe of the 'vanity of party-writing. And from this eventful 'epoch, he appears to have studied how to meliorate 'rather than to harden the heart; how to regulate, 'more than to vitiate, the practice of life (126).' Mr. Chalmers has taken a great deal of very commendable and successful pains to illustrate the Life of De Foe, and to vindicate his character from some of the ill-founded accusations which have been brought against him; but in this passage he has not done him justice. It appears at no period to have been the intention of De Foe to "harden the heart," or to "vitiate the practice of life." Nor had his works that tendency. Political writings, like those of De Foe, which are calculated to promote the interests of general liberty, and not the private views of any particular party, are highly beneficial to human society, and may contribute more to advance the common happiness of great communities, than any mere works of imagination.

(126) Life of De Foe, p. 50.

[MMM] The Life and strange surprizing Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.] Mr. Chalmers says, that the reception of Robinson Crusoe 'was immediate and universal; and Taylor, who purchased the manuscript 'after every bookseller had refused it, is said to have 'gained a thousand pounds. If it be inquired by 'what charm it is that these surprizing adventures 'should have instantly pleased, and always pleased, it 'will be found, that few books have ever so naturally 'mingled amusement with instruction. The attention 'is fixed, either by the simplicity of the narration, 'or by the variety of the incidents. The heart is 'amended by a vindication of the ways of God to man; 'and the understanding is informed, by various examples, how much utility ought to be preferred to 'ornament. The young are instructed while the old 'are amused (127).'

(127) Ibid. p. 52, 53.

In 1790, Mr. Walter published, in three volumes, 8vo. "A Selection from the Works of Daniel De "Foe." These volumes contain the whole of Robinson Crusoe, together with The True-born Englishman, and The Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England, examined and asserted. In an advertisement prefixed to this edition, it is observed by the editor, that 'few writers have suffered 'more severely by abridgers than Mr. Daniel De 'Foe. These lawless banditti, who are constantly 'employed in making predatory incursions into the 'territories of genius, have ravaged his most celebrated work, The Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, 'with a barbarous and undiscriminating ferocity. 'Not content with constantly ushering it into the 'world in a garb more worthy of a Grub-street production, than a work on which the great Rousseau 'has bestowed the highest encomiums, they have 'modernized

" alone in an uninhabited Iſland on the Coaſt of America, near the Mouth of the great " River of Oroonoque; having been caſt on Shore by ſhipwreck, wherein all the Men " periſhed but himſelf. With an Account how he was at laſt ſtrangely delivered by " Pirates. Written by himſelf. To which is added, a Map of the World, in which " is delineated the Voyages of Robinſon Cruſoe." The ſame year he publiſhed, " The " farther Adventures of Robinſon Cruſoe; being the ſecond and laſt Part of his Life, " and of the ſtrange ſurprizing Accounts of his Travels round three Parts of the Globe;" and the year following, " Serious Reflections, during the Life and ſurprizing Adven- " tures of Robinſon Cruſoe: with his Viſion of the Angelic World." This work has paſſed through upwards of twenty editions, and been tranſlated into many languages. The great invention which is diſplayed in it, the variety of incidents and circumſtances which it contains, related in the moſt eaſy and natural manner, together with the excellency of many of the moral and religious reflexions, render it a performance of very ſuperior and uncommon merit, and one of the moſt intereſting works that ever appeared [NNN]. Dr. Blair ſays, " No fiction, in any language, was ever better ſupported than " the Adventures of Robinſon Cruſoe. While it is carried on with that appearance of " truth and ſimplicity, which takes a ſtrong hold of the imagination of all readers, it " ſuggeſts, at the ſame time, very uſeful inſtruction; by ſhewing how much the native " powers of man may be exerted for ſurmounting the difficulties of any external " ſituation (i)." Robinſon Cruſoe has, indeed, been ſtrongly recommended by Rouſſeau, as a book admirably calculated to promote the purpoſes of natural education [OOO]. It has been pretended, that De Foe ſurreptitiouſly appropriated the papers of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotch mariner, who had lived in a ſolitary manner on the iſland of Juan Fernandez four years and four months, and who was taken on board on the ſecond of February, 1708-9, by captain Woodes Rogers, in his cruizing voyage round the world.

(i) Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Letters, vol. II. p. 309. edit. 4to. 1783.

' modernized it; that is, diveſted it of its ſimplicity,— ' ſtruck out every thing moral, uſeful, and impreſſive, ' —preſenting nothing but a bare exterior; totally ' rejecting thoſe excellent philoſophical and religious ' applications, every where interwoven with the ſtory.' Indeed, the fact is, that ſome of the other pieces of De Foe, as well as Robinſon Cruſoe, have been moſt wretchedly mutilated in the late editions, even when they were not publiſhed as abridgements. Walter's edition of Robinſon Cruſoe is one of the beſt; and a very elegant edition of Robinſon Cruſoe, in two volumes, 8vo. adorned with a variety of neat engravings, was publiſhed by Mr. Stockdale in 1790; and to this edition Mr. Chalmers's Life of De Foe, enlarged, was annexed.

[NNN] One of the moſt intereſting works that ever appeared.] This ſeems evidently to have been the opinion of Dr. Johnſon; who ſaid to Mrs. Thrale: ' Was there ever yet any thing written by mere man, ' that was wiſhed longer by its readers, excepting ' Don Quixote, Robinſon Cruſoe, and the Pilgrim's ' Progreſs (128)?'

(128) Anecdotes of Dr. Johnſon, p. 281.

[OOO] Recommended by Rouſſeau, as a book admirably calculated to promote the purpoſes of natural education.] In his Emilius Rouſſeau ſays, ' As we muſt have ' books, there is one already written, which, in my ' opinion, affords a complete treatiſe on natural edu- ' cation. This book ſhall be the firſt Emilius ſhall ' read: in this, indeed, will, for a long time, conſiſt ' his whole library, and it will always hold a diſtin- ' guiſhed place among others. It will afford us the ' text, to which all our converſations on the objects of ' natural ſcience will ſerve only as a comment. It ' will ſerve us as our guide during our progreſs to a ' ſtate of reaſon; and will even afterwards give us ' conſtant pleaſure, unleſs our taſte be totally vitiated. ' You aſk impatiently, what is the title of this won- ' derful book? Is it Ariſtotle, Pliny, or Buffon? No; ' it is Robinſon Cruſoe.

' Robinſon Cruſoe, caſt aſhore on a deſolate iſland, ' deſtitute of human aſſiſtance, and of mechanical im- ' plements, providing, nevertheleſs, for his ſubſiſtence, ' for ſelf-preſervation, and even procuring for himſelf ' a kind of competency. In theſe circumſtances, I ' ſay, there cannot be an object more intereſting to ' perſons of every age; and there are a thouſand ways ' to render it agreeable to children. Thus, you ſee, ' I have realized that deſert iſland, which I at firſt ' made uſe of only by way of compariſon. Such a ' ſituation, I confeſs, is very different from that of ' man in a ſtate of ſociety. Very probably it will ' never be that of Emilius; but it is from ſuch a ' ſtate he ought to learn to eſtimate others. The moſt ' certain method for him to raiſe himſelf above vulgar ' prejudices, and to form his judgement on the actual ' relations of things, is to take on himſelf the character ' of ſuch a ſolitary adventurer, and to judge of every ' thing about him, as a man in ſuch circumſtances ' would, by its real utility. This romance, beginning ' with his ſhipwreck on the iſland, and ending with ' the arrival of the veſſel that brought him away, ' would, if cleared of its traſh, afford Emilius, during ' the period we are now treating of, at once both in- ' ſtruction and amuſement. I would have him indeed ' perſonate the hero of the tale, and be entirely taken ' up with his caſtle, his goats, and his plantations; ' he ſhould make himſelf minutely acquainted, not ' from books but circumſtances, with every thing re- ' quiſite for a man in ſuch a ſituation. He ſhould ' affect even his dreſs, wear a coat of ſkins, a great ' hat, a large hanger; in ſhort, he ſhould be entirely ' equipt in his groteſque manner, even with his um- ' brella, though he would have no occaſion for it. I ' would have him, when at a loſs about the meaſures ' neceſſary to be taken for his proviſion or ſecurity, ' upon this or the other occaſion, examine the con- ' duct of his hero; he ſhould ſee if he omitted nothing, ' or if any thing better could be ſubſtituted in the ' room of what was actually done; and, on the diſ- ' covery of any miſtake in Robinſon, ſhould amend it ' in a ſimilar caſe himſelf; for I doubt not but he ' will form a project of going to make a like ſettle- ' ment. Not unlike to this were thoſe ancient caſtles ' in Spain, in that happy age when the height of ' human felicity conſiſted in the enjoyment of liberty ' and the neceſſaries of life.

' What opportunities of inſtruction would ſuch an ' amuſement afford an able preceptor, who ſhould ' project it only with a view to that end! The pupil, ' eager to furniſh a magazine for his iſland, would be ' more ready to learn than his tutor to teach him. ' He would be ſolicitous to know every thing that is ' uſeful, and nothing elſe: You would in ſuch a caſe ' have no more occaſion to direct; but only to re- ' ſtrain him. Let us haſten, therefore, to eſtabliſh ' him in this imaginary iſle, ſince to this he confines ' his preſent happineſs; for the time will now ſoon ' come, in which, if he is deſirous of life, it is not to ' live alone, and in which even a man Friday, the ' want of whom does not now affect him, would not ' be long ſatisfactory.

' The practice of ſimple manual arts, to the exer- ' ciſe of which the abilities of the individual, are ' equal, leads to the invention of the arts of induſtry, ' the exerciſe of which requires the concurrence of ' many. The former may be practiſed by hermits ' and ſavages; but the latter can be exerciſed only in a ' ſtate of ſociety, and render that ſtate neceſſary (129).'

But

But this charge againſt De Foe, though repeatedly and confidently brought, appears to be totally deſtitute of any ſolid foundation. De Foe probably took ſome general hints for his work from the ſtory of Selkirk, which he, or any other man, had a right to do, as Selkirk's ſtory had been publiſhed by Captain Woodes Rogers [PPP], in 1712, ſeven [PPP] Selkirk's ſtory had been publiſhed by Captain Woodes Rogers.] The account of Selkirk publiſhed by Captain Rogers we ſhall here inſert, as it cannot be improper that the moſt authentic account of this man ſhould be preſerved in the Biographia Britannica. After giving an account of his arrival at the Iſland of Juan Fernandez, in the ſhip named the Duke, in company with another ſhip called the Dutcheſs, of which Capt. Courtney was commander, Capt. Rogers ſays, 'Our 'pinnace returned from the ſhore, and brought abun-'dance of craw-fiſh, with a man cloathed in goat-ſkins, 'who looked wilder than the firſt owners of them. 'He had been on the iſland four years and four 'months, being left there by Capt. Stradling in the 'Cinque-Ports; his name was Alexander Selkirk, a 'Scotchman, who had been maſter of the Cinque-'Ports, a ſhip that came here laſt with Capt. Dam-'pier, who told me that this was the beſt man in her; 'ſo I immediately agreed with him to be a mate on 'board our ſhip. 'Twas he that made the fire laſt 'night when he ſaw our ſhips, which he judged to 'be Engliſh. During his ſtay here, he ſaw ſeveral 'ſhips paſs by, but only two came in to anchor. As 'he went to view them, he found them to be Spa-'niards, and retired from them; upon which they 'ſhot at him. Had they been French, he would have 'ſubmitted; but choſe to riſque his dying alone on 'the iſland, rather than fall into the hands of the 'Spaniards in theſe parts, becauſe he apprehended 'they would murder him, or make a ſlave of him in 'the mines, for he feared they would ſpare no ſtran-'ger that might be capable of diſcovering the South-'Sea. The Spaniards had landed before he knew 'what they were, and they came ſo near him that he 'had much ado to eſcape; for they not only ſhot at 'him, but purſued him into the woods, where he 'climbed to the top of a tree, at the foot of which 'they made water, and killed ſeveral goats juſt by, 'but went off again without diſcovering him. He 'told us that he was born at Largo, in the County of 'Fife in Scotland, and was bred a ſailor from his 'youth. The reaſon of his being left here was a 'difference betwixt him and his captain; which, to-'gether with the ſhip's being leaky, made him will-'ing rather to ſtay here, than go along with him at 'firſt; and when he was at laſt willing, the captain 'would not receive him. He had been in the iſland 'before to wood and water, when two of the ſhips 'company were left upon it for ſix months till the 'ſhip returned, being chaſed then by two French 'South-Sea ſhips.

'He had with him his clothes and bedding, with 'a firelock, ſome powder, bullets, and tobacco, a 'hatchet, a knife, a kettle, a bible, ſome practical 'pieces, and his mathematical inſtruments and books. 'He diverted and provided for himſelf as well as he 'could; but for the firſt eight months had much ado 'to bear up againſt melancholy, and the terror of 'being left alone in ſuch a deſolate place. He built 'two hutts with piemento trees, covered them with 'long graſs, and lined them with the ſkins of goats, 'which he killed with his gun as he wanted, ſo long 'as his powder laſted, which was but a pound; and 'that being near ſpent, he got fire by rubbing two 'ſticks of piemento wood together upon his knee. 'In the leſſer hut, at ſome diſtance from the other, 'he dreſſed his victuals, and in the larger he ſlept, 'and employed himſelf in reading, ſinging pſalms, 'and praying; ſo that he ſaid he was a better Chriſtian 'while in this ſolitude than ever he was before, or 'than, he was afraid, he ſhould ever be again. At 'firſt he never ate any thing till hunger conſtrained 'him, partly for grief, and partly for want of bread 'and ſalt; nor did he go to bed till he could watch 'no longer; the piemento wood, which burnt very 'clear, ſerved him both for firing and candle, and 'refreſhed him with its fragrant ſmell.

'He might have had fiſh enough, but could not 'eat them for want of ſalt, becauſe they occaſioned a 'looſeneſs; except craw-fiſh, which are there as 'large as our Lobſters, and very good. Theſe he 'ſometimes boiled, and at other times broiled, as 'he did his goats fleſh, of which he made very good 'broth, for they are not ſo rank as ours. He kept an 'account of 500 that he killed while there, and 'caught as many more, which he marked on the 'ear and let go. When his powder failed, he took 'them by ſpeed of foot; for his way of living, and 'continual exerciſe of walking and running, cleared 'him of all groſs humours, ſo that he ran with 'wonderful ſwiftneſs through the woods and up the 'rocks and hills, as we perceived when we employed 'him to catch goats for us. We had a bull-dog, 'which we ſent with ſeveral of our nimbleſt runners, 'to help him in catching goats; but he diſtanced 'and tired both the dog and the men, catched the 'goats, and brought them to us on his back. He 'told us that his agility in purſuing a goat had once 'like to have coſt him his life; he purſued it with ſo 'much eagerneſs, that he catched hold of it on the 'brink of a precipice, of which he was not aware, 'the buſhes having hid it from him; ſo that he fell 'with the goat down the ſaid precipice a great height, 'and was ſo ſtunned and bruiſed with the fall that he 'narrowly eſcaped with his life, and, when he came 'to his ſenſes, found the goat dead under him. He 'lay there about 24 hours, and was ſcarcely able to 'crawl to his hut, which was about a mile diſtant, or 'to ſtir abroad again in ten days.

'He came at laſt to reliſh his meat well enough 'without ſalt or bread, and in the ſeaſon had plenty 'of good turnips, which had been ſowed there by 'Capt. Dampier's men, and have now overſpread 'ſome acres of ground. He had enough of good 'cabbage from the cabbage-trees, and ſeaſoned his 'meat with the fruit of the piemonto trees, which is 'the ſame as the Jamaica Pepper, and ſmells deli-'ciouſly. He found there alſo a black pepper called 'Malagita, which was very good to expel wind, and 'againſt griping of the guts.

'He ſoon wore out all his ſhoes and clothes by 'running through the woods; and at laſt being forced 'to ſhift without them, his feet became ſo hard, that 'he ran every where without annoyances: and it 'was ſome time before he could wear ſhoes after we 'found him; for not being uſed to any ſo long, his 'feet ſwelled when he came firſt to wear them again.

'After he had conquered his melancholy, he di-'verted himſelf ſometimes by cutting his name on the 'trees, and the time of his being left, and con-'tinuance there. He was at firſt much peſtered with 'cats and rats, that had bred in great numbers from 'ſome of each ſpecies which had got aſhore from 'ſhips that put in there to wood and water. The 'rats gnawed his feet and clothes while aſleep, which 'obliged him to cheriſh the cats with his goats-fleſh; 'by which many of them became ſo tame, that they 'would lie about him in hundreds, and ſoon delivered 'him from the rats. He likewiſe tamed ſome kids, 'and to divert himſelf would now and then ſing and 'dance with them and his cats: ſo that by the care 'of Providence and vigour of his youth, being now 'about 30 years old, he came at laſt to conquer all 'the inconveniences of his ſolitude, and to be very 'eaſy. When his clothes wore out, he made him-'ſelf a coat and cap of goat-ſkins, which he ſtitched 'together with little thongs of the ſame, that he cut 'with his knife. He had no other needle but a nail; 'and when his knife was wore to the back, he made 'others as well as he could of ſome iron hoops that 'were left aſhore, which he beat thin and ground 'upon ſtones. Having ſome linen cloth by him, he 'ſewed himſelf ſhirts with a nail, and ſtitched them 'with the worſted of his old ſtockings, which he 'pulled out on purpoſe. He had his laſt ſhirt on 'when we found him in the iſland.

'At his firſt coming on board us, he had ſo much 'forgot his language for want of uſe, that we could 'ſcarcely underſtand him, for he ſeemed to ſpeak his 'words by halves. We offered him a dram, but he 'would ſeven years before the publication of Robinſon Cruſoe. But that work is undoubtedly the production of his own fertile genius; and though the charge againſt him, of his making an improper and unfair uſe of the papers of Selkirk, has been in ſuch a manner repeated from one author to another, that it ſeems to have gained almoſt univerſal credit [222], there is no reaſon for believing, that he was ever in poſſeſſion of a ſingle paper

'would not touch it, having drunk nothing but 'water ſince his being there, and it was ſome time 'before he could reliſh our victuals.

'He could give us an account of no other product 'of the iſland than what we have mentioned, except 'ſmall black plumbs, which are very good, but hard 'to come at, the trees which bear them growing on 'high mountains and rocks. Piemento trees are plenty 'here, and we ſaw ſome of 60 foot high, and about 'two yards thick; and cotton trees higher, and near 'four fathom round in the ſtock.

'The climate is ſo good, that the trees and graſs 'are verdant all the year. The Winter laſts no 'longer than June and July, and is not then ſevere, 'there being only a ſmall froſt, and a little hail, but 'ſometimes great rains. The heat of the Summer is 'equally moderate, and there's not much thunder or 'tempeſtuous weather of any ſort. He ſaw no veno-'mous or ſavage creature on the iſland, nor any other 'ſort of beaſt but goats, &c. as above-mentioned; 'the firſt of which had been put aſhore here on pur-'poſe for a breed by Juan Fernando, a Spaniard who 'ſettled there with ſome families for a time, till the 'continent of Chili began to ſubmit to the Spaniards, 'which, being more profitable, tempted them to quit 'this iſland, which is capable of maintaining a good 'number of people, and of being made ſo ſtrong that 'they could not be eaſily diſlodged.

'Ringroſe, in his account of Capt. Sharp's Voyage 'and other buccaneers, mentions one who had eſcaped 'aſhore here out of a ſhip which was caſt away with 'all the reſt of the company, and ſays he lived five 'years alone before he had the opportunity of another 'ſhip to carry him off. Capt. Dampier talks of a 'Moſkito Indian that belonged to Capt. Watling, 'who, being a hunting in the woods when the cap-'tain left the iſland, lived here three years alone, 'and ſhifted much in the ſame manner as Mr. Selkirk 'did, till Capt. Dampier came hither in 1684, and 'carried him off. The firſt that went aſhore was one 'of his countrymen, and they ſaluted one another, 'firſt by proſtrating themſelves by turns on the ground, 'and then embracing. But whatever there is in theſe 'ſtories, this of Mr. Selkirk I know to be true; 'and his behaviour afterwards gives me reaſon to 'believe the account he gave me how he ſpent his 'time, and bore up under ſuch an affliction, in which 'nothing but the Divine Providence could have ſup-'ported any man. By this one may ſee that ſolitude 'and retirement from the world is not ſuch an in-'ſufferable ſtate of life as moſt men imagine, eſpecially 'when people are fairly called or thrown into it un-'avoidably, as this man was; who in all probability 'muſt otherwiſe have periſhed in the ſeas, the ſhip 'which left him being caſt away not long after, and 'few of the company eſcaped. We may perceive by 'this ſtory the truth of the maxim, that neceſſity is 'the mother of invention, ſince he found means to 'ſupply his wants in a very natural manner ſo as to 'maintain his life, though not ſo conveniently, yet as 'effectually as we are able to do with the help of all 'our arts and ſocieties. It may likewiſe inſtruct us, 'how much a plain and temperate way of living con-'duces to the health of the body, and the vigour of 'the mind, both which we are apt to deſtroy by 'exceſs and plenty, eſpecially of ſtrong Liquor, and 'the variety as well as the nature of our meat and 'drink; for this man, when he came to our ordinary 'method of diet and life, though he was ſober enough, 'loſt much of his ſtrength and agility (130).'

Capt. Edward Cooke, who went the ſame voyage, and publiſhed a journal of it, alſo gives the following ſhort account of Selkirk: 'The Duke's boat went 'aſhore, and found one Alexander Selkirk, who had 'been formerly maſter of the Cinque Ports galley, 'an Engliſh privateer in thoſe parts; and having 'ſome difference with the Captain of the ſaid ſhip, 'and ſhe being leaky, he left the ſaid Captain Strad-'ling, going aſhore on this iſland, where he con-'tinued four years and four months, living on goats, 'and cabbages that grow on trees, parſnips, &c. He 'told us a Spaniſh ſhip or two, which touched there, 'had like to have taken him, and fired ſome ſhot at 'him. He was clothed in a goat's ſkin jacket, 'breeches, and cap, ſewed together with thongs of 'the ſame. He tamed ſome wild goats and cats, 'whereof there are great numbers (131).'

(131) Captain Edward Cooke's Voyage to the South Sea, and round the World, p. 34. 8vo. 1712.

Sir Richard Steele likewiſe gave ſome account of Selkirk in the 26th Number of the Engliſhman, which was publiſhed Dec. 3, 1713. Sir Richard appears to have had frequent converſations with him: and after giving an account of his reſidence on Juan Fernandez, and other particulars reſpecting him, he ſays, 'When 'I firſt ſaw him, I thought, if I had not been let 'into his character and ſtory, I could have diſcerned 'that he had been much ſeparated from company, 'from his aſpect and geſture. There was a ſtrong 'but chearful ſeriouſneſs in his look, and a certain 'diſregard to the ordinary things about him, as if 'he had been ſunk in thought. When the ſhip, 'which brought him off the iſland, came in, he 'received them with the greateſt indifference, with 'relation to the proſpect of going off with them, 'but with great ſatisfaction in an opportunity to re-'freſh and help them. The man frequently bewailed 'his return to the world, which could not, he ſaid, 'with all its enjoyments, reſtore him to the tranquil-'lity of his ſolitude. Though I had frequently con-'verſed with him, after a few months abſence, he 'met me in the ſtreet; and, though he ſpoke to me, 'I could not recollect that I had ſeen him. Familiar 'converſe in this town had taken off the lonelineſs of 'his aſpect, and quite altered the air of his face.

'This plain man's ſtory is a memorable example, 'that he is happieſt who confines his wants to natural 'neceſſities; and he that goes farther in his deſires, 'increaſes his wants in proportion to his acquiſitions; 'or, to uſe his own expreſſion, I am now worth eight 'hundred pounds; but ſhall never be ſo happy as when I 'was not worth a farthing (132).'

(132) Engliſhman, p. 124.

It ſhould be obſerved, that this was publiſhed by Sir Richard Steele about ſix years before the publication of Robinſon Cruſoe; and, from what Sir Richard ſays, it does not appear, that Selkirk had any manuſcript account of his adventures, or any expectation of gaining money by a narration of his life. If he had formed any ſuch deſign, or had any ſuch expectation, he certainly might have found ſome perſon to aſſiſt him in publiſhing his adventures long before the appearance of Robinſon Cruſoe.

[222.] It ſeems to have gained almoſt univerſal credit.] Even the ingenious Dr. Beattie ſpeaks of this charge againſt De Foe, and reaſons upon it, though he ſtates it differently from the common accounts, in a manner that ſhews he gave much more credit to it than it deſerved. Speaking of Robinſon Cruſoe, which he terms a Serious Romance, he ſays, 'The 'account given of that well-known work is as follows: 'Alexander Selkirk, a Scotch mariner, happened, by 'ſome accident, which I forget, to be left in the un-'inhabited iſland of Juan Fernandez, in the SouthSeas. 'Here he continued four years alone, without any 'other means of ſupporting life, than by running 'down goats, and killing ſuch other animals as he 'could come at. To defend himſelf from danger 'during the night, he built a houſe of ſtones rudely 'put together, which a gentleman, who had been in 'it (for it was extant when Anſon arrived there), 'deſcribed to me as ſo very ſmall, that one perſon 'could with difficulty crawl in, and ſtretch himſelf at 'length. Selkirk was delivered by an Engliſh veſſel, 'and returned home. A late French writer ſays, he 'had become ſo fond of the ſavage ſtate, that he was 'unwilling to quit it. But that is not true. The 'French writer either confounds the real ſtory of 'Selkirk, with a fabulous account of one Philip Quarl, 'written after Robinſon Cruſoe, of which it is a 'paltry imitation; or wilfully miſrepreſents the fact, 'in paper of Selkirk's [RRR]. But ſo great has been the deſire to deprive De Foe of the merit and invention of his Robinſon Cruſoe, that ſome verſes written by Mr. Cowper, in the character of Selkirk, and containing ſuch ideas and reflexions as might be ſuppoſed to ariſe in his mind during his ſolitary abode in Juan Fernandez, were printed in one of the periodical publications as Selkirk's, and as a proof that he was capable of producing ſuch a work as Robinſon Cruſoe. An abſurd ſtory has alſo been propagated, that Robinſon Cruſoe was written by Harley, Earl of Oxford, during his confinement in the Tower of London (k).

(k) Edinburgh Magazine, vol. VII. p. 269.

In 1720, De Foe publiſhed, in 8vo, "The Life, Adventures, and Piracies, of the "famous Captain Singleton [SSS]." The year after he publiſhed, in 8vo, "The "Fortunes

'in order to juſtify, as far as he is able, an idle con-
'ceit, which, ſince the time of Rouſſeau, has been in
'faſhion amongſt infidel and affected theoriſts on the 'continent, that ſavage life is moſt natural to us, and 'that the more a man reſembles a brute in his mind,
'body, and behaviour, the happier he becomes, and
'the more perfect.——Selkirk was adviſed to get his
'ſtory put in writing, and publiſhed. Being illiterate
'himſelf, he told every thing he could remember to
'Daniel De Foe, a profeſſed author of conſiderable
'note; who, inſtead of doing juſtice to the poor
'man, is ſaid to have applied theſe materials to his 'own uſe, by making them the ground-work of
'Robinſon Cruſoe; which he ſoon after publiſhed,
'and which, being very popular, brought him a
'good deal of money.

'Some have thought, that a love tale is neceſſary
'to make a romance intereſting. But Robinſon
'Cruſoe, though there is nothing of love in it, is 'one of the moſt intereſting narratives that ever
'was written; at leaſt in all that part which relates 'to the deſert iſland; being founded on a paſſion
'ſtill more prevalent than love, the deſire of ſelf-
'preſervation; and therefore likely to engage the 'curioſity of every claſs of readers, both old and
'young, both learned and unlearned.

'I am willing to believe, that De Foe ſhared the 'profits of this publication with the poor ſeaman:
'for there is an air of humanity in it, which one
'would not expect from an author who is an arrant
'cheat. In the preface to his ſecond volume, he 'ſpeaks feelingly enough of the harm done him by
'thoſe who had abridged the firſt, in order to re'duce the price. "The injury," ſays he, "which "theſe men do to the proprietors of works, is a "practice all honeſt men abhor: and they believe
"they may challenge them to ſhew the difference "between that and robbing on the highway, or "breaking open a houſe. If they cannot ſhew any "difference in the crime, they will find it hard to
"ſhew, why there ſhould be any difference in the "puniſhment." Is it to be imagined, that any man
'of common prudence would talk in this way, if he 'were conſcious that he himſelf might be proved 'guilty of that very diſhoneſty which he ſo ſeverely
'condemns (133)?'

(133) Diſſertations Moral and Critical, p. 565, 566. edit. 4to. 1783.

It certainly would have been ſomewhat extraordinary, that De Foe ſhould have talked in the manner he did, if he had been guilty of that with which he was charged. But the fact appears to have been, that the charge againſt De Foe, of having taken his book from Selkirk's manuſcripts, or from communications of any kind made by Selkirk, was a charge wholly groundleſs, and of which he had himſelf never heard; for we do not find, that the leaſt hint of any ſuch accuſation againſt him was ever publiſhed during his life-time.

Dr. Beattie ſays, 'Robinſon Cruſoe muſt be al'lowed, by the moſt rigid moraliſt, to be one of 'thoſe novels which one may read, not only with 'pleaſure, but alſo with profit. It breathes through'out a ſpirit of piety and benevolence; it ſets in a 'very ſtriking light the importance of the mechanic
'arts, which they, who know not what it is to be 'without them, are ſo apt to undervalue; it fixes
'in the mind a lively idea of the horrors of ſolitude,
'and, conſequently, of the ſweets of ſocial life, and
'of the bleſſings we derive from converſation and 'mutual aid; and it ſhews, how, by labouring
'with one's own hands, one may ſecure independ'ence, and open for one's ſelf many ſources of 'health and amuſement. I agree, therefore, with 'Rouſſeau, that this is one of the beſt books that 'can be put into the hands of children (134).'

(134) Id. ibid.

[RRR] There is no reaſon for believing, that he was ever in poſſeſſion of a ſingle paper of Selkirk's.] Mr. Chalmers remarks, that it appears from Woodes Rogers's account of Selkirk, that he 'had preſerved no pen,
'ink, or paper, and had loſt his language; ſo that 'he had no journal, or papers, which he could 'communicate, or by others could be ſtolen (135).'

(135) Life of De Foe, p. 55.

In the ſame year in which Robinſon Cruſoe was publiſhed, in 1719, a piece was printed, in 8vo, under the following title: 'The Life and ſtrange
'ſurprizing Adventures of Mr. D——— De F——,
'of London, Hoſier, who has lived above Fifty 'Years by himſelf in the kingdoms of North and 'South Britain. The various Shapes he has ap'peared in, and the Diſcoveries he has made for the 'Benefit of his Country. In a Dialogue between 'him, Robinſon Cruſoe, and his man Friday. With 'Remarks, ſerious and comical, upon the Life of
'Cruſoe.' But though this pamphlet was evidently written by an enemy of De Foe's, and for the very purpoſe of abuſing him on account of his Robinſon Cruſoe, not the leaſt hint is given, in any part of it, of his having taken it from any manuſcript of Alexander Selkirk's, or even from perſonal converſations with him, or of any ſuch report. On the contrary, Robinſon Cruſoe and Friday are ſpoken of as "airy "phantoms," of De Foe's own creating; the work is repeatedly repreſented as a mere fable, the production of De Foe's own imagination; he is ſaid to have made his hero, "out of nothing, famed from "Tuttle Street to Limehouſe-hole;" and the charges brought againſt him are ſuppoſed inconſiſtences in the ſtory, and his having ſpoken too well of Popery, and unfavourably of the Engliſh ſeamen. In the dialogue which is contained in this piece between De Foe, Robinſon Cruſoe, and Friday, the ſcene is laid in "a great field betwixt Newington-green "and Newington-town." A large white houſe, in which De Foe lived at Newington, is ſtill ſtanding.

When Robinſon Cruſoe was firſt publiſhed, the author was ſo far from being accuſed with having taken his book from any manuſcripts of Alexander Selkirk's, or from any perſonal converſations with him, that the great charge againſt him was, 'That 'the ſtory was feigned; that it was all a romance;
'that there never was any ſuch man, or place, or
'circumſtances in any man's life: that it was all
'formed and embelliſhed by invention, to impoſe
'upon the world.' This objection to his book De Foe found it very difficult to anſwer. However, at length, in order to remove all ſuch objections, and to prevent any farther doubt, or poſſibility of doubt, upon the ſubject, he publiſhed a declaration, in a preface to the Serious Reflections of Robinſon Cruſoe, ſigned by Robinſon Cruſoe himſelf, and part of which is as follows: 'I Robinſon Cru-
'ſoe, being at this time in perfect and ſound me'mory, (thanks be to God therefore) do hereby de'clare, their objection is an invention, ſcandalous in 'deſign, and falſe in fact; and do affirm, that the 'ſtory, though allegorical, is alſo hiſtorical; and 'that it is the beautiful repreſentation of a life of 'unexampled misfortunes; and of a variety not to 'be met with in the world: ſincerely adapted to,
'and intended for the common good of mankind;
'and deſigned, at firſt, as it is now farther applied,
'to the moſt ſerious uſes poſſible.'

[SSS] The Life, Adventures, &c. of the famous Captain Singleton.] Singleton is ſuppoſed to go to ſea

" Fortunes and Misfortunes of the famous Moll Flanders [TTT]." In 1722, he published, in 8vo. " Religious Courtship; being Historical Discourses on the Necessity of " marrying religious Husbands and Wives only. As also of Husbands and Wives being " of the same Opinions in Religion with one another. With an Appendix, of the Ne- " cessity of taking none but religious Servants, and a Proposal for the better managing " of Servants." The same year he also published, " A Journal of the Plague Year " [UUU]; being Observations or Memorials of the most remarkable Occurrences, as well " public as private, which happened in London during the last great Visitation in 1665. " Written by a Citizen who continued all the while in London." About the same time he likewise published, in 8vo, " Memoirs of a Cavalier: or, a Military Journal of the " Wars in Germany [WWW], and the Wars in England, from the Year 1632 to the " year 1648." In 1723, he published, in 8vo, " The History and remarkable Life of " the truly honourable Col. Jacque, commonly called Col. Jack [XXX];" and the year following, also in 8vo, " The Fortunate Mistress; or, a History of the Life and " vast Variety of Fortunes of Mademoiselle de Belau, afterwards called the Countess de " Wintelsheim [YYY] in Germany. Being the Person known by the Name of the Lady " Roxana, in the time of King Charles the Second." In justice to De Foe, it should be observed, that in these works, and others of a similar nature, in which he has given the supposed adventures of persons who passed through many scenes of vice and immorality, he often introduces very striking passages, to point out the pernicious tendency of vicious practices, and the destructive consequences of licentious courses.

In 1724, he published, in 8vo, the first volume of " A Tour through the whole " Island of Great Britain, divided into Circuits or Journies [ZZZ]. Giving a particular " and diverting Account of whatever is curious and worth Observation, viz. " First, a " Description of the principal Cities and Towns, their Situation, Magnitude, Government, " and Commerce. at about twelve years of age, and is led through a great variety of adventures. He is at length represented as having acquired an immense fortune by successful piracy, and yet rendered so miserable by conscious guilt, as to be about to put an end to his life. By his conversations with a Quaker surgeon, whom he had taken on board his ship, he is at last brought to a sense of religion, and completely reformed. The third edition of this book was published, in 12mo. in 1768.

[TTT]. The Fortunes and Misfortunes of the famous Moll Flanders.] The edition of this published in 1776, in 12mo, has the following title: " The His- " tory of Lætitia Atkins, vulgarly called Moll " Flanders. Published by Mr. Daniel De Foe, and " from Papers found since his Decease, it appears " greatly altered by himself; and from the said " Papers the present Work is produced." It is, however, manifest, that the whole of this is a deception, that the editor was in possession of no such papers of De Foe's, and that the work has been exceedingly altered and mutilated, not by the original author, but by the anonymous editor. It contains little more than one half in quantity of what is to be found in the edition of 1722.

[UUU] A Journal of the Plague Year.] An edition of this work was published in 8vo, in 1754, under the following title: " The History of the " Great Plague in London, in the year 1665: con- " taining Observations and Memorials of the most " remarkable Occurrences, both public and private, " that happened during that dreadful Period." Though this book may be considered as partly a work of imagination, yet De Foe appears to have interwoven in it the most authentic particulars which he could collect relative to the real circumstances which happened in London during the time of the plague. Mr. Chalmers says, ' The author's arti- ' fice consists in fixing the reader's attention by the ' deep distress of fellow men; and, by recalling the ' reader's recollection to striking examples of mor- ' tality, he endeavours to inculcate the uncertainty ' of life, and the usefulness of reformation (136).'

(136) Life of De Foe, p. 60.

[WWW] Memoirs of a Cavalier, &c.] Mr. Chalmers says, ' This is a romance the likest to truth ' that ever was written. It is a narrative of great ' events, which is drawn with such simplicity, and ' enlivened with such reflexions, as to inform the ' ignorant, and entertain the wise (137).' Among a great variety of incidents and transactions related in this book, are many particulars concerning to Gustavus Adolphus, and an interesting account of the destruction of Magdeburgh, and the infamous massacre of its inhabitants, by Count Tilly.

[XXX] The History and remarkable Life of the truly honourable Col. Jacque, &c.] The hero of this work is represented, when about ten years of age, as lodging in Glass-houses in the neighbourhood of East-Smithfield. After a variety of adventures, and being in some of the lowest situations in human life, and connected with some of the most profligate characters, he becomes a planter in Virginia, a merchant, and afterwards serves as a Lieutenant Colonel under Prince Eugene in Italy. This book contains some strong representations relative to the cruelty of the English planters towards their Negroes, and arguments in support of the policy, as well as humanity, of a more mild and generous treatment of them.

[YYY] The Fortunate Mistress, &c.] In the edition of 1735, this has the following title: " The " Life and Adventures of Roxana, the Fortunate " Mistress, or most Unhappy Wife." An edition of this was published in 1775, under the following title: " The History of Mademoiselle de Belau; " or, the New Roxana, the Fortunate Mistress, " afterwards Countess of Wintelsheim. Published " by Mr. Daniel De Foe: and, from Papers found " since his Decease, it appears was greatly altered by " himself; and from the said Papers the present " Work is produced." But this, as in the case of the History of Moll Flanders, is a manifest deception; nor was this edition published from any real papers of De Foe's. It does not contain one half of what is to be found in the edition of 1755. But these mutilated editions of these books appear to be the editions now in current sale.

[ZZZ] A Tour through the whole Island of Great Britain, &c.] The three first volumes of this work were written by De Foe; but a fourth volume was added to the edition of 1732, which is said to have been written by Mr. Samuel Richardson, De Foe having died the year before. As all the works of imagination of De Foe were first published in Richardson's time, it is probable that he was a diligent reader of his productions. There is the more reason to suppose this, because it may be observed, that the dramatic form, into which De Foe has thrown many parts of his works of imagination, has been evidently imitated by Richardson in his Pamela, Clarissa, and Sir Charles Grandison.

[AAAA] A New Voyage round the World, by a Courſe never ſailed before.] Mr. Chalmers ſays, 'Moſt 'voyagers have had this misfortune, that whatever 'ſucceſs they had in the adventure, they had very 'little in the narration. They are, indeed, full of 'the incidents of ſailing; but they have nothing of 'ſtory, for the uſe of readers who never intend to 'brave the dangers of the ſea. Theſe faults De 'Foe is ſtudious to avoid in his new voyage. He 'ſpreads before his readers ſuch adventures as no 'writer of a real voyage can hope to imitate, if we 'except the teller of Anſon's tale. In the life of 'Cruſoe we are gratified by continually imagining, 'that the fiction is a real fact. In the voyage round 'the world we are pleaſed by conſtantly perceiving, 'that the fact is a fiction, which, by uncommon 'ſkill, is made more intereſting than a genuine 'voyage (138).'

[BBBB] He was alſo the author of various other pieces.] When De Foe ceaſed to publiſh his Review, in 1713, he began to write a General Hiſtory of Trade, which he propoſed to publiſh in monthly numbers. But whether he met with few purchaſers, or from whatever other cauſe, he diſcontinued it after the publication of two numbers.

In 1726, he publiſhed, in 8vo, 'The Political 'Hiſtory of the Devil, as well antient as modern. 'In Two Parts. Part I. Containing a ſtate of the 'Devil's circumſtances and the various turns of his 'affairs, from his expulſion out of Heaven to the 'creation of man; with remarks on the ſeveral 'miſtakes concerning the reaſon and manner of his 'fall. Alſo his proceedings with mankind ever 'ſince Adam to the firſt planting of the Chriſtian 'Religion in the world. Part II. Containing his 'more private conduct, down to the preſent times. 'His government, his appearances, his manner of 'working, and the tools he works with.' The title of this book is ſomewhat different in different editions; but the ſixth edition of it was printed in 12mo, in 1770.

In 1727, he publiſhed, in 8vo, the firſt volume of 'The Compleat Engliſh Tradeſman; in familiar 'Letters, directing him in all the ſeveral Parts and 'Progreſſions of Trade, viz. 1. Of acquainting him 'with buſineſs during his apprenticeſhip.—2. Of 'writing to correſpondents in a trading ſtyle.—3. Of 'diligence and application, as the life of all buſineſs. '—4. Cautions againſt over-trading.—5. Of the 'ordinary occaſions of a tradeſman's ruin; ſuch as 'expenſive living, too early marrying, innocent 'diverſions, too much credit, being above buſineſs, 'dangerous partnerſhips, &c.—6. Directions in ſe- 'veral diſtreſſes of a tradeſman when he comes to 'fail.—7. Of tradeſmen compounding with other 'tradeſmen, and why they are ſo particularly ſevere 'upon one another.—8. Of tradeſmen ruining one 'another by rumours and ſcandal.—9. Of the 'cuſtomary frauds of trade, and particularly of 'trading lies.—10. Of credit, and how it is only 'to be ſupported by honeſty.—11. Of punctually 'paying bills, and thereby maintaining credit.—12. 'Of the dignity and honour of trade in England, 'more than in other countries. To which is added 'a Supplement, containing: 1. A warning againſt 'tradeſmen's borrowing money upon intereſt.—2. A 'caution againſt that deſtructive practice of draw- 'ing and remitting, as alſo diſcounting promiſſory 'bills, merely for a ſupply of caſh.—3. Directions 'for the tradeſman's accounts, with brief but plain 'examples, and ſpecimens for book-keeping.—4. Of keeping a duplicate, or pocket ledger, in 'caſe of fire.'

The ſecond volume of the Complete Engliſh Tradeſman was publiſhed in the courſe of the ſame year, in two parts. 'Part I. Directed chiefly to 'the more experienced tradeſmen; with cautions 'and advices to them after they are thriven, and 'ſuppoſed to be grown rich. viz. 1. Againſt run- 'ning out of their buſineſs into needleſs projects and 'dangerous adventures, no tradeſman being above 'diſaſter.—2. Againſt oppreſſing one another by 'engroſſing, underſelling, combination in trade, &c. '—3. Advice, that when he leaves off his buſineſs 'he ſhould part friends with the world; the great 'advantages of it; with a word of the ſcandalous 'character of a purſe proud tradeſman.—4. Againſt 'being litigious and vexatious, and apt to go to 'law for trifles; with ſome reaſons why tradeſmen's 'differences ſhould, if poſſible, be all ended by ar- 'bitration.——Part II. Being uſeful generals in 'trade, deſcribing the principles and foundation of 'the home trade of Great Britain: with large tables 'of our manufactures, calculations of the product, 'ſhipping, carriage of goods by land, importation 'from abroad, conſumption at home, &c. By all 'of which the infinite number of our tradeſmen are 'employed, and the general wealth of the nation 'raiſed and increaſed. The whole calculated for 'the uſe of all our inland tradeſmen, as well in the 'city as in the country.'

In 1728, he publiſhed, in 8vo. 'A Plan of the 'Engliſh Commerce; being a compleat Proſpect of 'the Trade of this Nation, as well the Home Trade 'as the Foreign. In three Parts. Part I. Contain- 'ing a view of the preſent magnitude of the Engliſh 'trade, as it reſpects, 1. The exportation of our 'own growth and manufacture.—2. The importa- 'tion of merchant goods from abroad.—3. The 'prodigious conſumption of both at home.—— 'Part II. Containing an anſwer to that great and 'important queſtion now depending, whether our 'trade, and eſpecially our manufactures, are in a 'declining condition, or no? ——Part III. Con- 'taining ſeveral propoſals, entirely new, for ex- 'tending and improving our trade, and promoting 'the conſumption of our manufactures in countries 'wherewith we have hitherto had no commerce. 'Humbly offered to the conſideration of King and 'Parliament.'

De Foe appears alſo to have been the author of the following pieces:

'An Enquiry into the Caſe of Mr. Aſgill's General 'Tranſlation; ſhewing that it is not a nearer way 'to Heaven than the Grave.' 8vo. 1704.

'The Experiment; or, the Shorteſt Way with 'the Diſſenters exemplified.' 8vo. 1705.

26th of April, 1731, in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He left a widow, and several children. His son, Norton De Foe [CCCC], was a writer in the Flying Post, and author of Memoirs of the Lives of the Princes of the House of Orange. His youngest daughter, Sophia, was married to Mr. Henry Baker, eminent for his skill in natural knowledge, and author of two treatises on the microscope. Mr. Chalmers remarks, that "De Foe probably died insolvent; for letters of administration on his goods and chattels were granted to Mary Brooke, widow, a creditrix, in September, 1733, after summoning in official form the next of kin to appear (l)."

Daniel De Foe possessed very uncommon merit both as a citizen, and as a writer; and yet few men have received more injurious treatment from their contemporaries. He has repeatedly been represented as an unprincipled writer, who had no view but to his own advantage, and who would write for any party by which he was employed. But these charges appear to have been totally destitute of foundation. He was not rich; and he naturally and reasonably endeavoured to make some pecuniary advantage of his writings; but he seems always to have written in conformity to his own principles; and, though much abuse has been thrown out against him, no evidence to the contrary has ever been produced. His prose works are much more valuable than his poetical performances. As a political writer, he had great merit; his sentiments appear to have been generally just, and he expressed himself with force and perspicuity. His pieces on the subject of trade and commerce exhibit uncommon penetration [DDDD], and very various 'Augusta Triumphans; or, the Way to make 'London the most flourishing city in the universe, '&c.' 8vo. 1729.

The last four were all published also under the name of Andrew Moreton, Esq.

The following pieces are likewise attributed to De Foe:

'The History of the Life and Adventures of Mr. 'Duncan Campbell.' 8vo. 1720.

'A System of Magic; or, a History of the Black 'Art. Being an Historical Account of Mankind's 'most early dealings with the Devil; and how the 'acquaintance on both sides first begun.' 8vo. 1727.

'The Judgement of whole Kingdoms and 'Nations concerning the Rights, Power, and Prerogative of Kings, and the Rights, Privileges, and 'Properties of the People,' &c. 8vo. 1710. This has been ascribed to Lord Somers, and printed as his.

'A Treatise concerning the use and abuse of the 'Marriage Bed,' &c. 8vo. 1729.

'The Supernatural Philosopher.' Published under the name of William Bond.

'Christian Conversation, in six Dialogues,' &c. 8vo. 1720.

He is also said to have been the author of the relation of the apparition of Mrs. Veal to Mrs. Bargrave at Canterbury, prefixed to many of the editions of Drelincourt's "Consolations against the fear of "Death." Mr. Chalmers says, 'The tradition 'among the booksellers is, that when Drelincourt's 'Consolations against the fear of Death first appeared, 'the book would not sell. De Foe said, he would 'make it sell; and he made the apparition recommend 'Drelincourt's book of death, as the best on that 'subject ever written. This affecting story had sold 'twenty editions of Drelincourt's Consolations before 'the year 1776, when the twenty-first edition was 'published (139).'

(139) Ibid. p. 74.

In Mr. Chalmers's "List of Writings, which are "considered as undoubtedly De Foe's," he has inserted "A Voyage to the World of Cartesius: written "originally in French, and translated into English." 8vo. 1692. But that translation was certainly not made by De Foe. A dedication is prefixed to it, signed by the translator, whose name was T. Taylor, of Magdalen-college, Oxford.

[CCCC] His son, Norton De Foe.] Pope has introduced Norton De Foe into his Dunciad in the following lines:

'Norton, from Daniel and Ostræa sprung, (140).' 'Bless'd with his father's front, and mother's tongue.

(140) Dunciad, Book II. l. 415.

And Savage, in the preface to his "Author to "be Lett," stiles Norton De Foe "Daniel De Foe's "son of love by a lady who vended oysters." But the whole of this appears to be nothing but a wanton and a groundless calumny.

[DDDD] His pieces on the subject of trade and commerce, &c.] Mr. Chalmers says, 'As a commercial 'writer, De Foe is fairly entittled to stand in the 'foremost rank among his contemporaries, whatever 'may be their performances or their fame.'—'The 'distinguishing characteristics of De Foe, as a commercial disquisitor, are originality and depth. He 'has many sentiments with regard to traffick, which 'are scattered through his Reviews, and which I 'never read in any other book.'—'Were we to compare De Foe with D'avenant, it would be found, 'that D'avenant has more detail from official documents; that De Foe has more fact from wider 'inquiry. D'avenant is more apt to consider laws 'in their particular application; De Foe more frequently investigates commercial legislation in its 'general effects. From the publications of D'avenant it is sufficiently clear, that he was not very 'regardful of means, or very attentive to consequences; De Foe is more correct in his motives, 'and more salutary in his ends. But, as a commer-various and extenſive knowledge. He was cenſurable for the perſonalities in his ſatirical poems, by which he made himſelf many enemies. But he ſeemed to ſuppoſe, that he was juſtified, as a ſatiriſt, if he advanced nothing, in what he wrote againſt others, but what he himſelf believed to be well founded. He had alſo too much zeal for orthodoxy; and was apt to write with too great aſperity reſpecting thoſe whom he conceived to hold unſound and heretical opinions. His education ſeems to have been defective, and he did not pay ſufficient attention to the elegancies of compoſition. That his inventive powers were very great, is ſtrikingly conſpicuous in his various works of imagination. Had he received that profit from his writings, which he ought to have derived from them, that alone muſt have been ſufficient to have placed him in a ſtate of affluence. For his works are very numerous; and ſome of them may be claſſed among the moſt popular productions that have appeared in this country [EEEE]. Before we conclude this article, we ſhall obſerve, that, in the courſe of it, we have been much indebted to the life of De Foe written by Mr. Chalmers, to which we have repeatedly referred. We have alſo received ſome uſeful notices, relative to this article, from the Rev. Mr. Ayſcough, of the Britiſh Muſeum.]

 [The delay in the publication of the "Biographia," which is ſometimes complained of, has, in ſeveral inſtances, been attended with peculiar advantages. Hence it has happened, that we have occaſionally been furniſhed with an acceſſion of freſh matter, which hath enabled us to render far more complete juſtice than could otherwiſe have been done to the Characters that paſs in Review before us. De Foe is an example of the truth of what is here remarked. Mr. Chalmers's ingenious and copious account of him, ſo recently publiſhed (1790), has been of ſignal ſervice on the preſent occaſion; and we have endeavoured to improve upon it, by large additions, and curious extracts. To the ſame gentleman we have been heretofore not a little indebted: for it was his Life of Sir John Davies, prefixed to Sir John's Hiſtorical Tracts, which induced and capacitated us to give, in our fourth volume, a new article of that eminent Lawyer and Poet.

Another obſervation, ſuggeſted by the caſe of De Foe, is, that eminent literary and intellectual merit at length finds its due place in the temple of Fame. Dr. Bentley, as we have formerly ſeen at large (m), is a remarkable inſtance in point; and De Foe is another example to the ſame purpoſe. Though his abilities in certain reſpects were generally acknowledged, full juſtice was far from being done to his reputation, either during his life, or for a conſiderable time after his deceaſe. By ſome perſons he has been ſpoken of with contempt; and others have only regarded him as a ready miſcellaneous author. But the world is at laſt become ſenſible of his great and various Talents. The world is at laſt become ſenſible that he was a very uncommon man: and that, as a noveliſt, a polemick, a commercial writer, and an hiſtorian, he is entitled to a high degree of applauſe. His poetry, though much celebrated in its day, conſtitutes the ſmalleſt part of his praiſes.

(m) Biographia Britannica, New Edition, Vol. ii. p. 242—247.

The rapidity with which De Foe muſt have written is not a little ſurprizing. In particular, his continuing "The Review," every week, for Nine Years, amidſt ſuch a multitude of other publications, and ſome of them large ones, is really aſtoniſhing. I was informed by the late William Ruſſel, Eſq. Fellow of the Royal Society, that he was told by Dr. Campbell, that De Foe once wrote two twelve-penny pamphlets in one day; and pamphlets had not then attained the ample margin, and the looſe printing, of modern times. In point of celerity and variety of compoſition, De Foe might be compared with a moſt eminent literary character of the preſent age. But it is only in theſe reſpects that we mention the ſimilitude; for the gentleman in queſtion ſuſtains a far higher rank in the diſcoveries of ſcience, and the extent of literature.

De Foe was poſſeſſed of an extraordinary knowledge of human nature, and had a ſingular capacity of ſuſtaining the characters which he introduced into his works. His "Journal of the Plague Year," which is repreſented as having been written at the

' cial prophet, De Foe muſt yield the palm to Child; ' who, foreſeeing from experience that men's conduct ' muſt finally be directed by their principles, foretold ' the colonial revolt: De Foe, allowing his prejudices ' to obſcure his ſagacity, reprobated that ſuggeſtion, ' becauſe he deemed intereſt a more ſtrenuous promp- ' ter than enthuſiaſm. Were we, however, to form ' an opinion, not from ſpecial paſſages, but from ' whole performances, we muſt incline to De Foe, ' when compared to the ableſt contemporary. We ' muſt allow him the preference, on recollection, that ' when he writes on commerce, he ſeldom fails to ' inſinuate ſome axiom of morals, or to inculcate ſome ' precept of religion (141).'

time by a Sadler in White-chapel, deceived Dr. Mead (n), nor will this be deemed ſurprizing, when we conſider the characteriſtic ſimplicity with which the book is compoſed. Many fine diſplays of natural ſentiment occur in Robinſon Cruſoe's man, Friday, and there is one which, in reading it, appeared to the preſent writer particularly ſtriking. It is in the converſation which Cruſoe has with Friday concerning the Devil. Friday, being informed by his maſter that GOD was ſtronger than the devil, aſks, "if "GOD much ſtrong, much might as the Devil, why GOD not kill the Devil, ſo make "him no more wicked?" At this queſtion Cruſoe was greatly ſurprized and embarraſſed; but, having recovered himſelf a little, he anſwered, that GOD would at laſt puniſh the Devil ſeverely; that he is reſerved for judgment, and is to be caſt into the bottomleſs pit, to dwell with everlaſting fire. Still, however, Friday not being ſatisfied, returns upon his maſter, repeating his words; "Reſerve at laſt! Me no underſtand: but why "not kill the Devil now, not kill great ago?" "You may as well aſk me," replied Cruſoe, "why GOD does not kill you and me, when we do wicked things here that "offend him; we are preſerved to repent and be pardoned." At this Friday muſed a while, and then ſaid, mighty affectionately: "Well, well, that well; ſo you, I, devil, "all wicked, all preſerve, repent, GOD pardon all (o)." Perhaps it would be going too far to aſſert, that De Foe intended covertly to inſinuate that there might be a more merciful diſtribution of things, in the final reſults of Divine Providence, than he dared at that time openly to exhibit.

It is obſerved, in note ZZZ, that the dramatic form, into which De Foe has thrown many parts of his works of imagination, has been evidently imitated by Richardſon, in his Pamela, Clariſſa, and Sir Charles Grandiſon. The writer of this addition to the article derives the greater pleaſure from the remark, as it coincides with an opinion which he has long entertained, that Richardſon was formed upon the model of De Foe. Richardſon ſeems to have learned from him that mode of delineating characters, and carrying on dialogues, and that minute diſcrimination of the circumſtances of events, in which De Foe ſo eminently excelled. If, in certain reſpects, the diſciple roſe above his maſter, as he undoubtedly did, in others he was inferior to him; for his converſations are ſometimes more tedious and diffuſe; and his works, though beautiful in their kind, are not by any means ſo various. Both of theſe writers had a wonderful ability in drawing pictures of human nature and human life. A careful peruſal of the "Family "Inſtructor," and the "Religious Courtſhip," would particularly tend to ſhew the reſemblance between De Foe and Richardſon. Indeed, the extraordinary merit of theſe two productions might have claimed a more copious diſcuſſion, had not the article been already extended to ſo great a length.] K.

 [DELANY (PATRICK), a Divine of the Eſtabliſhed Church of Ireland, of conſiderable celebrity in his day, and who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a variety of publications, chiefly of a theological nature, was born in that kingdom, in the year 1685 or 1686. His father lived as a ſervant in the family of Sir John Rennell, an Iriſh judge, and afterwards rented a ſmall farm, in which ſituation he is ſuppoſed to have continued to his deceaſe; for, when our author came to be in proſperous circumſtances, he was adviſed by Dr. Swift not to take his parents out of the line of life they were fixed in, but to render them comfortable in it *. At what place, and under whom, young Delany received his grammatical education we are not able to aſcertain; but we know, that at a proper age he became a Sizer in Trinity College, Dublin; that he went through his academical courſe; that he took the cuſtomary degrees; and that he was choſen firſt a Junior, and afterwards a Senior Fellow of the college. Such were his improvements in literature, and ſuch the character he ſuſtained, that, in his youth, he received many civilities from Sir Conſtantine Phipps, Lord Chancellor of Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne, and one of the Lords Juſtices of the kingdom at the time of her Majeſty's deceaſe. This eminent perſon, who, we are told, was a judge of all merit, excepting that of party, diſtinguiſhed Mr. Delany, among other juniors of the Univerſity of Dublin, for his learning, virtue, diſcretion, and good ſenſe (a). If Sir Conſtantine Phipps had continued in power, he would probably have endeavoured to give ſome effectual teſtimony of the regard which he entertained for our author; but as he reſigned, or, perhaps to ſpeak more accurately, was removed from his high offices ſoon after the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, no opportunity of that kind could ever occur (b). Happily for Mr. Delany, he was in a comfortable ſituation without the aſſiſtance of a patron; for he had become a tutor in the College, and his pupils were ſo numerous, that, in conjunction with the profits of his fellowſhip, he had a very affluent income.

During this time, he formed a cloſe connection of intimacy and friendſhip with Dr. Swift; and it appears, from ſeveral circumſtances, that he was one of the Dean of St. Patrick's chief favourites. It is not unreaſonable to conjecture, that, beſides his general merit, it might be ſome additional recommendation to him, that he readily entered into the Dean's playful diſpoſition. He joined with Swift and Dr. Sheridan in writing or anſwering riddles, and in compoſing other ſlight copies of verſes, the only deſign of which which was to paſs away the hours in a pleaſant manner. Several of Mr. Delany's exertions, on theſe occaſions, may be ſeen in the collections of Swift's Works, to which we refer our readers.

Theſe temporary amuſements did not, however, interfere with our author's more ſerious concerns. He applied vigorouſly to his ſtudies, diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a popular preacher, and was ſo celebrated as a tutor, that by the benefit of his pupils, and his ſenior fellowſhip, with all its perquiſites, he received every year between nine hundred and a thouſand pounds (c).

(c) Swift's Works, ubi ſupra, p. 267.

In 1724, an affair happened in the College of Dublin, with regard to which Dr. Delany is repreſented as having been guilty of an improper interference. Two Undergraduates, having behaved very inſolently to the Provoſt, and afterwards refuſing to make a ſubmiſſion for their fault, were both of them expelled. On this occaſion Dr. Delany took the part of the young men, and (as it is ſaid) went ſo far as to abuſe the Provoſt to his face, in a ſermon at the College Chapel. As it could not poſſibly be his deſign to encourage irregularities in the ſtudents, we muſt ſuppoſe that he was either influenced by a party ſpirit, or by perſonal animoſity, or by a ſincere conviction that the Provoſt had exceeded his authority. Whatever may have been his motives, the reſult of the matter was, that the Doctor was obliged to give ſatisfaction to the Provoſt, by an acknowledgment of his offence (d).

(d) Abp. Boulter's Letters, Vol. I. p. 15—19.

Our author's conduct in this affair, which had been diſpleaſing to the Lord Primate Boulter, might probably contribute to invigorate the oppoſition which the Archbiſhop made to him on a particular occaſion. In 1725, he was preſented, by the Chapter of Chriſtchurch, to the Pariſh of St. John's, in the City of Dublin. But, without a royal diſpenſation, he could not keep his fellowſhip with this new living. Archbiſhop Boulter, therefore, applied to the Duke of Newcaſtle, to prevent the diſpenſation from being granted. The reaſons he aſſigned were, that Dr. Delany was a great Tory; that he had much influence in Dublin and the parts adjacent; and that it were to be wiſhed, for his Majeſty's ſervice, that he might be tempted by ſome good country living to quit the College; whereas if he had St. John's with his fellowſhip, there could be no hopes of his removal (e). In conſequence of the Primate's application having been ſucceſsful, he wrote, in the following terms, to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. "I am very much "obliged to your Grace, and the other Lords Juſtices, for rejecting Dr. Delany's re- "queſt for a faculty to hold a living with a fellowſhip. I can aſſure your Grace it was "not out of any ill will to the perſon that I oppoſed it, but that his Majeſty's friends "here think it would be very much for his Majeſty's ſervice if he were removed from "the College to ſome other part of the kingdom, inſtead of having a living here in "town, and ſuch an addition to his fellowſhip, as may put it beyond any temptation "but that of a wife, to quit it. This was my reaſon then, and ſtill continues ſo. But "I am now a little ſurprized with what I did not then know, that his application was "not to be diſpenſed with from the obligation of any ſtatute, but of an oath he had "taken never to hold ſuch a benefice. This, where there is not an expreſs clauſe in "the oath, niſi tecum aliter diſpenſatum fuerit, ſeems to me altogether new (f)." We have tranſcribed the above paſſage for two reaſons; firſt, as it ſhews that Dr. Delany was conſidered as a formidable opponent by the Iriſh adminiſtration; and, ſecondly, as the latter part of it exhibits a curious circumſtance in the Doctor's character.

In 1727, our author began to have the proſpect of being regarded by Government with a more indulgent eye. On the acceſſion of King George the Second, Lord Carteret, afterwards Earl Granville, returned with a new commiſſion to Ireland, as Lord Lieutenant of that Kingdom. As his Lordſhip was underſtood to be leſs hoſtile to the Tories than his predeceſſors in office; and as he was at the ſame time a man of wit, and a patron of learning in general; it was reaſonably expected, that, in the diſtribution of eccleſiaſtical preferments, he would not be ſo much influenced by conſiderations of party as former Governors had been. Indeed, he cultivated the friendſhip of Dr. Swift, and, in ſome few inſtances, paid an attention to his recommendations (g).

(g) Biographia Britannica, Vol. iii. p. 273—275.

Among other clergy of diſtinction, the Dean mentioned Dr. Delany to Lord Carteret, as a perſon whoſe character it was proper his Excellency ſhould know, and by the truth of which Dr. Swift would himſelf be content to ſtand or fall in the Lord Lieutenant's opinion. This recommendation was backed by that of the Archbiſhop of Dublin (Dr. King); the conſequence of which was, that Dr. Delany became known to the Chief Governor, who was particularly pleaſed with him on account of his knowledge and taſte in ancient and claſſical literature, and invited him frequently to the Caſtle (h).

(h) Swift's Works, ubi ſupra, p. 266.

Such were the political prejudices of the times, that the favour, ſhewn by the Lord Lieutenant to a ſmall number of gentlemen who were reputed Tories, was regarded in a very evil light by ſome of thoſe bigoted Whigs who could diſcern no merit out of their own party. This folly, therefore, Dr. Swift took occaſion to expoſe; which he did in a pleaſant manner, in a pamphlet, written in 1730, and entituled, "A Vindication of "his Excellency John Lord Carteret, from the Charge of favouring none but Tories,

"High-Churchmen and Jacobites (i)." In fact, the Lord Lieutenant was too much reſtrained by his ſtation, and by the temper of Government, both in England and Ireland, to be able to confer any very extraordinary advantages on the clergymen recommended to him by Dr. Swift. In the year 1727, Dr. Delany was preſented, by the Univerſity of Dublin, to a ſmall Northern living, of ſomewhat better than One Hundred pounds a Year; and, about the ſame time, Lord Carteret promoted him to the Chancellorſhip of Chriſt Church, which was of equal value. Afterwards, in 1730, his Excellency gave him a Prebend in St. Patrick's Cathedral, the produce of which did not exceed either of the other preferments. Upon receiving the two former of theſe promotions, the Doctor, who had grown weary of an academic life, ventured into the world, and that in a very ſcanty condition; "having," ſays Swift, "ſquandered away "all his annual income in a manner which, although perhaps proper enough for a "Clergyman without a family, will not be for the advantage of his character to diſcover "either on the Exchange, or at a Banker's Shop." According to the ſame author, the whole of Dr. Delany's revenues, after he had obtained the prebend of St. Patrick's, amounted to little more than three hundred pounds a year, "inſtead of the like ſum of "infallible rents from a ſenior fellowſhip, with the offices annexed; beſide the advan-"tage of a free lodging, a great number of pupils, and ſome other eaſements (k)." We have, however, our doubts whether this ſtatement be exactly true: for, in a poetical epiſtle to Lord Carteret, by Dr. Delany, (we believe in 1729), ſoliciting farther promotion, he humouroufly repreſents it as being objected to him, that he was a double Vicar, a double Rector, and a Dignitary, with a lecture in the City; whence it is apparent, that he had certain advantages not enumerated by Dr. Swift. Nevertheleſs, it ſeems clear that his income, taking it altogether, was not very great; for he thus addreſſes his patron:

(k) Ibid. p. 267, 268.

"Would my good Lord but caſt up the account,
"And ſee to what my revenues amount;
"My titles ample! but my gain ſo ſmall,
"That one good Vicarage is worth them all:
"And very wretched ſure is he, that's double
"In nothing but his titles and his trouble (l)."

In 1729, Dr. Delany began a periodical paper called, "The Tribune," which was continued through about twenty numbers. Not having ſeen any of them, we can only conjecture, from the title of the work, that its deſign was, in part at leaſt, if not wholly, political. Indeed, it has been ſpoken of as a curious performance in that light. This was not the firſt time in which the Doctor exerted his abilities as a proſe writer: for he is underſtood to have been an anonymous aſſiſtant in a valuable publication, entituled, "Hibernicus's Letters," and which was carried on, by ſeveral hands, in the years 1725, 1726, and 1727 (m).

Soon after, our author engaged in a more ſerious and important work, of a theological nature, the intention of publiſhing which brought him to London, in 1731. On this occaſion, Archbiſhop Boulter, to whom he had for ſome time been reconciled, gave him a letter of recommendation to Dr. Edmund Gibſon, Biſhop of London. "The "perſon, ſays the primate, who waits upon you with this, is Dr. Delany, miniſter of "one of the principal churches in this City, and one of our moſt celebrated preachers. "He has of late employed his thoughts and pen in the vindication of our moſt holy "religion, and has ſome thoughts of printing what he has written, if it ſhall be thought "to be of ſervice (n)." The work here referred to, and which received the approbation of the Biſhop of London, to whoſe opinion it was ſubmitted, was undoubtedly Dr. Delany's "Revelation examined with Candour," the firſt volume of which was publiſhed in 1732 (o). The ſame year appears to have been of importance to our author in a domeſtic, as well as a literary view; for on the ſeventeenth of July in this year, he married, in England, Mrs Margaret Teniſon, an Iriſh widow lady, of large fortune (p). On his return to Dublin, he manifeſted his regard to the Univerſity in which he was educated, and of which he had long been a diſtinguiſhed member, by giving Twenty Pounds a year, to be diſtributed among the ſtudents (q). In 1734, appeared the ſecond volume of "Revelation examined with Candour;" and ſo favourable a reception did the whole work meet with from the learned world, that a third edition was called for in 1735. The title, as then publiſhed, was as follows: "Revelation examined with "Candour; or a fair Enquiry into the Senſe and Uſe of the ſeveral Revelations expreſſly "declared, or ſufficiently implied, to be given to Mankind, from the Creation, as they "are found in the Bible. By a profeſſed Friend to an honeſt Freedom of Thought "in religious Enquiries." By this performance, the firſt volume of which was dedicated to his Majeſty, and the ſecond to Lord King, Dr. Delany was thought to have rendered very conſiderable ſervice to the cauſe of revealed religion. The work conſiſts of diſſertations on a variety of important ſubjects, a liſt of which is given below [A]; and it muſt be allowed by thoſe who have read the book, that the Doctor has diſplayed in it no ſmall degree of ingenuity and learning, and that many of his remarks are curious and uſeful. Whether his judgment and powers of reaſoning were equal to his talents in other reſpects, may perhaps be doubted. In one of his diſſertations, our author earneſtly contends for the perpetuity of the apoſtolic decree, in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts, relative to the abſtaining from things ſtrangled, and from blood. The zeal with which he endeavoured to ſhew, that all Chriſtians are ſtill in duty bound to refrain from this ſpecies of food, did not fail of exciting attention, and of giving occaſion to ſome pleaſantry, but was productive of no conviction. In another reſpect the Doctor fell into rather a laughable miſtake. The fine ironical piece of Dr. Hare's, on the difficulties and diſcouragements which attend the ſtudy of the Scriptures, our author underſtood to be a ſerious and earneſt diſſuaſive againſt ſtudying the Sacred Writtings; and, accordingly, he has pathetically complained of it in that view in the following terms: "Men," ſays he, "were not only diſcouraged from ſtudying and revering the "ſcriptures, by perceiving how little true religion was promoted by that ſtudy, under "the management of ſome of its moſt eminent and learned profeſſors and their followers; "but alſo by being told that this ſtudy was difficult, fruitleſs, and dangerous; and a "public, an elaborate, an earneſt diſſuaſive from this ſtudy, for the very reaſons now "mentioned, enforced by two well known examples, and believed from a perſon of "great eminence in the church, hath already paſſed often enough through the preſs, "to reach the hands of all the clergymen in Great Britain and Ireland. God, in his "great mercy, forgive the author (r)." This miſtake has not eſcaped the notice of Biſhop Warburton, who hath animadverted upon it in his dedication to the Free Thinkers, prefixed to his "Divine Legation of Moſes." "But," ſays the Biſhop, "with all the "merit of this beautiful ſatire," (Hare's Tract), "it has been its fortune not only to be "abuſed by your bad imitations, but to be cenſured by thoſe in whoſe cauſe it was com-"poſed; I mean the friends of religion and liberty. An author of note thus expreſſes "himſelf."—Delany's Complaint is then cited, after which Dr. Warburton adds: "Seriouſly it is a ſad caſe; that one well-meaning man ſhould ſo widely miſtake the end "and deſign of another, as not to ſee by the turn and caſt of the difficulties and diſ-"couragements, that it is a thorough irony, addreſſed to ſome hot bigots then in power, "to ſhew them what diſmal effects that inquiſitional ſpirit, with which they were poſ-"ſeſſed, would have on literature in general, at a time when public liberty looked with "a very ſickly face! Not, I ſay, to ſee this, but to believe, on the contrary, that it "was really intended as a public, an elaborate, an earneſt diſſuaſive from the ſtudy of the "ſcriptures (s)."

In 1738, Dr. Delany publiſhed a ſermon which he had preached at Dublin, before the Lord Lieutenant William Duke of Devonſhire, on the Thirtieth of January preceding, being the Anniverſary of the Martyrdom of King Charles the Firſt. If, in this ſermon, our author has given a much higher character of that monarch than zealous Whigs will admire, it muſt, at the ſame time, be acknowledged, that the diſcourſe contains ſome reaſonable conceſſions and ſalutary reflections, and that the latter part of it is full of loyalty to the preſent reigning family. It was afterwards inſerted in the Doctor's volume upon ſocial duties.

In the ſame year appeared one of the moſt curious of Dr. Delany's productions, which was a pamphlet entituled, "Reflections upon Polygamy, and the Encouragement given "to that Practice in the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament." A ſecond edition being called for in 1739, a preface was added, in which the main objection againſt the work is obviated, and the author's views in publiſhing it at that time accounted for. The piece is dedicated, "To the moſt Reverend Father in God, Hugh, by Divine Providence,

[A] A Liſt of which is given below.] Volume, the firſt; conſiſting of Fifteen Diſſertations. 1. Of the Forbidden Fruit. 2. Concerning the Knowledge of the Brute World conveyed to Adam. 3. Of the Knowledge of Marriage given to Adam. 4. Of the Skill of Language infuſed into Adam. 5. Of the Revelations which immediately followed the Fall. 6. Concerning ſome Difficulties and Objections that lie againſt the Moſaic Account of the Fall. 7. Some farther Difficulties relating to the Fall conſidered. 8. Of Sacrifices. 9. Concerning that Corruption and Degeneracy of Mankind, which drew down the Divine Judgment of the Deluge. 10. Concerning the Natural Cauſes made uſe of by Almighty God to to flood the Earth. 11. Concerning the Ends of Divine Wiſdom anſwered by the Deluge. 12. Objections to the Moſaic Account of the Deluge and this Explication of it Conſidered. 13. Of the Concurrence of all Antiquity with the Moſaic Account of the Flood. 14. Of other Teſtimonies relating to the Deluge. 15. Some Difficulties relating to Noah's Ark conſidered.

In the preface, the Reader is deſired to take notice, that the word, Revelation, is, in the Diſſertations, taken in a very extenſive ſenſe; to ſignify every interpoſition of Providence in the government of the world, out of the ordinary eſtabliſhed courſe of nature.

Volume the ſecond; conſiſting of eight Diſſertations. 1. Of the grant of Animal Food made to Noah after the Flood. 2. A Continuation of the former, but principally of the Apoſtolic Decree concerning Blood and Things ſtrangled, whether it was only of temporary obligation. 3. Of the building of Babel. 4. Of the Predictions relating to Iſhmael. 5. Of Circumciſion. 6. Of the Deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. 7. Of the Command given to Abraham to ſacrifice his ſon. 8. A ſhort Recapitulation of the preceding Diſſertation.

" Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, a True Believer, a Lover of Truth, and a " Friend of Mankind." In this tract the confuſion, diſorders, and miſchiefs, which muſt ever be occaſioned in families by the practice of Polygamy, are well ſtated and repreſented. With regard to the other part of our author's deſign, which is to conſider the encouragement ſuppoſed to be given to the practice in queſtion in the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, we do not think that he has written ſo ably upon the ſubject as has ſince been done by the late ingenious Mr. Badcock, in the two fine articles of the Monthly Review relative to Madan's Thelyphthora. Of the ſeven diſſertations into which Dr. Delany's tract is divided, the two laſt are the moſt curious. The former of them is intended to ſhew that nothing can be more raſh and ill grounded than to draw any concluſions in favour of Polygamy from the number of inhabitants in Turkey, China, and Japan. In the other diſſertation, the ſtate of the ancient Northern nations is treated of; and this part of the work we ſhall inſert below [B], as the pamphlet is now little known, and [B] This part of the work we ſhall inſert below.] 'The laſt proof of the multiplication of mankind by 'Polygamy, beyond that by ſingle marriages, is taken 'from the prodigious increaſe of mankind in the ruder 'and more barbarous ages, ſufficiently evinced by 'thoſe frequent and furious ſwarms from the Northern 'hive; which have wholly ceaſed for ſome ages paſt, 'ſince the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity: that is, ſince 'Polygamy and promiſcuous copulations ceaſed among 'them.

'This I own did for a conſiderable time appear to 'me a ſtrong argument in favour of Polygamy: and 'upon inquiry I found it ſuch as required more 'time carefully to diſcuſs and clearly to determine 'than can well be ſuppoſed to have been employed 'upon it, by ſome very ingenious men who read only 'for their pleaſure.

'In the firſt place then I think it evident, from the 'moſt antient and authentic accounts of the Northern 'nations, that Polygamy never prevailed much amongſt 'them before the eſtabliſhment of Mahometiſm.

'For firſt, Herodotus, and Trogus, who ſeem to 'have carefully conſidered the manners of the Scythians, give us no hint of any ſuch practice prevailing amongſt them; though their other ſingularities are carefully noted. But at the ſame time it 'muſt be owned, that they are mentioned, by Strabo, 'as having their wives and children in common.

'In the next place, Pomponius Mela, who alſo 'ſhould ſeem to have been a careful inquirer, found 'no ſuch practice among any of the Northern nations 'of Europe, except that of Thrace only; who probably borrowed it from their Aſiatic neighbours. 'And this nation only of all the Europeans is noted 'by Strabo (l. 7.) on the ſame account.

'It is true, we are told by Tacitus, in his account 'of Germany, that this (Germany) was almoſt the 'only nation among the Barbarians, where ſingle 'marriages were in uſe; but in this I think he muſt 'be miſtaken for the reaſons now mentioned. Beſides that, this nation are ſuppoſed by Strabo to 'have been called Germans by the Romans, becauſe 'they were Germani, that is, brethren to the Gauls. 'And indeed the Gauls we hear ſo often of in the 'Roman hiſtorians before the times of Cæſar, ſeem 'to have been in all reſpects the ſame people. Cæſar 'we know hath given a particular account of their 'manners, as they ſtood at that time; and yet without the leaſt mention of their being Polygamiſts, 'which could not have been well avoided, eſpecially 'when he deſcribed their manners in contradiſtinction 'to thoſe of the Germans. We are alſo told by 'Strabo (l. 7) that the Germans are in their manners like the Gauls.

'But theſe writers will eaſily be reconciled, if we 'ſuppoſe that Tacitus, conſidering Gaul as now a 'Roman province, did not place its inhabitants 'among the number of the Barbarians.

'It is obſervable however, beſides all this, that it 'is made matter of doubt even by Tacitus himſelf, 'whether the Araviſci migrated from Germany into 'Pannonia, or the Oſi deſcended into Germany from 'them; inaſmuch as their language, manners, and 'inſtitutions were ſtill the ſame.

'But, ſuppoſing the Germans were the only nation 'among the Barbarians that abſtained from Polygamy, 'it is evident to a demonſtration, that they multiplied 'faſter than any other nation of the known world. 'And of this we need no other proof than the accounts 'we have of their incredible numbers, their continued 'contentions with the whole Roman power, and their 'almoſt as continued ſlaughters from Marius to Gratian; notwithſtanding which, they at laſt prevailed 'over the whole force of the empire, and were 'eſtabliſhed into an empire of their own, at leaſt as 'much by the advantage of their numbers as their 'proweſs.

'The numbers vanquiſhed by Marius were prodigious; and yet thoſe ſubdued and ſlaughtered by 'Cæſar were much more conſiderable. Under the 'Reign of Auguſtus, Druſus we are told ſubdued the 'greateſt and ſtrongeſt nations of Germany; and yet 'notwithſtanding this every one knows with what 'exceſs and bitterneſs of grief that emperor was wont, 'after this, to call upon Quintilius Varus to reſtore 'thoſe legions, which this people had intirely cut off.

'In the ſucceeding reign Germanicus the ſon of 'Druſus, after many hard and dangerous conflicts, 'triumphed over the Germans, who yet vexed the 'Roman territories before the end of it. His ſon 'Caligula undertook an expedition againſt them, but 'returned without either conqueſt or glory.

'In the reign of Veſpaſian, Pliny the elder, found 'materials enough for an ample hiſtory of the Roman 'wars with the Germans, which he compoſed in 'twenty books. Plin. Ep. l. iii. Ep. V.

'And it is obſerved by Tacitus, that from the 'conſulate of Cæcilius Metellus to the ſecond conſulate of Trajan, (a ſpace of about 210 years), 'the Romans were employed in ſubduing the Germans; in which ſpace I think it evident that they 'ſuſtained more damage from that nation than from 'all the reſt of the world beſides. It is true, Tacitus 'hath touched but lightly upon theſe loſſes; yet he 'cannot help owning that they were greater than 'thoſe ſuſtained from the Samnites, the Carthaginians, the Spaniards, the Gauls, or the Parthians; 'that they loſt five conſular armies together, beſides 'the legions under Varus; that neither Marius, Cæſar, 'Druſus, Nero, or Germanicus, ſubdued them with 'impunity; that after this they became the invaders, 'and drove the legions from their ſtations, and 'graſped at Gaul; in a word, that of late years they 'were more triumphed over than ſubdued.

'From this time we hear little of them till the 'reign of Marcus Aurelius, who was ſucceſsful againſt 'them, but not without infinite ſlaughter and loſs of 'his armies. In honour of whoſe conqueſts over 'them and the Sarmatæ their allies, that noble pillar 'which bore his name was erected to him by decree 'of the ſenate. And from this pillar it ſufficiently 'appeareth, that the Romans themſelves then thought 'the deliverance of their Emperor and armies, and 'the deſtruction of their enemies wrought, by the 'miraculous interpoſition of Almighty God.

'But whether this were obtained by the prayers of 'the Chriſtians, or the piety of the Emperor, is no 'part of my preſent purpoſe to determine.

'Commodus, who ſucceeded him, is obſerved by 'hiſtorians to have had no reſemblance of his father, 'but in his ſucceſs againſt the Germans.

'The Germans began again to be troubleſome 'under the reign of Maximin; and were again ſubdued. And yet, about twenty years after, they ravaged the Empire under the reign of Valerian; and 'penetrated as far as Ravenna; and in the next reign 'as far as Spain. Not long after, Claudius Gothicus 'ſlew and as our extract from it will afford a proper ſpecimen of the author's abilities, learning, and mode of writing.

In

'ſlew fifteen thouſand of them in one battle; and 'ſoon after, Aurelian (the rapidity of whoſe con-'queſts made him not unworthily to be compared to 'Alexander) recovered the Empire from them, and 'all other Barbarians; and yet in the compaſs of a 'very few years they poſſeſſed themſelves of all the 'Gauls, and were expulſed by Probus, who ſlew 'four hundred thouſand of them, and took ſixteen 'thouſand into pay.

'In the reign of Dioclefian they infeſted the em-'pire by Sea; and in the ſame reign Conſtantius ſlew 'ſixty thouſand of them in one day by land; and yet 'from this time to the reign of Gratian, which was 'about ninety years, they found the Romans more 'work to ſubdue and keep them within bounds, than 'all Barbarians of all other denominations; as any 'man will find, who will be at the trouble of peru-'ſing Ammianus Marcellinus; who obſerveth of 'them, that they were a nation who by their reſt-'leſs commotions confounded the Roman affairs with-'out meaſure or end; and although they were often 'diminiſhed from the very beginning by a variety of 'chances, yet they often ſprung up again ſo faſt, that 'you would imagine they had been unhurt for many 'ages.

'From hence I think it evident to a demonſtration, 'that the Germans, who were ſtrangers not only to 'Polygamy, but to promiſcuous copulations, ſtrict 'obſervers of chaſtity, and the obligations of the mar-'riage union, were yet the moſt prolific people of any 'in the then known world: conſequently that the 'ſwarms of the Northern hive were not owing to 'thoſe practices.

'Nor is this ſo much to be wondered at, if we 'conſider that the Antient Germany contained, ac-'cording to the accounts of the moſt antient geogra-'phers, particularly Pomponius Mela, (beſides the 'country now ſo called), Denmark, Norway, and 'the greateſt part of Sweden and Poland as far as the 'Weyſſel. And to theſe Cluverius adds Bohemia, 'and all that region from the fountains of the Viſtula 'to the Euxine ſea: that is, it contained thoſe coun-'tries which, from their fruitfulneſs in men, were 'antiently called Officina Gentium.

'And this reaſon will be farther ſtrengthened if it 'be found upon enquiry that neither were the Goths 'and Vandals Polygamiſts. And this is apparent.

'Firſt, becauſe they are charged by no hiſtorian 'with this practice.

'Secondly, becauſe they ſo eaſily became Chriſtians; 'whereas it is notorious that Polygamy hath always 'remarkably obſtructed the converſion of thoſe na-'tions to Chriſtianity, who were infected with this 'cuſtom.

'Thirdly; becauſe their chaſtity is celebrated by 'Chriſtian writers, in contradiſtinction to the Roman 'Chriſtians of thoſe times. And,

'Laſtly, becauſe I think it ſufficiently evident, that 'the Goths and Vandals were no other than different 'tribes of the Germanic nation: and that for theſe 'reaſons:

'Firſt, Becauſe the Boutones are numbered by 'Strabo among the people of Germany; and critics 'agree that theſe are the Guttones of Pliny (call'd 'Boutones through the miſtake of a letter, in the 'manuſcript of Strabo, inſtead of Guttones), men-'tioned in his account of that nation.

'And theſe are mentioned by him as a part of the 'Vandali (i. e. the Vandals) who are named foremoſt 'in the liſt of the Germanic tribes. And here it is 'remarkable, that as the Goths are here accounted a 'part of the Vandals; ſo the Vandals are accounted 'by Procopius as part of the Goths. Bell. Van. l. 1. 'c. ii.

'Tacitus found two of theſe nations, the Gothini 'and the Gothones among the Germans in his time; 'but the former he deemeth to have been originally 'Gauls. In one word, I know no one point more 'agreed among learned men, either antient or modern, 'than that the Goths and Vandals were derived from 'the ſame ſource with the Angles, Swedes, Teutones, 'and Cimbri; that is, that they were Germans.

'The only difficulty now remaining is, to know 'why theſe nations have for ſeveral centuries paſt '(that is, ſince the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity) 'ceaſed to ſwarm.

'And though this enquiry hath, I own, coſt me 'more trouble than almoſt any of the preceding diſ-'ſertations, yet, as it is properly no neceſſary part or 'appendix of the queſtion before me, the reader will 'I hope excuſe me, if my anſwers are very ſhort.

'In the firſt place then let it be obſerved, that no 'empire ever roſe gradually to great grandeur in the 'midſt of other ſurrounding ſtates and kingdoms, 'without the expence of a great number of lives; at 'leaſt, I am ſure, that of Rome did not.

'In the next place I take it for granted, that no 'empire ſo raiſed ever was ruined without a like ex-'pence of lives. This alſo muſt be allowed to have 'been the caſe of the Roman empire.

'That ſtate, as I apprehend, was in its moſt flour-'iſhing condition towards the cloſe of the common-'wealth. And from that time its inhabitants were, 'I think, gradually diminiſhed, to the end of Juſti-'nian's reign.

'Marius loſt great numbers of Roman ſoldiers in 'the ſlaughter of the Teutones and Cimbri. Cæſar 'loſt many more in his ſlaughters of more than a 'million of Gauls and Germans; the civil wars that 'enſued weakened the Romans to ſuch a degree, as 'to encourage the invaſion of Barbarians, particularly 'the Germans. Auguſtus loſt his legions; Druſus 'and Germanicus won honour againſt them; but ſtill 'the empire was weakened. The incredible luxury 'and cruelty of all the emperors, from Auguſtus to 'Veſpaſian, added to the deſtructions by famines, 'peſtilences, and earthquakes, weakened and waſted 'it yet more. From Veſpaſian to Adrian were de-'ſtroyed (to ſay nothing of other ſubjects) more than 'two millions of Jews; nor did they fall with impu-'nity; they ſold their lives at the deareſt rate; and 'though they ſeemed at this time brought to the brink 'of deſtruction, yet ſtill they found work for Anto-'ninus Pius his ſucceſſor to ſubdue them; as did the 'Britons, the Picts, the Germans, and the Dacæ.

'His ſucceſſor Marcus Aurelius was in the end 'ſucceſsful againſt the Parthians (under the conduct 'of his brother, who led the Roman army), but not 'till after he had firſt loſt his lieutenant and his 'legions.

'The loſſes and diſtreſſes he ſuſtained againſt the 'Germans are well known, and have been already 'mentioned; nor were thoſe inconſiderable which 'were ſuſtained from all the barbarous nations leagued 'in arms againſt him, from Pannonia to Gaul incluſive, 'though they were in the end triumphed over.

'And to all theſe may be added the deſtruction of 'an infinite number of men, in the ruin of Epheſus 'and Nicomedia by earthquakes.

'It were endleſs to recount the deſtruction of man-'kind, wrought from this period to the eſtabliſhment 'of the empire under Conſtantine, by fire and earth-'quakes, by Chriſtian perſecutions, by frequent and 'cruel contentions of competitors for the empire, by 'wars over the face of the whole earth, from Eaſt to 'Weſt, and from North to South, by the ravage and 'waſte of provinces, from the incurſions of Barba-'rians, and the conſequences of theſe, peſtilences and 'famines; one peſtilence particularly under Gallus 'and Voluſianus, which laſted fifteen years; of which 'Zozimus relateth, (Hiſt. l. 1.) that whilſt war rage'd 'on all ſides, every nation ſubject to the Romans 'being invaded and waſted by the Scythians, a plague 'came both upon cities and villages, which deſtroyed 'all that was left of human kind, and made more 'havock than any that had ever gone before it.

'Within this period the tyrant and monſter Maxi-'min deſtroyed, beſides his cruelty to his own ſub-'jects, Germany for three or four hundred miles, 'and many inhabitants; and Claudius ſlew three 'hundred and twenty thouſand Goths, thence named 'Gothicus; and Decius loſt his life and his army 'againſt the Scythians.

'Within this period it was, that Valerian was cir-

'cumvented

In this laſt performance, Dr. Delany was led to conſider, in a particular manner, the caſe of David, with regard to the point in debate; and it is probable, that he was hence

'cumvented and cruelly tortured to death by the 'Perſians; and Gallienus his ſon (a ſecond Nero) 'brought the empire to the brink of deſtruction; and 'beſides all the other blood ſpilt in his reign (more 'than in any other from the foundation of the em-'pire), he is ſaid to have deſtroyed from three to four 'thouſand a day of his own ſoldiers (Trebell. Poll. 'in Gal.) during a reign of ten years. In his time 'the empire was preſerved by thoſe very means which 'moſt naturally tended to deſtroy it. The contempt 'of his effeminacy, and terror of his cruelty, 'created many rebellions againſt him, many uſurpers 'of the empire (no fewer than thirty), who de-'fended on their own account what they would have 'neglected on his.

'The moſt eminent among theſe were Odenatus 'and Æmilianus, and, above all, the greateſt wo-'man of her own, or perhaps of any other age, 'Zenobia.

'Within this period Aurelian recovered the empire 'in ſome meaſure at the expence of much blood and 'ſlaughter; and as it ran faſt to ruin after him, 'Diocleſian in foreſight and in terror of its impend-'ing deſtruction retired from grandeur.

'Nor were almoſt all theſe fore-mentioned evils leſs 'continued or leſs conſuming, from the death of Con-'ſtantine the Great, to the re-eſtabliſhment and re-'union of the empire, under Theodoſius the Great.

'Within this period, the Germans waſted Gaul, 'the Sarmatæ Pannonia, the Picts England, and the 'Goths to the very walls of Conſtantinople; againſt 'whom Valens loſt his life, with ſuch a miſerable 'ſlaughter of his forces, as the Romans had never 'ſuſtained ſince Cannæ; and the victors were ſoon 'after defeated to an utter exciſion by Theodoſius, 'as the Germans were expulſed from Gaul by Gra-'ſian; and yet ſo exhauſted was the empire, at this 'time, that it was as much as both theſe emperors 'could do, with the united forces of Europe, Aſia, 'and Africa, to repreſs them; and at length Theodo-'ſius was glad to buy their friendſhip by the aſſign-'ment of lands in the provinces, and taking their 'beſt troops into pay, by which means the peace of 'the empire was ſecured from that quarter.

'This however could not ſecure it from the irrup-'tions of other Barbarians, who from the heart of 'Scythia crouded to the banks of the Danube; which 'is ſtill an additional proof that the empire was now 'exhauſted.

'The truth is, more populous nations ſeem as 'naturally to migrate to ſuch as are more thinly in-'habited, as the groſſer air gravitates to thoſe parts 'where it happeneth by any accident to be rarefied.

'Theodoſius, it is true, had the felicity to repreſs 'and to vanquiſh theſe and all his other enemies: 'he repreſſed theſe with great ſlaughter of their 'forces, and his other enemies with great ſlaughter 'of his own, ſo great ſlaughter of his own forces, 'and ſubjects of the empire, in his conflicts with 'Marcellinus and Maximus, with Eugenius and 'Arbogaſtes, and the ſlaughter of the ſeditious at 'Theſſalonica, that, however the reputation of the 'empire was raiſed under him, the number of its 'inhabitants, which are its natural ſtrength, was, I 'think, conſiderably impaired at his death. And 'that it daily and viſibly decayed both in ſtrength 'and reputation from this time to the reign of Juſti-'nian is, I think, out of all doubt.

'Within this period (to omit other calamities) 'Attila the Hun, the terror of the world, or, as 'he more properly ſtiled himſelf, the ſcourge of God, 'ravaged the Eaſt, and made Theodoſius the younger, 'tributary; waſted Mœſia, Macedon, and Theſ-'ſaly, and ſubjected the German nations of all deno-'minations, which we may well believe could not be 'effected without infinite bloodſhed; and pouring in 'upon the empire with an army of 700,000 men, 'waſted Gaul; and though his fury was awhile 'arreſted by the united forces of the Goths and the 'empire under the conduct of Theodoric and Aetius, 'and the loſs of a dreadful battle, in which 200,000 'of his forces fell, yet he ſoon after deſtroyed Pan-'nonia, and ſacked almoſt all the cities of Italy: at 'length, being diverted from the deſtruction of 'Rome by the interceſſion of Leo the Great, he 'returned home; where this man of blood died by a 'bleeding at his noſe.

'Not long after Genſeric took Rome, and carried 'many thouſands of the citizens into captivity to 'Carthage.

'Within this period Odoacer alſo took Rome, 'and was afterwards defeated with great ſlaughter 'of his armies by Theodoric, though not without 'conſiderable loſs.

'Here then I lay down theſe poſitions as truths, 'which, I apprehend, will not be long conteſted by 'the thinking and learned reader:

'Firſt, That the numbers of mankind in that 'which hath ſince been known by the name of the 'Roman world, were conſiderably impaired from the 'firſt Carthaginian war to the end of the Roman 'commonwealth.

'Secondly, That the numbers of mankind were 'very conſiderably impaired throughout the Roman 'world, from that period to that of Juſtinian.

'Thirdly, I apprehend that the Northern hive, at 'leaſt the European part of it, was now throughly 'exhauſted; nor can any man make this a doubt, 'who conſidereth that they had now been inceſſantly 'ſwarming for ſix hundred years; that they had now 'ſpread and ſettled themſelves not only all over Eu-'rope, but made conſiderable eſtabliſhments even in 'Afric. Theſe ſettlements and eſtabliſhments were 'not made at leſs expence than the deſtruction of at 'leaſt one half of their own people, as well as of 'thoſe whom they conquered, at leaſt in Europe.

'My ſincere opinion is, that one fourth part of 'their number, I mean of thoſe numbers with which 'they overſpread Europe, and invaded Afric, was 'now in being, when Juſtinian undertook to recover 'Afric from the Vandals, and not one half of theſe 'after his attempts to recover Italy out of the hands 'of the Goths; and though he went a great way 'towards effecting this by the uncommon wiſdom, 'virtue, fortitude, and felicity of Belizarius, yet the 'little armies he led, and even thoſe made up for the 'moſt part of Barbarians, ſufficiently ſhew how 'thoroughly the empire was exhauſted at this time.

'All theſe conſiderations lead me to the ſame con-'cluſion, viz. That the numbers of mankind 'throughout the North of Europe, and both the 'European and Aſiatic part of the Roman empire, 'were at the time of Juſtinian's acceſſion to the em-'pire, or at leaſt at the time of the deſtruction of 'Antioch by Coſroez, reduced to leſs than one half 'of what they were at Auguſtus's acceſſion to it; ſo 'that had the Northern hive been left unmoleſted 'from that time, it had not been capable of ſwarm-'ing with its ancient vigour in leſs than two centuries 'at ſooneſt.

'Soon after the third expedition of Coſroez againſt 'the Romans, came that remarkable plague upon the 'earth, ſo exactly and ſo judiciouſly deſcribed by 'Procopius; which traverſed every part and portion 'of the earth with a regular and equable deſtruction; 'and if we may judge by the numbers deſtroyed at 'Conſtantinople (and I think we may, inaſmuch as 'we are aſſured it deſtroyed equably and alike in all 'climates, in all ſeaſons of the year, in city and in 'country), it could not cut off leſs than one half of 'the human ſpecies then ſubſiſting.

'Suppoſe then the Northern hive diſabled in the 'beginning of this plague from ſwarming for two 'centuries, it is evident, that at the end of it they 'were diſabled from ſwarming with their wonted 'vigour in leſs than four centuries, that is, before 'the tenth century of the Chriſtian æra; and before 'that time Chriſtianity introduced civility, and civi-'lity culture, which enabled the earth to ſupport 'more than double, I may ſay more than ten times, 'its antient inhabitants.

'That the inhabitants of Germany are now more 'than double, I may ſay more than quadruple, the 'number they were in the days of Cæſar and Taci-'tus, is, I think, paſt all doubt.

'I think it evident, from the moſt antient account

hence induced to engage in examining whatever farther related to that great Jewiſh monarch.

'of theſe northern nations, that they led a kind of 'paſtoral life, like the Nomades of Scythia; and it is 'evident, from the nature of the thing, that all 'countries where the people do ſo muſt be thinly in-'habited.

'The Germans, we are expreſsly told, then had 'little culture, no cities, and but occaſional houſes. 'It was their glory (as the prophet Iſaiah expreſſeth 'it) to be placed alone in the midſt of the earth, to be 'defended by deſolations all around them; and one 'of theſe, as Cæſar relateth, was ſix hundred miles 'over. Theſe deſolations are now vaniſhed; much 'culture and many ample cities have ſucceeded them.

'They were then defended by lakes, by marſhes, 'and impenetrable foreſts of incredible extent; they 'are now defended by ſtrong and populous cities, 'their marſhes and their lakes are drained, and their 'foreſts deſtroyed.

'What we now call the Netherlands, in the days of 'the Barbaric incurſions were utterly deſolated; they 'are now covered with uncountable multitudes of 'men.

'And how are theſe numbers made up? Beyond 'all contradiction, from inſenſible ſwarms of the 'Northern hive; it being notorious, that both their 'cities and ſhips are filled with Danes, Swedes, Nor-'wegians, Poles, Muſcovites, and Germans, of all 'ſorts, who amount in the whole to numbers equiva-'lent to the moſt numerous ſwarms of many centuries 'in antient times.

'England is alſo a receptacle of the ſame kind. Sir 'Matthew Hale hath computed and proved, I think, 'plainly enough, that the inhabitants of England 'were before the Revolution more than twenty times 'as many as they were at the time of the Conqueſt. 'Now, in the courſe of their natural increaſe, they 'could not then be multiplied more than ſix-fold; 'to what then can we aſcribe this great additional 'exceſs, but partly to inſenſible ſwarms from other 'countries for the advantages of trade and liberty; 'and partly to more ſenſible cauſes, as the ſetting up 'the inquiſition in the Netherlands, and perſecuting 'the Huguenots in France?

'That regions ſeemingly barren can and actually 'do contain ten-fold the number of inhabitants that 'antiently poſſeſſed them, is put out of all doubt by 'the account we have of the numbers of the antient 'Helvetii, compared with thoſe of the preſent Swiſs, 'who inhabit the ſame country.

'This country was thought too narrow, as well for 'the numbers as the martial ſpirit of the inhabitants 'in the times of Cæſar, and therefore they migrated 'in ſearch of a better. Their intire number is exactly 'tranſmitted to us by Cæſar: they and their allies, 'men, women, and children, made up in all but 'three hundred and ſixty-eight thouſand ſouls, of 'which ninety thouſand are computed to be men capa-'ble of bearing arms. One of the thirteen Swiſs can-'tons (Berne) can now ſend out one hundred thouſand 'fighting men into the field; and Zurich will engage 'to raiſe fifty thouſand fighting men in the ſpace of 'twenty-four hours.

'To all this may be added,

'Firſt, that the increaſe of mankind within the 'limits of the Roman empire was conſiderably re-'tarded within this period, by the celibacy of the 'Chriſtian prieſthood, and the eſtabliſhment of ſo 'many monaſteries and nunneries, by which conſi-'derable numbers were ſhut out from ſocial commerce, 'and the world deprived of the advantages of a regu-'lar propagation from them.

'Secondly, That from the days of Juſtinian, the 'Roman empire grew every day weaker and weaker, 'till that of the Saracens was eſtabliſhed upon its 'ruins in the Eaſt and South; and thoſe of the 'Franks, Lombards, and Goths, of various denomi-'nations (all Germanic bodies) in the Weſt.

'In the very next reign the Lombards poſſeſſed 'themſelves of Italy: Tiberius was ſucceſsful againſt 'the Perſians in the Eaſt, but the Weſt was given up.

'In the reign of Mauritius, the Barbarians roſe in 'their demands of tribute under the title of penſion; 'and, ſoon after, Thrace was waſted by the Sclavo-'nians; and though 30,000 of theſe and other Bar-'barians were ſlain by the Romans in one battle, yet 'they prevailed in the end; and both they and the 'Perſians deſtroyed the Roman armies: and ſoon after 'forty cities of Dalmatia were laid waſte, and an in-'finite number of captives taken; all which, the Em-'peror (though very rich) refuſing to redeem at the 'loweſt rate, Chajanus in a rage maſſacred.

'It would be endleſs to purſue the detail of miſe-'ries that awaited this wretched empire in its decline: 'it is ſufficient to obſerve, that all the omens and 'indications of approaching ruin attended it from 'the days of Juſtinian; and therefore I ſhall beg 'leave to conclude this head with a very remarkable 'incident of this reign, I mean Mauritius's, which 'was this: a kind of ſecond deluge (followed by a 'dreadful peſtilence) overſpread Italy, from the ſwel-'ling of its ſeveral rivers; the waters poured in 'through the higheſt windows of their churches, and 'over the tops of their city walls; the villages were 'deſtroyed, and men and animals ſwept away; and 'the country was covered with immenſe lakes, for a 'conſiderable time after.

'It might now be ſaid of Italy, as it antiently was 'of the land of Iſrael, in the days of Shamgar; the 'highways were unoccupied; nay more, they were de-'faced and loſt: and among theſe the Flaminian way 'was now in all probability partly torn away, and 'partly covered with thoſe ſtrata of earth, which 'conceáled it from ſight for ſo many ſucceeding ages.

'The curious reader will, I hope, think this di-'greſſion pardonable.

'It may probably be thought an objection to the 'poſitions laſt laid down, that the Danes and Norwe-'gians are found to have ſwarmed into England and 'Ireland towards the beginning of the ninth century.

'To which I anſwer, firſt, they had three hundred 'years to recruit from the time of the fore-mentioned 'Procopian plague; nor were civility and culture 'yet introduced amongſt them by the Chriſtian 'religion.

'Secondly, As they were intirely out of the reach 'of the Roman arms, and out of the road of thoſe 'Northern incurſions, which croſſed the Danube. 'And,

'Thirdly, As there is reaſon to believe that Den-'mark was antiently better cultivated than other 'Northern regions, in all probability they ſuffered leſs 'waſte from invaſions, and leſs diminution from mi-'grations. And,

'Laſtly, Their ſwarms were now very little and 'inconſiderable, compared with thoſe of the Teutones 'and Cimbri their anceſtors.

'They were eſtabliſhed in Ireland, by means of 'the inteſtine diſcords and divided intereſts of their 'petty princes; yet not till after a courſe of continual 'ſupplies for near two centuries; and they gained 'ground in England by the means and meaſures, 'before the claims and contentions of the heptarchy 'were throughly decided and reconciled under one 'monarch: though not without the advantage of 'greater numbers, and a contention of equal con-'tinuance.

'Now, although theſe drains were not ſo ſtrong 'and ſo ſudden, yet being ſo long continued, I ap-'prehend, that about the time of their eſtabliſhment 'in England their country was throughly exhauſted; 'ſo exhauſted, that it could not be rightly recruited 'in leſs than 300 years, during which time they were 'employed in bloody and almoſt continued conteſts 'with their neighbours, and before the end of it, 'viz A. D. 1282, greatly diminiſhed by a dreadful 'peſtilence; and before that could be well recovered, 'by another, A. D. 1370, attended with a famine; 'and before that could be recovered, by another, A. 'D. 1484, much more dreadful and deſtructive than 'either of the preceding, which ſwept off one half 'of the human ſpecies; and which conſequently they 'cannot have recovered to this day: and I am well 'aſſured, that the late Prince George of Denmark 'was wont to aſſign this plague as the reaſon why the 'Northern hive had not ſwarmed for ſome centuries.

'It were eaſy to deduce the hiſtories of other 'Northern nations in the ſame manner, and account 'for their not overflowing, even under the advantages monarch. Be this, however, as it may, the Doctor's next publication was "An hiſto-"rical Account of the Life and Reign of David King of Izrael: interſperſed with "various Conjectures, Digreſſions, and Diſquiſitions: in which (amongſt other Things) "Mr. Bayle's Criticiſms upon the Conduct and Character of that Prince are fully "conſidered. By the Author of Revelation examined with Candour." The firſt volume of this work appeared in 1740, the ſecond in 1742, and the third in the ſame year. It would be denying Dr. Delany his juſt praiſe, were we not to ſay, that it is an ingenious and a learned Performance. It is written with ſpirit; there are ſome curious and valuable criticiſms in it; and many of the remarks, in anſwer to Bayle, are well founded. But when we have ſaid thus much, we can go no farther in our applauſes. We ſpeak with becoming deference to the opinions of others; but we cannot avoid thinking, that the Life of David is not, on the whole, a very judicious production. The author writes with too much eagerneſs, and is too fond of his hero. It is not neceſſary to the honour of the Sacred Writings, or to the cauſe of Revelation, to defend, or to palliate, the conduct of David, in whatſoever reſpects he appears to have acted wrong. The Scriptures freely and fully relate his faults and his crimes, and leave them fairly open to the cenſure of mankind. As to his behaviour in the affair of Bathſheba and Uriah, it is condemned again and again in the Old Teſtament; and it ought ever to be ſpoken of with the utmoſt deteſtation. At the ſame time it ſhould, in juſtice to him, be remembered, how deeply he repented of his iniquity. In forming a judgment of David, ſome regard ſhould likewiſe be had to the ſtate of ſociety in which he lived, to the imperfect, and indeed the rude and barbarous manners of the early ages of the world. Theſe things being conſidered, it will be found that, taking him altogether, he may juſtly be reckoned one of the eminent characters of antiquity. With relation to his being called the Man after God's own Heart, the expreſſion only ſeems to mean, that he was appointed and raiſed up by the Supreme Being to be a ſignal inſtrument in carrying on the purpoſes of his Providence: not to mention, that, if the words ſhould be thought to convey a more extenſive ſignification, they were ſpoken by Samuel concerning David in the early part of his life, and conſequently long before he had committed any of thoſe actions which have caſt ſuch a ſhade on his memory. But, whatever may be determined with regard to ſundry parts of his conduct, there is one view in which he appears with great ſplendour; and that is, as a divine poet, and as exhibiting the fineſt energies of devotion, in the happier tempers of his mind. The juſt and ſublime conceptions which he entertained and has repreſented of the Deity, raiſe him far above every thing that had been produced in the Heathen world.

'of

To return from this digreſſion, which, it is hoped, will be forgiven from the importance of the ſubject, Dr. Delany, on the ninth of June, 1743, married a ſecond time. The lady with whom he formed this connection wasMrs. Pendarves, the relict of Alexander Pendarves, Eſq. (t), and a very ingenious and excellent woman, of whom ſome account will be given at the cloſe of the preſent article. The Doctor had loſt his firſt wife on the ſixth of December, 1741 (u). On the thirteenth of March, 1743-4, our author preached a ſermon before the Society correſponding with the incorporated Society in Dublin for promoting Engliſh Proteſtant Working Schools in Ireland (w). The ſubject of the diſcourſe, which was ſpeedily printed, and well adapted to the occaſion, was our Saviour's new commandment to love one another. In May, 1744, Dr. Delany was raiſed to the higheſt preferment which he ever attained, and that was the Deanry of Down, in the room of Dr. Thomas Fletcher, appointed to be Biſhop of Dromore (x). Whatever may originally have been thought of the Doctor's political principles, it is certain that this promotion came from zealous Whigs; Dr. John Hoadly, Archbiſhop of Armagh, Robert Jocelyn, Lord Newport, and Henry Boyle, Eſq. Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, being at that time Chief Juſtices of Ireland, and Mr. Henry Pelham, firſt Lord of the Treaſury in England. In the ſame year, previouſly to his being made Dean of Down, our author publiſhed a volume of ſermons upon ſocial duties. The ſermons were fifteen in number, to which, in a ſecond edition, that appeared in 1747, were added five more diſcourſes, on the oppoſite vices. This is one of the moſt uſeful of Dr. Delany's performances; the objects to which it relates being of very important and general concern. In the dedication to the Counteſs of Granville, mother to Lord Carteret, the Doctor has drawn his own character; the peruſal of which will probably be acceptable to our readers. "The author of theſe diſcourſes," ſays he, "pretends not to acquit himſelf of ambition. He hath perhaps as ſtrong a "bias of original guilt, that way, as any mortal; but the truth is, it was early checked, "and entirely turned from all hope and proſpect of preferment, to the ſole view of

'of a greater increaſe, till the diſcovery of America, 'and the way to the Eaſt Indies by the Cape of Good 'Hope; both which have ſince drained Europe of 'more than her natural overflowings, and will in all 'probability be ſufficient to do ſo to the end of the 'world.

'From what hath been ſaid, I hope, it is now 'ſufficiently apparent, that neither the antient nor the 'the preſent world hath been peopled by Polygamy; 'quite otherwiſe: that the increaſe of mankind hath 'in all ages and regions of the world been beſt pro-'moted by ſingle marriages.'

" endeavouring to deſerve it. In this ſituation, he was found by your ſon, near twenty years " ago, in an honourable obſcurity; and drawn thence, with ſome diſtinction (though " without any ſuit or ſolicitation on his ſide), a little into the light, at leaſt into the " hurry of the world; where he hath continued to this day: unhonoured, indeed, but (I " thank God!) unreproached, and (what is, perhaps, matter of more vexation than " vanity) not unenvied; though he ſtood in no man's way, nor was rival to any mortal, " during that whole time, either for wealth, preferment, or power. He had been long " before this a conſtant preacher: nor did his natural vehemence allow him to be indo- " lent or unintereſted in what he delivered. His condition of life, and the circum- " ſtances of ſome particular friends, led him early to the conſideration of almoſt all the " following ſubjects; and a thouſand ſubſequent occaſions drew him frequently into " repeated conſiderations of them; ſo that, what he now preſumes to preſent to your " Ladyſhip, are, very truly, the firſt fruits of his early labour and unwearied zeal in " the ſervice of religion (y)."

Dr. Delany's next publication was not till 1748, and that was only a ſix-penny pamphlet. It was entituled, " An Eſſay towards evidencing the divine Original of " Tythes," and had at firſt been drawn up, and probably preached, as a ſermon. The text was Exodus xx. 17. being the Tenth Commandment, which forbids us to covet any thing that is our neighbour's (z). It muſt have been with more ingenuity than a ſtrictneſs of logic, that the Doctor could deduce the divine original of tithes from that particular prohibition; for the queſtion muſt be taken for granted before the inference can be juſt.

After an interval of ſix years, Dr. Delany again appeared in the world as an author, but not in his theological capacity. The occaſion of his aſſuming the pen was afforded by the Earl of Orrery's " Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr. Swift." Many of Swift's zealous admirers were not a little diſpleaſed with the repreſentations which the noble lord had given of him in various reſpects. Of this number was Dr. Delany, who determined, therefore, to do juſtice to the memory of his old friend; for which few were better qualified, having been in the habits of intimacy with the Dean of St. Patrick's from his firſt coming over to Ireland, and long before Lord Orrery could have known any thing concerning him. Accordingly, the Doctor publiſhed a moderate octavo volume, entituled, " Obſervations upon Lord Orrery's Remarks on the Life and " Writings of Dr. Jonathan Swift; containing ſeveral ſingular Anecdotes relating to the " Character and Conduct of that great Genius, and the moſt deſervedly celebrated " Stella. In a Series of Letters to his Lordſhip. To which are added, Two original " Pieces of the ſame Author (excellent in their Kind), never before publiſhed." Dr. Delany merited great credit from this performance, which is written with elegance and ſpirit, with politeneſs and candour. The anecdotes are curious and entertaining, and the Doctor's zeal for the reputation of his friend did not carry him beyond the bounds of moderation. He hath ſhewn himſelf ready to acknowledge the foibles, as well as to diſplay the excellencies, of Swift, and to vindicate him where he had been unjuſtly repreſented. On the whole, this production enabled the public to form a far clearer eſtimation of the real character of the Dean of St. Patrick's than any account of him which had hitherto been given to the world. Mr. Sheridan complains, that Dr. Delany's work did not meet with the favourable reception which it juſtly deſerved. " Though," ſays he, " this book is written with great ſpirit, and carried the evidence of truth with " it; as it was an anonymous publication, it was little attended to, except by thoſe who " wiſhed well to the memory of the Dean. Beſides, truth is not the object ſought " after by thoſe who are deſirous of remaining in an error. Swift has an obſervation " on this head which will be found to be generally true. 'The ill talent of the world " is ſuch, that thoſe who will be at pains enough to inform themſelves of a malicious " ſtory, will take none at all to be undeceived; nay, will be apt with ſome reluctance " to admit a favourable truth.' This obſervation was never more ſtrongly verified than " in the caſe before us: for, while the book which calumniated Swift's character, and " endeavoured to depreciate his talents, though poorly written, went through a great " number of editions, the ſingle one of the anſwer, though incomparably ſuperior in " every thing which can recommend writings of that kind, ſtill remains unſold (a)." How far this laſt circumſtance is ſtrictly true, we are not able to ſay; but we well remember, that Dr. Delany's " Obſervations" did not paſs unnoticed at the time of their appearance. They were read and admired by a conſiderable number of perſons. It was, indeed, a diſadvantage to them that they were not publiſhed with the author's name, and perhaps the impreſſion might be a large one. Beſides, there was not, in general, at that time, the avidity for biographical matter which now prevails; though it is probable, that the numerous writings concerning Dr. Swift have not a little contributed to diffuſe a taſte of this kind through the nation. However zealous Dr. Delany might be for the honour of his friend, he did not ſatisfy the petulant diſpoſition of Deane Swift, Eſq. who, in his Eſſay upon the Life, Writings, and Character of his Relation, treated our author with extreme ill-manners and groſs abuſe; to which he thought proper to give an anſwer, in a Letter to Mr. Swift, publiſhed in 1755. In this this letter the Doctor juſtified himſelf; and he did it with ſo much temper and ingenuity, ſo much candour, and yet with ſo much ſpirit, that the polite gentleman and the worthy divine were apparent in every page of his little pamphlet (b).

The year that produced the Obſervations upon Lord Orrery's Remarks on Dean Swift's Life and Writings (1754), was diſtinguiſhed by the appearance of another volume of ſermons, containing ſixteen diſcourſes upon doctrines and duties more peculiarly Chriſtian; and againſt the reigning vices of the age. So far as theſe diſcourſes are practical, which is the caſe with the larger part of them, they are entitled to great commendation. The few which are of a doctrinal nature have not been underſtood to be marked by any eminent powers of reaſoning. In one of them, our author has undertaken the difficult, and ſurely not the deſirable, taſk of explaining and proving the poſſibility, eternity, and juſtneſs of hell torments, and of fully anſwering the objections to them. There are two diſcourſes on the folly, iniquity, abſurdity, and crying guilt, of duelling, which are truly excellent. But what duelliſt reads ſermons? Or, if he did read them, what eloquence is equal to the eradication of thoſe inveterate prejudices which falſe notions of honour and courage have implanted in the hearts of the men of the world?

During this part of Dr. Delany's life, he was involved in a law ſuit of great conſequence, and which, from its commencement to its final termination, laſted more than nine years. It related to the perſonal eſtate of his firſt lady. That lady had left an only child, a daughter, Margaret Teniſon, who died in the nineteenth year of her age, having ſurvived her mother about thirteen months; and it was by the heirs at law of Miſs Teniſon that the ſuit was inſtituted. The general allegations of the bill, which was exhibited in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, were to the following purport: That Dr. Delany having made his addreſſes to Margaret, his late wife, ſhe refuſed marrying him until her perſonal eſtate ſhould be previouſly ſettled, for the benefit of her daughter Margaret, and ſuch other children as ſhe might afterwards have; that accordingly a ſettlement was executed by Mrs. Teniſon and the defendant, previouſly to their marriage, whereby it was agreed, that the perſonal fortune ſhe was poſſeſſed of, and particularly the ſeveral ſecurities and leaſehold intereſts mentioned in the bill, ſhould be veſted in truſtees, to permit and ſuffer her to receive the produce and intereſt of the ſaid ſeveral ſecurities and perſonal eſtates, to her ſeparate uſe, during her life; that in caſe Margaret Teniſon her daughter ſhould outlive her, and the ſaid Margaret the elder ſhould have other iſſue living at her death, that then ſhe might diſpoſe of her perſonal fortune among her children, as ſhe ſhould think fit; but in caſe her ſaid daughter Margaret ſhould outlive her, and ſhe ſhould have no other iſſue living at her death, then, and in ſuch caſe, her whole perſonal fortune ſhould veſt in, and go to, Margaret her daughter, her executors or adminiſtrators; that Margaret the elder thereby reſerved to herſelf a power to make a competent proviſion for Margaret her daughter out of her perſonal fortune, during her life, if ſhe ſhould marry with her conſent; that, ſoon after the death of his wife, the defendant had deſtroyed the marriage-ſettlement, in order to conceal the contents thereof from Miſs Teniſon and others intereſted therein, and to defeat the title of the next of kin. The plaintiffs prayed therefore, that they might be decreed their diſtributive ſhares of the reſidue of the perſonal eſtate which Margaret the younger was intitled to at her death.

On the other hand, it was admitted by Dr. Delany, the defendant, that a ſettlement was executed previouſly to his marriage with Margaret his late wife; but he denied that he perfected any ſettlement, whereby any limitation was made of the perſonal fortune of Margaret the elder unto Margaret the younger, or any other perſon, or that Margaret the elder ever mentioned to him the leaſt intention of ſettling her perſonal fortune upon her daughter, whoſe name, to the beſt of his remembrance and belief, was never once mentioned in the ſettlement entered into on his marriage with Margaret. He farther ſaid, that upon his intermarriage it was agreed between him and his wife, and a ſettlement thereupon executed by them, whereby a power was reſerved to his wife to diſpoſe of her perſonal fortune as ſhe pleaſed, by any deed under her hand and ſeal, in her life-time, or by her laſt will and teſtament; but that, in caſe of no ſuch diſpoſal, her whole perſonal fortune was thereby to be abſolutely veſted in the defendant, in caſe he ſurvived her, to his own uſe and benefit; and that he conſented to enter into the ſaid deed and ſettlement, upon a ſolemn promiſe made to him by Margaret, that ſhe never would diſpoſe of one ſhilling of her perſonal fortune without his full and free conſent; and that he ſhould be abſolute maſter of it as if no ſuch power had ever been reſerved to her; and that her only reaſon for deſiring ſuch a power was to fulfill a promiſe exacted from her by Mr. Barton (her father), that, in caſe of her entering into any ſubſequent marriage, ſhe would reſerve to herſelf a power over her perſonal fortune.

What particularly ſtrengthened the claims of the heirs at law, and was interpreted greatly to Dr. Delany's diſadvantage, was his having deſtroyed the ſettlement between him and his wife. In fact, however, this ſettlement was only a private agreement between them, which was of no force when one of them was dead. Nor did the Doctor deſtroy it in a clandeſtine manner, which he might eaſily have done, but gave it to his daughter-in-law to be burnt by her, as then of no uſe, in the preſence of two witneſſes, Dorothy Donagh and Elizabeth Berkeley. The perſon, likewiſe, who had originally prepared the deed, gave teſtimony, that, to the beſt of his recollection, there were no ſuch limitations as were contended for on the part of the plaintiffs. Nevertheleſs, appearances were ſo unfavourable to Dr. Delany, that a decree was paſt againſt him in the Iriſh Court of Chancery. Upon this he brought the cauſe, by appeal, before the Houſe of Lords in England. The counſel employed by him were Mr. Pratt, now (1791) Earl Camden, and Mr. Perrott, afterwards one of the Barons of the Exchequer. On the other ſide were engaged the honourable Charles Yorke, and Mr. Forreſter: and, after a ſolemn hearing, the decree of the Court of Chancery in Ireland was reverſed. This event took place on Monday, the ſixth of March, 1758; and it was a matter of great conſequence to Dr. Delany, both with reſpect to his fame and his fortune. Such as knew the Doctor beſt could not believe that he was capable of any intentional fraud; though his deſtruction of the deed, which had been executed between him and his wife, was an act of very blamable inadvertency, and which afforded plauſible grounds for entertaining ſuſpicions to the prejudice of his character. A detail of the whole legal proceedings relative to this affair would be too dry and too tedious to intereſt the generality of our readers. Thoſe who wiſh to ſee a more particular account of it may have recourſe to the appellant's and reſpondent's caſes, printed at the time, or to Mr. Joſiah Brown's Reports of Cauſes determined in Parliament (c).

(c) Vol. V. p. 300—325. To our learned friend Michael Dodſon, Eſq. we have been indebted for the peruſal and uſe of the appellant's and reſpondent's caſes.

After the final determination of the ſuit, Lord Corke, who was in the country when judgement was paſſed, expreſſed himſelf in the following terms, in a Letter to a Friend. "The Houſe of Lords have done themſelves great honour; and they have done Dr. "Delany great juſtice. He is certainly an honeſt man. I am glad he will be eaſy "in his fortune the remaining part of his life.—All at Marſton ſincerely rejoice "at his ſucceſs (d)."

(d) Nichols's Supplement to Swift, Vol. II. p. 448.

Dr. Delany was not ſo far engaged in the proſecution of his law-ſuit, as entirely to forget his diſpoſition to be often appearing in the world as an author. In the year 1757, he began a periodical paper called the "Humaniſt," which was carried on through fifteen numbers, and then dropped. When it firſt appeared, Lord Corke ſpoke of it as follows: "I think I could have gueſſed at the author of the Humaniſt, "even without any information, by the Chariots of Iſrael. The firſt number ſhews us "what we may expect; a good ſtyle, much learning, great virtue, and (unleſs when in "a paſſion, which too often happens to the author) much humanity in every ſenſe of "that expreſſion. The paper will be admired by men of ſenſe and literature, but will "never pleaſe the crowd." As the work proceeded, his lordſhip found himſelf obliged to ſpeak of it in very different terms. "The Humaniſt," ſays he, "is ſo "called, I preſume, becauſe humanum eſt errare. Every line I have read of it puts me "in mind of the apoplectic archbiſhop in Gil Blas (e)." From what remembrance occurs to us of the papers, we, in general, agree in opinion with Lord Corke. One number, if our recollection be accurate, was a vehement declamation againſt cutting ſhort the tails of horſes; which practice Dr. Delany repreſented as full of cruelty and iniquity. Faſhion has ſince, in part, effected what the Doctor's humanity pleaded for; but faſhion is a variable thing, and may again render the evil as extenſive as it has heretofore been. Even if our author had not been afflicted with ſomething of a paralytic affection (which, however, is more than hinted at by Lord Corke (f),) it was undoubtedly too late in life for him to carry on a periodical paper with that ſpirit and variety which ſuch an undertaking demands.

(e) Ibid.

(f) He calls him a paralytic wrong-headed old man.

In 1761, Dr. Delany publiſhed a tract, entituled, "An humble Apology for Chriſtian "Orthodoxy;" by which term he meant, an uniformity of belief with that of the primitive Chriſtian Church, ſet forth in the creeds of the Apoſtles and the Council of Nice. Notwithſtanding our author's very advanced period of life, he ſtill retained his popularity in the pulpit; for in 1763 he preached and printed three diſcourſes on public occaſions. The firſt was a Thankſgiving Sermon, on Account of the Peace of Paris, from Pſalm cxxii. 6—9.; the ſecond, for the Benefit of the Magdalen Hoſpital, from Matthew, v. 27, 28.; and the third, at the Annual Meeting of the Charity Schools, from 1 Timothy, vi. 18, 19. (g). It was likewiſe in 1763, after an interval of nearly thirty years from the publication of his former volumes, that Dr. Delany gave to the world the third and laſt volume of his "Revelation examined with Candour;" the ſubjects of which will be found in the note [C]. In the preface, the Doctor has indulged himſelf in ſome peeviſh remarks upon Reviewers of works of Learning; but from complaints of this kind few writers have ever derived any material advantage. With regard

[C] The ſubjects of which will be found in the note]. The volume is divided into chapters, being twelve in number, with a ſhort introductory diſſertation. Chapter 1. That the World was bleſſed with divine Revelations from the Beginning: an Eſſay on the natural Advantages of the Sabbath, with one ill-judged Abuſe of it; Travelling, and permitting Stage-waggons on a Sunday. 2. The Bleſſings derived to the World through Abraham. 3. God's Bleſſing to Abraham continued to his Son Iſaac: an Eſſay attempting to ſhew that Socrates was a Kind of Prophet to the Gentiles; and divine Inſpiration not confined regard to the volume itſelf, we are afraid, that it exhibits more numerous inſtances of the prevalence of imagination over judgment than had occurred in the former part of the undertaking. However, the "Revelation examined with Candour," taking it in the whole, is one of our author's moſt valuable performances; and there are ſeveral parts of it from which a judicious reader may derive important inſtruction. In 1766, a ſermon was publiſhed by Dr. Delany, the title of which was, "The Doctrine of "Tranſubſtantiation clearly and fully confuted; from Common Senſe; from the uner-"ring Atteſtation of the Senſes; from the indubitable Maxims of Philoſophy; from "the Proofs of our Saviour's Miracles, vouched by himſelf; and from the Words of "his Mouth, repeated and atteſted by St. Paul, and Three of the Evangeliſts." This ſermon was ſucceeded, in the ſame year, by the Doctor's laſt publication, which was a volume containing "Eighteen Diſcourſes and Diſſertations upon various very impor-"tant and intereſting Subjects." Of this volume we may ſay, agreeably to what has been obſerved before, that the practical ſermons are calculated for general utility, and that the doctrinal ones are of a more doubtful and diſputable nature. To the diſcourſes are added two diſſertations: one is on the ſeventh and eighth verſes of the ſixth chapter of the firſt Epiſtle of St. John; in which, according to our author's own language, "the ſeventh verſe of this chapter is proved to be genuine, from the teſtimony of two "witneſſes, from the nature and genius of the work, from the neceſſary connection of "the ſeveral verſes of the text, and from the character of the writer, clearly illuſtrated "by a parallel example from prophane hiſtory." Few of the learned, we believe, will give any kind of credit to ſuch bold and confident aſſertions. In the other diſſertation, "the objections to the account of the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles of Jeſus Chriſt "being inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt with the gift of languages are calmly and ſeriouſly "conſidered." It is remarkable, that the volume we are ſpeaking of is the only capital work to which Dr. Delany had ever prefixed his name. He had done it to ſingle ſermons; but all his other productions were either ſignalized by ſome general phraſes, or by references to former publications; ſuch as, "By the Author of Revelation examined "with Candour;" or, "By the Author of the Life of David." It was always, however, fully known to whom the world was indebted for his writings.

Dr. Delany departed this life at Bath, in the month of May, 1768, in the eighty-third year of his age (b); but where he was buried, and whether any monument has been erected to his memory, we are not informed. Though in general he was an inhabitant of Ireland, it appears from ſeveral circumſtances, and eſpecially from his writings, almoſt all of which were publiſhed in London, that he frequently came over to England, and occaſionally reſided there for a conſiderable time. Of his literary character an eſtimate may be formed from what has been already ſaid. With regard to two of his principal works, the "Revelation examined with Candour," and the "Life of David," they contain ſo many fanciful and doubtful poſitions, that all the ability and learning diſplayed in them will ſcarcely ſuffice to hand them down, with any eminent degree of reputation, to future ages. It is on his practical ſermons, and particularly on thoſe which relate to ſocial duties, that will principally depend the perpetuity of his fame. He was certainly too conſiderable a man, and too various and popular in his publications, to be omitted in the Biographia; and it is a pleaſure to us, that, from an early acquaintance with his writings, and a diligent attention to the ſcattered circumſtances concerning him, we have been enabled to do juſtice to his memory. With reſpect to his perſonal character, he appears to have been a gentleman of unqueſtionable piety and goodneſs, and of an uncommon warmth of heart. This warmth of heart was, however, accompanied with ſome inequality, impetuoſity, and irritability of temper. Few excelled him in charity, generoſity, and hoſpitality. His income, which for the laſt twenty years of his life was 3000 l. per annum, ſunk under the exerciſe of theſe virtues, and he left little behind him beſides books, plate, and furniture *. Of a literary diligence, protracted to above fourſcore years, Dr. Delany has afforded a ſtriking example; though it may poſſibly be thought, that if, when his body and mind grew enfeebled, he had remembered the ſolve ſeneſcentem equum, it would have been of no diſadvantage to his reputation.

We ſhall conclude this article with an anecdote that has been related, to ſhew the characteriſtic abſence of our author's mind. In the reign of King George the Second, being deſirous of the honour of preaching before his majeſty, he obtained, from the Lord Chamberlain, or the Dean of the Chapel, the favour of being appointed to that office

As he was not informed of the etiquette, he entered the Royal Chapel after the prayers begun, and, not knowing whither to go, crowded into the deſk by the Reader. The Veſturer ſoon after was at a loſs for the Preacher, till ſeeing a Clergyman kneeling by the Reader, he concluded him to be the man. Accordingly, he went to him, and pulled him by the ſleeve. But Dr. Delany, chagrined at being interrupted in his devotions, reſiſted and kicked the intruder, who in vain begged him to come out, and ſaid, "There was no text." The Doctor replied, that he had a text; nor could he comprehend the meaning, till the Reader acquainted him, that he muſt go into the veſtry, and write down the text (as uſual) for the cloſets. When he came into the veſtry, his hand ſhook ſo much that he could not write. Mrs. Delany, therefore, was ſent for; but no paper was at hand. At laſt, on the cover of a letter, the text was tranſcribed by Mrs. Delany, and ſo carried up to the King and Royal Family (i).]

 [DELANY (MARY)*, the ſecond wife of Dr. Patrick Delany, the ſubject of the preceding article, and a lady of diſtinguiſhed ingenuity and merit, was born at a ſmall country houſe of her father's, at Coulſton in Wiltſhire, on the fourteenth of May, 1700. Her deſcent was highly honourable, ſhe being of the illuſtrious family of the Greenvilles, or, as more lately it was written, the Granvilles, of which a large and curious account is given in the fourth volume of the firſt edition of the "Biographia." The lady of whom we are ſpeaking was the daughter of Bernard Granville, Eſq. a younger brother of George Granville, Eſq. afterward Lord Landſdowne, a nobleman whoſe abilities and virtues, whoſe character as a poet, whoſe friendſhip with Pope, Swift, and other eminent writers of the time, and whoſe general patronage of men of genius and literature, have ſo often been recorded in biographical productions, that they cannot be unknown to any of our readers. As the child of ſuch a family, ſhe could not fail of receiving the beſt education. Before her marriage, ſhe reſided chiefly at Whitehall, with her aunt Lady Stanley, whoſe huſband, Sir John Stanley, was a Commiſſioner of the Cuſtoms under King William, and was a very wiſe and accompliſhed man. Miſs Granville made, however, frequent viſits to her uncle Landſdowne in the country; and, in his ſociety, who united the accompliſhments of the polite courtier with thoſe of the elegant ſcholar, her underſtanding was improved, her taſte refined, and ſhe acquired a grace and dignity of manners which ſhe preſerved to the cloſe of her life. It was at Long Leat, the ſeat of the Weymouth family, which was occupied by Lord Landſdowne, during the minority of the heir of that family (a), that Miſs Granville firſt ſaw Alexander Pendarves, Eſq. a gentleman of large property at Roſcrow, in the county of Cornwall, and who immediately paid his addreſſes to her; which were ſo ſtrenuouſly ſupported by her uncle, whom ſhe had not the courage to deny, that ſhe gave a reluctant conſent to the match; and, accordingly, it took place in the compaſs of two or three weeks, ſhe being then in the ſeventeenth year of her age. From a great diſparity of years, and other cauſes, ſhe was very unhappy during the time in which this connection laſted. However, ſhe endeavoured to make the beſt of her ſituation. The retirement to which ſhe was confined was wiſely employed by her in the farther cultivation of a naturally vigorous underſtanding: and the good uſe ſhe made of her leiſure hours was eminently evinced in the charms of her converſation, and in her letters to her friends (A). That quick feeling of the elegant and beautiful which conſtitutes taſte was poſſeſſed by her in an eminent degree; and, therefore, ſhe was peculiarly fitted for ſucceeding in the fine arts. At the period we are ſpeaking of, ſhe made a great proficiency in muſic. As to painting, which afterwards ſhe moſt loved, and in which ſhe principally excelled, it had not as yet engaged her practical attention. In 1724, Mrs. Pendarves became a widow; upon which occaſion ſhe quitted Cornwall, and fixed her principal reſidence in London; where ſhe took a houſe firſt in Clarges-ſtreet, and afterwards in Upper Brook-ſtreet. In the laſt houſe ſhe continued till her marriage with Dr. Delany. For ſeveral years, between 1730 and 1736, ſhe maintained a correſpondence with Dr. Swift. Two of her letters, written in 1736, are inſerted in the Dean's works, and will ſerve to diſplay the ſtrength and vivacity of her mind, and the ingenious and judicious manner in which it was exerciſed and improved. Her cuſtom was, as ſhe informs Dr. Swift, to riſe at between five and ſix in the morning, and to go

(a) Lord Landſdowne had married, in 1711, the Lady Mary Thynne, a daughter of the firſt Earl of Jerſey, and the relict of Thomas Thynne, Eſq. who died young, and whoſe ſon, Thomas, by this lady, became, when a child, the ſecond Viſcount Weymouth. Collins's Peerage, Vol. VI. p. 62, 63. fifth edit.

[A] And in her letters to her friends.] Her moſt intimate friend, at this time, and till the year 1761, was her ſiſter, Mrs. Dewes. A conſiderable number of Mrs. Pendarves's letters to this beloved friend ſtill remain; and they afford ſtriking proofs of the warmth of her affection, the goodneſs of her heart, the ſtrength of her underſtanding, and her talents for writing. Of Mrs. Dewes, Lady Luxborough, the celebrated Lord Bolingbroke's ſiſter, thus ſpeaks, in her letters, publiſhed by Dodſley, in 1775. "I have "had the pleaſure of ſeeing Mrs. Dewes three times "lately; who is now at Mapleborough Green, for "change of air for her children. It only ſerves to "make me regret her not continuing at that houſe of "her huſband; for Welſbourn is almoſt too far for "a viſit. She is very agreeable in converſation, and "ſhews all that politeneſs, delicacy, ſoftneſs, and "grace, which one diſtinguiſhes in her uncle Lord "Landſdowne's poems, and which I have ſo often "obſerved in him, having been perſonally acquainted "with him." Mrs. Dewes died in the year 1761.

to bed at eleven at night. From the ſame letters, it appears how well Mrs. Pendarves was qualified to find reſources in herſelf; for ſhe declares, that living alone was a pleaſanter thing than ſhe imagined (b). It has been obſerved, that there is ſomething of an air of ſtiffneſs and conſtraint in her correſpondence with the Dean of St. Patrick's, which, without doubt, was inſpired by her awe of him, and which was very different from the unaffected eaſe and elegance of thoſe to her intimate friends. Several of Dr. Swift's letters to Mrs. Pendarves, that have never been publiſhed, are in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Dewes, who has favoured us with a copy of one of them, which, as characteriſtic of the Doctor's diſpoſition of mind, ſhall be inſerted below [B]. In 1743, as we have ſeen in the former article, Mrs. Pendarves was married to Dr. Delany, with whom it appears that ſhe had long been acquainted; and for whom ſhe had many years entertained a high eſteem. She had been a widow nineteen years when this connection, which was a very happy one, took place. We are aſſured, from unqueſtionable authority, that her huſband regarded her almoſt to adoration. The ſenſible and delicate mind of Mrs. Delany muſt, however, have been deeply affected, during the long continuance of the law-ſuit in which the Doctor's intereſt and reputation were ſo materially concerned. Upon his deceaſe, in May, 1768, ſhe intended to fix herſelf at Bath, and was in queſt of a houſe for that purpoſe. But the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland, hearing of her deſign, went down to the place, to prevent her coming to ſuch a reſolution. The Ducheſs, who in her early years had formed an intimacy with Mrs. Delany, wiſhed to have near her a lady from whom ſhe had neceſſarily, for ſeveral years, been much ſeparated, and whoſe heart and talents ſhe knew would in the higheſt degree add to the happineſs of her own life. Her Grace ſucceeded in her ſolicitations. In the following winter, Mrs. Delany went to the Ducheſs of Portland's at Whitehall, and in the ſpring

'Madam,

'I have had one great, and not very uſual, misfortune in my life, which was to come to a kingdom 'where I was utterly a ſtranger, when it was too late 'to make new friendſhips; every body worth knowing being already beſpoke. As to the many friends 'I left in England when I firſt came over, they are 'either baniſhed or dead, or by a tacit agreement we 'have dropt correſpondence; and the few remaining, 'my ill health hath condemned me never to ſee again. 'Another ill circumſtance is, that years have not hardened me; and therefore, when I lament my abſence from thoſe I love and eſteem, I fly for a remedy 'to ill-nature: I recollect whatever I found amiſs in 'them; one was poſitive, another was a bad liſtener; 'a third talked too much, and a fourth was too ſilent, 'and ſo on. For theſe reaſons, I would give half my 'goods that I had known you five times more than I 'did; and had the forecaſt to watch all your behaviour 'till I could have found ſomething that was wrong, 'though it was in the leaſt ſignificant part of your 'conduct; and upon that one point I would have 'forced my memory and obſervation to dwell, as 'ſome little cure for the vexation of deſpairing ever 'to ſee you again. Pray, Madam, will you be 'pleaſed, in mere mercy, to ſend me the names and 'places of abode of your enemies and cenſurers (for 'God forbid you ſhould want either): after which, 'I will deſire a commerce of letters with them, 'whereof you ſhall be the ſubject; and then I ſhall 'be able to talk ill of you to myſelf, as well as to 'other people, without being believed by either. As 'you are in doubt whether you would have me ſick or 'neglect you; ſo, for the ſake of thoſe who come to 'viſit you, I might be in doubt whether I could wiſh 'your eyes were well or not; becauſe ten thouſand 'may ſuffer in the firſt caſe, and only one in the ſecond. My concern is only that they ſhould give 'you no pain, whatever they may do to the fine gentlemen twenty miles round, who, ten to one, are 'ſuch coxcombs as to think they only make you 'handſomer, without conſidering that they diſcover 'almoſt every good quality of your mind. I do not 'remember that I called you a fool; but as to your 'being a knave, there may be ſome probability. You 'have forſaken your friend Mrs. Donnellan; you 'have run away with 514 hearts, to which you had 'no other claim than power tyrannical; not to mention that of the Killala parſon; for which all the clergy of the kingdom, and principally myſelf, look 'upon you as a mortal enemy to the Church. My 'partiality for you forceth me to congratulate you on 'your ſiſter's recovery. I hope ſhe is like you in 'every thing, but the hardneſs of her heart. However, as we gave you the government of this kingdom, we deſire you will ſend her over, as your deputy, to tyrannize in your ſtead. Whoſe fault is it 'that you loſe Mrs. Donnellan? Or how can you pretend to loſe any thing that you know at any time 'where to find? And we heartily wiſh that the diſtreſs 'you complain of, on her account, were 500 times 'greater than it is. I have viſited Mrs. Donnellan 'but once ſince her arrival: ſhe is in the family of a 'perſon with whom I have no acquaintance, nor am 'likely to have any; ſo that ſhe is of no more comfort to me than to you. Dr. Delany is abſolutely a 'country ſquire; he hath given up his town-houſe; 'I have not ſeen or heard of him theſe five weeks; 'we all think he hath acted exceedingly wrong. He 'hath a fortune ſufficient to live as he pleaſes in this 'cheap kingdom, and grow rich beſides. Neither he 'nor his lady are naturally inclined to ſolitude, which 'however in the winter ſeaſon he muſt be condemned 'to, and in evenings the whole year. I extremely 'diſapprove of this monkiſh way of living. The 'great and only happineſs of Dublin is the ſociable 'evening meetings, in which it much exceeds London, eſpecially (with ſubmiſſion to your Whiggiſm) 'ſince the Queen's death. And indeed out of mere 'poverty we are dropping them here. There is but 'one family in all Dublin where I can get a dinner; 'and that is with Dr. Helſham, which I compaſs once 'or twice a month. All other days I eat my chicken 'alone like a king, or carry my bread, meat, and 'wine, to ſome country parſon 4 or 5 miles off. But 'if you come over, I will give you a dinner once a 'week, whereof your ſhare will coſt me eighteen 'pence, and ſix pence for your chair. I am now going 'to dine, chicken 6d. pint of Fr. wine 8d. bread ½, 'butter for ſauce 1d.; total 1s. 3½d. dreſſing 0 0 0. 'In London the bill would be, a chicken 1s. 6d. 'wine 2s. 6d. butter 3d. bread 1d. dreſſing 3d.; 'total 4s. 7d. And would I live in London? And 'will not you live in Ireland, with ſo fair an invitation? Well, I hear all you ſay, but am not convinced. The apology you make in the poſtſcript is, 'in few words, a compound of falſehood and affectation. You are aſhamed, you ſay, of your blunders: and I cannot obſerve one. I ſuppoſe it is a 'civil way of reproaching mine; for my ill head 'makes me always miſtake ſyllables, letters, words, 'and ſometimes half ſentences; you may ſee how 'often I am forced to interline. Pray God preſerve 'you! I am, with the trueſt reſpect and great eſteem, 'Madam, your moſt obedient and humble ſervant,

'Deanery-houſe, Dublin,
'Auguſt 6th, 1735.
'To Mrs. Pendarves.'

of 1769, ſhe took a ſmall houſe in Thatched-houſe-court, in St. James's-ſtreet. Here ſhe reſided till ſhe could find a houſe more ſuited to her inclination. Such a houſe ſhe met with the next year in St. James's-place, and, having purchaſed the leaſe of it, ſhe continued in it till her death. Her ſummers ſhe ſpent with the Ducheſs of Portland at Bulſtrode; ſometimes, however, making excurſions to her relations in Warwickſhire and Staffordſhire, or to others of thoſe many friends who were happy to enjoy her ſociety. But theſe excurſions were neither frequent nor long; and in her latter years ſhe almoſt wholly declined them. In the winter, ſcarcely a day paſſed in which the Ducheſs of Portland, unleſs confined by illneſs, did not paſs ſome time with Mrs. Delany at St. James's-place. The moſt uſual time of her Grace's viſit was in an evening, from ſeven o'clock till ten; at which time there was often an aſſemblage of perſons of the firſt diſtinction for rank, abilities, and character. It is apparent, from this account, that Mrs. Delany never lived with the Ducheſs of Portland as a companion (taking that word in the ſignification according to which it is frequently applied), but as an independent friend; for ſhe was poſſeſſed of more than ſix hundred pounds a year. What drew them ſo cloſely together was the moſt perfect friendſhip, founded on long acquaintance, ſimilar virtues, and congenial purſuits. Upon the death of the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland, the King, who had frequently ſeen and honoured Mrs. Delany with his notice at Bulſtrode, was graciouſly pleaſed to aſſign to her, for her ſummer reſidence, the uſe of a houſe completely furniſhed, in St. Alban's-ſtreet, Windſor, adjoining to the entrance of the Caſtle: and, that the having of two houſes on her hands might not produce any inconvenience with regard to the expence of her living, his Majeſty, as a farther mark of his royal favour, conferred upon her a penſion of three hundred pounds a year. The manner in which this penſion was paid added to the gracefulneſs of this gift. To prevent the cuſtomary deductions, the Queen herſelf, in the kindeſt, moſt condeſcending, and moſt conſiderate manner, brought, every half year, the bank notes in her pocket. This, however, was not, as by many has been imagined, an eleemoſynary appointment. Mrs. Delany did not ſtand in need of it in that view; and, if her liberal and moderate ſpirit had permitted her to wiſh for an enlargement of her income, ſhe had near relations, whoſe circumſtances enabled them, and whoſe ſincere affection would have diſpoſed them to add to it, with the utmoſt pleaſure. The munificence of the King proceeded from the high eſteem which their Majeſties entertained of her character, and from their deſire to have near them a lady of ſuch uncommon merit and endowments. Accordingly, they took much pleaſure in converſing with her, and ſometimes would call upon her more than once in the ſame day. On the fifteenth of April, 1788, after a ſhort indiſpoſition, ſhe departed this life, at her houſe in St. James's-place, having nearly completed the eighty-eighth year of her age.

The circumſtance that has principally entitled Mrs. Delany to an article in the preſent work, is her ſkill in painting, and in other ingenious arts, one of which was entirely her own. With reſpect to painting, ſhe was late in her application to it. She did not learn to draw till ſhe was more than thirty years of age, when ſhe put herſelf under the inſtruction of Goupy, a faſhionable maſter of that time, and much employed by Frederic Prince of Wales. To oil-painting ſhe did not take till ſhe was paſt forty. So ſtrong was her paſſion for this art, that ſhe has frequently been known to employ herſelf in it, day after day, from ſix o'clock in the morning till dinner-time, allowing only a ſhort interval for breakfaſt. She was principally a copyiſt, but a very fine one. The only conſiderable original work of hers in oil was the raiſing of Lazarus, which is now in the poſſeſſion of her noble, kind, and much-valued friend, Lady Bute. The hint of the compoſition was taken from a well-known print of Rembrandt's. It is underſtood, that Sir Joſhua Reynolds was much pleaſed with this picture of Mrs. Delany's. The number of pictures painted by her, conſidering how late it was in life before ſhe applied to the art, was very great. Her own houſe was full of them; and others of them are among the chief ornaments of Calſwich, Welſbourn, and Ilam, the reſpective reſidences of her nephews, Mr. Granville and Mr. Dewes, and of her niece, Mrs. Port.

Mrs. Delany, among her other accompliſhments, excelled in embroidery and ſhell-work; and, in the courſe of her life, produced many elegant ſpecimens of her ſkill in theſe reſpects. But what is more remarkable with regard to her is, that, at the age of ſeventy-four, ſhe invented a new and beautiful mode of exerciſing her ingenuity. This was by the conſtruction of a FLORA, of a moſt ſingular kind, formed by applying coloured papers together, and which might not improperly be called a ſpecies of Moſaic work. Being perfectly miſtreſs of her ſciſſars, the plant or flower which ſhe purpoſed to imitate ſhe cut out; that is, ſhe cut out its various leaves and parts in ſuch coloured Chineſe paper as ſuited her ſubject; and as ſhe could not always meet with a colour to correſpond with the one ſhe wanted, ſhe then dyed her own paper to anſwer her wiſhes. She uſed a black ground, as beſt calculated to throw out her flower; and not the leaſt aſtoniſhing part of her art was, that though ſhe never employed her pencil to trace out the form or ſhape of her plant, yet, when ſhe had applied all the pieces which compoſed it, it hung ſo looſely and gracefully, that every one was perſuaded that it muſt previouſly have been drawn out, and repeatedly corrected, by a moſt judicious hand, before it could have attained the eaſe and air of truth which, without any impeachment of the honour of this accompliſhed lady, might juſtly be called a forgery of Nature's works. The effect was ſuperior to what painting could have produced; and ſo impoſing was her art, that ſhe would ſometimes put a real leaf of a plant by the ſide of one of her own creation, which the eye could not detect, even when ſhe herſelf pointed it out. Mrs. Delany continued in the proſecution of her deſign till the eighty-third year of her age, when the dimneſs of her ſight obliged her to lay it aſide. However, by her unwearied perſeverance, ſhe became authoreſs of far the completeſt FLORA that ever was executed by the ſame hand. The number of plants finiſhed by her amounted to nine hundred and eighty. A pleaſing anecdote, relative to this ſubject, ſhall be given in the note [C].

This invaluable Flora was bequeathed by her to her nephew Court Dewes, Eſq. and is now in his poſſeſſion. The liberality of Mrs. Delany's mind rendered her at all

[C] A pleaſing anecdote, relative to this ſubject, ſhall be given in the note]. Mrs. Delany, whilſt in Ireland, was preſented with a citron, the ſeeds of which ſhe planted, and reared to a tree, which, at the time of her leaving that kingdom, was in its perfection. When ſhe was become enamoured of her new work, ſhe often wiſhed to perpetuate the tree ſhe had left behind her; and intimating ſuch wiſh to the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland, her noble friend, with that benevolence which diſtinguiſhed her character, contrived to get the tree ſent over to Bulſtrode. As ſoon as it was recovered from the accidents of ſo long a journey, it was placed in the gallery; and on Mrs. Delany's being ſtruck with the beauty of the plant, ſhe was informed by her Grace, that it was the identical tree ſhe had often been deſirous of obtaining. Mr. Keate happened to pay a viſit at Bulſtrode juſt as Mrs. Delany had finiſhed the portrait of a branch of her favourite citron tree; and hearing the hiſtory of it, a deſire was excited in him of commemorating an event, which gave him an opportunity of recording the abilities of Mrs. Delany, and the diſcerning and attentive friendſhip of the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland. This he accordingly did, in an elegant copy of verſes, entituled, "A Petition from Mrs. Delany's "Citron Tree to her Grace the Ducheſs Dowager of "Portland;" the concluding part of which, as more immediately regarding our preſent ſubject, we ſhall inſert, for the gratification of our readers.

'From citron-groves on diſtant ſhores,
'Round which the wide Atlantic roars,
'Torn from my parent tree, I came
'A little ſeed conſign'd to fame;
'Conſign'd to fame —— for ſome kind ſtar,
'When from my home I'd wander'd far,
'At laſt on fair Hibernia's land
'Led me to good Delany's hand;
'Delany's hand, whoſe touch can give
'New grace and bloom,—ſhe bade me live.—
'I rooted, nor wiſh'd more to ſtir;
'And who would not, to live with her?—
'Rear'd by her ſmiles, I daily grew,
'And ſpread my beauty to her view;
'But plants, like men, it is allow'd,
'Have all their ſun-ſhine, and their cloud!
'My friendly guardian call'd away,
'On Britain's coaſt to fix her ſtay,
'My cheering ſun-ſhine loſt! no more
'My leaves their wonted verdure wore,
'No more with joy my bloſſoms ſpread,
'Sorrowing I droop'd, and hung my head,
'Till gracious Portland deign'd to be
'Protectreſs of my miſery;
'Bade me once more the Ocean croſs,
'My ſpirits rais'd, retriev'd my loſs;
'And, ever be her name ador'd,
'My miſtreſs to my ſight reſtor'd.—
'Whilſt now I glow with wonted charms,
'And gratitude each fibre warms,
'More favour'd ſure no plant can ſhine!
'But a ſtill happier lot is mine!
'For lo! your faithful friend for me
'Prepares a glorious deſtiny;
'She makes me on her table riſe,
'And notes me with enquiring eyes,
'My texture marks, my form ſurveys,
'And views me with parental gaze,
'Then with her artful ſciſſars traces
'My ſhape, my colour, and my graces,
'Unlike what poets give The Fate,
'For theirs deſtroy, but her's creates!—
'I ſee another ſelf — and ſtart,
'Shudd'ring with wonder at her art.—
'Tis done — and ſhe hath ſeal'd my doom,
'And fix'd me in eternal bloom.
'So Bacchus once, as bards relate,
'Compleated Ariadne's fate,
'And, as ſhort life to beauty 's giv'n,
'Fix'd her a ſtarry crown in Heav'n;
'Surrounded with a radiant blaze,
'For future worlds t' admire, and gaze.—
'Then, noble Lady, may I ſue,
'And one requeſt prefer to you?
'Whilſt my own fame I raptur'd trace,
'I feel a wiſh for all my race.
'O could my ſiſter plants, and flowers,
'That ſpring beneath your beauteous bow'rs,
'Before the good Delany ſtand,
'And ſhare the magic of her hand!
'She'd give to others, as to me,
'A kind of Immortality!' (1)

The ſame ingenious writer has embraced another opportunity of celebrating the merit of the lady we are treating of, in the following lines, containing "Advice to a little Girl, the Author's Daughter, on "her being honoured with ſome Inſtruction by Mrs. "Delany in cutting out Paper."

'With that benevolence which condeſcends
'To glide its knowledge to the youthful heart,
'O'er thee, my child, the good Delany bends,
'Directs thy ſciſſars, and reveals her art.
'Ah! ſeize the happy moment!—She can ſhew
'The mazy path myſterious Nature treads;
'Can ſteal her varied grace, her varied glow,
'And all the changeful beauties that ſhe ſpreads.
'Then mark thy kind inſtructreſs, watch her hand,
'Her judgement, her inſpiring touch attain;
'Thy ſciſſars, make like her's, a magic wand!—
'Tho' much I fear thy efforts will be vain.—
'Failing in this, my child, forbear the ſtrife;
'Another path to fame by her is ſhown;—
'Try by the pattern of her honour'd life,
'With equal virtue to cut out thine own (2).

Theſe are not the only poetical compliments which Mr. Keate has paid to Mrs. Delany; as will appear, in a very agreeable manner, if he ſhould be induced to oblige the world by the publication of a farther Collection of Poems.

Mr. Walpole, in the later editions of his "Anec-"dotes of Painting in England," ſpeaking of a particular picture, which was in the poſſeſſion of the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland, expreſſes himſelf in a note as follows: "This portrait the Ducheſs, at "her death, bequeathed to her friend, the widow of "Dr. Delany, and correſpondent of Dr. Swift: a "lady of excellent ſenſe and taſte, a paintreſs in oil, "who, at the age of ſeventy-five, invented the art of "Paper Moſaic, with which material, coloured, ſhe, "in eight years, executed within twenty of a thouſand "various flowers and flowering ſhrubs, with a preci-"ſion and truth unparalleled (3.) times

times ready to communicate her art. She frequently purſued her work in company; was deſirous of ſhewing to her friends how eaſy it was to execute; and was often heard to lament, that ſo few would attempt it. It required, however, two eſſential requiſites to undertake it with ſucceſs; great patience, and great knowledge in botanical drawing.

When Mrs. Delany had entered into the eightieth year of her age, ſhe prefixed to the firſt volume of her Flora the following lines, having never written, ſo far as is known, any Verſes before.

" Hail to the happy hour, when Fancy led
" My penſive mind the flowery path to tread,
" And gave me emulation to preſume
" With timid art to trace fair Nature's bloom;
" To view with awe the great creative power
" That ſhines confeſt in the minuteſt flower;
" With wonder to purſue the glorious line,
" And gratefully adore the Hand divine."

Theſe lines are ſucceeded by what follows, in proſe.

" This Paper Moſaic work was begun in the ſeventy-fourth year of my age (which I " at firſt only meant as an imitation of an Hortus ſiccus), and as an employment and " amuſement to ſupply the loſs of thoſe that had formerly been delightful to me, but " had loſt their power of pleaſing; being deprived of that friend * whoſe partial " approbation was my pride, and had ſtamped a value on them. Though the effect of " this work was more than I expected, I thought that a whim of my own fancy might " fondly beguile my judgement to think better of it than it deſerved; and I ſhould have " dropped the attempt as vain, had not the Ducheſs Dowager of Portland looked on it " with favourable eyes. Her approbation was ſuch a ſanction to my undertaking, as " made it appear of conſequence, and gave me courage to go on with confidence. To " her I owe more than I dare expreſs; but my heart will ever feel, with the utmoſt " gratitude and tendereſt affection, the honour and delight I have enjoyed in her moſt " generous, ſteady, and delicate friendſhip, for above forty years. MARY DELANY.

* Dr. Delany, her huſband, is probably here intended.

" The ſame deſires, the ſame ingenious arts,
" Delighted both.—We owned and bleſs'd that power
" That join'd at once our ſtudies and our hearts.
" Maſon, Elegy III.

" Bulſtrode, 5th July, 1779."

In 1782, Mrs. Delany loſt her ſight, on which occaſion ſhe wrote the following lines:

" The time is come, I can no more
" The vegetable world explore;
" No more with rapture cull each flower
" That paints the mead, or twines the bower;
" No more with admiration ſee
" Its beauteous form and ſymmetry;
" No more attempt, with hope elate,
" Its lovely hues to imitate.
" Farewell to all thoſe friendly powers
" That bleſt my ſolitary hours;
" Alas, farewell! but ſhall I mourn
" As one who is of hope forlorn?
" Ah, no! my mind with rapture feels " The promiſe which thy word reveals.
" Come, Holy Spirit! on thy wing
" Thy ſacred conſolations bring;
" Teach me to contemplate that grace
" Which hath ſo long ſuſtained my race;
" Which various bleſſings ſtill beſtows,
" And pours in balm to all my woes.
" O! ſanctify the pointed † dart
" That at this moment rends my heart;
" Teach me, ſubmiſſive, to reſign,
" When ſummoned by thy will divine.
" St. James's Place, 1782."

† Alluding to her blindneſs, which deprived her of ſo many occupations and amuſements.

Theſe poetical effuſions, which diſplay ſo excellent a diſpoſition, naturally lead us to conclude this article with an account of Mrs. Delany's private character, which we are happy in being enabled to give in the words of her friend Mr. Keate. " She had " every virtue that could adorn the human heart, with a mind ſo pure, and ſo uncon- " taminated by the world, that it was matter of aſtoniſhment how ſhe could have lived " in

" in its more ſplendid ſcenes without being tainted with one ſingle atom of its folly or " indiſcretion. The ſtrength of her underſtanding received, in the fulleſt degree, its " poliſh, but its weakneſs never reached her. Her life was conducted by the ſentiments " of true piety; her way of thinking, on every occaſion, was upright and juſt; her " converſation was lively, pleaſant, and inſtructive. She was warm, delicate, and ſincere " in her friendſhips; full of philanthropy and benevolence, and loved and reſpected by " every perſon who had the happineſs to know her. That ſun-ſhine and ſerenity of " mind which the good can only enjoy, and which had thrown ſo much attraction on " her life, remained without a ſhadow to the laſt; not leſs bright in its ſetting, " than in its meridian luſtre. That form which in youth had claimed admira- " tion, in age challenged reſpect. It preſented a noble ruin, become venerable by the " decay of time. Her faculties remained unimpaired to the laſt; and ſhe quitted this " mortal ſtate to receive in a better world the crown of a well-ſpent life."

Mrs. Delany was buried in a vault belonging to St. James's Church; and, on one of its columns, a ſtone is erected to her memory, with an inſcription, which, after reciting her name, deſcent, marriages, age, &c. concludes as follows: " She " was a lady of ſingular ingenuity and politeneſs, and of unaffected piety. Theſe " qualities had endeared her through life to many noble and excellent perſons, and made " the cloſe of it illuſtrious, by procuring for her many ſignal marks of grace and favour " from their Majeſties."] K.

 [DEMPSTER [THOMAS], a man of conſiderable learning, of ſingular character, and author of ſeveral literary works, was born in Scotland in the year 1579 (a). He is ſaid to have been deſcended from a noble family, and was inſtructed in grammar learning at Aberdeen; but he was obliged at an early age to leave Scotland, on account of the commotions that then prevailed in that country. He went into England, where he ſtudied for ſome time at Pembroke Hall in Cambridge (b). From thence he went to France, where he gave out, that he had left great eſtates in his own country, on account of his attachment to the Roman Catholic religion (c). He alſo aſſumed the title of Baron of Mureſk, which is ſaid to have been one of the titles of his father; but the low ſtate of his finances obliged him to undertake to teach claſſical literature at Paris. In that city he alſo publiſhed, in one volume, folio, in 1613, " Antiquitatum Romanarum abſolutiſſimum, in quo præter ea quæ Joannes Roſinus " delineaverat, infinita ſupplentur, mutantur, adduntur. Ex criticis, et omnibus " utriuſque linguæ auctoribus collectum: poetis, oratoribus, hiſtoricis, juriſconſultis, " qui laudati, explicati, correctique."

But during his ſtay at Paris, Dempſter did not wholly ſpend his time in his ſtudies, or in the buſineſs of education. " He was as quick," we are told, " at drawing his " ſword, and as quarrelſome, as a profeſſed duelliſt. He either fought with a ſword, " or boxed, almoſt every day; ſo that he was the terror of all ſchoolmaſters (d)." As a teacher, he appears to have been a rigid diſciplinarian; and one ſpirited exertion of his authority in that capacity, in the College of Beauvais [A], produced ſuch conſequences, as obliged him for a time to quit Paris. He then went to England, where he found not only a place of refuge, but alſo a very handſome wife, whom he afterwards carried back with him to Paris [B]. Beſides teaching in that city, it appears that he alſo diſputed for a profeſſor's chair at the academy of Niſmes, and carried it with great applauſe againſt many competitors. From France he went into Italy, and taught philological learning in the Univerſity of Piſa, where he had good appointments. Returning one day from the College, he found that his wife had been ſtolen away, his own ſcholars having aſſiſted in the elopement. "He bore his loſs," ſays Bayle, "like "a Stoic; and, perhaps, was not ſorry to be delivered from a treaſure that he had "found ſo difficult to keep." From Piſa he removed to Bologna, and was appointed Profeſſor in the Univerſity of that city, in which ſituation he continued till his death. He was alſo admitted into the Academy della notte (e).

[A] One ſpirited exertion of his authority in that capacity, in the College of Beauvais, &c.] Of this we have the following account: 'Grangier, Principal of that 'College, being obliged to go a journey, appointed 'Dempſter his ſubſtitute. The latter exerciſed juſtice 'on a ſcholar, who had challenged one of his ſchool-'fellows to fight a duel: he cauſed his breeches to be 'let down, a luſty fellow to horſe him, and whipped 'him ſoundly in a full ſchool. The ſcholar, to revenge 'his affront, brought three gentlemen of his relations, 'who were of the King's life-guards, into the College. 'Dempſter made the whole College take up arms, 'ham-ſtrung the three life-guardmen's horſes before 'the College-gate, and put himſelf into ſuch a poſture 'of defence, that the three military men were forced 'to aſk for quarter. He granted them their lives, but 'impriſoned them in the belfry, and did not releaſe 'them till ſome days after. They went another way 'to revenge themſelves: they cauſed an information 'to be laid againſt Dempſter, concerning his life and 'manners, and got ſome witneſſes to be heard againſt 'him; which obliged him to go over into Eng-'land (1).'

[B] A very handſome wife, whom he afterwards carried back with him to Paris.] Dempſter's wife, on her firſt appearance in Paris, in conſequence of her beauty, and the different mode of her dreſs from that of the women of that city, excited a degree of attention, that was extremely troubleſome, and even dangerous. It is thus related by Nicius Erythræus, as quoted by Bayle: 'Ubi (in Anglia) non modo tutum ab inſectatoribus ſuis perfugium, verum etiam mulierem nactus eſt, forma et vultu, adeo liberali, adeo venuſto, 'ut nihil ſupra, quam in uxoris habuit loco. Quæ 'mulier, cum luce quadam, Pariſiis, quo rurſus Thomas cum ea ſe receperat, conſpecta eſſet, et quia, 'forma præſtabat, ut diximus, et quia habitu erat 'dementiſſimo: nam et pectus et ſcapulas, nive ipſa 'candidiores, omnium oculis expoſitas habebat; tantus, viſendi gratia, hominum concurſus factus eſt, 'ut niſi ſe in domum cujuſdam, una cum viro, recipiſſet, nihil proprius factum eſſet, quam ut ambo à 'multitudine opprimerentur.' 'In England he not 'only found refuge from his perſecutors, but a woman 'alſo of incomparable beauty, and of an air ſo noble 'and graceful, that nothing could be more charming, 'whom he took for his wife. As ſhe was one day 'ſeen at Paris, whither Dempſter had carried her in 'his return, and being, as I ſaid, extremely beautiful, and in a moſt enchanting dreſs, expoſing to 'public view a neck and breaſt whiter than the pureſt 'ſnow, ſuch a crowd of people flocked from all ſides 'to her, that, had they not taken ſhelter in a neighbouring houſe, it is more than probable they would 'have been both cruſhed to death.'

In 1622, he publiſhed, at Bologna, in 8vo, "Κεραυνος και σφελος in Gloſſas Lib. "IV. Inſtitut. Juſtiniani," &c.; and the following year he publiſhed, in 8vo, "De "Juramento, Lib. III. Locus et Antiq. Rom. retractatus," &c. He died at Bologna in the year 1625 (f).

Dempſter was in his perſon a very tall, ſtout, and well-made man, and poſſeſſed great perſonal courage (g). He appears to have been a man of warm paſſions, a zealous friend, and a violent enemy. His literary acquiſitions were very conſiderable, as is manifeſt from his works; and it is ſaid, that he was accuſtomed to ſtudy fourteen hours a day without intermiſſion. His memory was uncommonly tenacious, ſo that he ſaid of himſelf, that he knew not what it was to forget (b); and he was ſometimes ſtyled a great ſpeaking library. But his judgment was by no means equal to his erudition. Archbiſhop Uſher ſays of him, that he was homo multæ lectionis, ſed nullius planè judicii (i). But Voſſius ſtiles him eruditus Scotus, beneque de literis meritus (k).

Two years after Dempſter's death, was publiſhed at Bologna, in 1627, in one volume 4to, from his manuſcript, "Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica Gentis Scotorum, Lib. XIX." This work contains a very long liſt of Scottiſh ſaints, and accounts of ſome literary men; and, at the end of the book, a few particulars concerning Dempſter himſelf were added by Matthæus Peregrinus. But the diſregard to truth, which Dempſter has diſplayed in this work, has juſtly expoſed him to the cenſure of many writers [C]. He alſo publiſhed, in his own life-time, the following pieces: "Strena Kal. Januar. 1616. "ad illuſtriſſ. virum Jacobum Hayum, Dominum ac Baronem de Saley," &c. Lond. 4to, 1616. "Menologium Scotorum, in quo nullus niſi Scotus gente aut converſa-"tione, quod ex omnium gentium monimentis, pio ſtudio Dei gloriæ. Sanctorum "honori. Patriæ ornamento," &c. Bonon. 4to, 1622. "Scotia illuſtrior, ſeu, Mendi-"cabula repreſſa." Lugd. 1620, 8vo. He is likewiſe ſaid to have been the author of four books of epiſtles, of ſome tragedies and tragi-comedies, of fourteen books of different kinds of poetry, and of various pieces (l). Notwithſtanding his attachment to the Romiſh religion, ſome of his books were condemned by the inquiſition (m). A very elaborate and learned work of Dempſter was elegantly printed at Florence, with many copper plates, in two volumes, folio, in 1723 and 1724, under the care of Thomas Coke, Eſq. at the expence of Coſmo III. and John Gaſto, Dukes of Tuſcany, and to which the following title was prefixed: "Thomæ Dempſteri a Mureſk Scoti "Pandectarum in Piſano Lyceo Profeſſoris Ordinarii de Etruria Regali Libri Septem, "Opus Poſtumum, in duas partes diviſum." [C] Juſtly expoſed him to the cenſure of many writers.] Baillet, in his Jugemens des Savans, ſpeaking of Dempſter, ſays, Il nous a donné une Hiſtoire Eccléſiaſtique d'Ecoſſe en 19 livres, où il parle beaucoup des gens de lettres de cette contrée. Mais, quoiqu'il fût habile d'ailleurs, il n'en avoit ni le ſens plus adroit, ni le jugement plus ſolide, ni la conſcience meilleure. Il eût voulu que tous les ſavans fuſſent Ecoſſois. Il a forgé des titres de livres qui n'ont jamais été mis au monde, pour relever la glorie de ſa patrie, et il a commis divers autres fourbes qui l'ont décrié parmi les gens de lettres (2). 'Thomas Dempſter has given us an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſ-'tory of Scotland, in nineteen books, wherein he 'ſpeaks very much of the learned men of that coun-'try. But though he was in ſome reſpects an able 'man, he did not poſſeſs ſound ſenſe, or a ſolid judg-'ment, nor was he very conſcientious. He would 'have wiſhed that all learned men had been Scotch-'men. He forged the titles of books that never ap-'peared in the world, in order to raiſe the glory of 'his country; and he committed ſeveral literary frauds, 'which have diſcredited him among men of learn-'ing.'

(2) Id. ibid.

Biſhop Nicolſon ſays, that 'Dempſter reckons a 'great many writers of Scottiſh hiſtory, who are al-'lowed to be counterfeits (3).' And Sir James Ware remarks, that 'Dempſter, in his Catalogue of Scotch 'Authors, has not only inſerted thoſe of England and 'Wales, at his own pleaſure; but, to prove his aſſer-'tions, has alſo frequently quoted imaginary authors, 'and fictitious treatiſes, times, and places (4).'

(3) Scottiſh Hiſtorical Library, p. 21. edit. 1736

Archbiſhop Uſher repeatedly cenſures Dempſter for his inventions and his falſehoods; and in one place ſpeaks of it as being a practice of Dempſter's, to enumerate books which were never written, and that had no exiſtence but in his own idle brain (5). Dr. William Cave alſo ſpeaks of Dempſter with great contempt, on account of his fictions with reſpect to Scottiſh authors (6). Indeed, Dempſter ſeems to have thought it highly meritorious to advance the groſſeſt falſehoods, if thoſe falſehoods would, in any degree, contribute to the honour of his country.

DENHAM (Sir JOHN), an eminent Poet of the XVIIth century, was the only ſon of Sir John Denham, Knight, of Little Horſely in Eſſex, ſome time Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, and one of the Lords Juſtices of that kingdom, by Eleanor his wife, daughter of Sir Garret More, Knight, Baron of Mellefont in Ireland (a). He was born at Dublin in the year 1615 (b); but was brought over from thence very young, upon his father's being made one of the Barons of the Exchequer in England, in 1617. He had his education in grammar learning at London, and, in Michaelmas Term 1631, he was entered a Gentleman-Commoner in Trinity-College in Oxford, being then ſixteen years of age; where (as Anthony Wood expreſſes it) 'being looked upon as a ſlow, dreaming, young man, and more addicted to gaming than ſtudy, they could never 'imagine he could ever enrich the world with the iſſue of his brain, as he afterwards 'did.' After three years ſtay in the Univerſity, and having been examined in the publick ſchools for the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he entered himſelf in Lincoln's-Inn; where he was generally thought to apply himſelf very cloſely to the ſtudy of the Common Law. But, his itch of gaming continuing, he was often ſtript of all his money; and, his father chiding him ſeverely, and threatening to diſcard him, if he did not reform, he wrote thereupon a little Eſſay againſt Gaming, which he preſented to his father, to convince him of his deteſtation of it (c). His father dying in 1638 (d), he fell to gaming again, and ſquandered away ſeveral thouſand pounds. In the latter end of the year 1641, he publiſhed his tragedy called The Sophy [A]; which was greatly admired, and gave Mr. Waller occaſion to ſay of our author, that he broke out like the Iriſh Rebellion, threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, when no body was aware, or in the leaſt ſuſpected it. Soon after he was pricked for High-Sheriff of the county of Surrey, and made Governor of Farnham-Caſtle for the King. But, not being well ſkilled in military affairs, he ſoon quitted that poſt, and retired to his Majeſty at Oxford, where he publiſhed his poem called Cooper's Hill [B]. In 1647, he was entruſted by the Queen with a meſſage to the King, then in the hands of the army, and employed in other affairs relating to his Majeſty [C]. In April 1648, he conveyed away James Duke of York [D], then under the tuition of Algernon Earl of [A] His Tragedy called The Sophy.] It was acted at the private houſe in Black Friars, with great applauſe, and firſt printed in 4*to*, London 1642; afterwards in 8*vo*, 1667; and again in 8*vo*, 1671. The plot is the ſame with that of Baron's Mirza, taken from Herbert's Travels, in the Life of Abbas (1).

[B] His Poem called Cooper's Hill.] It was printed at Oxford in 1643, in one ſheet and an half, in 4*to*; reprinted with additions at London in 1650 and 1655, in 4*to*; and again in 1667 and 1668, in 8*vo* (2). The editions of 1667, &c. after the Reſtoration, differ conſiderably from the preceding ones; as may be ſeen in the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr Dryden (3). It was tranſlated into Latin verſe by Mr. Moſes Pengry, of Brazen-noſe college in Oxford, and publiſhed there in 1676, in 4*to*, under the title of, Cooper's Hill, Latinè redditum, ad nobiliſſimum Dominum Gulielmum Dominum Cavendiſh, honoratiſſimi Domini Gulielmi Comitis Devoniæ filium unicum (4). Mr Dryden, ſpeaking of Cooper's Hill (5) ſays, it is A Poem, which for majeſty of the ſtyle is, and ever will be, the exact ſtandard of good writing. And the noble author of an Eſſay on Human Life, obſerves (6), that 'Cooper's 'Hill has met with univerſal applauſe, though it's 'ſubject ſeems rather deſcriptive than inſtructing; but 'it is not the hill, the river, nor the ſtag-chace; it 'is the good ſenſe, and the fine reflexions ſo frequently 'interſperſed, and as it were interwoven with the reſt, 'that gives it the value, and will make it, as was ſaid 'of true wit, everlaſting like the ſun.' Mr. Pope celebrates this poem in the following lines of his Windſor Foreſt (7).

Here his firſt lays majeſtick Denham ſung;
There the laſt numbers flow'd from Cowley's tongue.

——Tread, with reſpectful awe,
Windſor's green glades, where Denham, tuneful bard,
Charm'd once the liſt'ning Dryads with his ſong,
Sublimely ſweet. O! grant me, ſacred ſhade,
To glean ſubmiſs' what thy full fickle leaves.

There is in the following verſes (9) a fooliſh inſinuation, that Sir John Denham was not the author of Cooper's Hill:

(9) The Seſſion of the Poets, in the Miſcell. Poems, Part ii. p. 92.

Then in came Denham, that limping old bard,
Whoſe fame on the Sophy and Cooper's Hill ſtands;
And brought many Stationers, who ſwore very hard,
That nothing ſold better, except 'twere his lands.

But Apollo adviſed him to write ſomething more,
To clear a ſuſpicion, which poſſeſſed the Court,
That Cooper's Hill, ſo much bragg'd on before,
Was writ by a Vicar, who had forty pound for't.

[C] He was intruſted by the Queen with a meſſage to the King——and employed in other affairs relating to his Majeſty.] Our Poet himſelf ſhall give us an account of this circumſtance of his life. In his Dedication of his Poems to King Charles II, he addreſſes that Prince as follows: 'Sir, after the delivery of your royal 'father's perſon into the hands of the army, I under-'taking to the Queen-Mother, that I would find ſome 'means to gain acceſs to him, ſhe was pleaſed to ſend 'me, and by the help of Hugh Peters I got my ad-'mittance, and coming well inſtructed from the Queen, '(his Majeſty having been long kept in the dark), he 'was pleaſed to diſcourſe very freely with me of the 'whole ſtate of his affairs.——At his departure 'from Hampton-Court, he was pleaſed to command 'me to ſtay privately in London, to ſend to him, and 'receive from him, all his letters from and to all his 'correſpondents at home and abroad, and I was fur-'niſhed with nine ſeveral cyphers in order to it. Which 'truſt I performed with great ſafety to the perſons with 'whom we correſponded; but about nine months after, 'being diſcovered by their knowledge of Mr Cowley's 'hand, I happily eſcaped both for myſelf and thoſe 'that held correſpondence with me.'

[D] He conveyed away James Duke of York.] So we

of Northumberland, from St. James's, and carried him into France to the Prince of Wales, and the Queen-mother. Not long after, he was ſent Ambaſſador from King Charles II. to the King of Poland [E]. In 1652, or thereabout, he returned into England; and, his paternal eſtate being greatly reduced by gaming and the Civil Wars, he was kindly entertained by the Earl of Pembroke at Wilton, and continued with that Nobleman about a year. At the Reſtoration, he entered upon the office of Surveyor of his Majeſty's Buildings [F], in the room of Inigo Jones, deceaſed; and, at the coronation of King Charles II. was created Knight of the Bath. Upon ſome diſcontent ariſing from a ſecond marriage, he loſt his ſenſes: but ſoon recovering from that diſorder, he continued in great eſteem at Court, and with all perſons of taſte, for his Poetical Writings [G]. He [E] He was ſent Ambaſſador from King Charles II. to the King of Poland.] William (afterwards Lord) Crofts was joined in the embaſſy with Sir John Denham (11). Among our author's Poems is one intituled, On my Lord Crofts and my Journey into Poland, from whence we brought 1000*l. for his Majeſty, by the decimation of his Scottiſh ſubjects there.*

(11) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 423.

[F] He entered upon the office of Surveyor of his Majeſty's Buildings.] Mr. Wood pretends (12), that King Charles I. had granted our Poet the reverſion of that place after the deceaſe of Inigo Jones: but Sir John himſelf, in the Dedication of his Poems, aſſures us, King Charles II. at his departure from St. Germains to Jerſey, was pleaſed freely, without his aſking it, to confer it upon him.

(12) Ibid.

[G] He was in great eſteem ——— for his poetical writings.] In the Dedication of his Poems to King Charles II. he tells us, he had been diſcouraged by King Charles I. from writing verſes. 'One morning '(ſays he) waiting on him (the King) at Cauſham, 'ſmiling upon me, he ſaid he could tell me ſome news 'of myſelf, which was, that he had ſeen ſome verſes of 'mine the evening before (being thoſe to Sir R. Fanſhaw); and aſking me when I made them, I told him 'two or three years ſince: he was pleaſed to ſay, that 'having never ſeen them before, he was afraid I had 'written them ſince my return into England; and, 'though he liked them well, he would adviſe me to 'write no more, alledging, that when men are young, 'and have little elſe to do, they might vent the over-'flowings of their fancy that way; but when they 'were thought fit for more ſerious employments, if 'they ſtill perſiſted in that courſe, it would look as 'if they minded not the way to any better. Where-'upon I ſtood corrected, as long as I had the honour 'to wait upon him.' But King Charles II. was an encourager of our author's Muſe, eſpecially while he had the good fortune to wait upon his Majeſty in Holland and Flanders; and was pleaſed ſometimes to give him arguments, to divert and put off the evil hours of their baniſhment, which now and then, he tells us, fell not ſhort of his Majeſty's expectation. After his promotion to the office of Surveyor of the royal buildings, he gave over poetical lines, and made it his buſineſs, he ſays, to draw ſuch others as might be more ſerviceable to his Majeſty, and, he hoped, more laſting. Then he adds: 'Since that time I never diſobeyed my old maſter's 'commands, till this ſummer at the Wells, my retire-'ment there tempting me to divert thoſe melancholy 'thoughts, which the new apparitions of foreign in-'vaſion and domeſtick diſcontent gave us; but theſe 'clouds being now happily blown over, and our ſun 'clearly ſhining out again, I have recovered the re-'lapſe; it being ſuſpected it would have proved the 'epidemical diſeaſe of age, which is apt to fall back 'into the follies of youth: yet Socrates, Ariſtotle, 'and Cato, did the ſame; and Scaliger ſaith, that 'fragment of Ariſtotle was beyond any thing that Pin-'dar or Homer ever wrote.' Our author's Dedication concludes with a farewel to the Muſes. 'As for 'thoſe latter parts, ſays he, ſpeaking of his Poems, 'which have not yet received your Majeſty's favourable 'aſpect, if they who have ſeen them do not flatter me, '(for I dare not truſt my own judgment), they will 'make it appear, that it is not with me as with moſt 'of mankind, who never forſake their darling vices, 'till their vices forſake them; and that this divorce 'was not Frigiditatis cauſa, but an act of choice, and 'not of neceſſity. Therefore, Sir, I ſhall only call it 'an humble petition, that your Majeſty will p'eaſe to 'pardon this new amour to my old miſtreſs, and my 'diſobedience to his commands, to whoſe memory I 'look up with great reverence and devotion; and 'making a ſerious reflexion upon that wiſe advice, it 'carries greater weight with it now than when it was 'given: for when age and experience have ſo ripened 'man's diſcretion as to make it fit for uſe, either in 'private or public affairs, nothing blaſts and corrupts 'the fruit of it ſo much as the empty, airy reputation 'of being Nimis Poeta; and therefore I ſhall take my 'leave of the Muſes, as two of my predeceſſors did, 'ſaying;

'Splendidis longum vale dico nugis.
'His verſus et cætera ludicra pono.'

Our author's poems are as follow: I. Cooper's Hill (13). II. The Deſtruction of Troy: an Eſſay on the Second Book of Virgil's Æneis. Written in the Year 1636. To Sir Richard Fanſhaw, upon his Tranſlation of Paſtor Fido. XX. A Dialogue between Sir John Pooley and Mr. Thomas Killigrew. XXI. An Occaſional Imitation of a Modern Author upon the Game of Cheſs. XXII. The Paſſion of Dido for Æneas. XXIII. Of Prudence. Of Juſtice. Theſe two pieces are tranſlated from the Latin of Mancini, a noble Italian, who was contemporary with Petrarch and Mantuan, and not long before Taſſo. The author wrote upon the four Cardinal Virtues; but Sir John Denham tranſlated only the two firſt, 'not (he tells us) to turn the kindneſs he in-'tended the author into an injury; for the two laſt 'are little more than repetitions and recitals of the 'firſt; as (to make a juſt excuſe for him) they could 'not well be otherwiſe, ſince the two laſt virtues are 'but deſcendants from the firſt, Prudence being the true 'mother of Temperance, and true Fortitude the child 'of Juſtice (16). XXIV. The Progreſs of Learning. XXV. Cato Major, of Old Age, a Poem. It is taken from the Latin of Tully, though much altered from the original, not only by the change of the ſtyle, but by addition and ſubſtraction. Our author tells us, that 'intending to tranſlate this piece into proſe (where 'tranſlation ought to be ſtrict) finding the matter very 'proper for verſe, he took the liberty to leave out 'what was only neceſſary to that age and place, and 'to take, or add, what was proper to this preſent age 'and occaſion, by laying the ſenſe cloſer, and in fewer 'words, according to the ſtyle and ear of theſe times.' 'The three firſt parts,' ſays he, 'I dedicate to my old 'friends, to take off thoſe melancholy reflexions which the 'ſenſe of age, infirmity, and death, may give them. The laſt part

'I think neceſſary for the conviction of thoſe many 'who believe not, or at leaſt mind not, the immor-'tality of the ſoul, of which the ſcripture ſpeaks only 'poſitively, as a Law-giver, with an ipſe dixit. But if 'a Heathen philoſopher bring ſuch arguments from 'reaſon, nature, and ſecond cauſes, which none of our 'atheiſtical ſophiſters can confute, if they may ſtand 'convinced, that there is an immortality of the ſoul, 'I hope they will ſo weigh the conſequences, as nei-'ther to talk, nor live, as if there was no ſuch 'thing (17).' XXVI. "The Sophy, a Tragedy (18)." The above pieces have been ſeveral times printed toge-ther, in one volume, in 12mo, under the title of "Poems and Tranſlations, with the Sophy, a Tra-"gedy: written by the Honourable Sir John Denham, "Knight of the Bath." The ſixth edition is of 1719. Beſides theſe, Anthony Wood mentions "A Panegy-"rick on his Excellency the Lord General George "Monk, Commander in Chief," &c. Lond. 1659, in one ſheet, in 4to. Though our author's name is not to it, it was generally aſcribed to him. "A Pro-"logue to his Majeſty at the firſt play preſented at the "Cock-Pit, in Whitehall, being part of that noble "entertainment which their Majeſties received, Nov. "The True "Preſbyterian without diſguiſe: or, a Character of a "Preſbyterian's Ways and Actions." Lond. 1680, in half a ſheet in folio. Our author's name is to this poem; but it was then queſtioned by many, whether he was the author of it. In the year 1666, there were printed by ſtealth, in octavo, certain Poems, intituled, "Directions to a Painter," in four copies or parts, each dedicated to King Charles II. They were very ſatirically written againſt ſeveral perſons engaged in the Dutch war, in 1665. At the end of them was a piece intituled, "Clarendon's Houſe-warming;" and after that his "Epitaph," both containing bitter reflections on Edward Earl of Clarendon. Sir John Denham's name is to theſe pieces; but they were generally thought to be written by Andrew Marvel, Eſq. The Printer of them, being diſcovered, was ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory for the ſame (19). B.

 [From the various lives which have been written of Sir John Denham, ſcarcely any perſonal information can be collected that is not to be met with in the preceding article. Dr. Johnſon has taken notice of a ſlight circumſtance omitted by other writers, which is, that when our poet was for a time diſordered in his underſtanding, Butler lampooned him for his lunacy. "I know not," adds the doctor, whether the malig-"nant lines were then made publick; nor what pro-"vocation incited Butler to do what no provocation "can excuſe (20)."

(20) Lives of the Poets, vol. I. p. 107.

Another fact, not mentioned by the generality of Denham's Biographers, is, that he was an early mem-ber of the Royal Society. This, which muſt be conſidered as honourable to his memory, we learn from Dr. Birch's Hiſtory of that Society; in which, according to the doctor's cuſtom when he records the death of a member, he has given a ſhort "Life of Sir John (21)." It appears, from the Regiſter Book of the Royal Society, that he was elected a Fellow on the 20th day of May, 1663.

(21) Hiſtory of the Royal Society of London, vol. II. p. 406—408.

The great object of conſideration, with regard to Sir John Denham, is his character as a poet, concern-ing which much has been ſaid by recent, as well as by our older writers. Mr. Waller's encomium on the appearance of his "Sophy," that "He broke out, "like the Iriſh rebellion, threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, "when nobody was aware, or in the leaſt expected it," will probably be conſidered as ſomewhat hyperbolical. Not having the play at hand, we cannot ſpecify its diſtinct merit. The author of the Biographia Drama-tica ſays, that Denham's Genius broke forth in a full blaze of meridian brightneſs, in that juſtly celebrated and admired tragedy, the Sophy. But when the writer afterward comes to ſpeak of it ſeparately, he does not point out its particular excellencies, contenting him-ſelf alone with vindicating our poet for having han-dled his ſubject very differently from what was done by Baron, in his Mirza. Baron objects, that Den-ham has deviated from the truth of hiſtory, in mak-ing Abbas die in his tragedy; whereas he really ſur-vived ſeveral years after the murder of his ſon. "This, "however," it is juſtly anſwered, "is no more than "a licentia poetica, which has ever been conſidered as "warrantable; and which, on the preſent occaſion, "is made uſe of only for the ſake of dramatic juſ-"tice (22)."

(22) Biographia Dramatica, vol. I. p. 121. vol. II. p. 349.

Of all Sir John Denham's poems, we need not ſay that his Cooper's Hill is the moſt celebrated. To the former opinions, which have been given of it, we ſhall add what has more lately been ſaid concerning it; and here Dr. Johnſon will naturally claim our firſt at-tention. "Cooper's Hill," ſays the doctor, "if it "be maliciouſly inſpected, will not be found without "its faults. The digreſſions are too long, the mora-"lity too frequent, and the ſentiments ſometimes ſuch "as will not bear a rigorous enquiry. The four verſes "which, ſince Dryden has commended them, almoſt "every writer, for a century paſt, has imitated, are "generally known:

"O could I flow like thee, and make thy ſtream
"My great example—as it is my theme!
"Tho' deep, yet clear; tho' gentle, yet not dull;
"Strong, without rage; without o'er-flowing, full.

"The lines are in themſelves not perfect; "for moſt of the words, thus artfully oppoſed, are "to be underſtood ſimply on one ſide of the compari-"ſon, and metaphorically on the other; and, if there "be any language which does not expreſs intellectual "operations by material images, into that language "they cannot be tranſlated. But ſo much meaning is "confined in ſo few words; the particulars of reſem-"blance are ſo perſpicaciouſly collected, and every "mode of excellence ſeparated from its adjacent fault "by ſo nice a line of limitation; the different parts "of the ſentence are ſo accurately adjuſted, and the "flow of the laſt couplet is ſo ſmooth and ſweet, that "the paſſage, however celebrated, has not been "praiſed above its merit. It has beauty peculiar to "itſelf, and muſt be numbered among thoſe felicities "which cannot be produced at will by wit and labour, "but muſt ariſe unexpectedly in ſome hour propitious "to poetry, (23)."

(23) Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra, p. 111, 112.

On the two laſt of theſe four celebrated lines, which Mr. Dryden propoſes as a problem to exerciſe the wits of the critics, to diſcover the reaſons why they are ſo harmonious, the learned Greek Scholar, Lord Mon-boddo, has condeſcended to diſplay his critical ſkill. He obſerves, that it is a great beauty in verſe, when the monoſyllable, on which the accent is thrown, is a word that not only will bear an emphaſis, but requires it; ſo that the accent, which is the elevation of the voice upon one ſyllable of the word, and the emphaſis, which is the ſame elevation upon a word of a ſentence, in order to diſtinguiſh it from the reſt, concur to-gether. This is one of the beauties of the diſtich in queſtion; where the emphaſis, as well as the accent, falls upon the monoſyllables deep, clear, ſtrong, rage, and full. "But this," adds his Lordſhip, "is not "the only beauty of thoſe lines. For, in the firſt "place, there are the antitheſes of deep and clear, gen-"tle and dull, ſtrong and without rage, and full, with-"out overflowing. Secondly, If theſe antitheſes had "been expreſſed in the ſame manner, I ſhould have "thought there were too many of them, and that the "compoſition was too uniform. But there is only a "ſimilarity in the two firſt of them; which being "carried no farther, I think, is a beauty. And the "expreſſion of the two in the ſecond line is different, "not only from thoſe in the firſt, but from one ano-"ther. Theſe are beauties of compoſition indepen-"dent of the verſification. But, laſtly, There is a "farther beauty in the verſification, beſides that al-"ready obſerved; namely, that the ſecond line begins "with a trochee; that is, with an accented ſyllable, "in place of an unaccented, with which the firſt line "begins. This gives a flow to the ſecond line, very "different from that of the firſt; and gives a beautiful "variety to the whole, which otherwiſe the four an-"titheſes, notwithſtanding the change of expreſſion, "would "would render a little too uniform in the ſtruc-

"ture (24.)"

(24) Of the Origin and Progreſs of Language, vol. ii. p. 389, 390, note.

Previouſly to Dr. Johnſon's and Lord Monboddo's obſervations, other writers have made Denham's famous diſtich the ſubject of their enquiry. There is a diſquiſition concerning it in Hughes's Minutes for an Eſſay on the Harmony of Verſe; and another in Say's Eſſay on the Numbers of Paradiſe Loſt. But no one has ſo particularly conſidered the matter as the Rev. John Maſon, M. A. the author of a well-known and much-approved treatiſe on Self-Knowledge. This gentleman, in a pamphlet publiſhed by him, in 1749, without his name, entitled, "An Eſſay on the Power "of Numbers, and the Principles of Harmony, in "Poetical Compoſition," has given a ſolution of Dryden's Problem, which we ſhall here inſert, the tract wherein it occurs being now very ſcarce. The ſolution, which perhaps is the beſt that has yet been offered, is as follows: 'I ſhall conclude my remarks 'on the Iambic meaſure with obſerving, that, from 'the principles before advanced, we may be able to 'account for the peculiar elegance of that celebrated 'diſtich of Mr. Denham's, in his "Cooper's Hill," 'which hath been rendered ſo famous by Mr. Dryden's 'propoſing it as a ſort of problem to exerciſe the wits 'of grammarians to diſcover the true ſource of its 'harmony.

⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ – ⏑ ⏑ ⏑ –

'Tho' deep, | yet clear; | tho' gen|tle, yet | not dull;

'Strong with|out Rage; | without | o'erflow|ing full.

'Mr. Hughes ſuppoſes that all the admired muſic of 'theſe lines ariſes from the free and unforced quan-'tity of the ſyllables, the propriety of the pauſes, di-'verſifying the grammatical ſtructure of the ſentences, 'tranſpoſing the order of the words, and cloſing the 'couplet with the emphatical word full; and then con-'cludes, if there be any other myſtery in theſe lines, I own 'it is beyond my ſkill to diſcover it (25). Now, I ap-'prehend, there is a further myſtery in them, which 'indeed he was not aware of, ariſing from the order 'and quality of the poetical numbers; in the choice 'and diſpoſition of which the Poet was extremely 'happy. For he hath introduced into theſe two lines 'every one of the diſſyllable feet; the Iambic and 'Pyrrhic in the firſt, and the Trochee and Spondee 'in the ſecond. So that it hath all the advantage of 'harmony which variety of numbers can give it. Nor 'is he leſs happy in the diſpoſition of theſe numbers. 'For in the firſt line, excepting the fourth foot, they 'are all Iambics: the laſt part of each falling, not 'only on accented ſyllables, but emphatical words, 'and thoſe in contraſt too, makes the ſound and the 'ſenſe moſt perfectly accord. The fourth place is 'poſſeſſed by a Pyrrhic, which is always an agreeable 'movement.

(25) See Eſſays on the Harmony, &c. of Numbers, p. 151, 152.

'The ſecond line begins with a Trochee; which 'gives motion, as it were, to the river; but is im-'mediately checked by the Spondees and Iambics 'that alternately follow. So that the ſtately flow of 'the numbers expreſſes that of the river they deſcribe. 'And the ſound is ſtill an echo to the ſenſe.

'In a word, then, the beauty of this diſtich con-'ſiſts in two things, viz. the elegance of the ſtile, and 'the harmony of the verſe. The elegance of the ſtile 'ariſes from the tranſpoſition of the words, the pro-'priety of the pauſes, and the contraſts of the de-'ſcription; and the harmony of the verſe ariſes from 'the variety and diſpoſition of the numbers happily 'adapted to the emphaſis of the words, and the nature 'of the ſubject; as I have juſt ſhewn. And this I 'take to be a true ſolution of this poetical problem, 'which there needs no other Œdipus to unriddle than 'a little inſight into the power of numbers and the 'principles of verſe (26.)"

(26) Eſſay on the Power of Numbers and the Principles of Harmony in Poetical Compoſitions. p. 59, 60.

Whilſt ſo many encomiums have been paſſed on this celebrated diſtich, there is one writer who cannot perceive in it the leaſt degree of beauty. After examining them with a minuteneſs and coldneſs of verbal criticiſm, which every man of taſte will regard with contempt, he concludes, that the lines in queſtion are equalled in ſweetneſs by many hundreds in our language, written both before and ſince; and that to attend to them in that view would be futile. From what has already been produced from Dr. Johnſon, Lord Monboddo, and Mr. Maſon, it may fairly be collected, that the author we are ſpeaking of (Mr. Scott, of Amwell) underſtood but little of the power and variety of poetic numbers.

It is not to the particular diſtich ſo often mentioned that Mr. Scott's criticiſm is confined. He has made a direct and formal attack upon the whole of the "Cooper's Hill," in no part of which he can diſcern any traces of excellence. We acknowledge, that ſeveral of his remarks are well founded, and that the poem has been applauded beyond its merit: but what are we to think of Mr. Scott's concluſion, which is as follows: 'There are many performances which have 'great beauties and great faults: the Sun of Genius 'illuminates their mountains, though their valleys are 'dark; but "Cooper's Hill" is an uniform maſs of 'dulneſs, on which that Sun has not beſtowed its 'faineſt irradiation (27).' In oppoſition to ſo bold an aſſertion, it may ſafely be maintained, that there are ſome paſſages in the poem which will always be admired. This is eſpecially the caſe with reſpect to the general deſcription of the Thames; concerning which the ingenious traveller Dr. Moore, after citing the verſes containing it, obſerves, that 'they are, beyond 'compariſon, the nobleſt lines that were ever written 'on a river (27).' In Prior's "Carmen Seculare," we recollect two lines which are a manifeſt imitation, and no unhappy one, of Denham's diſtich:

(27) Critical Eſſays on ſome of the poems of ſeveral Engliſh Poets, p. 1—36. p. 23—25. 35.

(28) View of Italy, vol. I. p. 282.

'Thames,
'With gentle coarſe devolving fruitful ſtreams;
'Serene, yet ſtrong; majeſtic, yet ſedate:
'Swift without violence, without terror great."

On the other poems of Sir John Denham Dr. Johnſon has made various remarks, which are worthy of notice. His ludicrous compoſitions the Doctor juſtly condemns. 'Nothing,' ſays he 'is leſs exhilarating 'than the ludicrouſneſs of Denham. He does not 'fail for want of efforts: he is familiar; he is groſs; 'but he is never merry, unleſs the "Speech againſt 'Peace, in the Cloſe Committee," be excepted. For 'grave burleſque, however, his imitation of Dave-'nant ſhews him to have been well qualified.'

'Of his more elevated occaſional poems,' adds Dr. Johnſon, 'there is perhaps none that does not deſerve 'commendation. In the verſes to Fletcher we have 'an image that has ſince been often adopted:

'But whither am I ſtrayed? I need not raiſe
'Trophies to thee from other men's diſpraiſe;
'Nor is thy fame on leſſer ruins built;
'Nor need thy juſter title the foul guilt
'Of Eaſtern Kings, who, to ſecure their reign,
'Muſt have their brothers, ſons, and kindred, ſlain.'

'After Denham, Orrery, in one of his prologues:

'Poets are ſultans, if they had their will;
'For every author would his brother kill.'

And Pope,

'Should ſuch a man, too fond to rule alone,
'Bear like the Turk no brother near the throne.'

'But this is not the beſt of his little pieces: it is 'excelled by his poem to Fanſhaw, and his elegy on 'Cowley. His praiſe of Fanſhaw's Verſion of Gua-'rini contains a very ſpritely and judicious character 'of a good tranſlator:

'That ſervile path thou nobly doſt decline,
'Of tracing word by word, and line by line.
'Thoſe are the labour'd births of ſlaviſh brains;
'Not the effect of poetry, but pains;
'Cheap vulgar arts, whoſe narrowneſs affords
'No flight for thoughts, but poorly ſtick at words.
'A new and nobler way thou doſt purſue,
'To make tranſlations and tranſlators too.
'They but preſerve the aſhes, thou the flame,
'True to his ſenſe, but truer to his fame.'

'The excellence of theſe lines is the greater, as 'the truth which they contain was not at that time 'generally known.'

'His poem on the death of Cowley was his laſt, 'and, among his ſhorter works, his beſt performance: 'the numbers are muſical, and the thoughts are 'juſt (29).'

(29) Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra, p. 108—110.

Dr. Johnſon farther obſerves, that Denham 'appears to have been one of the firſt that underſtood the neceſſity of emancipating a tranſlation from the drudgery of counting lines, and interpreting ſingle words. How much this ſervile practice obſcured the cleareſt, and deformed the moſt beautiful parts of the ancient authors, may be diſcovered by a peruſal of our earlier verſions; ſome of them the works of men well qualified, not only by critical knowledge, but by poetical genius, who yet, by a miſtaken ambition of exactneſs, degraded at once their originals and themſelves. Denham ſaw the better way; but has not purſued it with great ſucceſs. His verſions of Virgil are not pleaſing; but they taught Dryden to pleaſe better. His poetical imitation of Tully on "Old Age," has neither the clearneſs of proſe, nor the ſpritelineſs of poetry.'

With regard to the "Strength of Denham," which Pope ſo emphatically mentions, Dr. Johnſon remarks, that it is to be found in many lines and couplets, which convey much meaning in few words, and exhibit the ſentiment with more weight than bulk. Inſtances of this are produced, by the Doctor, from our Poet's verſes on the Thames, on Lord Strafford, and on Cowley. We ſhall mention, from his other poems, an example or two which occur to our recollection; and which, for their conciſeneſs, good ſenſe, and moral excellence, deſerve to be generally remembered.

'Books ſhould to one of theſe four ends conduce,
'For Wiſdom, Piety, Delight, and Uſe.'

Again,

'For on their life no grievous burthen lies,
'Who are well-natured, temperate, and wiſe.'

The riſe and progreſs of Papal Dominion are briefly and ſtrongly expreſſed in the following lines:

'The Fiſher to convert the world began,
'The pride convincing of vain-glorious man:
'But ſoon his followers grew a ſovereign Lord.
'And Peter's keys exchang'd for Peter's ſword,
'Which ſtill maintains for his adopted ſon
'Vaſt patrimonies, though himſelf had none (30.)'

(30) Ibid. p. 113—115.' Johnſon's Poets, vol. IX. p. 91. 106. 112.

As one of Denham's principal claims to the regard of poſterity is founded on his improvements of our numbers, Dr. Johnſon has conſidered his verſification, and aſſerts, that it will afford that pleaſure which ariſes from the obſervatiou of a man of judgment naturally right, forſaking bad copies by degrees, and advancing towards a better practice, as he gains more confidence in himſelf. In his tranſlation of Virgil, written when he was about twenty-one years of age, may be ſtill found the old manner of continuing the ſenſe ungracefully from verſe to verſe; but from this kind of concatenated metre he afterwards refrained, and taught his followers the art of concluding their ſenſe in couplets, which has perhaps been rather with too much conſtancy purſued. His rhymes are ſuch as ſeem found without difficulty, by following the ſenſe; and are, for the moſt part as exact at leaſt as thoſe of other poets; though now and then the Reader is ſhifted off with what he can get; nor are the ends of the verſes very carefully varied. However, concerning moſt of theſe petty faults Dr. Johnſon remarks, that they are in his firſt productions, when he was leſs ſkilful, or at leaſt leſs dextrous, in the uſe of words; and that, though they had been more frequent, they could only have leſſened the grace, not the ſtrength, of his compoſition. On the whole, the Doctor has given a favourable opinion of Denham. He ſays, that he is deſervedly conſidered as one of the Fathers of Engliſh Poetry, that he ſeems to have been, at leaſt among us, the author of a ſpecies of compoſition that may be denominated local poetry, of which the fundamental ſubject is ſome particular landſcape, to be poetically deſcribed, with the addition of ſuch embelliſhments as may be ſupplied by hiſtorical retroſpection, or incidental meditation; and that he is one of the writers that improved our taſte, and advanced our language; whom therefore we ought to read with gratitude; though, having done much, he left much to do (31).

(31) Lives the Poets, ubi ſupra, p. 108. 110, 111. 115—118.

Sir John Denham's Verſion of the Pſalms is now but little known. Dr. Watts reſigns to him the honour of being the beſt poet, if he had given his genius but a juſt liberty. 'Yet,' adds the Doctor, 'his work 'will ever ſhine brighteſt among thoſe that have con'fined themſelves to mere tranſlation. But that cloſe 'confinement has often forbid the freedom and glory 'of verſe, and, by cramping his ſenſe, has rendered 'it ſometimes too obſcure for a plain Reader and 'the public worſhip, even though we lived in the 'days of David and Judaiſm. Theſe inconveniences 'he himſelf ſuſpects, and fears in the preface (32.)' Notwithſtanding Dr. Watts's candour, it is plain, from this account, that Denham's Verſion of the Pſalms is entitled to no great degree of attention; and, indeed, ſuch we found to be the caſe, on a curſory examination. With Dr. Johnſon, therefore, we readily agree, that in this attempt he has failed: nor do we much differ from the doctor, when he adds, 'but in 'ſacred poetry who has ſucceeded (33)?'

In Johnſon's edition of the Engliſh Poets, two poems are reſtored to Denham which had not appeared in former collections. Theſe are his "Verſes to Sir "Edward Howard," and his "Elegy on the Death "of Lord Haſtings (34.) They do not add a ſingle jot to Sir John Denham's reputation.] K.

 [DENNIS (John), a Poet, a Political Writer, and a Critic, was born in the city of London, in the year 1657. His father was a ſubſtantial ſadler, and a citizen of reputation; who obſerving, as it is to be preſumed, conſiderable marks of ability in his ſon, determined to give him a liberal education. Accordingly, he ſent him to Harrow-on-the-Hill, where he received his grammatical inſtruction, under Dr. William Horn, a ſchool maſter in high eſteem for piety and literature. At this place he had for his ſchool-fellows ſeveral young noblemen and gentlemen, who afterwards made no ſmall figure in the State. Among the perſons of rank, Lord Francis and Lord Charles Seymour, ſucceſſively Dukes of Somerſet, were his contemporaries at Harrow; but it does not appear that in his future life he ever maintained any correſpondence or connection with that noble family. In the eighteenth year of his age he was removed to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was entered of Caius College, on the thirteenth of January, 1675 (a). At this college Mr. Dennis continued till he took his Bachelor's Degree, which was in 1679; after which he became a member of Trinity-Hall, where, in 1683, he was admitted to the degree of Maſter of Arts (b). It is related, by the author of the Biographia Dramatica, that he was expelled from college, for literally attempting to ſtab a perſon in the dark (c). But this we cannot help regarding as a ſtory entirely deſtitute of foundation. For, not to mention that we have met with no other traces of it in all the ſevere things we have read concerning Mr. Dennis, the fact is abſolutely inconſiſtent with his being a member of the univerſity for more than ſeven years, and then quitting it, with a Maſter's Degree.

(b) Cantabrigienſes Graduati, p. 115.

(c) Biographia Dramatica, vol. I. p. 122.

Not ſatisfied with obtaining the beſt education his own country could afford, Mr. Dennis determined to improve his underſtanding, and increaſe the extent of his knowledge, by the advantages of foreign travel. Accordingly, he made the tour of France and Italy; in the courſe of which it is ſaid that his obſervations on the evil Effects ariſing from deſpotic Government, greatly contributed to ſtrengthen in him thoſe principles of Whiggiſm, and that zeal for liberty which he had early imbibed, and which he invariably maintained to the cloſe of his life (d). On his return to England, ſuch was the opinion entertained of his accompliſhments, that he found an eaſy admiſſion into the company of ſeveral of the moſt diſtinguiſhed men of the age for genius, wit, and learning. The perſons with whoſe acquaintance he was honoured, were the Earls of Pembroke and Mulgrave, Charles Montague, Eſq. afterwards Earl of Halifax, Walter Moyle, Eſq. Mr. Wycherley, and the celebrated poets Dryden, Congreve, Southern, and Garth. All of theſe thought highly of his talents; but, if certain accounts of him are to be credited, they had not the ſame reaſon to think well of his diſcretion; his pride and paſſion hurrying him into ſcrapes which were injurious to his reputation. It is related, that on his firſt introduction to Charles Montague, Eſq. he got intoxicated with ſome very fine wines, to which he had not been accuſtomed; and that theſe made him ſo very impatient of contradiction, that, riſing on a ſudden, he ruſhed out of the room, and overturned the ſideboard of plate and glaſſes as he went. Next morning ſeeing Mr. Moyle, he told him, that in conſequence of having been ſo much in liquor he had forgotten every thing which had happened, and deſired to know in what manner he went away. "Why," ſaid Moyle, "You went away like the devil, "and took one corner of the houſe with you (e)."

(e) Biographia Britannica, vol. VII. Supplement, p. 41. firſt edit.

We know not whether Mr. Dennis was originally deſigned for any particular profeſſion. If he was, he was probably diverted from it by the company he kept; beſides which, having ſome fortune left him by an uncle, he was undoubtedly the more eaſily determined to devote himſelf wholly to poetry, politics, and criticiſm. It is as a Poet that we ſhall firſt conſider him, taking his poems in the order in which they are printed in his ſelect works, publiſhed by him, in two volumes, in the year 1721. The collection begins with ſome verſes on the victory at ſea, and the burning of the French fleet at La Hogue, in 1692; with regard to which we can only ſay, that their chief character is Turgidity. The paraphraſe of part of the Te Deum, in Pindaric verſe, is of ſuperior merit, though not entitled to any very high degree of praiſe. One of the beſt ſtanzas is the fifth, and there are ſome good lines in the ſixth. The ſhort Ode to Mr. Dryden, upon his tranſlation of the Third Book of Virgil's Georgics, ſhall be inſerted below [A], as exhibiting the moſt favourable ſpecimen we could perhaps have ſelected of Mr. Dennis's poetical talents. Indeed, it ſtands upon a footing with many of the pieces which occur in the works of ſeveral of the minor poets, who have been allowed a place in Johnſon's Collection. We cannot ſpeak ſo well of the next poem; which, according to the faſhion of the times, is likewiſe a Pindaric Ode, addreſſed to King William, and occaſioned by the battle of Aghrim, in 1691. There is poetic ſpirit in the twelfth ſtanza; but the reſt is partly turgid, and partly heavy. The ſix lines that follow, to a painter drawing a lady's picture, and entitled an epigram, are the earlieſt of our author's productions, having been written in 1682.

[A] The ſhort Ode to Mr. Dryden ſhall be inſerted below.]

I.

'While mounting with expanded wings,
'The Mantuan ſwan unbounded heav'n explores;
'While with ſeraphic ſounds he tow'ring ſings,
'Till to divinity he ſoars;
'Mankind ſtands wond'ring at his flight,
'Charm'd with his muſic and his height,
'Which both tranſcend our praiſe;
'Nay, Gods incline their raviſh'd ears,
'And tune their own harmonious ſpheres
'To his melodious lays.
'Thou, Dryden, canſt his notes recite,
'In modern numbers, which expreſs
'Their muſic and their utmoſt might;
'Thou wond'rous poet, with ſucceſs,
'Canſt emulate his flight.

II.

'Sometimes of humble rural things,
'Thy Muſe, which keeps great Maro ſtill in ſight,
'In middle air with varied numbers ſings,
'And ſometimes her ſonorous flight
'To heav'n ſublimely wings:
'But firſt takes time with majeſty to riſe,
'Then without pride, divinely great,
'She mounts her native ſkies;
'And Goddeſs-like retains her ſtate,
'When down again ſhe flies:
'Commands which judgment gives, ſhe ſtill obeys,
'Both to depreſs her flight and raiſe.
'Thus Mercury from heav'n deſcends,
'And to this under-world his journey bends,
'When Jove his dread command has giv'n;
'But ſtill deſcending dignity maintains,
'As much a God upon our humble plains,
'As when he tow'ring reaſcends to heav'n.

III.

'But when thy Goddeſs takes her flight,
'With ſo much majeſty, to ſuch a height,
'As can alone ſuffice to prove,
'That ſhe deſcends from mighty Jove:
'Gods! how thy thoughts then riſe, and ſoar, and ſhine,
'Immortal ſpirit animates each line!
'Each with bright flame that fires our ſouls is crown'd,
'Each has magnificence of ſound,
'And harmony divine.
'Thus the firſt orbs in their high rounds,
'With ſhining pomp advance,
'And to their own celeſtial ſounds
'Majeſtically dance:
'On with eternal ſymphony they roll,
'Each turn'd in its harmonious courſe,
'And each inform'd by the prodigious force
'Of an empyreal ſoul (1).

(1) The Select Works of Mr. John Dennis, vol. I. p. 19—22.

'He who great Jove's artillery ap'd ſo well,
'By real thunder and true lightning fell.
'How then dar'ſt thou, with equal danger, try
'To counterfeit the lightning of her eye?
'Painter, deſiſt, or ſoon the event may prove 'That Love 's as jealous of his arms as Jove.'

The prayer for the King's ſafety in the ſummer-expedition of 1692, which alſo is called an epigram, is totally deſtitute of the point that conſtitutes epigrammatic beauty. This is ſucceeded by another Pindaric poem, dedicated to the memory of Queen Mary. The title of it is, "The Court of Death;" and Mr. Dennis evidently aims in it at riſing to ſomething great; but has not ſucceeded in his attempt, having miſtaken the bombaſtic for the true ſublime. The ſeventh ſtanza is remarkably turgid; and, at the ſame time, not very intelligible. In the concluſion our author has ſucceeded better than in the beginning; but, upon the whole, the poem is too long, and too tedious, to be read with much ſatisfaction. Paſſing over the "Paſſion of Byblis," not ill tranſlated from the Ninth Book of Ovid's Metamorphoſis, though with ſome irregularity of verſification, we come to "The Monument: a Poem, ſacred to the immortal Memory of the "beſt and greateſt of Kings, William the Third." Of this performance the chief characteriſtics are undue length, extravagant panegyric, and proſaic compoſition. It is written in blank verſe; but with little of that variety and harmony of which Milton hath given ſo beautiful an example. In fact, ſuch blank verſe as that of Dennis's is of very eaſy fabrication. The next production, which is entituled, "Britannia Triumphans, "or a Poem on the Battle of Blenheim," is not altogether ſo tedious as the former; but its faults are more diſtinguiſhable than its excellencies. The blank verſe in which it is written has the ſame defects we have juſt mentioned; many paſſages are extremely turgid; and every Reader will complain that the work is too long. One thing obſervable in it, to the honour of the author, is the piety which he expreſſes through the whole, and from which it is apparent, that he had a great reverence for Religion. How good an opinion he had of the future celebrity of his performance, is evident from his dedicating it to Queen Anne, that it might live with the immortality of her renown. Another exertion of Mr. Dennis's poetical talents was occaſioned by the battle of Ramilies, which he has celebrated at a very great length, in five books, compoſed likewiſe in blank verſe. Our author, in his dedication of this performance to Lord Halifax, calls it one of the boldeſt poems that has been written for ſeveral years; an aſſertion that is undoubtedly founded on the machinery with which it abounds, and which ſeems to have been partly borrowed from Milton, though by no means conducted with a ſkill and judgment that demand approbation. In conſequence, however, of this machinery, the work, though faulty enough in various reſpects, does not appear ſo tedious in the peruſal as moſt of the productions already mentioned. The two remaining poems, which are on the Acceſſion of King George to the Britiſh throne, and a prologue to the ſubſcribers for Julius Cæſar, are unworthy of particular notice (f).

(f) Dennis's Select Works, vol. I. p. 1—356.

From the account we have given of Mr. Dennis's Miſcellaneous Poetry, few of our Readers will be diſpoſed to make it the object of their attention. Independently of its other deficiencies, the ſubjects to which it was devoted were not calculated to confer upon it any laſting degree of popularity. Political, and eſpecially panegyrical poems (and ſuch for the moſt part were our author's), are only fitted to excite a temporary admiration. The virtues of a William and Mary, and the actions of a Marlborough, undoubtedly deſerved to be celebrated. But it was in or near their own time chiefly that their applauſes would be heard with peculiar delight; nor can it be expected that poſterity ſhould be captivated with the productions, which, in the enthuſiaſm of the moment, were eagerly read and highly praiſed. Addiſon's "Campaign" was received with tranſport by our anceſtors; but faſtidious criticiſm is now diſpoſed to give it the appellation of a Gazette in rhyme.

Mr. Dennis next comes before us as a dramatic writer, in which capacity his firſt performance was a comedy, entitled, "A Plot and no Plot; or Jacobite Credulity," and acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane, in the year 1697 (g). The title ſhews that it was intended as a ſatire on the party devoted to King James. Of this play the author of the Biographia Dramatica ſays, 'that it is extremely regular, and bears teſtimony 'in favour of the writer, not only as a man of wit, but as a perfect maſter of the arts of 'the ſtage, and of the ſtrict rules of the drama (h).' It is with ſome degree of abatement that we aſſent to this character. In the ſtory, Mr. Dennis juſtly claims the merit of original invention, and many of the ſcenes abound with wit; but ſeveral of the incidents are very abſurd and unnatural.

(g) Dennis's Select Work, vol. II. p. 293—370.

(h) Biographia Dramatica, vol. II. p. 286.

Our Author's ſecond dramatic production was "Rinaldo and Armida," a tragedy, acted at Lincoln's-Inn Fields, in 1699. Not having read this piece, we muſt be indebted for our account of it to the Biographia Dramatica; from which we learn, that the hint of the chief characters is borrowed from Taſſo's Gieruſalemme. As, however, Mr.

Dennis was not ſatisfied with the manners of that great Italian, he has taken the liberty to change them, and to form the characters according to what he apprehended to be more agreeable to the ſubject. His reaſons for ſo doing he has given, not only in the preface to the play, but alſo in the prologue. How far he has ſucceeded in his deſign is not mentioned. The ſcene lies on a top of a mountain in the Canaries; and the muſical entertainments that accompanied the work were compoſed by Mr. John Eccles, excepting a chorus in the fourth act, which is borrowed from Mr. Henry Purcell's Froſt Scene (i). Another tragedy, "Iphigenia," was produced by our author in 1700, and brought on at the theatre in Little Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, where it was damned (k). It certainly did not deſerve ſo ſevere a fate. There are undoubtedly many irregular lines in it, and perhaps ſome paſſages ſavour of turgidity; but, upon the whole, it is a pathetic and intereſting performance (l). It muſt not, however, be concealed that Mr. Dennis has derived his chief excellence from Euripides's Iphigenia in Tauris. Thence his ſtory is taken, and to that he is indebted for the moſt ſtriking parts of his tragedy. Indeed, his obligations to Euripides are ſo numerous, that he ought to have openly acknowledged them; but ſo little were the Greek tragedies at that time known, by the wits and critics of the metropolis, that he probably thought he might ſafely aſſume to himſelf the praiſe of greater originality than was ſtrictly his due. The ill ſucceſs with which his play was received upon the ſtage will eaſily be accounted for, when we reflect that ſubjects taken from ancient claſſic ſtory have ſeldom been popular with an Engliſh audience. Smith's "Phædra and Hippolitus," though, in various reſpects, a more finiſhed work than Dennis's "Iphigenia," and ſtrongly recommended by the firſt writers of the age, met, nevertheleſs, with a moſt cold reception from the public. With leſs merit than "Iphigenia," a comedy of Mr. Dennis's, which was produced by him in 1702. was ſomewhat more ſucceſsful at the theatre. The title of it is, "The Comical "Gallant, with the Amours of Sir John Falſtaff." As to the piece itſelf, we are told that it is no other than a very indifferent alteration of Shakſpeare's "Merry Wives of "Windſor." When it was publiſhed, a large account was added of the taſte in poetry, and the cauſes of its degeneracy (m).

In 1704, our author brought out a tragedy, entituled, "Liberty aſſerted," the ſcene of which is laid at Agnie (which name, he ſays, for the ſake of a better ſound, he has altered to Angie) in Canada; and the plot is an imagined one, from the wars carried on among the Indian nations. In the dedication to Anthony Henley, Eſq. Mr. Dennis owns himſelf to be indebted to that gentleman for "the happy hint upon which it was "formed (n)." That part of the plot which relates to Sakia's huſband is, indeed, well conducted; and, in particular, the diſcovery of him in Frontenac, at the concluſion of the piece, is equally unexpected and intereſting; but, on the whole, we have not read the play with much pleaſure. Upon the ſtage, it was by far the moſt ſucceſsful of all our author's dramatic productions; having been repreſented many times at Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, with very great applauſe (o). This was probably owing, in a conſiderable degree, not to its own merit, but to the abuſe which is plentifully ſcattered through it upon the French nation; an abuſe, that during a ſeaſon of war, and in the enthuſiaſm of the moment, might be congenial to the feelings of the auditory; but which never was proper, and now appears ridiculous. Strange things are related of the conſequence which Mr. Dennis aſſumed to himſelf from his tragedy. The ſeverity of the ſtrokes againſt the French he imagined could never be forgiven, and conſequently, that Louis the Fourteenth would not conſent to a peace with England, unleſs he was delivered up a ſacrifice to national reſentment. Nay, ſo far did he carry this apprehenſion, that when the Congreſs for the Peace at Utrecht was in agitation, he waited on the Duke of Marlborough, who had formerly been his patron, to entreat his intereſt with the plenipotentiaries, that they ſhould not conſent to his being given up. With great gravity the Duke informed him, that he was ſorry it was out of his power to ſerve him, as at that time he had no connection with the miniſtry. His Grace added, that he fancied his caſe not to be quite ſo deſperate as he ſeemed to imagine; for that, indeed, he had taken no care to get himſelf excepted in the articles of peace; and yet he could not help thinking that he had done the French almoſt as much damage as even Mr. Dennis had done. Another inſtance of our Author's terror, ariſing from his ſelf-importance on the ſame account, is related as follows. Having been invited down to a gentleman's houſe on the coaſt of Suſſex, where he was very kindly entertained, as he was walking one day near the beach, he ſaw a ſhip ſailing, as he imagined, towards him. Upon this, ſuppoſing that he was betrayed, he immediately made the beſt of his way to London, without even taking leave of his hoſt, whom he believed to have been concerned in the plot againſt him, and to have decoyed him to his houſe, with no other view than to give notice to the French, who had fitted out a veſſel on purpoſe to carry him off, if he had not luckily diſcovered their deſign (p). This ſtory has been told ſomewhat differently by different writers (q); and indeed we are far from paying it an entire credit. If there be any truth in it, that truth we believe to be mixed with no ſmall degree of exaggeration.

Mr. Dennis's next dramatic attempt was in a comedy, entitled, "Gibraltar, or the "Spaniſh Adventure;" and which was performed in 1705, at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane; but without ſucceſs. On the firſt night of repreſentation the actors exerted their abilities to the utmoſt for the ſupport of the play; but being unfavourably received by the audience, they remitted their diligence on the ſecond night, and the piece was condemned. The ſcene of the comedy is laid in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar (r).

(r) Biographia Dramatica, ubi ſupra, p. 136.

"Orpheus and Euridice," a maſque, which was produced by our author in 1707, does not appear to have been acted. It is printed in the "Muſe's Mercury," for the month of February in that year (s).

In 1709, Mr. Dennis brought upon the ſtage, at Drury Lane, "Appius and Vir-"ginia," a tragedy; which, though not damned, was not remarkably ſucceſsful. The character of Appius is extravagantly drawn, and the ſentiments and language delivered by him are often highly bombaſtic. On the whole, we have not read this play with much approbation. The following lines, ſpoken by Virginia, when ſhe is urged by Icilius to bear a part in the propoſed aſſaſſination of Appius, have pleaſed us more than any others in the tragedy:

'The Gods of every virtue are poſſeſs'd;
'Tis the poſſeſſing all which makes them Gods.
Not ſo are mortals, but from Heaven derive Thoſe, which at firſt the forming hand of Jove
Fitted their earthly organs to receive.
Thus man in power and intrepidity,
And great revenge, the image is of Heaven;
Woman in ſoft compaſſion, and in mercy.
The nobler Virtues I admire and love,
Which ſhine ſo bright in my Icilius' ſoul;
But humbly am content to practiſe thoſe
Which fit the ſoftneſs of my ſex and temper (t).'

(t) Dennis's Select Works, vol. II. p. 224.

Our author, for the advantage of this play, had invented a new ſpecies of thunder, which was approved of by the actors, and is the very ſort that at preſent is uſed in the theatre. The tragedy, however, was coldly received notwithſtanding ſuch aſſiſtance, and was acted but a ſhort time. Some nights after, Mr. Dennis being in the pit, at the repreſentation of Macbeth, heard his own thunder made uſe of; upon which he roſe in a violent paſſion, and exclaimed, with an oath, that it was his thunder. "See," ſaid he, "how theſe raſcals uſe me! They will not let my play run; and yet they ſteal my "thunder (u)!"

(u) Biographia Dramatica, ubi ſupra, p. 19.

Our Author's laſt production in the dramatic way, was, "Coriolanus, the Invader of "his country; or, The Fatal Reſentment;" a tragedy. It is an alteration of Shakeſpeare's Coriolanus; and was brought upon the ſtage at Drury Lane, in the year 1720. After it had been repreſented three nights, the managers, Wilks, Cibber, and Booth, who were not ſatisfied with the profits derived from it, to the aſtoniſhment and indignation of Mr. Dennis, gave out another play for the next evening. Upon this he publiſhed his tragedy, with a flaming dedication to the Duke of Newcaſtle, at that time Lord Chamberlain of his Majeſty's houſehold; in which he has given full ſcope to his reſentment againſt the Patentees, and eſpecially againſt Mr. Cibber. The laſt gentleman, inſtead of taking the Author's Epilogue, had ſubſtituted one of his own, which was ſpoken by Mrs. Oldfield. This was an additional cauſe of offence to our poet, who, in an advertiſement, has repreſented it as a wretched medley of impudence and nonſenſe; and, indeed, it does not appear to be entitled to commendation. As Dennis's Dedication to the Duke of Newcaſtle ſtrongly diſplays the temper of the man, and relates to an intereſting circumſtance in his literary life, we ſhall give the greateſt part of it in a note (B). Perhaps, too, it may afford ſome hints that might not be altogether uſeleſs to Lord

[B] We ſhall give the greateſt part of it in a note.]

'My Lord,

'I TAKE the liberty to dedicate to your Grace '"The Invader of his Country," which is the Co-'riolanus of Shakeſpeare, altered by me. And I have 'preſumed to do this without aſking your leave, be-'cauſe this is a dedication of an extraordinary nature, 'and an application to your Grace for juſtice, in a 'cauſe that is determinable by your Grace alone, by 'virtue of your office; as all cauſes of the like na-'ture, ever ſince I could remember, have been de-'cided in the laſt appeal by your Grace's predeceſ-'ſors.

'My Lord, Coriolanus throws himſelf at your 'Grace's feet, in order to obtain juſtice of you, after 'having received as injurious treatment from the 'petulant deportment of two or three inſolent players, 'as ever he formerly did at Rome from the brutal 'rage of the rabble. He has been baniſhed from 'our theatre by the one, through a miſtaken gree-'dineſs of gain, as the other formerly expelled him 'from Rome through a groundleſs jealouſy of power.

'My Lord, when I tell the world that Coriolanus 'has been unjuſtly baniſhed from our theatre by two 'or three inſolent players, I am ſure all thoſe will be 'apt to believe me, who will reflect with indigna-'tion and diſdain, that that Roman is not the firſt 'Nobleman whom they have audaciouſly dared to ex-'clude from thence. And I hope this provoking re-'flection will oblige your Grace to vindicate your 'own

Lord Chamberlains, writers, and actors. Upon a review of Mr. Denham's productions for

'own juſt right, and the Crown's undoubted prero-
'rogative.

'If the concern which I have in this cauſe were the 'only thing in queſtion, I ſhould make a conſcience
'of giving your Grace any trouble about it. But,
'my Lord, it is a cauſe of far more extenſive and
'more important conſequence. It is the noble cauſe
'of your country, in which your Grace has been ſo
'active and ſo ſucceſsful, and in which this play was 'altered: it is the cauſe of Dramatic Poetry, the 'cauſe of the Britiſh Muſes, and of all thoſe whom 'they vouchſafe to inſpire. It is your Grace who is 'to determine whether theſe ſhall flouriſh for the fu'ture, and do honour to Great Britain, and conſe-
'quently to augment, in ſome meaſure, the intereſt
'and power of your country; or whether the beſt
'profeſſors of the nobleſt art, and the art itſelf, muſt
'die. It is your Grace who is to determine, whe'ther gentlemen who have great capacities, who have 'had the moſt generous education, who have all their 'lives had the beſt and the nobleſt deſigns for the ſer-
'vice of their country, and the inſtruction of man-
'kind, ſhall have their worthy labours ſupported
'and rendered effectual to the great ends for which 'they intended them; or whether they muſt all be 'ſacrificed to two or three inſolent actors, who have 'no capacity, who have had no education, who have 'not the leaſt concern for their country, who have 'nothing in their heads or in their hearts but low
'thoughts, and ſordid deſigns; and yet at the ſame
'time have ſo much pride, and ſo much inſupportable
'inſolence, as to dare to fly in the face of the greateſt
'perſons in England.

'I will now lay the matter of fact before your
'Grace, by which I believe you will very eaſily diſ-
'cern, that there was a conſpiracy from the begin'ning, between the three members of this ſeparate
'miniſtry, as they are pleaſed to call themſelves, for 'the deſtruction of this play. They were engaged
'to act it the laſt winter, by their words ſolemnly
'given, and the acting of it then had been moſt ſea-
'ſonable, when the nation was in the uneaſy expec'tation of a double invaſion, from Sweden on the 'North, and from Spain on the Weſt of England.
'Inſtead of keeping their words with me; they poſt-
'poned a play, that was writ in the cauſe of their 'country—in the cauſe of their Sovereign, whoſe
'ſervants as well as ſubjects they call themſelves, for
'the moſt abſurd and inſipid trifles that ever came 'upon any ſtage. They began the winter with 'preaching up adultery to the town by the mouth of 'a dramatic prieſt. They ended it much after the 'rate at which they began it, by teaching ladies how
'they may cuckold their huſbands without the appre-
'henſion of a diſcovery; as if any licence, or any 'patent, would bear theſe people out in debauching
'the people, or as if ſuch a practice were not ſuffi-
'cient to diſannul any patent. My Lord, in the be'ginning of this winter they began to rehearſe the 'Play; after they had diſpoſed ſome of the comick
'parts to perſons who were wholly unfit for them;
'and maimed two of the principal tragick ſcenes to
'that degree, that I could hardly know them. After 'about five weeks rehearſal, the tenth of November
'was fixed for the acting the play. I could not pre'vail with them to put it off for a week longer, not-
'withſtanding it was moſt apparently their intereſt
'more than mine; becauſe there was a daily expec'tation of the King's arrival. My Lord, when the 'tenth of November came, theſe three religious per-
'ſons were, to the wonder of all that heard of it, at'tacked with ſcruples of conſcience: they were in'formed that it was the third day of a young author
'at the other houſe, and it would be cruel, it would 'be barbarous, to have my firſt day upon the other's 'third. Thus did theſe good-natured gentlemen take 'an occaſion from a pretended tenderneſs to exerciſe
'a real barbarity. My Lord, I was very eaſily pre'vailed with to put off the play; but little thought,
'at the ſame time, that they deſigned to put it off for 'a day only. I was very much ſuprized when I found
'by the bills, that the play was to be acted the very 'next day, and that conſequently Friday was to be 'my third day. Now, my Lord, Friday is not only
'the very worſt day of the week for an audience, but 'this was that particular Friday, when a hundred per-
'ſons, who deſigned to be there, were either gone to 'meet the King, or preparing here in town to do that 'duty which was expected from them at his arri'val.

'Thus, my Lord, did theſe good, humane, tender-
'hearted managers, take an occaſion to exerciſe a real
'barbarity upon their old acquaintance, to whom they
'and their ſtage are more obliged than to any writer
'in England, from a pretended tenderneſs to one who 'is a mere ſtranger to them, and from whoſe ſucceſs
'they could expect nothing but the leſſening of their
'gain. My Lord, the play was acted on Wedneſday
'the 11th, to an audience of near an hundred pounds,
'for ſo much they owned to me. It was favourably 'received by the audience. There did ſome malice
'appear twice; but it was immediately drowned by
'the utmoſt clamours of applauſe. On Thurſday the 'play was acted again, to an audience of between 'fifty and threeſcore pounds; and on Friday to an 'audience of between ſixty and ſeventy pounds.
'Conſidering the diſadvantages under which we lay,
'here were fair hopes for the future. And on Fri-
'day, after the play was done, theſe tender-hearted
'managers cauſed another to be given out, to the 'aſtoniſhment of the audience, the diſappointment of
'thoſe who had reſerved themſelves for the ſixth day,
'and the retrenching three parts in four of my profits;
'and this, contrary to an ancient rule, which has 'been always obſerved till now, by thoſe who have
'at any time had the government of a playhouſe; and 'that is, never to give over a new play which is fa'vourably received by an audience as long as it brings
'charges. And, my Lord, nothing can be more
'reaſonable and equitable than the obſervation of 'this rule. For ſince the Poet ventures his intereſt in 'his play, which is ſometimes his all, and his repu'tation into the bargain, which is his hope of future
'gain, can any thing be more juſt, than that the maſ-
'ters or managers of a play-houſe ſhould venture
'their gain upon a probable proſpect of future profit,
'the loſs of which for two or three nights they will 'hardly feel, rather than by laying down a play
'abruptly, abſolutely ruin the author, who perhaps
'has done his part to pleaſe.

'Now, my Lord, I appeal to your Grace, if here
'was not a fair proſpect of ſucceſs for the future. The 'play had been acted three nights together, to a hun'dred, to ſixty, and to ſeventy pounds. The play
'was received the firſt night with applauſe; the King,
'and the Court, and the Parliament, were all com-
'ing to town. But notwithſtanding all our reaſon-
'able expectation, the managers gave out another
'play, inſolently declaring, that no play was worth
'their acting any longer than it brings a hundred 'pounds. Now, my Lord, they cannot but know
'that ſeveral plays which have been but indifferently
'followed the firſt days, have afterwards come to be 'admired plays, and to bring crowded audiences.
'The beſt play which can be writ by an author who 'has not a cabal, will hardly bring an hundred 'pounds upon the ſecond and fourth nights; and the
'worſt that can be writ by a poetaſter who has a cabal,
'may do a great deal more. As long as the publick
'taſte is ſo vitiated as it is at preſent, bad plays are 'like to be more crowded than good ones. So that,
'by their own declaration, as long as theſe perſons
'have the management of the play-houſe, there can 'be no improvement of the publick taſte: good wri'ters are ſure to be diſcouraged, and the art of the 'Drama, in a little time, is certain to be loſt; and
'the art of writing is ſure to be followed by the art
'of acting. For great actors are not to be made but 'by original parts; and as it is an eternal, general
'rule, that a copy has neither the free ſpirit nor eaſy
'grace of an original, ſo the copy of a copy is ſtill
'more faint, and the ſeveral ſucceeding copies grow
'weaker ſtill the further they deſcend from the origi'nal, till all life and all reſemblance comes at laſt to 'be loſt. But if any one happens to object to him,
'that when a young man who has a talent for acting

'comes for the theatre, we cannot ſpeak favourably of his dramatic abilities. That he had a very high opinion of his own talents in this reſpect, is apparent from many paſſages in his works, and particularly from his ſeveral dedications. In the tranſcript below, he aſſerts that the managers and their ſtage were more obliged to him than to any writer in England. Not only theſe managers, but the world in general entertained a different opinion. We cannot, however, help thinking that the following repreſentation of him; in the Biographia Dramatica, is ſomewhat too ſevere. 'As a dramatic author,' ſays his Biographer in that work, 'He certainly deſerves not to be held in any conſideration. 'His plots, excepting that of his "Plot and no Plot," which is a political play, are 'all borrowed; yet, in the general, not ill-choſen. But his characters are ill-deſigned 'and unfiniſhed; his language proſaical, flat, and undramatic; and the conduct of his 'principal ſcenes heavy, dull, and unimpaſſioned. In ſhort, though he certainly had 'judgment, it is evident he had no execution; and ſo much better a critic is he than 'dramatiſt, that I cannot help ſubſcribing to the opinion of a gentleman, who ſaid of 'him, that he was the moſt compleat inſtructor for a dramatic poet; ſince he could 'teach him to diſtinguiſh good plays by his precepts, and bad ones by his examples (w).' In this cenſure it is forgotten, that the plot of "Liberty aſſerted" appears to have been an original one; and it might have been added, that heavineſs is not always the characteriſtic of Mr. Dennis's language. There is, likewiſe, a circumſtance in his favour, which is, that he wiſhed to baniſh from the ſtage the practice of making love alone the object of theatrical repreſentation. Accordingly, while he has not excluded it from his performances, he has rendered it ſubordinate to nobler paſſions. In "Rinaldo," it gives place to glory; in "Iphigenia," to Friendſhip; and in "Liberty aſſerted," to the public good (x).

(x) Jacob's Poetical Regiſter, vol. I. p. 63.

Before we proceed to conſider Mr. Dennis as a political writer, we ſhall advert to a few circumſtances relative to his private life. We have ſeen that he derived ſome fortune from an uncle; but that was probably ſpent in a little time. As he wrote for Government when the Whigs were in power, and was patronized by Lord Halifax, there can be no doubt but that he occaſionally received pecuniary gratifications, either from the bounty or through the intereſt of that nobleman. For his poem on the battle of Blenheim the Duke of Marlborough rewarded him with a preſent of a hundred guineas. But, previouſly to the writing of that poem, he had experienced his Grace's patronage in a much more important inſtance; for the Duke had procured for him the place of a waiter at the Cuſtom-houſe, worth a hundred and twenty pounds a year. This office he held for ſix years; during which he lived ſo extravagantly, and managed his affairs with ſo little diſcretion, that, in order to diſcharge ſome preſſing demands, he was obliged to diſpoſe of his waiterſhip. The Earl of Halifax, having heard of his deſign, ſent for him, and, in the moſt friendly manner, expoſtulated with him upon the folly and raſhneſs of diſpoſing of his place, by which his Lordſhip told him that he would ſoon become a beggar. In reply, our author repreſented the exigencies to which he was reduced, and the importunate nature of the demands that were made upon him. The Earl, however, inſiſted, that, if he muſt ſell his place, he ſhould reſerve to himſelf an annuity out of it for a conſiderable term of years; ſuch a term as his Lordſhip thought Mr. Dennis was not likely to ſurvive. Nevertheleſs, he did outlive it; and was

'comes to act a part of which he has ſeen neither 'the copying nor original actor, that part is to him 'an original one. To him I anſwer, that moſt of our 'poets having had either the addreſs or the weakneſs, 'I leave it to your Grace to determine which, to 'write to the manners and the talents of ſome parti-'cular actors, it ſeems to me to be abſolutely im-'poſſible, with ſubmiſſion to your Grace's judgment, 'that any actor can become an admirable original, 'by playing a part which was writ and deſigned for 'another man's particular talent.

'Thus have I laid before your Grace the reaſons 'why the conduct of the preſent managers muſt de-'ſtroy the very ſpecies of dramatick poets and players. 'And theſe reaſons, which I hope are clear in them-'ſelves, are confirmed by infallible experience: it 'being evident from fact, that all our principal dra-'matick poets and players have been formed while 'our theatres were under the Lord Chamberlain's 'regulation; and that both writing and acting have 'gradually fallen off ſince the players have pretended 'to exclude him from his juriſdiction over them. 'And, my Lord, it is a melancholy thing to con-'ſider, that there is not at preſent in Great Britain 'one promiſing genius, or promiſing actor, growing 'up for the ſtage.

'As every branch of poetry in England muſt fall 'with the dramatic, there being here no conſtant 'viſible encouragement for poets, but what is derived 'from the ſtage, I appeal to your Grace, whether it 'is worth while to turn poetry, which is the nobleſt, 'and perhaps the only original branch of the Britiſh 'learning, out of the nation, only to advance the 'lucre of three actors.

'Thus, my Lord, have I laid this cauſe before 'your Grace; not without flattering myſelf, that I 'have fully made it appear to you, that I have been 'uſed with extreme injuſtice by the managers of the 'play-houſe. Before this play came upon the ſtage, 'it had the approbation of ſome of the very beſt judges 'in England, who are ſo, and are univerſally acknow-'ledged to be ſo, and who are too exalted both by 'their high ſtations, and the greatneſs of their minds, 'to ſay a thing to me, which they did not think. I 'have had this play long enough by me to form as 'true and as ſure a judgment of it myſelf as any one 'can do who underſtands poetical matters no better 'than myſelf. And as a man who is oppreſſed is 'allowed to ſpeak truth in his own behalf, I humbly 'conceive, that nothing comparable to it has been 'produced at the theatre in Drury-Lane, ſince theſe 'people had the management of it, not excepting 'Mr. Cibber's "Heroick Daughter," who, for aught I 'know, may be more heroic than the daughter of 'Corneille; but there is this remarkable difference 'between them, that Corneille's is beautiful and ſpi-'rited, and Mr. Cibber's ugly and inſipid (z).'

(z) Dennis's Select Works, vol. I. Dedication to Coriolanus.

exposed in his old age to the distresses of great poverty (y). To the kindness of the Earl of Halifax, in the affair of the annuity, our Author refers in the dedication of his poem on the Battle of Ramillies, in which he says, 'I have lately had very great obliga-'tions to your Lordship. You have been pleased to take some care of my fortune at 'a time when I most wanted it, and had least reason to expect it from you (z).' With such a disposition as Mr. Dennis possessed, it is not surprizing that he was often liable to arrests from his creditors. An instance of Sir Richard Steele's friendship to him in this respect he is said to have ill-repaid. Sir Richard, if the story be true, once became bail for him, and afterwards was arrested on his account; but, when he heard of it, he only exclaimed, "'Sdeath! why did he not keep out of the way, as I did (a)?" In the latter part of our poet's life, he resided within the verge of the Court, for the security of his person. However, one Saturday night, he happened to saunter to a public-house, which, in a short time, he discovered to be out of the Verge. As he was sitting in an open drinking-room, a man of a suspicious appearance entered, about whom Mr. Dennis imagined there was something that denoted him to be a bailiff. Being seized with a panic, he was afraid that his liberty was now at an end, and sat in the utmost solicitude; but durst not offer to stir, lest he should be seized upon. After an hour or two had passed in this painful anxiety, at last the clock struck twelve; when Mr. Dennis, addressing himself to the suspected person, cried out in an extacy, "Now, Sir, Bailiff "or no Bailiff, I don't care a farthing for you—you have no power now." The man was astonished at his behaviour; and, when it was explained to him, was so much affronted with the suspicion, that, had not our Author been protected by his age, he would probably have smarted for his mistaken opinion (b). Such are the distresses and terrours to which imprudence and extravagance are liable.

On Mr. Dennis's character as a political writer it is not necessary to enlarge. It is probable that, in this capacity, he may have been the author of several tracts, which are now forgotten, and with regard to which there would be no utility in endeavouring to rescue them from oblivion. In his select works are inserted the productions of this kind which he himself thought of the most consequence, and the most worthy of preservation; and of these we shall take some slight notice. The first of them was published in 1702, and is an answer to a discourse of the famous, or rather infamous, Henry Sacheverell, called, "The Political Union." Mr. Dennis's piece is entituled, "Priestcraft "Dangerous to Religion and Government;" and is a candid and moderate defence of Low-church principles and of toleration. Sacheverell's Discourse afforded an ample foretaste of that violent and factious spirit which afterwards occasioned so much disturbance in the kingdom. The Low-churchmen he distinguishes by the appellations of "False and "Perfidious Members, Shuffling Teachers, Latitudinarians, Sots and Bigots, Apostates "and Renegadoes, False Traitors, Crafty, Faithless, Insidious Persons;" while the terms he bestows on the Dissenters are, "Villains, Swarms of Sectaries, Robbers, Vipers, "Boars, Beasts, Devils, Traitors, Bastard Spawn of a Popish Party, Propagators of "Schism, Pandars of a cursed Train, and Sharers in Villainy and Rebellion (c)." It is to the honour of the present times, that bigotry, though sufficiently active in many a breast, and often accompanied with no small degree of malignity, does not now descend to such illiberal and reproachful language.

(c) Dennis's Select Remarks, Vol. I. p. 357—380. p. 567.

In 1703, Mr. Dennis printed "A Proposal for putting a speedy End to the War, by "ruining the Commerce of the French and Spaniards, and securing our own, without "any additional Expence to the Nation (d)." The scheme was, to form such a junction of the English and Dutch Fleets, and such a combination and disposition of a large number of smaller armed vessels, as should effectually carry into execution the purpose intended. Our Author has explained his project with sufficient ingenuity; but, like many other projects, which voluntary politicians have been so ready to contrive for the public good, it met with no degree of regard. Indeed, the views and measures of the then subsisting ministry were more directed to exertions by land than at sea.

(d) Ibid. P. 381—405.

Mr. Dennis, in 1711, produced "An Essay upon Public Spirit; being a Satire, in "Prose, upon the Manners and Luxury of the Times, the chief Sources of our present "Parties and Divisions (e)." The definition given of public Spirit is, that it is "the "ardent love of one's country, affecting us with a zealous concern for its honour and "interest, and inspiring us with resolution and courage to promote its service and glory." Our Author has justly called his essay a satire in prose; for it is a violent and not very judicious declamation against the vices of his own age, in contrast with the virtues of our remote ancestors. It is pleasant to observe with what zeal he expresses himself in praise of frugality and œconomy, to which he paid so little regard in his own person. We think, however, that we discover in his tract the signatures of upright and benevolent intention, though mixed with too much severity.

(e) Ibid. P. 406—443.

The last production of Mr. Dennis's, which we have to mention under the present department of our article, appeared in the beginning of King George the First's reign, and is entituled, "Priestcraft distinguished from Christianity (f)." This, perhaps, may rather be considered as a theological than a political work. Our Author displays in it a very very conſiderable knowledge of Divinity, as it was then explained, and as it ſtill continues to be underſtood by the majority of believers. His views of the general nature and deſign of Chriſtianity are rational and manly. 'Charity,' ſays he, 'being the only 'Virtue that reigns in Heaven, he who has not been habituated to it on Earth, would go 'thither like a ſtranger to a remote country, whoſe language and cuſtoms are both un-'known to him, and entirely different from his own; and where by conſequence he 'could neither keep any company, nor find any pleaſure.' The Diſcourſe is ſo far of a political nature, as it was principally intended to expoſe thoſe high claims of Churchmen, and thoſe arbitrary principles of government, which were hoſtile to the ſpirit of toleration, to the cauſe of liberty, and the intereſts of the Houſe of Hanover.

We are now to conſider Mr. Dennis in his critical capacity, in which he ſo frequently exerted himſelf, that he came to be called the Critic, by way of diſtinction. For ſuſtaining this character he was well qualified by his Knowledge, Learning, and Judgment. He maintained it, likewiſe, with conſiderable reputation for ſome time; but the misfortune was, that, at length, he diſplayed his talents in this view with ſo much ſeverity (we had almoſt ſaid malignity), and againſt men of ſuch eminence and ſuperiority, that they ſucceeded in reducing him to a low degree of eſtimation with the publick. It was early that our Author began to ſhew his critical abilities. The firſt public proof of them of which we have any information, was exhibited in his Obſervations on Blackmore's Prince Arthur; the third edition of which poem was printed in 1696. Mr. Dennis had here, without doubt, ſufficient ſcope for a variety of ſtrictures; but what was particularly advanced by him we are not able to ſay, as both the poem and the criticiſm are now buried in oblivion. That he did not tranſgreſs the bounds of good manners in his remarks, is probable from his afterwards correſponding with Sir Richard Blackmore on very friendly terms (g).

(g) Dennis's Original Letters, familiar, moral, and critical, Vol. I. p. 1—12. p. 154—158. Vol. II. p. 461

In the year 1696 or 1697, he publiſhed "Letters upon ſeveral Occaſions." Theſe Letters were written partly by himſelf, and partly by Mr. Dryden, Mr. Wycherley, Mr. Moyle, and Mr. Congreve. The ſubjects of them are in ſome degree miſcellaneous; but chiefly critical; and, among other things, they contain Mr. Congreve's Obſervations concerning Humour in Comedy (h). It is proper to take notice, that this was not a ſurreptitious publication; but appeared with the conſent of the gentlemen concerned (i). A very high opinion of our Author was at this time entertained by Dryden and Congreve. In 1701, he gave to the public a critical diſcourſe, entituled, "The Advancement and Reformation of modern Poetry." This tract is divided into two parts; the deſign of the firſt of which is to ſhew, that the principal reaſon why the ancients excelled the moderns in the greater poetry, was, becauſe they mixed Religion with Poetry. In the ſecond, Mr. Dennis endeavours to prove, that by joining Poetry with the Religion revealed to us in Sacred Writ, the modern poets might equal the ancient. Whether he has entirely ſucceeded in the poſitions he maintains may, perhaps, be doubtful. But it muſt, at the ſame time, be acknowledged that he has ſupported them with ingenuity and ability, and that his performance is the reſult of much ſtudy and reflection.

(h) Dennis's Select Works, Vol. II. p. 487—543.

(i) Ibid. p. 480.

In the beginning of the year 1704, our Author diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an antagoniſt of the famous Jeremy Collier. That gentleman had made his firſt attack upon the ſtage in 1698; but, upon occaſion of the great ſtorm which happened on the 27th of November, 1703, he renewed his attack, in a pamphlet, intituled, "A Diſſuaſive from the "Play-houſe; written by way of Letter to a Perſon of Quality." The deſign of this piece was to repreſent the tempeſt as a judgment upon the nation for the enormities of the theatre (k). A ſentiment ſo extravagant and ſuperſtitious excited Mr. Dennis's indignation, and produced from him "The Perſon of Quality's Anſwer to Mr. Collier's "Letter: containing a Defence of a regulated Stage." This tract is ironical; in which mode of writing our critic has not been remarkably ſucceſsful. Several things, however, are advanced by him that are ſenſible and ſpirited; and he has had the prudence to confine himſelf to the vindication of a theatre under proper regulations; freely giving up the licentiouſneſs and profaneneſs by which it had formerly been ſo greatly diſhonoured (l).

(k) Letters, familiar, moral, and critical, p. 225, 226.

In 1706, our Author publiſhed "An Eſſay on the Operas, after the Italian manner, "which are about to be eſtabliſhed on the Engliſh Stage: with ſome Reflections on the "Damage which they may bring to the Public." Mr. Cibber aſſerts, that Mr. Dennis, in this Eſſay, has ſhewn, with an irreſiſtible force, the extreme danger that a generous nation is expoſed to, by too much indulging effeminate muſic (m). Undoubtedly, he has advanced many ſtrong and important ſentiments upon the ſubject; but, on the whole, he has, in our opinion, carried the matter too far. His violent declamation againſt operas and muſic is not ſufficiently juſtified by reaſon and experience. Such declamation was partly the faſhion of the moſt eminent writers of the time; and they had ſome cauſe for reſentment, in the cold reception that had been given to more valuable and manly performances. Our Author declares, however, in his preface, that his Treatiſe is only levelled againſt thoſe operas which are entirely muſical; ſince thoſe which which are dramatical may be partly defended by the examples of the ancients. In the poſtſcript, he celebrates, with great exultation, and in the higheſt ſtrains of panegyric, the conduct of a young lady of the firſt quality, equally famous for her beauty, her ſpirit, and her virtue, who, to the glory of her own ſex, and the ſhame of ours, had lately given very ſtrict orders, that the Julius Cæſar of Shakſpeare, which was acted at her requeſt, ſhould be done without any performance either of ſinging or dancing. This Lady appears to have been one of the daughters of the Duke of Marlborough (n).

(n) Dennis's Select Works, Vol. I. p. 444—471.

Another of Mr. Dennis's critical publications, the exact time of the firſt edition of which we are not able to aſcertain, but which is preſerved in his Select Works, was, "The Grounds of Criticiſm in Poetry (o)." This tract is evidently a proſecution of the ſentiments which he had maintained in his "Advancement and Reformation of modern "Poetry," and is entitled to conſiderable praiſe in the ſame view. The grand point he inſiſts upon is the immenſe ſcope which Religion affords for poetic excellence. Under the word Religion he includes the whole ſyſtem of ſupernatural machinery, the introduction of ſuperior beings, and all the noble fictions, ſentiments, addreſſes, and images, that may be derived from the knowledge of Revelation. That poets may hence be enabled to enrich their compoſitions in a very high degree, and that the deſcriptions of the Deity which are given in the Sacred Writings may be of peculiar advantage to them, cannot juſtly be denied. Epic poetry, unleſs it looks beyond the preſent world, and the mere ſcenes of human affairs, can never ſupport its true dignity.

(o) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 415—479.

In the beginning of the year 1711, our Author produced another tract, which added farther to his reputation—as a judicious critic; we mean, his three "Letters on the "Genius and Writings of Shakſpeare (p)." In theſe letters he has drawn the poetical character of our immortal Dramatiſt with ſagacity and judgment; and, in treating upon his learning, he has ſtrongly ſupported the ſame opinion which hath ſince ſo ably, and ſtill more deciſively, been maintained by Dr. Farmer.

(p) Dennis's Original Letters, Vol. II. p. 361—406.

Thus far Mr. Dennis purſued his critical enquiries, without giving any peculiar offence. He might, indeed, occaſionally deliver with freedom his ſentiments concerning the writings of his contemporaries, and in ſome few inſtances might expreſs himſelf with ſeverity. But ſtill he did not run into ſuch exceſſes as to get involved in any material perſonal controverſy. In the works already mentioned, the attack upon Mr. Collier excepted, he has ſtated his opinions with moderation and candour. But henceforward we muſt view him in another light.

It was in 1711, ſoon after the commencement of the Spectator, that he began his hoſtilities with Addiſon, Steele, and Pope. He imagined himſelf to be attacked ſo early as in the very ſecond or third number of that paper; and was particularly diſpleaſed with the thirty-ninth and fortieth numbers, in which a doctrine was advanced, with regard to poetical juſtice, very different from what he had always maintained. Accordingly, he addreſſed a letter to the Spectator on the ſubject, at the concluſion of which he ſays: "Thus—I have diſcuſſed the buſineſs of poetical juſtice, and ſhewn it to be "the foundation of all tragedy; and therefore whatever perſons, whether ancient or "modern, have written dialogues which they call tragedies, where this juſtice is not "obſerved, thoſe perſons have entertained and amuſed the world with romantic lamen-"table tales, inſtead of juſt tragedies, and of lawful fables (q)." That our critic was extremely anxious in ſupport of this point, is apparent from ſeveral other parts of his works. He has particularly inſiſted upon it in a letter to Sir Richard Blackmore (r) on the moral and concluſion of an epic poem; and it would be denying Mr. Dennis his juſt praiſe were we not to ſay, that he has conducted his argument with great ingenuity and ability. Indeed, his reaſoning ſeems better adapted to epic poetry than to tragedy; the latter of which could not always be reduced to the ſtrict rules of poetical juſtice without deſtroying ſome of the nobleſt ſubjects of theatric repreſentation. Nature and Shakſpeare declare againſt ſuch rigid laws of dramatic compoſition. 'Whatever pleaſure,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'there may be in ſeeing crimes puniſhed, and virtue rewarded, yet, ſince 'wickedneſs often proſpers in real life, the poet is certainly at liberty to give it proſ-'perity on the ſtage. For if poetry has an imitation of reality, how are its laws broken 'by exhibiting the world in its true form? The ſtage may ſometimes gratify our wiſhes; 'but, if it be truly the mirror of life, it ought to ſhew us ſometimes what we are to 'expect (s).'

(s) Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. p. 393.

Another object which the Spectator afforded Mr. Dennis for the exerciſe of his critical ſkill, was preſented by the illuſtrations in the ſeventieth and ſeventy-fourth numbers of the famous old ballad of Chevy Chace. In theſe Illuſtrations Mr. Addiſon had exceeded the juſt bounds of encomium. It is not ſurprizing, therefore, that Mr. Dennis ſhould have the advantage over him; though the ſubject was ſcarcely important enough to deſerve an elaborate diſcuſſion of nearly thirty pages (t).

(t) Original Letters, ubi ſupra, Vol. I. p. 166—193.

A farther attack upon the Spectator was particularly levelled at Sir Richard Steele. That gentleman, it is ſaid, had promiſed our critic to take ſome opportunity of mentioning his works in publick with advantage, and thereby of promoting his reputation. It, however, unfortunately happened, that Mr. Addiſon, who, perhaps, knew nothing of of Sir Richard's engagement, quoted, in his paper upon Laughter, the two following lines, which he calls humourous and well-expreſſed, from Mr. Dennis's Tranſlation of a ſatire of Boileau's:

'Thus one fool lolls his tongue out at another,
'And ſhakes his empty noddle at his brother.'

Miſtaking this quotation for the performance of Sir Richard Steele's promiſe, our Author publiſhed a letter to the Spectator full of reſentment, and which ſtrongly marks the irritability of his diſpoſition. What particularly diſpleaſed him was, that ſome far ſuperior ſpecimen was not exhibited of his poetic excellence; and he pointed out a paſſage in his poem on the Battle of Ramillies, which he thinks might have been preferred to the forementioned couplet (u).

(u) Original Letters, Vol. II. p. 417—429. Cibber, ubi ſupra, p. 217—219.

Mr. Dennis's conteſt with the Spectator was ſpeedily followed by his attack upon Mr. Pope; occaſioned by the publication of the "Eſſay on Criticiſm." In that eſſay were the following lines, which our Author conſidered as having a reference to himſelf:

'Twere well might Critics ſtill this freedom take,
'But Appius reddens at each word you ſpeak:
'And ſtares tremendous with a threatening eye,
'Like ſome fierce tyrant in old tapeſtry.'

He imagined himſelf, likewiſe, to be ſtruck at in this couplet:

'Some have at firſt for Wits, then Poets paſt,
'Turned Critics next, and proved plain fools at laſt (w).'

(w) Engliſh Poets, Vol. XXXII. p. 115.

Upon theſe provocations he wrote a pamphlet, of which Dr. Johnſon ſays, that it is ſuch as rage might be expected to dictate. In a few inſtances his ſtrictures were juſt; but in general his deſire to do miſchief was greater than his power. The only extenuation of the perſonal abuſe he threw out againſt Mr. Pope was his conviction of that Gentleman's having given the firſt offence. 'Thus,' obſerves Dr. Johnſon, 'began the 'hoſtility between Pope and Dennis, which, though ſuſpended for a ſhort time, never 'was appeaſed. Pope ſeems, at firſt, to have attacked him wantonly; but, though he 'always profeſſed to deſpiſe him, he diſcovers, by mentioning him very often, that he 'felt his force or his venom (x).'

p. 92.

(x) Lives of the Poets, Vol. IV. p. 16—19.

Not again to return to this quarrel, we ſhall here take notice, that Mr. Dennis afterward criticized ſeveral of Mr. Pope's other poems; but without ſucceſs. That hence a place ſhould be aſſigned to him in the "Dunciad," is no more than what might have been expected. In that poem he is thus introduced:

'She ſaw ſlow Philips creep like Tate's poor page,
'And all the mighty mad in Dennis' rage.'

And again,

'Ah, Dennis! Gildon, ah! what ill-ſtarr'd rage
'Divides a friendſhip long confirm'd by age?
'Blockheads with reaſon wicked Wits abhor,
'But Fool with Fool is barb'rous civil war.
'Embrace, embrace, my ſons! be foes no more!
'Nor glad vile Poets with true Critics' gore (y).'

(y) Cibber, ubi ſupra, p. 230, 231. Engliſh Poets, Vol. XXXIV. p. 87. 187.

Dennis endeavoured to retort upon his antagoniſt by writing againſt the "Rape of "the Lock." It was remarked by him, that the machinery is ſuperfluous; and that, by all the buſtle of preternatural operation, the main event is neither haſtened nor retarded. 'To this charge,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'an efficacious anſwer is not eaſily made. 'The Sylphs cannot be ſaid to help or to oppoſe; and it muſt be allowed to imply ſome 'want of art, that their power has not been ſufficiently intermingled with the action. 'Other parts may likewiſe be charged with want of connection (z).' But whatever faults either the ſagacity or the acrimony of Dennis could point out in the poem, they were not worthy of being mentioned in compariſon with its excellencies. Indeed, the opinion of the publick was already ſettled, and the "Rape of the Lock" was no longer at the mercy of criticiſm (a).

(a) Ibid. 27.

In the year 1713, Mr. Addiſon's Cato was produced upon the ſtage with a degree of applauſe which, we believe, was never before given to any dramatic compoſition. But though the play was acted in the cauſe of Whiggiſm, and Dennis himſelf was ſo zealous a Whig, he could not bear the ſucceſs with which it was attended. That in this he was actuated by perſonal animoſity, cannot be denied; ſince it is acknowledged by himſelf, in a letter to the Duke of Buckingham. In that letter, he declares that the motive which induced him to write his Remarks upon Cato was, his having been attacked in ſeveral numbers of the Spectator (b). His principle of action we condemn; but the abilities with which he has executed his purpoſe are unqueſtionable. 'He 'found,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'and ſhewed many faults: he ſhewed them, indeed, with 'anger; but he found them with acuteneſs, ſuch as ought to reſcue his criticiſm from 'oblivion.' In conformity to ſo great an authority, we ſhall inſert the Doctor's account of it below [C]. Under this attack of Dennis, Addiſon thought proper to maintain an entire

(b) Original Letters, Vol. I. P. 55—57.

[C] We ſhall inſert the Doctor's account of it below.] It is as follows; with the omiſſion of a ſhort paſſage, already quoted, concerning poetical juſtice: 'A defe-'rence is to be paid to a general applauſe, when it 'appears that that applauſe is natural and ſpontaneous; 'but that little regard is to be had to it, when it is 'affected and artificial. Of all the tragedies which in 'his memory have had vaſt and violent runs, not one 'has been excellent; few have been tolerable; moſt 'have been ſcandalous. When a poet writes a tra-'gedy, who knows he has judgement, and who feels 'he has genius, that poet preſumes upon his own me-'rit, and ſcorns to make a cabal. That people come 'coolly to the repreſentation of ſuch a tragedy, with-'out any violent expectation, or deluſive imagination, 'or invincible prepoſſeſſion; that ſuch an audience is 'liable to receive the impreſſions which the poem 'ſhall naturally make in them, and to judge by their 'own reaſon and their own judgments, and that rea-'ſon and judgment are calm and ſerene, not formed 'by nature to make proſelytes, and to controul and 'lord it over the imaginations of others. But that 'when an author writes a tragedy, who knows he has 'neither genius nor judgment, he has recourſe to the 'making a party, and endeavours to make up in in-'duſtry what is wanting in talent, and to ſupply by 'poetical craft the abſence of poetical art: that ſuch 'an author is humbly contented to raiſe men's paſ-'ſions by a plot without doors, ſince he deſpairs of 'doing it by that which he brings upon the ſtage. 'That party and paſſion, and prepoſſeſſion, are cla-'morous and tumultuous things, and ſo much the 'more clamorous and tumultuous by how much the 'more erroneous: that they domineer and tyrannize 'over the imaginations of perſons who want judge-'ment, and ſometimes too of thoſe who have it; and, 'like a fierce outrageous torrent, bear down all op-'poſition before them.'

'He then condemns the neglect of poetical juſtice; which is always one of his favourite principles.'

''Tis certainly the duty of every tragick poet, by 'the exact diſtribution of poetical juſtice, to imitate 'the Divine Diſpenſation, and to inculcate a particu-'lar Providence. 'Tis true, indeed, upon the ſtage 'of the world, the wicked ſometimes proſper, and the 'guiltleſs ſuffer. But that is permitted by the Gover-'nor of the world, to ſhew, from the attribute of 'his infinite juſtice, that there is a compenſation in 'futurity, to prove the immortality of the human ſoul, 'and the certainty of future rewards and puniſhments. 'But the poetical perſons in tragedy exiſt no longer 'than the reading, or the repreſentation; the whole 'extent of their entity is circumſcribed by thoſe; and 'therefore, during that reading or repreſentation, 'according to their merits or demerits, they muſt be 'puniſhed or rewarded. If this is not done, there is 'no impartial diſtribution of poetical juſtice, no in-'ſtructive lecture of a particular Providence, and no 'imitation of the Divine Diſpenſation. And yet the 'author of this tragedy does not only run counter to 'this, in the fate of his principal character; but every 'where, throughout it, makes virtue ſuffer and vice 'triumph: for not only Cato is vanquiſhed by Cæſar, 'but the treachery and perfidiouſneſs of Syphax pre-'vails over the honeſt ſimplicity and the credulity of 'Juba; and the ſly ſubtilety and diſſimulation of Por-'tius over the generous frankneſs and openheartedneſs 'of Marcus.'

'Dennis objects to the characters that they are not natural, or reaſonable; but as heroes and heroines are not beings that are ſeen every day, it is hard to find upon what principles their conduct ſhall be tried. It is, however, not uſeleſs to conſider what he ſays of the manner in which Cato receives the account of his ſon's death.'

'Nor is the grief of Cato, in the fourth act, one 'jot more in nature than that of his ſon and Lucia 'in the third. Cato receives the news of his ſon's 'death not only with dry eyes, but with a ſort of ſa-'tisfaction; and in the ſame page ſheds tears for the 'calamity of his country, and does the ſame thing in 'the next page upon the bare apprehenſion of the 'danger of his friends. Now, ſince the love of one's 'country is the love of one's countrymen, as I have 'ſhewn upon another occaſion, I deſire to aſk theſe 'queſtions: of all our countrymen, which do we love 'moſt, thoſe whom we know, or thoſe whom we 'know not? And of thoſe whom we know, which 'do we cheriſh moſt, our friends or our enemies? 'And of our friends, which are the deareſt to us, 'thoſe who are related to us, or thoſe who are not? 'And of all our relations, for which have we moſt 'tenderneſs, for thoſe who are near to us, or for thoſe 'who are remote? And of our near relations, which 'are the neareſt, and conſequently the deareſt to us, 'our offspring or others? Our offspring moſt cer-'tainly; as Nature, or in other words Providence, 'has wiſely contrived for the preſervation of mankind. 'Now, does it not follow, from what has been ſaid, 'that for a man to receive the news of his ſon's death 'with dry eyes, and to weep at the ſame time for the 'calamities of his country, is a wretched affectation, 'and a miſerable inconſiſtency? Is not that, in plain 'Engliſh, to receive with dry eyes the news of the 'deaths of thoſe for whoſe ſake our country is a name 'ſo dear to us, and at the ſame time to ſhed tears for 'thoſe for whoſe ſakes our country is not a name ſo 'dear to us?'

'But this formidable aſſailant is leaſt reſiſtible when 'he attacks the probability of the action, and the 'reaſonableneſs of the plan. Every critical reader 'muſt remark, that Addiſon has, with a ſcrupuloſity 'almoſt unexampled on the Engliſh ſtage, confined 'himſelf in time to a ſingle day, and in place to ri-'gorous unity. The ſcene never changes, and the 'whole action of the play paſſes in the great hall of 'Cato's houſe at Utica. Much therefore is done in 'the hall, for which any other place had been more 'fit; and this impropriety affords Dennis many hints 'of merriment, and opportunities of triumph. The 'paſſage is long: but as ſuch diſquiſitions are not com-'mon, and the objections are ſkilfully formed and 'vigorouſly urged, thoſe who delight in critical con-'troverſy will not think it tedious.

'Upon the departure of Portius, Sempronius makes 'but one ſoliloquy, and immediately in comes Syphax, 'and then the two politicians are at it immediately. 'They lay their heads together, with their ſnuff-'boxes in their hands, as Mr. Bays has it, and league 'it away. But in the midſt of that wiſe ſcene, Sy-'phax ſeems to give a ſeaſonable caution to Sem-'pronius:

'Syph. But is it true, Sempronius, that your ſenate
'Is call'd together? Gods! thou muſt be cautious,
'Cato has piercing eyes.

'There is a great deal of caution ſhewn, indeed, in 'meeting in a governor's own hall to carry on their 'plot againſt him. Whatever opinion they have of 'his eyes, I ſuppoſe they had none of his ears, or 'they would never have talked at this fooliſh rate ſo 'near:

—'Gods! thou muſt be cautious.

'Oh, yes! very cautious; for if Cato ſhould over-'hear you, and turn you off for politicians, Cæſar 'would never take you; no, Cæſar would never take 'you.

'When Cato, Act II. turns the ſenators out of the 'hall, upon pretence of acquainting Juba with the 'reſult of their debates, he appears to me to do a thing 'which is neither reaſonable nor civil. Juba might 'certainly have better been made acquainted with the 'reſult of that debate in ſome private apartment of the 'palace.

entire ſilence. Pope, however, was ſo much affected at the ill treatment of his friend, that he took upon him to avenge his cauſe; which he did in a pamphlet, entituled, "The 'palace. But the Poet was driven upon this abſurdity 'to make way for another; and that is, to give Juba 'an opportunity to demand Marcia of her father. 'But the quarrel and rage of Juba and Syphax, in 'the ſame act, the invectives of Syphax againſt the 'Romans and Cato; the advice that he gives Juba, 'in her father's hall, to bear away Marcia by force; 'and his brutal and clamorous rage upon his refuſal, 'and at a time when Cato was ſcarce out of ſight, 'and perhaps not out of hearing; at leaſt, ſome of his 'guards or domeſticks muſt neceſſarily be ſuppoſed to 'be within hearing; is a thing that is ſo far from being 'probable, that it is hardly poſſible.

'Sempronius, in the ſecond act, comes back once 'more in the ſame morning to the governor's hall, to 'carry on the conſpiracy with Syphax againſt the 'governor, his country, and his family: which is ſo 'ſtupid, that it is below the wiſdom of the O—'s, 'the Mac's, and the Teague's; even Euſtace Com-'mins himſelf would never have gone to Juſtice-hall, 'to have conſpired againſt the government. If of-'ficers at Portſmouth ſhould lay their heads together, 'in order to the carrying off J— G—'s niece or 'daughter, would they meet in J— G—'s hall, to 'carry on that conſpiracy? There would be no ne-'ceſſity for their meeting there, at leaſt till they came 'to the execution of their plot, becauſe there would 'be other places to meet in. There would be no 'probability that they ſhould meet there, becauſe there 'would be places more private and more commodious. 'Now there ought to be nothing in a tragical action 'but what is neceſſary or probable.

'But treaſon is not the only thing that is carried on 'in this hall: that and love, and philoſophy, take 'their turns in it, without any manner of neceſſity or 'probability, occaſioned by the action, as duly and 'as regularly, without interrupting one another, as 'if there were a triple league between them, and a 'mutual agreement that each ſhould give place to and 'make way for the other, in a due and orderly ſuc-'ceſſion.

'We come now to the third Act. Sempronius, in 'this act, comes into the governor's hall, with the 'leaders of the mutiny: but as ſoon as Cato is gone, 'Sempronius, who but juſt before had acted like an 'unparalleled knave, diſcovers himſelf, like an egre-'gious fool, to be an accomplice in the conſpiracy.

'Semp. Know, villians, when ſuch paltry ſlaves
'preſume
'To mix in treaſon, if the plot ſucceeds,
'They 're thrown neglected by; but if it fails,
'They 're ſure to die like dogs, as you ſhall do.
'Here, take theſe factious monſters, drag them
'forth
'To ſudden death.—

''Tis true, indeed, the ſecond leader ſays, there are 'none there but friends: but is that poſſible at ſuch 'a juncture? Can a parcel of rogues attempt to aſ-'faſſinate the governor of a town of war, in his own 'houſe, in mid-day, and after they are diſcovered 'and defeated, can there be none near them but 'friends? Is it not plain from theſe words of Sem-'pronius,

'Here, take theſe factious monſters, drag them forth
'To ſudden death—

'and from the entrance of the guards upon the word 'of command, that thoſe guards were within ear-ſhot? 'Behold Sempronius then palpably diſcovered. How 'comes it to paſs, then, that, inſtead of being hanged 'up with the reſt, he remains ſecure in the governor's 'hall, and there carries on his conſpiracy againſt the 'government, the third time in the ſame day, with 'his old comrade Syphax? who enters at the ſame 'time that the guards are carrying away the leaders, 'big with the news of the defeat of Sempronius; 'though where he had his intelligence ſo ſoon is diffi-'cult to imagine. And now the reader may expect a 'very extraordinary ſcene: there is not abundance of 'ſpirit, indeed, nor a great deal of paſſion; but there 'is wiſdom more than enough to ſupply all defects.

'Syph. Our firſt deſign, my friend, has prov'd
'abortive;
'Still there remains an after-game to play:
'My troops are mounted, their Numidian ſteeds
'Snuff up the winds, and long to ſcour the deſart.
'Let but Sempronius lead us in our flight,
'We 'll force the gate, where Marcus keeps his 'guard,
'And hew down all that would oppoſe our paſſage;
'A day will bring us into Cæſar's camp.
'Semp. Confuſion! I have fail'd of half my pur-
'poſe;
'Marcia, the charming Marcia 's left behind.

'Well! but though he tells us the half-purpoſe that 'he has failed of, he does not tell us the half that he 'has carried. But what does he mean by

'Marcia, the charming Marcia's left behind?

'He is now in her own houſe; and we have neither 'ſeen her nor heard of her any where elſe ſince the 'play began. But now let us hear Syphax:

'What hinders then, but that thou find her out,
'And hurry her away by manly force?

'But what does old Syphax mean by finding her out? 'They talk as if ſhe were as hard to be found as a hare 'in a froſty morning.

'Semp. But how to gain admiſſion?

'Oh! ſhe is found out then, it ſeems.

'But how to gain admiſſion? for acceſs
'Is giv'n to none, but Juba and her brothers.

'But, raillery apart, why acceſs to Juba? For he 'was owned and received as a lover neither by the 'father nor by the daughter. Well! but let that paſs. 'Syphax puts Sempronius out of pain immediately; 'and, being a Numidian, abounded in wiles, ſupplies 'him with a ſtratagem for admiſſion, that, I believe, 'is a non-pareille:

'Syph. Thou ſhalt have Juba's dreſs, and Juba's
'guards;
'The doors will open, when Numidia's prince
'Seems to appear before them.

'Sempronius is, it ſeems, to paſs for Juba in full day 'at Cato's houſe, where they were both ſo very well 'known, by having Juba's dreſs and his guards: as if 'one of the marſhals of France could paſs for the Duke 'of Bavaria, at noon-day, at Verſailles, by having 'his dreſs and liveries. But how does Syphax pretend 'to help Sempronius to young Juba's dreſs? Does he 'ſerve him in a double capacity, as general and maſter 'of his wardrobe? But why Juba's guards? For the 'devil of any guards has Juba appeared with yet! 'Well! though this is a mighty politick invention, 'yet, methinks, they might have done without it; 'for, ſince the advice that Syphax gave to Sempro-'nius was,

'To hurry her away by manly force,

'In my opinion, the ſhorteſt and likelieſt way of com-'ing at the lady was by demoliſhing, inſtead of putting 'on an impertinent diſguiſe to circumvent two or three 'ſlaves. But Sempronius, it ſeems, is of another opinion. 'He extols to the ſkies the invention of old Syphax:

'Sempr. Heavens! what a thought was there!

'Now, I appeal to the reader, if I have not been as 'good as my word. Did I not tell him, that I would 'lay before him a very wiſe ſcene?

'But now let us lay before the reader that part of 'the ſcenery of the fourth act, which may ſhew the 'abſurdities which the author has run into, through 'the indiſcreet obſervance of the unity of place. I do 'not remember that Ariſtotle has ſaid any thing ex-'preſsly concerning the unity of place. 'Tis true, 'implicitly he has ſaid enough in the rules which he 'has laid down for the chorus. For, by making the 'chorus an eſſential part of tragedy, and by bringing 'it on the ſtage immediately after the opening of the 'ſcene, and retaining it there till the very cataſtrophe,

'he

" The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the ſtrange and deplorable frenzy " of Mr. John Dennis, an officer in the cuſtom-houſe (c)." It is a witty and laughable per-

' he has ſo determined and fixed the place of action, ' that it was impoſſible for an author on the Grecian ' ſtage to break through that unity. I am of opinion ' that if a modern tragic poet can preſerve the unity ' of place, without deſtroying the probability of the ' incidents, 'tis always beſt for him to do it, becauſe ' by the preſervation of that unity, as we have taken ' notice above, he adds grace, and cleanneſs, and ' comelineſs, to the repreſentation. But ſince there ' are no expreſs rules about it, and we are under no ' compulſion to keep it, ſince we have no chorus as ' the Grecian poet had; if it cannot be preſerved, ' without rendering the greater part of the incidents ' unreaſonable and abſurd, and perhaps ſometimes ' monſtrous, 'tis certainly better to break it.

' Now comes bully Sempronius, comically accou- ' tred and equipped with his Numidian dreſs and his ' Numidian guards. Let the reader attend to him ' with all his ears; for the words of the wiſe are pre- ' cious:

' Semp. The deer is lodg'd, I've track'd her to her
' covert.

' Now, I would fain know why this deer is ſaid to be ' lodged, ſince we have not heard one word ſince the ' play began of her being at all out of harbour: and, ' if we conſider the diſcourſe with which ſhe and Lucia ' begin the act, we have reaſon to believe that they ' had hardly been talking of ſuch matters in the ſtreet. ' However, to pleaſure Sempronius, let us ſuppoſe, for ' once, that the deer is lodged:

' The deer is lodg'd, I've track'd her to her covert.

' If he had ſeen her in the open field, what occaſion ' had he to track her, when he had ſo many Numidian ' dogs at his heels, which, with one halloo, he might ' have ſet upon her haunches? If he did not ſee her ' in the open field, how could he poſſibly track her? ' If he had ſeen her in the ſtreet, why did he not ſet ' upon her in the ſtreet, ſince through the ſtreet ſhe ' muſt be carried at laſt? Now here, inſtead of hav- ' ing his thoughts upon his buſineſs, and upon the ' preſent danger; inſtead of m[illegible]ing and contriving ' how he ſhall paſs with his miſtreſs through the ſouth- ' ern gate, where her brother Marcus is upon the ' guard, and where ſhe would certainly prove an im- ' pediment to him, which is the Roman word for the ' baggage; inſtead of doing th[illegible], Sempronius is enter- ' taining himſelf with wh[illegible]s:

' Sempr. How will the young Numidian rave to ' ſee
' His miſtreſs loſt! If aught could glad my ſoul,
' Beyond th' enjoyment ſo bright a prize,
' 'Twould be to torture that young gay Barbarian.
' But hark! what noiſe. Death to my hopes, 'tis he,
' 'Tis Juba's ſelf! There is but one way left!
' He muſt be murder d, and a paſſage cut
' Thro' thoſe his guards.

' Pray, what are thoſe his guards? I thought at pre- ' ſent, that Juba's guards had been Sempronius's tools, ' and had been dangling after his heels.

' But now let us ſum up all theſe abſurdities to- ' gether. Sempronius goes at noon-day, in Juba's ' cloaths, and with Juba's guards, to Cato's palace, ' in order to paſs for Juba, in a place where they ' were both ſo very well known: he meets Juba there, ' and reſolves to murder him with his own guards. ' Upon the guards appearing a little baſhful, he ' threatens them:

' Ha! daſtards, do you tremble!
' Or act like men, or, by yon azure heav'n!

' But the guards ſtill remaining reſtive, Sempronius ' himſelf attacks Juba, while each of the guards is ' repreſenting Mr. Spectator's ſign of the Gaper, awed, ' it ſeems, and terrified by Sempronius's threats. Juba ' kills Sempronius, and takes his own army priſon- ' ers, and carries them in triumph away to Cato. Now ' I would fain know, if any part of Mr. Bays's tragedy ' is ſo full of abſurdity as this?

' Upon hearing the claſh of ſwords, Lucia and ' Marcia come in. The queſtion is, why no men ' come in upon hearing the noiſe of ſwords in the ' governor's hall? Where was the governor himſelf? ' Where were his guards? Where were his ſervants? ' Such an attempt as this, ſo near the perſon of a ' governor of a place of war, was enough to alarm ' the whole garriſon: and yet, for almoſt half an hour ' after Sempronius was killed, we find none of thoſe ' appear, who were the likelieſt in the world to be ' alarmed; and the noiſe of ſwords is made to draw ' only two poor women thither, who were moſt certain ' to run away from it. Upon Lucia and Marcia's ' coming in, Lucia appears in all the ſymptoms of an ' hyſterical gentlewoman:

' Luc. Sure 'twas the claſh of ſwords! my trou' bled heart
' Is ſo caſt down, and ſunk amidſt its ſorrows,
' It throbs with fear, and aches at every ſound!

' And immediately her old whimſey returns upon her:

' O Marcia, ſhould thy brothers, for my ſake—
' I die away with horror at the thought.

' She fancies that there can be no cutting-of-throats, ' but it muſt be for her. If this is tragical, I would ' fain know what is comical. Well! upon this they ' ſpy the body of Sempronius; and Marcia, deluded ' by the habit, it ſeems, takes him for Juba; for, ' ſays ſhe,

' The face is muffled up within the garment.

' Now how a man could fight, and fall with his face ' muffled up in his garment, is, I think, a little hard ' to conceive! Beſides, Juba, before he killed him, ' knew him to be Sempronius. It was not by his ' garment that he knew this; it was by his face then: ' his face therefore was not muffled. Upon ſeeing ' this man with the muffled face, Marcia falls a rav- ' ing; and, owning her paſſion for the ſuppoſed de- ' funct, begins to make his funeral oration. Upon ' which Juba enters liſtening, I ſuppoſe on tiptoe; ' for I cannot imagine how any one can enter, liſten- ' ing, in any other poſture. I would fain know how ' it came to paſs, that during all this time he had ſent ' nobody, no, not ſo much as a candle-ſnuffer, to ' take away the dead body of Sempronius. Well! ' but let us regard him liſtening. Having left his ap- ' prehenſion behind him, he, at firſt, applies what ' Marcia ſays to Sempronius. But finding at laſt, ' with much ado, that he himſelf is the happy man, ' he quits his eve-dropping, and diſcovers himſelf ' juſt time enough to prevent his being cuckolded by a ' dead man, of whom a moment before he had appear- ' ed ſo jealous; and greedily intercepts the bliſs, which ' was fondly deſigned for one who could not be the ' better for it. But here I muſt aſk a queſtion: how ' comes Juba to liſten here, who had not liſtened ' before throughout the play? Or, how comes he to ' be the only perſon of this tragedy who liſtens, when ' love and treaſon were ſo often talked in ſo public a ' place as a hall? I am afraid the author was driven ' upon all theſe abſurdities only to introduce this miſe- ' rable miſtake of Marcia; which, after all, is much ' below the dignity of tragedy, as any thing is which ' is the effect or reſult of trick.

' But let us come to the ſcenery of the fifth act. ' Cato appears firſt upon the ſcene, ſitting in a ' thoughtful poſture; in his hand Plato's treatiſe on ' the Immortality of the Soul, a drawn ſword on the ' table by him. Now let us conſider the place in ' which this ſight is preſented to us. The place, for- ' ſooth, is a long hall. Let us ſuppoſe, that any one ' ſhould place himſelf in this poſture, in the midſt of ' one of our halls in London; that he ſhould appear ' ſolus, in a ſullen poſture, a drawn ſword on the ' table by him; in his hand Plato's treatiſe on the Im- ' mortality of the Soul, tranſlated lately by Bernard ' Lintot: I deſire the reader to conſider, whether ' ſuch a perſon as this would paſs, with them who ' beheld him, for a great patriot, a great philoſopher, performance; but there is a cruelty in it which muſt excite the diſapprobation of every benevolent mind. One thing is obſervable, which is, that Pope has left Dennis's objections to Cato in their full force, 'and therefore diſcovered more deſire of vexing the 'critic, than of defending the poet. Addiſon, who was no ſtranger to the world,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'probably ſaw the ſelfiſhneſs of Pope's friendſhip; and reſolving that he 'ſhould have the conſequences of his officiouſneſs to himſelf, informed Dennis by Steele, 'that he was ſorry for the inſult; and that whenever he ſhould think fit to anſwer his 'Remarks, he would do it in a manner to which nothing could be objected (d).' Mr. Dennis, having been ſucceſsful in diſplaying the faults of Cato, with regard to the probability of the action, and the reaſonableneſs of the plan, proceeded, in the pride of conqueſt, to attack the ſentiments of the play, which he did in ſeven letters (e). But here he only betrayed the captiouſneſs of his diſpoſition. His ſtrictures are, in general, trifling and inſignificant; containing ſuch petty cavils, and minute objections, as the malignity of criticiſm, united with ſome degree of ſagacity, might ever be capable of exerciſing againſt the moſt perfect productions of the human mind.

' or

(e) Original Letters, Vol. II. p. 303—357.

In 1721, Mr. Dennis publiſhed, in two volumes, octavo, his "Select Works," of which we have taken notice according to the time of their original appearance. He printed, likewiſe, in the ſame year, by ſubſcription, in two volumes, large octavo, "Original Letters, familiar, moral, and critical;" the greater part of which have alſo paſſed under our obſervation. This collection does credit to our Author's abilities. Among the pieces not yet mentioned, he has made ſome ingenious remarks upon the vis comica, with the want of which Terence was charged by Julius Cæſar (f); and there are ſeveral other diſquiſitions that are not unworthy of a peruſal. In a letter to Mr. Jacob Tonſon, ſenior, on the conſpiracy againſt the reputation of Mr. Dryden, our Author has manifeſted a high regard for the honour of that great poet. The character Mr. Dennis gives of himſelf, in the ſame letter, is very different from what the public, both at that time and ever ſince, has entertained. "Whatever," ſays he, "the miſtaken "world may think, I am always willing to be pleaſed; nay, am always as greedy of "pleaſure as any Epicurean living; and whenever I am naturally touched, I give my-"ſelf up to the firſt impreſſion, and never look for faults (g)."

(f) Ibid. Vol. I. p. 13—18.

(g) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 289—292.

The relief which Mr. Dennis obtained by theſe publications, though conſiderable, was not permanent. Being much diſtreſſed very near the cloſe of his life, it was propoſed to act a play for his benefit, and Mr. Thomſon, Mr. Mallet, Mr. Benjamin Martin, and Mr. Pope, took the lead upon the occaſion. The play, which was "The Provoked Huſband," was repreſented at the little theatre in the Haymarket, on the eighteenth of December, 1733; and Pope condeſcended ſo far to lay aſide his reſentment againſt his former antagoniſt, as to write a prologue, which was ſpoken by Theophilus Cibber. Dennis had at this time become blind. Mr. Pope's benevolence was not ſo pure as could be wiſhed; for his prologue was throughout a ſneer upon the poor old critic, who happily, either from vanity or the decay of his intellects, did not perceive its tendency. Mr. Dennis ſurvived this aſſiſtance only twenty days, dying on the ſixth of January, 1733-4, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age (h).

(h) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. IV. p. 237, 238. Biographia Dramatica, Vol. I. p. 124. Engliſh Poets, Vol. XXXIII. p. 346, 347.

The following verſes, in the name of our Author, were addreſſed, at the time of the repreſentation of the play for his benefit, to Mr. Thomſon, who had taken the moſt active part in that affair. It is underſtood that they were written by Mr. Savage.

"Reflecting on thy worth, methinks I find
"Thy various Seaſons in their author's mind.
"Spring opes her bloſſoms, various as thy Muſe,
"And, like thy ſoft compaſſion, ſheds her dews.
"Summer's hot drought in thy expreſſion glows,
"And o'er each page a tawny ripeneſs throws.
"Autumn's rich fruits th' inſtructed reader gains,
"Who taſtes the meaning purpoſe of thy ſtrains.
"Winter—but that no ſemblance takes from thee;
"That hoary ſeaſon yields a type of me.
"Shatter'd by Time's bleak ſtorms I withering lay,
"Leafleſs, and whitening in a cold decay.
"Yet ſhall my propleſs ivy, pale and bent,
"Bleſs the ſhort ſunſhine which thy pity lent."

'or a general, or for ſome whimſical perſon who fancied himſelf all theſe; and whether the people who 'belonged to the family, would think that ſuch a 'perſon had a deſign upon their midriff or his own?

'In ſhort, that Cato ſhould ſit long enough, in 'the aforeſaid poſture, in the midſt of this large hall, 'to read over Plato's treatiſe on the Immortality of the 'Soul, which is a lecture of two long hours; that he 'ſhould propoſe to himſelf to be private there upon 'that occaſion; that he ſhould be angry with his ſon 'for intruding there; then, that he ſhould leave this 'hall upon the pretence of ſleep, give himſelf the 'mortal wound in his bedchamber, and then be 'brought back into that hall to expire, purely to 'ſhew his good-breeding, and ſave his friends the 'trouble of coming up to his bed-chamber; all this 'appears to me to be improbable, incredible, impoſſible.'

'Such is the cenſure of Dennis. There is, as Dryden expreſſes it, perhaps too much horſe-play in his raillery; but if his jeſts are coarſe, his arguments are ſtrong. Yet as we love better to be pleaſed than to be taught, Cato is read, and the critick is neglected (3).'

(3) Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. p. 390—413.

The character of Mr. Dennis muſt, in general, be ſufficiently apparent from what has already been ſaid. Ill-nature has been aſcribed to him with too much ſhew of reaſon; though perhaps it belonged to him more as a writer than as a man. In a letter to a friend he has endeavoured to vindicate himſelf from the charge; but not, we think, with entire ſucceſs (i). This at leaſt is certain, from ſeveral tranſactions, that he was very irritable in his temper. On the whole, however, there ſeems to be no room to doubt of his having been a perſon of integrity and virtue. Till he was five-and forty, he was intimately converſant with the firſt men of the age, both with reſpect to rank and abilities; and when he retired from the world, he continued to preſerve ſome honourable connections. Such was the eſtimation he was held in, that he experienced the patronage of gentlemen whoſe political principles were extremely different from thoſe which he always openly avowed. George Granville, Eſq. in particular, afterwards Lord Lanſdowne, behaved to him with diſtinguiſhed generoſity (k).

(k) Ibid. Vol. I. p. 46, 47. Vol. II. p. 364.

In the Gentleman's Magazine for January, 1734, ſome verſes were inſerted on the death of Mr. Dennis, in which a longer duration is promiſed to his reputation and his works than they will probably ever attain.

" Though here, revenge and pride withheld his praiſe,
" No wrongs ſhall reach him through his future days.
" The riſing ages ſhall redeem his name;
" And nations read him into laſting fame,
" In his defects untaught; his labour'd page
" Shall the ſlow gratitude of time engage."

From the temporary celebrity of Mr. Dennis, and his connections, either in the way of friendſhip or hoſtility, with the principal writers of his time, we could not reaſonably avoid giving him a place in this work; and the article will not, we hope, be totally deſtitute of utility. It will add ſomething to the great body of the literary hiſtory of England; and it may ſerve to diſplay the unhappy effects that reſult from the extravagance of ſelf-opinion; an extravagance which is uſually more incident to ſecondary authors, than to thoſe who occupy the higheſt ranks of genius and learning.] K

DENNY (Sir ANTHONY) Knight, favourite, and one of the Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber to King Henry VIII. was the ſecond ſon of Thomas Denny [A], of Cheſhunt, in the county of Hertford, Eſq. by Elizabeth daughter of Thomas Mannock (a). He had his education in St. Paul's ſchool, London, under the famous William Lilly (b); and afterwards in St. John's College in Cambridge: in both which places he ſo improved himſelf, that he became an excellent ſcholar, as well as a perſon of great worth (c). His merit having made him known at Court, he was conſtituted, by King Henry VIII, one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber, Groom of the Stole, and a Privy-Counſellor; and likewiſe received the honour of Knighthood from that Prince (d): with whom being in great favour, he raiſed a conſiderable eſtate upon the ruins of the diſſolved monaſteries. For, in 1537, King Henry gave him the Priory of Hertford, together with divers other lands and manors [B]. He farther granted him, in 1539, on the 15th of December, the office of Steward of the manor of Bedwell and Little Berkhamſtead, in Hertfordſhire [C]: beſides which, Sir Anthony alſo obtained the manor of Butterwick, in the pariſh of St. Peter in St. Alban's (e), the manors of the Rectory, and of the Nunnery, in the pariſh of Cheſhunt (f); and of Great Amwell (g), all in the county of Hertford. Moreover, in 1541, there was a large grant made to him, by Act of Parliament, of ſeveral lands that had belonged to the Abbey of St. Alban's, lately diſſolved [D]. Not [A] Was the ſecond ſon of Thomas Denny.] The family of Denny is traced up by ſome as high as the year of Chriſt 725. About that time, the Moors having invaded France with a prodigious army, were oppoſed by Charles Martel: who had under him an officer named Denny, by whoſe bravery and conduct the French ſlew thirty thouſand of the enemy in one battle, and got a glorious victory. Deſcended from him, as is ſuppoſed, was John Denny, Eſq. who ſerved King Henry V. in his wars in France, and being ſlain there, was buried at St. Denis, in Paris. His deſcendants were ——Henry: ——William, of Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire, and High-Sheriff of that county in the year 1480 (1)———Edmund [whom Sir William Dugdale by miſtake calls Edward (2)]. He was a Clerk in the Exchequer; and in 1504 conſtituted the King's Remembrancer (3): and on the 6th of May, 1514, one of the Barons of the Exchequer (4). He died on the 22d of December, 1520 (5). ——— His eldeſt ſon, John, died without iſſue: and his ſecond ſon———Thomas was the father of Sir Anthony, who is the ſubject of this article.

[D] Moreover, in 1541, there was a large grant made to him, by Act of Parliament, of ſeveral lands that had belonged to the abbey of St. Alban's, lately diſſolved.] For in the Parliament begun at Weſtminſter the 16th of January, 33 Henry VIII. it was enacted, that Anthony Denny, Eſq. one of the Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, ſhould have to him and his heirs, all the manor or lordſhip of the king of Parkbury in the county of Hertford, and all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, with the appurtenances in Park, called Boreham, Spirth, and Grimeſgate-field, late in the occupation of John Coningſby, the firſt crop of a meadow

Not content with that, he found means to procure a thirty-one years leaſe, of the many large and rich demeſnes, that had been poſſeſſed by Waltham-Abbey in Eſſex (b): of which his lady purchaſed afterwards the reverſion [E]. In 1544, the King gave him the advantageous wardſhip of Margaret, the only daughter and heir of Thomas Lord Audeley, deceaſed (i). On the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1546, he was commiſſioned, with John Gate, and William Clerk, Eſquires, to ſign all warrants in the King's name (k). In this reign he did an eminent ſervice to the great ſchool of Sedberg in Yorkſhire, belonging to the College wherein he had received his education. For, the building being fallen to decay, and the lands appropriated thereto ſold and embezzled, he cauſed the ſchool to be repaired, and not only recovered, but alſo ſettled the eſtate ſo firmly, as to prevent all future alienations (l). When King Henry VIII. was on his death-bed, Sir Anthony had the honeſty and courage to put him in mind of his approaching end; and deſired him, to raiſe his thoughts to heaven, to think of his paſt life, and to call on GOD for mercy through Jeſus Chriſt (m). So great an opinion had that King of him, that he appointed him one of the executors of his will, and one of the counſellors to his ſon and ſucceſſor King Edward VI. and bequeathed him a legacy of three hundred pounds (n). He did not live long after this; for he died in the year 1550 (o); Dr. Fuller being miſtaken when he ſays it was in 1548 (p). By his wife Joan, daughter of Sir Philip Champernon, of Modbury in Devonſhire, a Lady of great beauty and parts [F], he had ſix children; of whom Henry, the eldeſt, was father of Edward Denny, knighted in 1589, ſummoned to Parliament in 1605, and advanced, on the 24th of October, 1626, to the dignity of Earl of Norwich (q). As for Sir Anthony Denny's character; one of his contemporaries informs us, that his whole time and cares were taken up with, and employed about, Religion, Learning, and the care of the Publick (r): and has highly commended him for his prudence and humanity. The learned Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, wrote an excellent epitaph for him, ſome years before his deceaſe [G]. And Sir John Cheke, who had a great eſteem for him, honoured his memory with an elegant Heroic Poem [H].

Death, and the King, did, as it were, contend,
Which of them two bare Denny greateſt love:
The King, to ſhew his love can farre extend,
Did him advance his betters farre above.
Nere place, much wealth, great honour, eke him gave,
To make it knowne what power great Princes have.

The King gave welth, but fading and unſure:

This epitaph, as Mr. Fuller obſerves (11), was made by a poetical prolepſis, or anticipation. For, the noble and ingenious author of it did not ſurvive Sir Antony; being ſacrificed, in the year 1546, to the jealouſy of that brutiſh tyrant Henry VIII.

 [In this life of Sir Anthony Denny, little is recorded concerning him, excepting the gifts which he received from King Henry the Eighth. He muſt undoubtedly have been a great favourite with that monarch, ſince he obtained ſo large a ſhare in the plunder of the monaſteries. What is moſt to his honour is, his having a high character given of him by two ſuch men as Henry Howard Earl of Surrey, and Sir John Cheke. It was but a ſhort time that the Earldom of Norwich continued in the Denny family; for Edward, in whom the title commenced, died without male iſſue, having had only one daughter, Honora, who was married to James Lord Hay, afterwards Earl of Carliſle (13).] K.

DERHAM (WILLIAM) a moſt excellent Chriſtian Philoſopher, and Divine, who flouriſhed in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth century, was born at Stowton, near Worceſter, on the 26th of November, 1657. He had his ſchool-education at Blockley, in his native county, under the Reverend Mr. Nathaniel Collier: And, May 14, 1675, in the eighteenth year of his age, was admitted into Trinity-College, Oxon, under the tuition of the learned Dr. Willes, father of the late Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, January 28, 1678-9; and by that time had ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and other valuable and eminent qualifications, that he was earneſtly recommended by Dr. Ralph Bathurſt, then Preſident of Trinity-College, to Dr. Seth Ward, Biſhop of Saliſbury; by whoſe intereſt and recommendation, he became Chaplain, as ſoon as he had entered into holy orders, to Catharine Lady Dowager Grey of Warke. He was ordained Deacon by Dr. Compton, Biſhop of London, May 29, 1681, and Prieſt by Biſhop Ward, juſt now mentioned, July 9, 1682. On the 5th of July, 1682, he was preſented by Mr. Neville to the Vicarage of Wargrave in Berkſhire. But he did not long continue there; for, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1689, he was preſented by Mrs. Jane Bray to the Rectory of Upminſter in Eſſex (a), a living of above two hundred pounds value, and not more than fifteen miles from London: which lying at ſo convenient a diſtance from that metropolis of the kingdom, gave him an opportunity of converſing, and keeping a correſpondence, with the greateſt virtuoſos in the nation. Being therefore placed in that quiet and retired ſtation, ſuitable to his contemplative and philoſophical temper, he applied himſelf, with great eagerneſs, to the ſtudy of Nature, and to Mathematicks, and Experimental Philoſophy; in which he became ſo eminent, that he was, ſoon after, choſen Fellow of the Royal Society. And he proved one of the moſt uſeful and induſtrious Members of it, frequently publiſhing in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions," curious obſervations, and valuable pieces, of which the particulars follow. [B] The Hiſtory of the Death-watch.] In treating of this inſect, he gives, firſt, a draught of it as it appeareth to the naked eye, and as magnified with a microſcope. Then he informs us, That it is very much like a louſe in ſhape and colour, but runneth more nimbly: and is common in every houſe in the warm months; but in the cold ſeaſon of the year, they hide themſelves in dry and obſcure places. Their eggs, which are much ſmaller than the nits of lice, though ſhaped like them but more tranſparent, they lay in dry duſty places. Theſe are hatched by the warmth of the approaching ſpring, about the beginning of March; and at the firſt leaving their egg-ſhell are perfectly like the mites in cheeſe, but exceedingly ſmall, ſo as ſcarcely to be diſcerned by the ſharpeſt eye, without the help of a convex-glaſs. In this ſhape they continue ſix weeks or two months, and then gradually grow to their more perfect ſtate. Their ticking noiſe is a wooing-act, and is commonly in July, and about the beginning of Auguſt. But they do not every year beat alike, doing it ſometimes ſooner, ſometimes later, ſometimes much, ſometimes little. After they have ſpent ſome time in ticking, they copulate. Death-watches, both young and old, feed upon dead inſects, and upon little crumbs of biſket, tallow, &c. mixed among the duſt.

[C] Experiments and Obſervations on the Motion of Sound, &c.] In this curious paper, he obſerves (in the firſt place), the diſagreement between the moſt eminent authors concerning the velocity of ſound, that is, how many Engliſh feet a ſound moves in one ſecond of time: and gives a table of it. Then from the experiments he had made upon that ſubject, he deduces the following obſervations: That there is no variation of ſound from the different elevation or direction of the gun: that the motion of ſound, is not altered by the alterations in the air: that ſounds produced from different bodies move with the ſame velocity: that the motion of ſound is uniform. He likewiſe treats therein of the following ſubjects; of an echo at a great diſtance and in the air; and of the motion of the echos; of the aſcending and deſcending of ſounds; of the remiſſneſs and intenſeneſs of ſounds, according to the alteration of the air; of the influence of winds, on the motion of ſounds; of the velocity of winds, and of ſounds. Experiments on ſounds made in Italy, &c.

[D] An Account of a Child's crying in the Womb.] It was the child of one Clark of Hornchurch in Eſſex, who was heard to cry in his mother's womb, at times, for five weeks. And though the poſſibility of ſuch a thing is queſtioned by Etmuller and Diemerbroek (1), yet our author proves from ſeveral matters of fact, that it is not only poſſible, but alſo has happened many times; although it was not of ſo long continuance, and with ſuch frequent reiterations of the crying, as it happened in this inſtance.

(1) Etmulleri Diſſertat. de abſtruſo reſpirationis humanæ negotio; where Diemerbroek's opinion is related.

[E] Miſchiefs occaſioned by ſwallowing the Stones of Bullace and Sloes.] There being a notion, 'that the 'ſtones of ſloes, cherries, &c. are uſeful in preventing 'a ſurfeit from the fruit,' our ingenious author ſhews, in this paper, the danger of that ill-grounded opinion, in the inſtance of a neighbouring clergyman's ſervant: who having in his youth been a great lover of fruit, uſed greedily to devour all ſorts he could come at, and bullace and ſloes being the eaſieſt to be gotten, he uſed to ſwallow great quantities of them, without evacuating many of the ſtones by ſtool. But the conſequence of it was, That he came to have exceſſive pains in his ſtomach, and to vomit up whatever he eat. At length, after violent vomitings, he brought up, at divers times, above one hundred and twenty bullace and ſloe-ſtones, beſides many others of which he could not keep account.

[F] Obſervations about Waſps, &c.] In theſe obſervations he ſhews, that there are three ſorts of Waſps. The Queens, or Females, which never work; the Kings, or Males; and the common Labouring Waſps; each of them very diſtinct. The Queen, or Female-Waſp (by many called the King Waſp) is much longer in the body, and larger, than any other Waſp. The Male-Waſps are leſs than the Queens, but as much longer and larger than the common Waſps, as the Queen is longer and larger than theſe. Theſe males alſo have no ſtings, which the Queens and common Waſps all have. And they may be known from other Waſps, by their Antennæ, or horns; which are longer and larger than either thoſe of the Queen or common Waſps, and with them they ſeem, in running, to feel more than the others do. But the grand and chief difference, are the parts of generation of theſe Male-Waſps, which the curious author accurately deſcribes (2).

(2) Ubi ſupra, No. 382. p. 53, &c.

[G] Of the Meteor call'd the Ignis Fatuus, &c.] He proves in this paper, from obſervations made by himſelf and by Sir Tho. Dereham, that the Ignes Fatui are not, as divers ſkilful Naturaliſts have imagined, only the ſhining of a great number of the Male Glow-worms in England, or of the Pyrauſtæ in Italy, flying together; but, are very much like that ſort of Phoſphorus, which doth indeed ſhine in the dark, but doth not burn any thing as common fire doth. Moreover, that they appear, in Italy, moſtly in moraſſy grounds, in dark nights, and in cold, ſnowy, and even rainy weather; but not ſo much in ſummer (3).

[H] The Artificial Clock-Maker, &c.] In the preface the ingenious author informs us, that 'this little book 'was a part of the diverſion of his juvenile years, and 'at firſt drawn up in a rude manner, only to pleaſe 'himſelf, and divert the vacant hours of a ſolitary 'country life. But was publiſhed purely in hopes of 'its

The fourth edition, with large emendations, was publiſhed in 1734, 12*mo*. In the years 1711 and 1712, he preached ſixteen Sermons at Mr. Boyle's Lecture [I], which, having put into a new form, he publiſhed in 1713, under this title, 'Phyſico-Theology: 'or, a Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God, from his Works of Crea-'tion. Being the Subſtance of Sixteen Sermons preached in St. Mary le Bow 'Church, London, at the Honourable Mr. Boyle's Lectures, in the year 1711 and 1712. 'With large Notes, and many curious Obſervations, 8vo [K].' In purſuance of the ſame noble and pious deſign, he publiſhed, in 1714, 'Aſtro-Theology: or, a Demon-'ſtration of the Being and Attributes of God, from a Survey of the Heavens. Illuſtrated 'with Copper-plates,' 8*vo* [L]. Upon the acceſſion of the late King George I, due notice being taken of our learned author's worth and ingenuity, his late Majeſty, then Prince of Wales, made him his Chaplain, and procured for him a Canonry of Windſor, into which he was inſtalled Sept. 19, 1716. The Univerſity of Oxford, likewiſe, in conſideration of his merit, learning, and ingenuity, conferred on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity, by diploma, the 26th of June 1730 [M]. But to return to our author's

'its doing ſome good in the world, among ſuch whoſe 'genius and leiſure lead them to mechanical ſtudies, 'or thoſe whoſe buſineſs and livelihood it is.'—Afterwards he adds—'Upon the account of the innocence 'of my end in publiſhing this book, and that it was 'written only as the harmleſs (I may add alſo the vir-'tuous) ſport of leiſure hours; I think myſelf excuſ-'able to God and the world, for the expence of ſo much 'time, on a ſubject different from my profeſſion.'

[I] In the years 1711 and 1712, he preached ſixteen Sermons at Boyle's lecture.] How he came to be appointed to preach that lecture, he tells us in the following words.—(4) 'Having the honour to be a mem-'ber of the Royal Society, as well as a Divine, I was 'minded to try what I could do towards the improve-'ment of Philoſophical matters to Theological uſes; 'and accordingly laid a ſcheme of what I have here 'publiſhed a part of; and when I had little elſe to do, 'I drew up what I had to ſay, making it rather the 'diverting exerciſes of my leiſure hours, than more 'ſerious Theological ſtudies. This work (although 'I made a conſiderable progreſs in it at firſt, whilſt a 'novelty, yet) having no thoughts of publiſhing, I 'laid aſide, until your Grace, being informed of my 'deſign by ſome of my learned friends both of the 'Clergy and Laity, was pleaſed to call me to the un-'expected honour of preaching Mr. Boyle's lectures: 'an honour I was little aware of in my country pri-'vacy, and not much acquainted with perſons in high 'ſtations, and not at all particularly with your 'Grace.'———

Dr. Derham, as to his perſon, was pretty tall, and ſeemed to be of a ſtrong and healthful conſtitution. His moral character was quite amiable; and among other inſtances of his bounty, he was a Phyſician to the Bodies as well as to the Souls of his Pariſhioners; none, or but few, of them, having occaſion to apply to any one elſe but him for relief in the time of illneſs. Such was his ſkill in Phyſick, as well as in all other branches of Knowledge!

 [It ſometimes happens that clergymen of the greateſt wiſdom, learning, and merit, are far from being good preachers. Dr. Derham is underſtood to have made but a very poor figure in this reſpect; and to his other defects in the pulpit, was added ſome diſadvantage with regard to his perſon, for he was wry-necked (8).

(8) From the communications of a valuable correſpondent.

Lord Kaims accuſes Dr. Derham of not having paid ſufficient attention to one ſubject which properly came before him in his "Phyſico-Theology." What his Lordſhip refers to is, the natural hiſtory of animals with relation to pairing, and the care of their progeny. "M. Buffon," ſays he, "in many large volumes, "beſtows ſcarcely a thought on that favourite ſub-"ject; and the neglect of our countrymen Ray and "Derham is ſtill leſs excuſable, conſidering that to "diſplay the conduct of Providence was the ſole pur-"poſe of their writing Natural Hiſtory." This defect Lord Kaims has endeavoured to ſupply, by ſome ingenious obſervations of his own: which, however, he conſiders as hints merely, tending to excite farther curioſity (9).

A remark occurs to us, with reſpect to the different manner in which the works of nature were ſtudied by Philoſophers in the laſt and beginning of the preſent century from thoſe of our own time. The former treated much on final cauſes, and were very ſolicitous to diſplay the Wiſdom and Goodneſs of God in the creation and adminiſtration of the world. But modern philoſophers, in general (we ſay in general, for we know that there are illuſtrious exceptions), do not ſeem to be animated with the ſame ſpirit of piety. They moſt aſſiduouſly purſue their enquiries into the properties of the objects around them, and have made ſurprizing additions to the ſtock of philoſophical knowledge; but they do not appear ſufficiently concerned to trace the God of Nature in his works. Nay, ſome there are who diſapprove of any diſquiſitions into final cauſes. That ſubject ought, without doubt, to be examined with the utmoſt modeſty, circumſpection, and caution: but ſtill, we think, that, in a vaſt variety of reſpects, there are ſuch evident proofs that particular objects are eminently fitted to anſwer certain wiſe and benevolent purpoſes, that not to attend to them, not to point them out, is a want of that reverential regard which ſhould ever be paid to the Supreme Being. To animate devotion is one of the nobleſt ends of the Study of Nature. This perhaps may, in contempt, be called preaching; but to ſtand up for the honour of the Great Governor of the Univerſe, is not only to be religiouſly, but philoſophically, employed.] K.

DES-

 [DESAGULIERS (JOHN-THEOPHILUS), an eminent Experimental Philoſopher, was born at Rochelle, in France, on the 12th of March, 1683 (a). He was brought to England, when he was an infant of about two years of age, by his father, the Rev. Mr. John Deſaguliers, who, being a French Proteſtant, was obliged to quit his native country, in conſequence of the perſecution which followed upon the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which took place in 1685. He was inſtructed in grammar learning by his father, and read the claſſics under him; after which he was ſent to Chriſt-Church College, Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and entered into Deacon's Orders in 1710 (b). The ſame year he read lectures in experimental philoſophy at Hart-hall, whither he had removed from Chriſt-Church, in the room of Mr. Keill [A], afterwards Dr. Keill, who at this time accompanied the Palatines to New England, in conſequence of his being appointed their treaſurer. In 1712, he married Miſs Joanna Pudſey, daughter of William Pudſey, Eſq. and, on the third of May, the ſame year, took the degree of Maſter of Arts. The following year he removed to the metropolis [B], and ſettled in Channel-row, Weſtminſter, where he continued his courſes of experimental philoſophy ſeveral years.

On

[A] He read lectures in experimental philoſophy at Hart-hall, &c. in the room of Mr. Keill.] Dr. Deſaguliers himſelf ſays, that 'Dr. John Keill was the firſt 'who publickly taught natural philoſophy by experi'ment in a mathematical manner; for he laid down 'very ſimple propoſitions, which he proved by expe'riments, and from thoſe he deduced others more 'compound, which he ſtill confirmed by experiments; 'till he had inſtructed his auditors in the laws of mo'tion, the principles of hydroſtatics and optics, and 'ſome of the chief propoſitions of Sir Iſaac Newton 'concerning light and colours. He began theſe 'courſes in Oxford, about the year 1704 or 1705, and 'that way introduced the love of the Newtonian phi'loſophy. There were, indeed, about the ſame time, 'experiments ſhewn at London by the late Mr. Hauk'ſbee, which were electrical, hydroſtatical, and pneu'matical. But as they were only ſhewn and explained 'as ſo many curious phænomena, and not made uſe of 'as mediums to prove a ſeries of philoſophical propo'ſitions in a mathematical order, they laid no ſuch 'foundation for true philoſophy as Dr. Keill's expe'riments; though, perhaps, performed more dex'terouſly, and with a finer apparatus. They were 'courſes of experiments; and his a courſe of experi'mental philoſophy. When Dr. Keill left the uni'verſity, I began to teach experimental philoſophy, 'after the ſame method he had done, adding the 'mechanicks (ſtrictly ſo called, that is, the explana'tion of mechanical organs, and the reaſon of their 'effects) and ſeveral optical propoſitions in my courſes 'of experimental philoſophy; which ever ſince that 'time I have endeavoured to improve, by the addition 'of new propoſitions and experiments, and by alter'ing and changing my machines, as I found things 'might be made more intelligible to ſuch of my audi'tors as were not acquainted with mathematics, or 'more ſatisfactory to ſuch as were; eſpecially in what 'regards the cauſes of the motions of the heavenly bo'dies, and the phænomena of our ſyſtem (1).'

(1) Pref. to his Courſe of Experimental Philoſophy.

[B] He removed to the metropolis] Of this, and of his ſucceſs as a lecturer in experimental philoſophy, he gives himſelf the following account: 'About the 'year 1713, I came to ſettle at London, where I have 'with great pleaſure ſeen the Newtonian Philoſophy 'ſo generally received among perſons of all ranks and 'profeſſions, and even the ladies, by the help of ex'periments; that though ſeveral ingenious men have 'ſince that time with great ſucceſs taught (and do 'ſtill teach) experimental philoſophy in my (or ra'ther Dr. Keill's) manner, I have had as many courſes 'as I could poſſibly attend; the preſent courſe, which 'I am now engaged in, being the 121ſt ſince I began 'at Hart-Hall, in Oxford, in the year 1710. The ſa'tisfaction we enjoy by being any way inſtrumental to 'the improvement of others, is ſo great, that I can't 'help boaſting—that of eleven or twelve perſons, who 'perform experimental courſes at this time in Eng'land, and other parts of the world, I have had the 'honour of having eight of them for my ſcholars; 'whoſe farther diſcoveries become an advantage to 'myſelf; for what would raiſe envy in any other pro'feſſion, but that of a philoſopher, is received as a 'new acquiſition by all lovers of natural knowledge, 'the profit being ſhared in common, while the diſ'coverer has only the honour of the invention (2).' (2) Ibid.

Among thoſe perſons of note and rank who attended his lectures was Baron Bielfeld, who has given the following account of Dr. Deſaguliers's lectures, in a letter to Monſ. Jordan, at Berlin, dated from London, March 6, 1741.

'I withdraw myſelf twice a week from my labours, 'in order to attend the celebrated Dr. Deſaguliers, 'chaplain to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, 'in a courſe of experimental philoſophy; and I have 'engaged almoſt all the foreign miniſters here to be 'of the party. The Doctor's apartment has more the 'appearance of a hall of congreſs, than of the auditory 'of a profeſſor; and as we pay him generouſly, he, 'in return, ſpares no pains to entertain us, and to diſ'cover to us all the hidden ſprings of nature. Phy'ſics, properly ſo called, mechanics, hydraulics, hy'droſtatics, optics, aſtronomy, are all included in his 'courſe. You have, I believe, in your valuable li'brary, that work of the Doctor's which is called, A 'Courſe of Experimental Philoſophy, and which was 'publiſhed at London in quarto. This work forms 'the baſis of his lectures; but as he makes his demon'ſtrations by the aſſiſtance of a great number of ma'chines, he ſeems to unfold all nature before our eyes, 'and to follow her in all her operations. I confeſs to 'you, that I find an inexpreſſible pleaſure in attend'ing his lectures, and that I never leave them with'out the higheſt ſatisfaction. Among the great num'ber of his machines, there is none that excites my 'admiration ſo much as his famous Planetarium. I 'had before ſeen, in the library at Leyden, in that of 'Berlin, and elſewhere, ſeveral ſpheres made to ex'hibit to the eye the motions of the heavenly bodies; 'I have likewiſe examined that which they call the 'Orrery, from Lord Orrery, its inventor; but all theſe 'machines, though ingenious, have one conſiderable 'defect; which is, that they give a very erroneous 'idea of the ſeveral diſtances between the heavenly 'bodies, and deſcribe but very imperfectly their mo'tions. For by placing the ſun in the center, and 'giving it the ſize of an orange, it is neceſſary, in or'der to preſerve a due proportion between it and the 'planets, and to determine the juſt diſtances, that 'ſuch a ſphere ſhould be at leaſt an Engliſh mile in 'diameter. Dr. Deſaguliers, perceiving this incon'venience, ruminated for a long time in order to find 'out ſome method of perfecting this machine, and at 'laſt contrived his Planetarium. He was very efficа'ciouſly aſſiſted in this buſineſs by Mr. Graham, the 'moſt able and the moſt celebrated watch-maker that 'ever exiſted. The movements of this Planetarium 'are highly complex, but very ingenious. Our Doc'tor adopts, as you will ſuppoſe, the ſyſtem of New'ton and of Copernicus; and, conſequently, when 'the whole machine is complete, you ſee the ſun im'moveable in the center, and the earth and moon, 'and the planets, with their ſatellites, which turn 'round the ſun on their axes. He then begins by 'turning a winch, and immediately the whole heaven 'is in its natural motion, each body deſcribing its 'proper

On the 29th of July, 1714, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, of which he became a very uſeful member, and was much reſpected by the Preſident, Sir Iſaac Newton (c). His firſt paper, which appeared in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, was publiſhed in the 348th Number, and contained an account of ſome experiments of Sir Iſaac Newton on Light and Colours, which had been repeated by Mr. Deſaguliers, in order to confirm Sir Iſaac's theory (d) [C]. Of ſome Experiments which he made with Mr. Villette's burning-glaſs, in conjunction with Dr. J. Harris, an account was alſo publiſhed in the Tranſactions (f).

In 1716, he publiſhed a piece, intituled, "Fires improved; being a new Method of "building Chimnies, ſo as to prevent their ſmoaking." This was a tranſlation from the French, and involved him in ſome diſpute with Edmund Curll, whom he had employed as his publiſher, and admitted to have a ſhare in the book. Curll, in order to promote the ſale, had puffed it off in a very groſs manner; which induced Mr. Deſaguliers to publiſh a letter in a periodical Paper, called, "The Town-Talk," ſet on foot at that time by Sir Richard Steele, in which he informed the publick, that, whenever his name hereafter "was, or ſhould be printed, with that egregious flatterer Mr. Curll's, "either in an advertiſement, or at the title-page of a book, except that of Fires Im-"proved, he entirely diſowned it *."

The merit of our experimental philoſopher had now attracted the notice of the Duke of Chandos, who had before taken Dr. Keill under his patronage, and who became alſo a patron to Mr. Deſaguliers, making him his chaplain, and preſenting him to the living of Edgeware, near his own magnificent ſeat at Cannons (g). In the year 1717, he went through a courſe of his lectures on experimental philoſophy, before King George I. at Hampton-Court; with which his Majeſty was ſo well pleaſed, that he intended to have conferred upon him the valuable living of Much-Munden, in Hertfordſhire; but that benefice was obtained for another perſon by the Earl of Sunderland, who prevailed with a friend to preſent him with a living in Norfolk, the revenue of which, however, amounted only to 70 l. per annum (h). On the 16th of March, 1718, he accumulated the degrees of Batchelor and Doctor of Laws at Oxford (i). On the 30th of June, 1720, he made an experiment before the Royal Society, to prove that bodies of the ſame bulk do not contain equal quantities of matter; and, therefore, that there is an interſperſed vacuum (k). He likewiſe made ſome experiments, before the Society, on the 30th of March, 1721, relating to the reſiſtance of fluids, an account of which was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 367(l).

In 1728, he ſhewed before the Royal Society a machine for meaſuring any depth in the ſea, with great expedition and certainty, which was invented by the Rev. Mr. Stephen Hales, afterwards Dr. Hales, and himſelf; and of which an account was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 405 (m). He continued, from time to time, to

'proper orbit, whether circular or elliptic. The firſt 'lecture is given by day, that the auditors may clearly 'obſerve all the different bodies, and their movements, 'according to the explication that Dr. Deſaguliers 'then gives. In the next lectures, he places in the 'centre a ſmall chryſtal globe, which contains a lamp, 'and repreſents the ſun. He then ſhuts the windows, 'and putting his Planetarium again in motion, he 'ſhews in this lecture what parts of the earth, the 'moon, and the planets, are illuminated by the ſun, 'at every inſtant. You will obſerve, that in theſe two 'lectures, the exact diſtances muſt be abſtractedly 'conſidered: for it is not poſſible to repreſent them 'diſtinctly in a machine of four feet diameter. But, 'in the ſucceeding lectures, the Doctor analyzes his 'machine, and preſents to his auditors the ſun ſtill in 'the centre, but with only one planet and its ſatel-'lites; as the earth, which turns on its inclined axis 'round the ſun, accompanied by the moon only. By 'this method, the diſtances become much more diſ-'cernible; and in this manner he explains, with great 'perſpicuity, and with admirable facility, the whole 'ſolar ſyſtem. All theſe matters are exhibited with 'ſo much perſpicuity, that I would engage to teach 'aſtronomy, by the help of this Planetarium, to any 'lady who has the leaſt curioſity and attention, in a 'month's time. But ſuch a machine is not to be had 'by every one: for that of Dr. Deſaguliers has coſt 'him more than one thouſand pounds ſterling †."

[C] Experiments of Sir Iſaac Newton on light and colours, which had been repeated by Mr. Deſaguliers, in order to confirm Sir Iſaac's theory]. Dr. Prieſtley ſays, that 'of foreigners, the firſt who made any public 'objection to Newton's philoſophy, concerning light 'and colours, was Father Pardies; but he was ſoon 'convinced of his miſtake, and was ſo ingenuous as 'to acknowledge it. But no perſon diſtinguiſhed him-'ſelf ſo much by his oppoſition to Newton as the in-'genious M. Marriotte, who could not ſucceed in 'making the experiments. And as M. Leibnitz, who 'was the editor of the Acta Eruditorum at that time, 'in the volume for the year 1713. p. 447. requeſted 'that Newton himſelf would remove M. Marriotte's 'difficulty, for the benefit of others, he himſelf being 'at that time dead, Sir Iſaac deſired Dr. Deſaguliers 'to try the experiments in which M. Marriotte had 'failed; and he did it accordingly with perfect ſuc-'ceſs, before many members of the Royal Society, 'and alſo afterwards in the preſence of M. Monmort, 'and ſeveral gentlemen of the Royal Academy of 'Sciences. Some time after, Rizetti, an Italian, pre-'tending to refute Newton's theory, by experiments, 'our philoſopher was ably defended by M. Richter. 'This controverſy, however, was the occaſion of Dr. 'Deſaguliers repeating his experiments, with ſome 'new ones, leading to the ſame concluſions, in 1728; 'after which no perſon, who choſe to give his name 'to the publick, or whoſe name is worth recording, 'made any more oppoſition to it; ſo that, at preſent, 'no hypotheſis in philoſophy ſtands upon ſurer ground, 'or is more generally acquieſced in, than that of the 'different refrangibility of the rays of light (3).'

'I intended myſelf the honour to have waited upon 'the Preſident, to have ſpoken to him concerning 'what I told you at Slaughter's Coffee-houſe; but laſt 'Thurſday's work was too much for me in my con'dition, and cauſed a relapſe, which has confined me 'to my chamber ever ſince. I was juſt free from pain 'after a long fit of the gout, and ſtanding almoſt two 'hours upon my feet that day, whilſt they were ſtill 'weak, together with the effect of the cold, gave me a 'return of pain, as well as lameneſs, that very even'ing. I muſt, therefore, beg of you to be my advo'cate to Sir Hans, to deſire him (if there be nothing 'contrary to form in it), to be ſo good as to ſettle my 'laſt year's ſalary in the next council, which uſed to 'be done generally at the meeting of the Society after 'the vacation, though now the death of the treaſurer 'hindered it. [E] A Courſe of Experimental Philoſophy.] In the preface to this work he ſpeaks in the following manner of the Philoſophy of Des Cartes, and the Diſcoveries of Sir Iſaac Newton. 'When Monſ. Des Car'tes's Philoſophical Romance, by the elegance of its 'ſtyle, and the plauſible accounts of natural phæno'mena, had overthrown the Ariſtotelian phyſics, the 'world received but little advantage by the change; 'for, inſtead of a few pedants, who, moſt of them, 'being conſcious of their ignorance, concealed it with 'hard words and pompous terms; a new ſet of phi'loſophers ſtarted up, whoſe lazy diſpoſition eaſily 'fell in with a philoſophy that required no mathe'matics to underſtand it; and who, taking a few 'principles for granted, without examining their 'reality, or conſiſtence with each other, fancied they 'could ſolve all appearances mechanically by matter 'and motion; and, in their ſmattering way, pre'tended to demonſtrate ſuch things, as perhaps Car'teſius himſelf never believed; his philoſophy (if he 'had been in earneſt) being unable to ſtand the teſt 'of the geometry which he was maſter of.

'It is to Sir Iſaac Newton's application of geometry 'to philoſophy, that we owe the routing of this army 'of Goths and Vandals in the philoſophical world; 'which he hath enriched with more and greater diſ'coveries, than all the philoſophers that went before 'him; and has laid ſuch foundations for future ac'quiſitions, that, even after his death, his works ſtill 'promote natural knowledge. Before Sir Iſaac New'ton, we had but wild gueſſes at the cauſe of the mo'tion of the comets and planets round the ſun; but 'now he has clearly deduced them from the univerſal 'laws of attraction (the exiſtence of which he has 'proved beyond contradiction), and has ſhewn, that 'the ſeeming irregularities of the moon, which aſtro'nomers were unable to expreſs in numbers, are but 'the juſt conſequences of the actions of the ſun and 'earth upon it, according to their different poſitions. 'His principles clear up all difficulties of the various 'phænomena of the tides; and the true figure of the 'earth is now plainly ſhewn to be a flatted ſpheroid 'higher at the equator than the poles, notwithſtand'ing many aſſertions and conjectures to the contrary. 'Our incomparable philoſopher has diſcovered and de'monſtrated to us the true nature of light and colours, 'of which the moſt ſagacious and inquiſitive naturaliſts were entirely ignorant; for while they fought 'for the origin of colours in the mixture of light and 'ſhadow, Sir Iſaac Newton found that they were con'genial with the rays of the ſun, and contained in 'light itſelf; the ſurface of coloured bodies ſerving 'only to ſeparate from one another thoſe rays that 'make different colours; by abſorbing ſome, and re'flecting others to our eyes, ſo as to produce thoſe 'different ſenſations, on which the pleaſing variety of 'coloured objects depends. His optics, beſides the 'properties of light, contain a vaſt fund of philoſophy, 'which (though he has modeſtly delivered under the 'name of queries, as if they were only conjectures) 'daily experience and obſervations confirm; a notable 'inſtance of which may be ſeen in the Rev. Mr. 'Stephen Hales's excellent book of Vegetable Sta'ticks, which, by putting ſeveral of Sir Iſaac's queries 'out of all doubt, ſhew how well they were founded. 'I paſs over Sir Iſaac Newton's noble inventions in 'pure mathematics, juſtly admired at home and a'broad; becauſe, though they have been of great uſe 'in the diſcovery of the cauſes of natural phænomena, 'they are foreign to my preſent ſubject, which is 'phyſics; whoſe knowledge I am in this courſe en'deavouring to convey by experiments; not only 'where things have been diſcovered that way, but 'even where they have been deduced by a long train 'of mathematical conſequences; having contrived 'experiments, which ſtep by ſtep bring us to the ſame 'concluſion.'

In the year 1719, was publiſhed, in 4to, a work under the following title: "A Syſtem of Experimental "Philoſophy, proved by Mechanicks: wherein the "Principles and Laws of Phyſics, Mechanics, Hy"droſtatics, and Optics, are demonſtrated and ex"plained at large, by a great Number of curious Ex"periments: with a full Deſcription of the Air Pump, "and the ſeveral Experiments thereon: As alſo of the "different Species of Barometers, Thermometers, and "Hydrometers; as ſhewn at the Public Lectures in a "Courſe of Experimental Philoſophy. As performed "by J. T. Deſaguliers, M. A. F. R. S." But when Dr. Deſaguliers publiſhed his "Courſe of Experi"mental Philoſophy," he diſavowed this work: which appears to have been publiſhed by a perſon of the name of Paul Dawſon, who attended Dr. Deſaguliers's Lectures, and dedicated the work to Sir Richard Steele.

[F] An attempt to explain the phænomenon of the horizontal moon.] Dr. Prieſtley obſerves, that 'Dr. Deſa'guliers very well illuſtrated the doctrine of the hori'zontal moon, upon the ſuppoſition of our imagining 'the viſible heavens to be only a ſmall portion of a 'ſpherical ſurface, and conſequently ſuppoſing the moon 'to be farther from us in the horizon than near the 'zenith; and by ſeveral ingenious contrivances he de'monſtrated how liable we are to ſuch deceptions. 'In the preſence of ſeveral ſpectators, he placed two 'equal candles, at a conſiderable diſtance from one 'another; which, as the diſtance was diſtinctly per'ceived, continued to appear equal to them all; but 'taking off their attention for a little time, he re'moved the farther candle; and, in the ſame line in 'which it had appeared, ſubſtituted another, much 'leſs than it, but nearer; when the ſpectators, being 'informed that the candle was changed, but taking 'it for granted that the new one was put in the ſame 'place, always pronounced that it was as large as the 'other. He made the ſame experiment with equal 'ſucceſs when he made uſe of ivory balls inſtead of 'candles (5).' But Dr. Prieſtley alſo remarks, that the writer, to whom we are obliged for the moſt complete illuſtration of this curious ſubject, is Dr. Smith, in his Optics (6).

than when elevated many degrees above the horizon, ſupported by an experiment (n) He likewiſe publiſhed this year, in 8vo. the ſecond edition of "Dr. Gregory's Elements of Catoprics and Dioptrics," tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr. Brown; to which he added an Appendix, containing an account of reflecting teleſcopes, &c.

(n) Abridgment, Vol. VIII. Part I. p. 130.

The 16th of February, 1738, he made ſome electrical experiments before the Royal Society [G]; and, on the 15th of April, the ſame year, he performed ſome electrical experiments at the Prince of Wales's houſe at Cliefden (o); of which an account was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 454. In 1739, he communicated to the Royal Society ſome thoughts and conjectures concerning the cauſe of elaſticity, which were publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 454 (p).

[G] He made ſome electrical experiments before the Royal Society.] Dr. Prieſtley obſerves, in his very valuable Hiſtory of Electricity, that the reaſon which Dr. Deſaguliers gives 'why he had avoided entertaining the Royal Society upon this ſubject before, and 'why he had not purſued it ſo far as he might have 'done; conſidering, as he ſays, that he could excite 'as ſtrong an electricity in glaſs, by rubbing with his 'hand, as any body could, is worth mentioning for 'its curioſity, and for the light that it throws upon 'the temper and manner of Mr. Grey. He ſays, that 'he was unwilling to interfere with the late Mr. 'Stephen Grey, who had wholly turned his thoughts 'to electricity; but was of a temper to give it entirely 'over, if he imagined that any thing was done in oppoſition to him (7).

(7) Abridgment of the Phil. Tranſ. Vol. VIII. p. 419.

'Dr Deſaguliers begins with obſerving very ſenſibly (and the obſervation is ſtill true), that the phænomena of electricity are ſo odd, that, though we 'have a great many experiments upon that ſubject, 'we have not been able, from their compariſon, to 'ſettle ſuch a theory as will lead us to the cauſe of 'that property in bodies, or even to judge of all its 'effects, or find out what uſeful influence electricity 'has in nature; though certainly, from what we have 'ſeen of it, we may conjecture that it muſt be of great 'uſe, becauſe it is ſo extenſive (8).'

(8) Hiſt. and preſent State of Electricity, fourth edit. p. 64.

Dr. Prieſtley farther remarks, that 'to Dr. Deſaguliers we are indebted for ſome technical terms which 'have been extremely uſeful to all electricians to this 'day, and which will probably remain in uſe as long 'as the ſubject is ſtudied. He firſt applied the term 'conductor to that body to which the excited tube conveys its electricity; which term has ſince been extended to all bodies that are capable of receiving 'that virtue. And he calls thoſe bodies in which 'electricity may be excited, by heating or rubbing, 'electrics per ſe.

'In the writings of this author we find many 'axioms relating to electrical experiments; ſome of 'which are expreſſed in a more clear and diſtinct manner than they had been before; but the real improvements which he made, were very few and immaterial.

'On ſeveral occaſions, and particularly in a paper 'delivered to the Royal Society, in the month of 'January, 1741, he lays down, among others, the 'following general rules, which ſeem to be more accurate than any which had been delivered before 'upon the ſubject (9).

(9) Abridgm. of the Phil. Tranſ. Vol. VIII. p. 430.

"An electric per ſe will not receive electricity from "another electric per ſe, in which it has been excited, ſo as to run along its whole length: but will "only receive it a little way, being, as it were, ſaturated with it.

"An electric per ſe will not loſe all its electricity "at once; but only the electricity of thoſe parts near "which a non-electric has been brought. It, conſequently, loſes its electricity the ſooner, the more "of thoſe bodies are near it. Thus, in moiſt weather, the excited tube holds its virtue but a little "while, becauſe it acts upon the moiſt vapours which "float in the air. And if the excited tube be applied "to leaf gold laid upon a ſtand, it will act upon it "much longer, and more ſtrongly, than if the ſame "quantity of leaf-gold be laid upon a table, which "has more non-electric ſurface than the ſtand (10)."

(10) Ibid, P. 427.

'This, however, ſeems not to be the whole of the 'reaſon; for if the leaf-gold were laid upon a broad 'ſurface of glaſs, it would not be acted upon ſo powerfully, as if it were placed upon a narrow ſtand of 'any kind of matter.

"A non-electric, when it has received electricity, "loſes it all at once, upon the approach of another "non-electric." This, however, could only be the caſe when the approaching electric was not inſulated, 'but had a communication with the earth. It muſt 'alſo be brought into contact with the electrified 'body.

"Animal ſubſtances are non electrics by reaſon of "the fluids they contain (11)."

(11) Ibid. P. 429.

"Excited electricity exerts itſelf in a ſphere round "the electric per ſe, or rather in a cylinder, if the "body be cylindrical (12)."

(12) Ibid. P. 431.

'Few of the many experiments which were made 'by Dr. Deſaguliers (accounts of which were publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions) had, as I 'obſerved before, any thing new in them. Thoſe 'which were the moſt ſo are the following.

'Endeavouring to communicate electricity to a 'burning tallow candle, he obſerved, that the candle 'attracted the thread of trial, but not within two or 'three inches of the flame; but that, as ſoon as the 'candle was blown out, the thread was attracted by 'every part of it, and even by the wick, when the 'fire was quite extinguiſhed. He electrified a wax 'candle in the ſame manner, and the experiment 'ſucceeded as well, only the electricity came not ſo 'near the flame in the wax, as in the tallow candle.

'He ſays, that only warming a glaſs receiver, 'without any rubbing, would cauſe the threads of a 'down feather, tied to an upright ſkewer to extend 'themſelves, as ſoon as it was put over the feather; 'and that ſometimes roſin and wax would exert their 'electricity by being only expoſed to the open air.

'He obſerved, that if a hollow glaſs tube, ſupporting the line of communication, were moiſtened by 'blowing through it, it would intercept the electricity.

'He ſays, that when an excited tube has repelled a 'feather, it will attract it again, after being ſuddenly 'dipped into water, but in fair weather it will not 'attract it unleſs it hath been dipped pretty deep into 'the water, a foot of its length at leaſt: whereas, in 'moiſt weather, an inch or two will ſuffice (13).'

(13) Ibid. P. 429.

'He ſhewed the attraction of water by an excited 'tube, in a better manner than it had been ſhewn 'before, viz. by bringing the tube to a ſtream iſſuing 'from a condenſing fountain: which, thereupon, was 'evidently bent towards it.

'Dr. Deſaguliers ſeems to have been the firſt who 'expreſſly ſaid, that pure air might be ranked among 'electrics per ſe, and that cold air in froſty weather, 'when vapours riſe leaſt of all, is preferable, for 'electrical purpoſes, to warm air in ſummer, when 'the heat raiſes the vapours (14). He alſo ſuppoſed 'that the electricity of the air was of the vitreous 'kind; and he accounted for the electricity appearing 'on the inſide only of an exhauſted glaſs veſſel, by 'its going where it met with the leaſt reſiſtance from 'ſo electrical a body as the air (15).

(14) Ibid. P. 437.

(15) Ibid. P. 438.

'He endeavoured to account for the fixing of air 'by the ſteams of ſulphur, according to the experiment of Dr. Hales; by ſuppoſing that the particles 'of ſulphur, and thoſe of air, being poſſeſſed of dif'ferent

which have not been already mentioned, ſome account will be found in the notes [H]. He had the honour of reading his lectures before King George II. as well as the reſt of the royal family; and he exchanged the living which he had in Norfolk for one in Eſſex, which he obtained on the preſentation of his Majeſty. He was likewiſe made Chaplain to Frederick Prince of Wales (q).

(q) Supplement, ut ſupra.

When Channel Row, in which he had lived for ſome years, was ordered to be taken down, to make way for the new bridge at Weſtminſter, Dr. Deſaguliers removed to lodgings over the Great Piazza in Covent-Garden, where he carried on his lectures till his death. He is ſaid to have been repeatedly conſulted by Parliament, upon the deſign of building that bridge; in the execution of which Mr. Charles Labelye, who had been many years his aſſiſtant, was appointed a ſupervisor. He likewiſe erected a ventilator, at the deſire of Parliament, in a room over the Houſe of Commons (r).

(r) Ibid.

In 1742, he publiſhed a "Diſſertation on Electricity," by which he gained the prize of the academy at Bourdeaux. 'This prize,' Dr. Prieſtley obſerves, 'was a medal of 'the value of 300 livres, propoſed, at the requeſt of Monſieur Harpez de la Force, for 'the beſt eſſay on electricity; and ſhews how much this ſubject engaged the attention 'of philoſophers at that time. The diſſertation is well drawn up, and comprizes all that 'was known of the ſubject till that period (s).'

(s) Hiſt of Electricity, p. 69.

Dr. Deſaguliers, who is ſtiled by the celebrated writer whom we have juſt quoted, "an indefatigable Experimental Philoſopher," died in the year 1749. He was the firſt who introduced the reading of lectures in experimental philoſophy at the metropolis; and was a member of ſeveral foreign academies, and correſponding member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris. His perſonal figure was not very promiſing; for he was thick and ſhort, not well ſhaped, his features irregular, and extremely near-ſighted (t). In the former part of his life he lived very abſtemiouſly; but latterly was cenſured for an indulgence in eating to exceſs, both in the quantity and quality of his diet. He tranſlated into Engliſh, from the Latin, Graveſande's "Mathematical Elements of Natural Philoſophy." This work was publiſhed by his ſon J. T. Deſaguliers, in two volumes, 4to. He left two other ſons: Alexander, who was bred to the church, and had a living in Norfolk, where he died in 1751 (u); and another, named Thomas, who became Colonel of the Royal Regiment of Artillery, and Equerry to his preſent Majeſty, and roſe to the rank of major-general.] T.

'ferent kinds of electricity, attracted one another, 'whereby their repulſive power was deſtroyed. He 'alſo propoſed the following conjecture concerning 'the riſe of vapour. The air at the ſurface of water 'being electrical, particles of water, he thought, 'jumped to it, then, becoming themſelves electrical, 'they repelled both the air and one another, and con-'ſequently aſcended into the higher regions of the 'atmoſphere (16).'

 [In Dr. Desaguliers's character as a Divine, we find only one publication by him, and that was no more than a single sermon, in octavo, which was preached before the King, in 1717, from Luke xiii. 5. "I tell you nay; but except you repent, you shall "all likewise perish." It was a thanksgiving-sermon; but on what particular occasion it was delivered we are not informed (x).

If credit is to be given to Mr. Cawthorn, Dr. Desaguliers was in very necessitous circumstances at the time of his decease. In the poem intituled, "The Vanity of Human Enjoyments," Mr. Cawthorn has the following lines:

"Can Britain, in her fits of madness, pour
"One half her Indies on a Roman whore,
"And still permit the weeping Muse to tell
"How poor, neglected Desaguliers fell!
"How he, who taught two gracious Kings to view

DEVEREUX (WALTER) the first Earl of Essex of this name and family, a General equally distinguished for his courage and conduct, and a Nobleman not more illustrious by his titles than by his birth. He was descended from a most ancient and noble family, being the son of Sir Richard Devereux, Knight, by Dorothy, daughter of George Earl of Huntingdon (a), and grandson of Walter Viscount of Hereford, so created by King Edward the VIth, with a very peculiar circumstance of honour (b) [A]. He was born about the year 1540, at his grandfather's castle in Carmarthenshire (c), educated in his youth with all the care due to his high birth, and applied himself to his studies with great diligence and success (d). He succeeded to the titles of Viscount Hereford and Lord Ferrers of Chartley, in the nineteenth year of his age (e), and being early distinguished for his modesty, learning, and loyalty, stood in high favour with his Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth (f). In the year 1569, upon the breaking-out of that desperate rebellion in the north, under the potent Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, he shewed his duty by raising a considerable body of forces (g), which joining those belonging to the Lord Admiral and the Earl of Lincoln, he was declared Marshal of the Army; which did good service, in obliging the rebels to disperse, and the Earls to retire for shelter into Scotland (h). This behaviour so highly recommended him to the Queen, that, in 1572 (i), she honoured him with the Garter, and on the 4th of May, the same year, created him Earl of Essex (k), as being descended, by his great grandmother, from the noble family of Bourchier, long before honoured with the same title (l). In the preamble of his patent, his descent from that house is mentioned, as well as the service he had rendered the Queen by his assistance in the suppressing that formidable rebellion (m); and with great ceremony he was invested with his new dignity, being conducted into the Queen's presence by the Earls of Sussex and Huntingdon, the cap and circle of gold being carried by the Earl of Leicester, the Earl of Bedford bearing the sword of state, the Queen herself hanging the sword cross his shoulders, and imposing the cap and coronet with her own hand (n). In the month of January following, he was one of the Peers that sat in judgment upon the Duke of Norfolk (o). At this time he was so favourably looked upon by the Queen, that some, who were for confining her good graces to themselves and to their friends, began to wish him at a greater distance, and therefore greatly encouraged an inclination he shewed to adventure both his person and fortune for her Ma-

[A] With a very peculiar circumstance of honour.] This family of Devereux descended from William Devereux of Bodynham in the county of Hereford, of which he was Sheriff in the forty-fifth of Edw. III (1). His grandson, Sir Walter Devereux, married Anne, sole daughter and heiress of William Lord Ferrers of Chartley; and, in the thirty-fourth of Henry VI, was Sheriff of Gloucestershire (2). In the first year of Edward IV, he was advanced to the dignity of a Baron of this realm, by the title of Lord Ferrers, and had large grants from the Crown, out of the forfeitures of those who adhered to Henry VI (3). This Walter Lord Ferrers was slain at Bosworth field, fighting valiantly in the cause of Richard III (4). His son, John Lord Ferrers of Chartley, espoused Cecily, daughter to Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex (5), by whom he had Walter, his son and heir, who in the seventeenth of Henry VIII was constituted Justice of South Wales, being then Knight of the most noble Order (6) of the Garter. It was this noble person, who, on the second of February, in the fourth of Edward VI, was advanced to the dignity of Viscount Hereford (7), with this singular clause in his patent, 'that he and his heirs 'male should enjoy the rank and degree of Viscount 'Hereford in all Parliaments and Councils within the 'realm of England, and other the King's territories 'and kingdoms (8);' which, in the opinion of Sir Richard St. George, Garter King at Arms, gave the Viscounts of Hereford a right to sit in the Parliament of Ireland. This Walter Viscount Hereford married first, Mary, daughter of Thomas Marquis of Dorset (9), by whom he had Sir Richard Devereux, Knt. father to Walter Earl of Essex of whom we are speaking, and also Sir William Devereux, who died without issue male. By his second wife, Margaret, daughter of Robert Garnish of Kenton, in the county of Suffolk, Esq. he had one son, Sir Edward Devereux of Castle Bromwich in the county of Warwick, whose descendants were Viscounts of Hereford (10), till the title became extinct in Price, late Lord Viscount Hereford, who died July 22, 1748 (11).

jeſty's ſervice in Ireland (p) [B]. Accordingly, on the 16th of Auguſt, 1573, he embarked at Liverpool, accompanied by the Lord Darcy, the Lord Rich, and many other perſons of diſtinction, together with a multitude of volunteers, whom the hopes of preferment, and his Lordſhip's known reputation, inclined to follow his fortune (q). His reception in Ireland was not very promiſing from the beginning; for landing at Knockfergus, on the 16th of September, he found the chiefs of the rebels profeſſing a ſtrong inclination to ſubmit; but that was only to gain time, and to accompliſh their own purpoſes; for then they withdrew again, and broke out into open rebellion (r). The Lord Rich was called away by his own affairs, and, by degrees, moſt of thoſe who went abroad with the Earl dropped off, and came home again, upon a variety of pretences (s). In this ſituation Eſſex deſired the Queen to carry on the ſervice in her own name, and by her own command, though he ſhould be at one half of the expence (t). Afterwards he applied to the Earls of Suſſex and Leiceſter, and the Lord Burleigh, to induce the Queen to pay one hundred horſe and ſix hundred foot; which, however, did not take effect; but the Queen, perceiving how hardly this Nobleman was dealt with, and how, in contempt of her commands, the Lord Deputy had delayed ſending him his commiſſion, ſhe was inclined to recal him out of Ulſter, if Leiceſter and others, who found their account in his abſence, had not diſſuaded her (u). The Lord Deputy having at laſt, in 1574, ſent him his patent, perceiving him buſy in fortifying Clandeboy, which was indeed the great end of his coming thither, diſpatched poſitive orders to him to purſue the Earl of Deſmond one way, while himſelf preſſed him another (w). The Earl of Eſſex obeyed, though with reluctance, and had the good luck to force, or to perſuade, the Earl of Deſmond to ſubmiſſion (x). He gained great honour by this, and, it is highly probable, would have performed much higher things, if the ſame fallacious arts had not with-held his hands in the winter, which had blaſted his beſt endeavours in the ſummer [C]. The ſame misfortune attended his ſubſequent attempts; and, excepting the zeal of his attendants, the affection of the Engliſh ſoldiers, and the eſteem of the native Iriſh, he gained

[B] For her Majeſty's ſervice in Ireland.] It is of great conſequence to the perſonal hiſtory of this Nobleman, which very well deſerves to be known, and which nevertheleſs has been but very obſcurely repreſented, that the original cauſe of his going to Ireland ſhould be thoroughly underſtood. The troubles of Ireland were at this juncture very great; for in Ulſter, Brian Mac Phelim, who had ſeized a great part of the country of Clandeboy, burnt the town of Knockfergus, that is, Fergus's rock, and others in thoſe parts began to raiſe tumults (12). Againſt theſe, Walter Earl of Eſſex craved leave to undertake an expedition, following therein the counſel of thoſe, who deſired above all things to have him farther off, and to plunge him into dangers, under pretence of procuring him honour, which he knew well enough; but being a ſtirring man, and one addicted to a martial life from his youth he held his reſolution, and made an agreement with the Queen, that, upon certain conditions, the one half of Clandeboy, if he drove out the rebels, ſhould be granted to him and his ſoldiers (13). For the defence whereof he ſhould maintain, at his own charge, two hundred horſemen, and four hundred foot; and, to furniſh himſelf for the war, he borrowed of the Queen ten thouſand pounds of Engliſh money, mortgaging his lands in Eſſex for the ſame (14). Sir William Fitz-Williams, Lord Deputy of Ireland, fearing leſt the name of ſo great an Earl ſhould eclipſe his glory in Ireland, adviſed the Queen that he might not be ſent, feigning, ſays Camden, I know not what general revolt of all Ulſter (15). But Eſſex for all that was ſent; and that the Lord Deputy's honour and authority might ſtand uneclipſed, he was commanded to receive his patent from him, whereby to be made Governor of Ulſter, which he was long in procuring, and that not without very important ſolicitation. Dr. Fuller treats this ſubject, as indeed he does all ſubjects, very facetiouſly: he ſays, the Earl of Eſſex mortgaged his fine eſtate, and afterwards ſold it outright for money to buy a bear's-ſkin, but that when he came to take and ſlay the bear, he found greater difficulties than he expected; and at the ſame time intimates, that as this was the firſt, ſo it was the laſt bargain of the kind made with that Queen (16), in which he is certainly miſtaken; for bargains of that kind were common enough, tho', as he very juſtly obſerves, they very ſeldom turned to the benefit of thoſe who made them. All this ought not, however, to bring any imputation upon the underſtanding of this noble perſon, who moſt certainly acted like a very wiſe, as well as a very honeſt and brave man. He had in view the ſervice of the Queen, the nation, and himſelf; and if he had been as fairly dealt with as his fidelity deſerved, all his views would have been fully accompliſhed; that is to ſay, the rebels would have been reduced, the country planted, and his family would have derived from his labours a very large eſtate.

[C] Which had blaſted his beſt endeavours.] As ſoon as the Earl had engaged Deſmond to lay down his arms, he undertook a long march againſt Turlough Lenigh, O'Donnel (17) joining with him; but from Con O'Donnel, Turlough's ſon-in-law, who would not ſerve under him, he took the caſtle of Liffer, and gave it to Hugh O'Donnel: Turlough, in the mean while, ſpinning out the time with parties, till Eſſex was of neceſſity to return, who, as he had tired out his body with labours and cares all the ſummer, ſo, winter approaching, he conſidered ſeriouſly by what means Ulſter, which had been ſo long neglected that it was grown wild and ſavage, might be reduced to civility. And, upon mature deliberation, he ſhewed, that if three towns were built at the Queen's charge, and ten forts by the common purſe of the ſoldiers, in ſuch convenient places as he had deſigned, above ſeven thouſand pounds of Engliſh money might be gathered yearly from thoſe people, and after two years the Queen ſhould not need to maintain any more garriſons there. Whilſt he was wholly taken up about theſe projects, and other commendable endeavours, he narrowly eſcaped being ſlain by the rebel Iriſh. For Brian Mac Phelim, who had treacherouſly ſlain one Moore, an Engliſh Captain, had conſpired with Turlough and the Scots to cut him off. Which as ſoon as he underſtood, he thought it beſt not to expect their coming but to attack them. And attack them he did ſo reſolutely, that, with the ſlaughter of two hundred Iriſh, he took Brian, and Rory Oge his half brother, and Brian's wife. Thus, ſays Camden, the year was brought to a cloſe to no man's advantage, but to the great misfortune and loſs of the Earl of Eſſex (18). It muſt, however, be obſerved, that this learned perſon is in a great miſtake as to the year, for he ſets it down expreſſly 1573, whereas it was 1574, and indeed his own relation ſhews it muſt have been ſo; for in the year 1574 he ſets down nothing of the affairs of Ireland, becauſe he had in reality ſet them down before.

nothing by all his pains. Worn out at length with these fruitless fatigues, he, the next year, desired leave to conclude, upon honourable terms, an accommodation with Turlough Oneile, which was refused him (y). He then surrendered the government of Ulster into the Lord Deputy's hands, as believing the forces allowed him altogether insufficient for its defence; but the Lord Deputy, of a sudden, obliged him to resume it, and to march against Turlough Oneile, which he accordingly did; and his enterprize being in a fair way of succeeding, he was surprized to receive instructions, which peremptorily required him to make peace (z). This likewise he concluded without loss of honour, and then turned his arms against the Scots from the Western islands, who had invaded and taken possession of his country. These he quickly drove out, and, by the help of Norris, followed them into one of their islands; and was preparing to dispossess them of other posts, when he was required to give up his command, and afterwards to serve at the head of a small body of three hundred men, with no other title than their captain (a). These were the artifices of Leicester, to ruffle and distract him; but the Earl, notwithstanding he was inwardly grieved, continued to perform his duty punctually, without any shew of resentment, out of respect to the Queen's service (b) [D]. In the spring of the succeeding [D] Out of respect to the Queen's service.] We find all these matters very clearly stated by Mr. Camden, who wrote from good memoirs, and, so far as we are able to judge, with great candour and impartiality. He has not, however, as indeed it was not his business, cleared up this matter entirely, and shewn us how this worthy Lord was so grossly abused. It is certain that Queen Elizabeth meant nothing like it, nor is it at all probable that her Ministers, in general, had any such design; but thus the matter appears to have been managed. The Queen intended to have gratified the Earl in most of his requests, but at the same time to have done this in such a manner, as not to lessen either the dignity or the power of the Lord Deputy Fitz-Williams. She therefore directed a letter, dated March 15, 1574-5, to both of them, in which she shews what she thought reasonable in behalf of the Earl, and refers the manner and other circumstances to the Lord Deputy (19), who knowing perhaps he should make himself friends at home by such a construction, boldly took upon him, under colour of this letter, to disapprove the whole enterprize, and after all the labours and losses of the Earl of Essex, to strip him of every thing. The chief reason of this seems to have been, that the Earl had intimated something, which, if well improved, might have saved the Queen great sums of money, and promoted the service of Ireland very much. What this was, will appear from the following passage in his Lordship's letter to the Queen (20). 'Your Majesty taketh hold of my 'words written to the Lords in October, to diminish 'your numbers to two thousand men of all sorts. 'It may please you therefore to consider of my words, 'which were these: And I see no reason, but if her 'Majesty kept two thousand soldiers (without which, 'obedience or profit will not be had of Irish or En'glish in Ireland) why thirteen hundred of them should 'not, for the most part, reside in Ulster. This was, 'and is still, my opinion, and I hope cannot be con'strued but by these soldiers were meant English bands, 'and not to be extended towards officers or Kearne, 'which are neither at commandment, nor can be em'ployed but in their charges. Besides, I never took 'upon me to set down my opinion for the government 'of the whole realm, wherewith I never had to do, 'nor with your favour will have to do, but only of 'my charge, and therefore I trust my words have not 'procured this diminishment of your Majesty's army. 'But now I will say directly, that which before I 'spake conjecturally, that two thousand English sol'diers, under bands, well maintained, will be enough 'to govern all the whole realm of Ireland, and to 'make all that be rebels, or that be of the Irish fac'tion, to quake, and either to be good subjects, or 'to seem good subjects.' How the Earl resented this usage, will best appear from his own short and significant letter to the Council, in which, with great spirit and freedom, and yet with the utmost modesty and decorum, he very accurately states his own case (21).

'My good Lords,

'I have of late seen a letter signed by the Queen's 'Majesty, and jointly endorsed to my Lord Deputy 'and me, concerning mine enterprise in the province of Ulster, which, although it carry a shew of 'a present proceeding therein, and of a consent to all 'my petitions, yet hath it brought forth none other 'effects but the present discharge of all that serve un'der me, and a final dissolving of my enterprize. 'Whereunto, what answer I have made to her Ma'jesty, may appear unto you by the copy of my letter 'herein inclosed; and although it become me to stand 'contented with any thing that her Majesty shall sig'nify to be her will, yet when I compare this conclu'sion to the course that hath been taken with me since 'my coming hither, I cannot but think the dealing 'very strange. First, I came with the good liking of 'all your Lordships, and with the allowance of the 'Council here, so as by the consents of both realms I 'took my journey, the matter being first thoroughly 'debated, and so digested, as though no scruple should 'at any time arise. I had not been here three months, 'but that it was given forth that the continuance of 'the enterprize was in question, and in that stay hath 'it remained ever since, till now, that in all appear'ance the proceeding therein is agreed upon, and all 'my petitions granted, and yet the same letter that so 'doth assure me of all this gracious favour, is a warrant 'to my Lord Deputy (as he taketh it) to overthrow the 'whole. My Lords, I humbly desire you to consider 'well of this matter: It is somewhat to me (although 'little to others) that my house should be overthrown, 'with suffering me to run myself out of breath with 'expences. It is more, that in the word of the Queen 'I have, as it were, undone, abused, and bewitched, 'with fair promises, Odonell Mac Mahon, and all 'others that pretend to be good subjects in Ulster. It 'is most, that the Queen's Majesty shall adventure 'this estate, or else subdue rebellion with intolerable 'charge. For will not all parts of this realm take 'hold of this dissolution? or, can any in Ulster, or 'in any part of the realm, hope of defence hereafter? 'But to return to my own estate: let my life here, my 'good Lords, be examined by the strictest Commissioners 'that may be sent; I trust in examining my faults 'they will alledge this for the chief, that I have unsea'sonably told a plain, probable, honourable, and ef'fectual way, how to do the country good. For of 'the rest they can say nothing of me, but witness my 'misery by plague, famine, sickness, continual toil, 'and continual wants of men, money, carriages, vic'tuals, and all things meet for great attempts: and if 'any of these have grown by my default, then con'demn me in the whole. I pray you, my Lords, 'pardon my earnestness, I think I have reason that am 'thus amazed with an oversudden warning, that must 'take a discharge before I am made acquainted with 'the matter; I think it had been a better course, that I 'might have had time to have made some profitable 'peace with Tyrlanghe, which hath been sought at 'my hands, and not at one instant to lose my travail, 'my money, my credit, and, with the same, hazard 'the honour of her Majesty, and of the realm of En'gland. I trust, my Lords, my plain dealing shall 'not do me hurt with you; for my own part, a soli'tary life is best for a disgraced person; but because 'there is none of you but hath professed favour to'wards me, and some of your Lordships are mixed 'with ing year he came over to England, where he was very far from ſtifling the juſt indignation he had conceived againſt the all-powerful favourite, for the inexcuſable uſage he had met with (c). But as it was the cuſtom of that great man to debaſe his enemies by exalting them, ſo he procured an order for the Earl of Eſſex's return into Ireland, with the ſounding title of EARL-MARSHALL (d) of that kingdom, and with promiſes, that he ſhould be left more at liberty than in times paſt; but, upon his arrival at Ireland, as the judicious Mr. Camden tells us (e), he found his ſituation ſo little altered for the better, that he pined away with grief and ſorrow, which, at length, proved fatal to him, and brought him to his end. There is nothing more certain, either from the public hiſtories, or private memoirs, and letters of that age, than that this noble Earl was one of the worthieſt, honeſteſt, and beſt of men (f); one who, in his public capacity, ſhewed himſelf a ſtout ſoldier, a loyal ſubject, and a moſt diſintereſted patriot, as, in his private life, he was of a chearful temper, kind, affectionate, and beneficent, to all who were about him; and, to ſay much in a little compaſs, one commended by all parties (g), and to whoſe prejudice there is not the ſlighteſt inſinuation to be met with in all the papers of thoſe times. He was taken ill of a flux on the 21ſt of Auguſt, and, in great pain and miſery, languiſhed to the 22d of September, 1576, when he departed this life at Dublin, being ſcarcely thirty-five years old (h). There was a very ſtrong report at the time, of his being poiſoned; and, if we may judge from what the learned Camden ſays upon the ſubject, it was no eaſy matter to decide whether that report was without grounds (i) [E]. It

'with me in blood and alliance, I crave of you all, 'that, as I have entered into this action with your 'good liking and advices, ſo now, the failing being 'no way to be laid upon me, you will all by means 'for me to her Majeſty to deal well with me for my 'charge, as in honour, conſcience, and juſtice, you 'ſhall think good.' What was the ſenſe of diſintereſted people in thoſe days upon theſe points, will moſt unexceptionably appear from the following paſſages, in a letter from Sir Nicholas White, Maſter of the Rolls in Ireland, to the Lord Burleigh (22): 'But what 'good thing can be hoped for here, when a Prince's 'determination, touching ſo great an enterprize, in 'the hands of ſo ſufficient and ſo honourable a ſubject 'to perform it, ſhall be ſo ſuddenly revoked! And if 'I might with all humility ſay it to her Highneſs, 'there are two things of great moment that ſeem 'ſtrange to us here, if they be true. The one is, the 'letting of the realm to farm, wherein ſo many hearts 'may be alienated from the landlord to the farmer. 'And the other is, the caſting up of the Earl's enter-'terprize between the fallow and the ſeed; which will 'make Ulſter deſperate, and all the reſt doubtful. 'And truly, if ſhe look not back where ſhe began, 'and review both the man and the matter, ſhe ſhall 'puff up the Iriſh into incorrigible pride, and pull 'down the hearts of all good Engliſh ſubjects to a per-'petual diffidence of any ſettled government in this 'realm.——There cannot go out of this land a 'man with greater fame of honour, nor can come in, 'whoſe bounty hath deſerved more. And if that no-'ble mind of his, deſirous of honour, and ſo careleſs of 'gain, were employed with the aſſociation of grave 'council, I believe God hath ordained him to do 'great things.'

(22) Strype's Annals, Vol. II. p. 388.

[E] Whether that report was without grounds.] There were few facts that happened in this reign which have made more noiſe in the world than the death of this Earl of Eſſex; and though Camden, as a wiſe man and a grave hiſtorian, treats the ſuſpicion of poiſon as a popular report, and takes occaſion to aſſign the reaſon of ſuch reports in a manner which does great honour to the Earl's memory; yet it is evident enough that he did not altogether diſbelieve it himſelf, or intend to make his readers diſbelieve it. But let us hear what he ſays (23). 'The death of this Nobleman 'carried with it a ſuſpicion of poiſon among the vul-'gar ſort, who always ſuſpect them to be poiſoned 'whom they eſteem and love, altho' Sidney, Lord 'Deputy of Ireland, after diligent inquiſition made, 'wrote to the Council in England, that the Earl, 'upon his firſt taking his bed, ſaid many times, 'that this was a thing uſual and ordinary with him; 'that whenſoever he was troubled and perplexed in 'mind he fell into the Bloody-flux, and that he ſuſ-'pected nothing at all of the poiſon, and that his 'body retained the ſame colour in his ſickneſs which 'it had in its perfect health: no ſpot, no infection, 'no ſhedding of the hair or nails, and being embowel-'led no ſign at all of poiſon appeared; that though 'the Phyſicians differed in their judgments, yet they 'applied nothing againſt the force of poiſon; and that 'his cupbearer was falſely accuſed of infuſing ſome-'thing in water, and mixing it with wine. Yet have 'we ſeen the ſame man openly pointed at for a poi-'ſoner.' In a famous book, publiſhed when all the parties were living, and in which, though commonly treated as a libel, there are abundance of ſtrange truths, we have the whole proceſs of this execrable affair ſet forth to public view, in the following terms (24). 'It was my chance to come to the underſtanding of 'divers particulars concerning that thing, both from 'one Lea, an Iriſhman, Robert Honnies, and others, 'that were preſent at Penteneis, the Merchant's houſe 'in Dublin, upon the key where the murder was com-'mitted. The matter was wrought, eſpecially by 'Crompton, Yeoman of the Bottles, by the procure-'ment of Lloyd: and there was poiſoned at the ſame 'time, and with the ſame cup, as given of courteſy by 'the Earl, one Mrs Alice Draycot, a goodly gentle-'woman, whom the Earl affectioned much; who de-'parting thence towards her own houſe, which was 'eighteen miles off, the aforeſaid Lea accompanying 'her, and waiting upon her, ſhe began to fall ſick 'very grievouſly upon the way, and continued with 'increaſe of pains, and exceſſive torments, by vomit-'ing until ſhe died, which was the Sunday before the 'Earl's death, enſuing the Friday after; and when ſhe 'was dead her body was ſwolne into a monſtrous 'bigneſs and deformity, whereof the good Earl hear-'ing the day following, lamented the caſe greatly, 'and ſaid, in the preſence of his ſervants, Ah, poor 'Alice, the cup was not prepared for thee, albeit it 'were thy hard deſtiny to taſte thereof. Young Hon-'nies alſo, whoſe father is maſter of the children of 'her Majeſty's chapel, being at that time page to the 'ſaid Earl, and accuſtomed to take the taſte of his 'drink (though ſince entertained alſo, among other, 'by my Lord of Leiceſter, for better covering of mat-'ters) by his taſte that he then took of the compound 'cup (though in very ſmall quantity, as you know the 'faſhion is) yet was he like to have loſt his life, but 'eſcaped in the end, being young, with the loſs only 'of his hair; which the Earl perceiving, and taking 'compaſſion of the youth, called for a cup of drink 'a little before his death, and drank to Honnies, 'ſaying, I drink to thee, my Robin, and be not afraid; 'for this is a better cup of drink than that whereof 'thou tookeſt the taſte when we were both poiſoned, 'and whereby thou haſt loſt thy hair, and I muſt 'loſe my life. This hath young Honnies reported 'openly in divers places, and before divers Gentlemen 'of worſhip, ſince his coming into England; and the 'aforeſaid Lea, the Iriſhman, at his paſſage this way 'towards France, after he had been at the fore-named 'Mrs. Draycot's death, with ſome other of the Earl's 'ſervants,

It muſt, however, be owned, that an inquiry was immediately made by authority, and Sir Henry Sidney, then Lord Deputy of Ireland, wrote very fully upon this ſubject to the Privy-Council in England (k), and to one of the members of that Council in particular (l), of which ſomething will be ſaid in the notes [F]. 'ſervants, have, and do moſt conſtantly report the 'ſame, where they may do it without the terror of 'my Lord of Leiceſter's revenge.' The ſame tale, with the ſame circumſtances, is very prettily told in verſe, by an anonymous writer, who took an ill natured care of preſerving the Earl of Leiceſter's memory (25). There want not, however, authorities from writers of unſuſpected credit. Sir Nicholas White (26), in his letter to the Lord Burleigh, immediately after the death of the Earl of Eſſex, tells him, That he was frequently with his Lordſhip in his laſt ſickneſs, who doubted that he was poiſoned, and at the ſame time acquitted that nation of having any hand therein, ſaying, with ſome paſſion, No, Turlough Oneile, himſelf, would have attempted no villainy againſt my perſon. There is a long, full, and moſt inſtructive hiſtory of his laſt ſickneſs yet extant (27); written, as, from ſome circumſtances, I conjecture, by the Earl's faithful dependant, Sir Edward Waterhouſe, the beginning of which the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee. 'Walter, the noble Earl of Eſſex 'and Eu, Earl Marſhall of Ireland, Knight of the moſt 'honourable Order of the Garter, falling ſick on a 'laſke, as it was ſuppoſed, called dyſenteria, thorough 'aduſtioun of choller, on Friday the 21ſt of Auguſt; 'or whether it were of any other accident, the living 'God knoweth, and will revenge it; he was grievouſly tormented by the ſpace of twenty-two days, 'having ſuch abundance of water as every day and 'night he had few leſs than twenty, thirty, or ſome 'times forty ſtools, through which, being ſore weakened in body, and natural ſtrength diminiſhed, he addreſſed himſelf to that, which his friends and ſervants feared, that is, to finiſh his life, to our great 'ſorrow, but to his everlaſting joy.'

[F] Of which ſomething will be ſaid in the notes.] This Lord Deputy of Ireland, Sir Henry Sydney, had ſhewn great civility and reſpect to the Earl of Eſſex, and gave as high teſtimonies to the merit of that Nobleman when deceaſed, as the warmeſt and beſt affected friend in the world could have done. He was not at Dublin, but in a country progreſs, at the time of this Nobleman's deceaſe, which is an unlucky circumſtance, as it left it out of his power to ſpeak, otherwiſe than by hearſay; which might be the cauſe of that viſible inconſiſtency in the following letter of his to Sir Francis Walſingham, to be laid before the Council, in which, he ſays, the Earl of Eſſex did not think himſelf poiſoned; that thoſe about him did not think ſo either, but pretended to think ſo to pleaſe the Earl; and yet that it was not the Earl's own thought, but was put into his head by others; ſo that if from the whole of his relation the council could receive any ſatisfaction, it muſt have been by relying entirely upon his ſentiment in that matter, as the reader will judge from the peruſal (28). 'Hearing, beſides, 'that letters had been ſent over, as well before his 'death as after, that he died of poiſon, I thought 'good to examine the matter as far as I could learn, 'and certify you, to the end you might impart the 'ſame to the Lords, and both ſatisfy them therein, 'and all others whom it might pleaſe you to participate the ſame unto, and would believe the truth. 'For in truth there was no appearance, or cauſe of ſuſpicion that could be gathered, that he died of poiſon. 'For the manner of his diſeaſe was this: a flux took 'him on the Thurſday at night, being the thirtieth of 'Auguſt laſt paſt, in his own houſe, where he had that 'day both ſupped and dined; the day following he 'rid to the Archbiſhop of Dublin's, and there ſupped 'and lodged: the next morning following he rid to 'the Viſcount of Baltinglas, and there did lie one 'night, and from thence returned back to this city. 'All theſe days he travelled haſtily, fed three times a 'day without finding any fault, either through inflammation of his body, or alteration of taſte, but often 'he would complain of gripes in his belly, and ſometimes ſay, that he had never hearty grief of mind 'but that a flux would accompany the ſame. After 'he returned from this journey, he grew from day to 'day ſicker and ſicker, and having an Iriſh Phyſician 'ſent to him by the Earl of Ormond, Dr. Trevor, an 'Oxford man; and my phyſician, Mr Chaloner, Secretary of this State, and not unlearned in Phyſick, 'and one that often for good will giveth counſel to 'his friends in caſes of ſickneſs; and one Mr. Knell, 'an honeſt Preacher in this city, and a Chaplain of his 'own, and a Profeſſor of Phyſick, continually with 'him, they never miniſtred any thing to him againſt 'poiſon. The Iriſh Phyſician affirmed, before good 'witneſs, that he was not poiſoned: what the other 'do ſay of that matter, by their own writings, which 'herewith I ſend you, you ſhall perceive. And drawing towards his end, being ſpecially aſked by the 'Archbiſhop of Dublin, whether he thought that he 'was poiſoned or no, conſtantly affirmed that he 'thought he was not, nor that he felt in himſelf any 'cauſe why he ſhould conjecture ſo to be. In his 'ſickneſs his colour rather bettered than impaired, 'no hair of his body ſhed, no nail altered, no tooth 'looſed, nor any part of his ſkin blemiſhed. And when 'he was opened, it could not appear that any entrail 'within his body, at any time had been infected with 'any poiſon. And yet I find a brute there was that 'ſaid he was poiſoned, and that aroſe by ſome words 'ſpoken of by himſelf, and yet not originally at firſt conceived of himſelf, as it is thought by the wiſeſt here, 'and thoſe that were continually about him: but one 'that was very near him at that time, and whom he 'entirely truſted, ſeeing him in extreme pain with flux 'and gripings in his belly, by reaſon of the ſame ſaid 'to him, By the Maſs, my Lord, you are poiſoned. 'Whereupon the Yeoman of his celler was preſently 'ſent for to him, and mildly and lovingly he queſtioned with him, ſaying, that he ſent not for him to 'burden him but to excuſe him. The fellow conſtantly anſwered, that if he had taken any hurt by 'his wine he was guilty of it, for, my Lord, ſaith he, 'ſince you give me warning in England to be careful 'of your drink, you have drank none but it paſſed my 'hands. Then it was reported, that the boiled water 'which he conſtantly drank with his wine, ſhould be 'made of water wherein flax or hemp ſhould be 'ſteeped, which the Yeoman of his celler flatly denied, 'affirming, the water which he always boiled for him 'was perfectly good. Then it was imputed to the ſugar, he anſwered, he could get no better at the 'Steward's hands, and fair though it were not, yet 'wholeſome enough, or elſe it had been likely that a 'great many ſhould have had a ſhrewd turn, for my 'houſhold and many more have occupied of the ſame 'almoſt this twelve months. The Phyſicians were 'aſked what they thought? that, they ſpake doubtfully, 'ſaying, it might be that he was poiſoned, alledging 'that this thing or that thing might poiſon him, ſince 'they never gave him medicine for it, they conſtantly affirm that they never thought it, but for argument's ſake, and partly to pleaſe the Earl. He 'had two gentlewomen that night at ſupper with him 'that the diſeaſe took him, and they coming after to 'viſit him, and he hearing that they were troubled 'with ſome looſeneſs, ſaid, that he feared that they 'and he had taſted of one drug, and his page (who 'was gone with his body over before I returned). 'The women, upon his words, were afraid, but never 'ſick, and be in as good a ſtate of health as they were 'before they ſupped with him.' It is to be obſerved, that in this letter there is a fair character given of a ſpiritual and corporal Phyſician, who attended the Earl of Eſſex, but the Lord Deputy found cauſe to change his ſentiments of him afterwards, as appears from the following letter written by Sir Henry Sidney to his brother-in-law the Earl of Leiceſter, upon this melancholy ſubject, dated from Dundalk, February 4, 1576 (29).

If not, what you will ' have more done ſhall be done. I am ſorry I hear ' not how you like of that I have done, and the more ' for that I am advertiſed of Fagnaney's arrival there. ' I would not have doubted to have made Knell to ' have retracted his inconſiderate and fooliſh ſpeech ' and writing, but God hath prevented me by taking ' him away, dying of the ſame diſeaſe that the Earl ' died, which moſt certainly was free from poiſon, ' and a mere flux; a diſeaſe appropriated to this ' country, and whereof there died many in the latter ' part of the laſt year, and ſome out of mine own ' houſhold, and yet free from any ſuſpicion of poiſon.' There is no queſtion to be made, that the Lord-Deputy's care in this reſpect was very acceptable to the Earl of Leiceſter, and perhaps might have gone a great way, if not in ſilencing the clamour, at leaſt in preventing the belief, which the Earl's ſtrange illneſs had created, of his dying by poiſon, if the Earl of Leiceſter himſelf had not kept the mouth of fame open, by his indiſcreet marriage of the Counteſs of Eſſex, which gave occaſion to ſuch as envied him and hated him to ſay, that if what was ſuſpected had not been true, there would have been no ſuch willingneſs found either in him or her, ſo haſtily, and in the midſt of ſuch rumours, to have concluded this indecent marriage (30), which by an odd accident was made doubly indecent: Sir Francis Knolles, the father of the Lady, being not able to perſuade himſelf that the match was really made ſo ſoon, and being reſolved to truſt no other eyes but his own, obliged them to be married again in his preſence (31), which made a freſh outcry in the nation, and kept thoſe ſtories alive and in remembrance, which, in this world at leaſt, had otherwiſe ſunk into oblivion.

[G] Of all the country round about.] The Earl's body was brought over to Wales as ſoon after his deceaſe as poſſible, by Mr. Waterhouſe, but was not interred till the 26th of November, when his obſequies were performed in the pariſh church of Carmarthen (32), and his funeral ſermon preached by Dr. Richard Davies Lord Biſhop of St. David's. That Reverend Prelate had been long and intimately acquainted with this noble perſon, and from his own knowledge gave him a very high character. He ſaid (33), that taking no pride in the nobility of his birth, he had made it the buſineſs of his life to render his titles illuſtrious by his actions; that, inheriting the courage of his anceſtors, he had given ſuch proofs of it upon all occaſions, that her Majeſty, if he had lived, might have uſed his ſervice to be a terror to all enemies foreign and domeſtick; that his prudence and diſcretion were admirable from his youth; that his eloquence was natural and eaſy; his affability, and gentleneſs of behaviour, altogether unaffected; that his piety was perfectly ſincere; ſo that religion loſt in him an excellent advocate, and a zealous protector. That, from his youth, he was conſtantly inclined to ſuch ſtudies as ſuited his condition, to Hiſtory in general, and to that of his own country in particular; and that if any thing more eſpecially claimed his attention, it was genealogies, deſcents, and pedigrees, in which he was ſo thoroughly verſed, as to be well acquainted with all the noble houſes in Europe: that for his fortitude he was revered in England and Ireland, and that there was no ſubject could affright or corrupt him from the execution of ſtrict juſtice: that to the haughty and arrogant he was as a lion, to the humble and meek as a lamb: that he had the utmoſt abhorrence for oppreſſion; and that he once remembered, when complaint was made to his Lordſhip of one of his men who had done a violent thing, he ſaid that his ſervant could do him no greater diſhonour, than, by pretence of his authority, to do any poor man wrong; and the Biſhop appealed to all who heard him for the truth of this part of his character, that he was a comfortable refuge to all in adverſity, and the conſtant ſupport of ſuch as were oppreſſed by power. He added farther, that as in the time of King Richard II. Sir Thomas Montacute was called the good Earl of Salisbury, and in the reign of Henry VI. Sir Thomas Beauchamp was ſtiled the good Earl of Warwick, ſo in this of Queen Elizabeth he deſerved, for the like qualities, to be called the good, the virtuous, and the valiant Earl of Eſſex. This ſermon, together with a long genealogical epitaph in Latin verſe, was printed, and dedicated to the young Earl by Edward, afterwards Sir Edward, Waterhouſe (34), and was held ſo remarkable in thoſe days, that Raphael Holinſhed having brought his book juſt then to a cloſe, inſerted it at the end of his Chronicle. After all, Queen Elizabeth herſelf did the greateſt honour to this noble Peer, when, in a letter under her hand, ſhe ſtiled him (35) the rare jewel of her realm, and the bright ornament of her nobility.

(35) In the Dedication by Mr. Waterhouſe to Robert Earl of Eſſex.

Before we part with this ſubject it may be proper to give the reader the two laſt paragraphs of that celebrated Dedication, becauſe they contain matter very curious in itſelf, and which, though frequently mentioned elſewhere, yet always ſuppoſed to be grounded upon this indiſputable authority.

' To the end, ſays Mr. Waterhouſe to the young ' Earl, that you may know what you are by birth and ' blood, and that you ſhould not by ignorance, or ' lack of knowledge of yourſelf, do any thing unworthy the noble houſes from whence you are deſcended: a well-wiſher of your's hath joined to this ' ſermon, amongſt other epitaphs containing your father's due praiſes, his ſtately deſcent in well-digeſted ' Latin verſes, not to puff you up with any ſwelling ' vanities, but to give you a reaſon how you bear your ' armour and badges of honour, and to remember ' you what error you enter into, if you ſhould blemiſh the virtues of your noble anceſtors, or to do ' any thing as I ſaid unworthy your birth and calling.

' Laſtly, my Lord, have always before your eyes ' the fear of God, and the counſel of the Earl your ' father at his death, namely, that you ſhould ever ' be mindful of the moment of time aſſigned both to ' your father and grandfather, the eldeſt having attained but to ſix and-thirty years, to the end, that ' upon conſideration of the ſhort courſe of life that ' you in nature are to look for, you might ſo employ ' your tender years in virtuous ſtudies and exerciſes, ' as you might in the prime of your youth become a ' man well accompliſhed to ſerve her Majeſty and ' your country, as well in war as peace, whereunto ' he commanded you to bend all your endeavours, ' and with theſe conditions heaped his bleſſings upon ' you. I pray therefore that God will increaſe thoſe ' conditional bleſſings, and the cauſes of them in you, ' to the end that her Majeſty may think of you hereafter, as of a true ſervant, and humble ſubject, one ' of the pillars of her eſtate, her Majeſty's kinſman ' by many alliances, and the ſon of a moſt noble ' father.'

In order to his clearly underſtanding the firſt part of the foregoing quotation, it is neceſſary for the reader to ſee the titles given to this noble Peer, at, and after his deceaſe. He was then ſtiled (36) ' The ' Right Honourable Walter Devereux, Earl of Eſſex ' and Eu, Earl Marſhal of Ireland, Viſcount Here- ' ford, and Bourcher, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, ' Bourcher, and Louvain, Knight of the moſt noble ' Order of the Garter.' It does not however appear, that this noble perſon in his life-time ever took the title of Earl of Eu, or of Viſcount Bourcher, which may more clearly appear by the manner in which Garter proclaimed his ſtile at the time of his creation, and this was in the following words (37): Du treſhault et puiſſant Seigneur Gautier d'Evereux Count d'Eſſex, Viſcount de Hereford, Baron Ferrers de Chartley, et Chevalier de treſnoble Order de la Jarretiere. However, as it is recited in the preamble of this noble Lord's Patent, that he was heir male of the noble family of the Bourchers, Earls of Eſſex; it was thence inferred, that he was the heir of all their honours: now

Lettice, daughter to Sir Frances Knolles, Knight of the Garter, who ſurvived him many years, and whoſe ſpeedy marriage after his death to the Earl of Leiceſter, upon whom common fame threw the charge of haſtening his death, did not at all contribute to diſcredit that report (n). By this lady he had two ſons, Robert and Walter. Of the former we ſhall ſpeak in the next article, and incidentally likewiſe of the latter; as alſo two daughters, Penelope, firſt married to Robert Lord Rich, and then to Charles Blount Earl of Devonſhire; and Dorothy, who becoming the widow of Sir Thomas Perrot, Knight, eſpouſed for her ſecond huſband Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland (o).

now William Bourcher was created by Henry V. Earl of Eu in Normandy (38), and his ſon Henry Bourcher was, in the twenty-fifth of Henry VI. created Viſcount Bourcher (39), and by that title ſummoned to Parliament (40); and in the firſt year of Edward IV. he was created Earl of Eſſex (41). Thus the writer ſees clearly how theſe titles came to be attributed to the family of Devereux. C.

 [It is not true, as is aſſerted at the cloſe of the note [A], that the title of Lord Viſcount Hereford became extinct in Price Devereux, who died on the 22d of July, 1748. In 1750, the title was revived, by claim, in another deſcendant of Sir Edward Devereux of Caſtle Bromwich, in the county of Warwick. Edward, the preſent Lord Hereford, is the twelfth Viſcount of the family (42); which, however, has undergone conſiderable changes in point of property.

From the whole of this Article, the character of Walter Earl of Eſſex appears in a very reſpectable light. His letter to the Council, inſerted in note [D], is admirably written. It ſhews the Earl's great abilities, and the perfection to which the Engliſh language was carried at that time. The ſame may be obſerved concerning the letter of Sir Nicholas White. From a vaſt number of inſtances, it is evident, that the reign of Queen Elizabeth was an illuſtrious reign in point of talents. There muſt have been a high degree of ſolidity and judgment in the education of a period which produced ſo many able men.

In Murden's Collection of State Papers, are two Letters, written by the Earl of Eſſex; one, two days before his death, and the other on the day preceding that event. The firſt is addreſſed to the Queen; and in it he recommends his family to her Majeſty in very pathetic terms. In the ſecond, which is to Lord Burleigh, he expreſſes his earneſt deſire that that nobleman would take upon him the wardenſhip of his ſon, whom he wiſhes, likewiſe, to be under the protection of the Earl of Suſſex, then Lord Chamberlain. Both theſe letters prove the Earl of Eſſex to have been a moſt affectionate father, as well as a man of judgment and addreſs. Indeed, they exhibit an amiable picture of his heart and his head (43).

(43) Murdin's State Papers, p. 300—302.

Perhaps our ingenious predeceſſor has paid more attention to the report of the Earl of Eſſex's having been poiſoned than the ſubject merited. Suſpicions of this kind were readily entertained in that age. The vexations he had met with, and the continuance of a violent and painful flux from the twenty-firſt of Auguſt to the twenty-ſecond of September, will ſufficiently account for his deceaſe. As to what is ſaid in the article, that the ſpeedy marriage of the Counteſs of Eſſex with the Earl of Leiceſter, upon whom common fame threw the charge of haſtening her huſband's death, did not at all contribute to diſcredit that report, the remark is certainly founded on a miſtake. The marriage in queſtion did not take place till the twenty-firſt of September, 1578, when the Lady had been a widow two years, one day excepted (44).

(44) Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, Vol. I. p. 74.

It muſt not be concealed, that there is a tranſaction mentioned by Dr. Leland, in his hiſtory of Ireland, which, if true, reflects great diſhonour on the Earl of Eſſex's memory. The ſtory, as literally tranſlated, by Mr. O'Connor, from the Iriſh manuſcript annals of Queen Elizabeth's reign is as follows: "Anno 1574. A ſolemn peace and concord "was made between the Earl of Eſſex and Felim "O'Nial. However, at a feaſt wherein the Earl "entertained that Chieftain, and at the end of their "good cheer, O'Nial with his wife were ſeized; "their friends who attended were put to the ſword "before their faces. Felim, together with his wife "and brother, were conveyed to Dublin, where "they were cut up in quarters. This execution gave "univerſal diſcontent and horrour (45)." Conſidering the general character of the Earl of Eſſex, we cannot avoid greatly doubting of the authenticity of this fact; and, indeed, if it was founded on truth, it muſt appear very extraordinary that it ſhould not have occurred in any other narration of the times] K.

(45) Leland's Hiſt. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 357.

DEVEREUX (ROBERT) Earl of Eſſex, a gallant ſoldier, a great favourite, and an unhappy victim to the arts of his enemies and his own ambition, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was ſon to Walter Earl of Eſſex, of whom we have ſpoken in the preceding article, and Lettice, daughter to Sir Francis Knolles, who was related to Queen Elizabeth, born November 10th, 1567, at Netherwood, his father's ſeat in Herefordſhire (a), when that noble perſon had attained no higher title than that of Viſcount Hereford (b). In his tender years it is reported, that there did not appear any pregnant ſigns of an extraordinary genius; and one, who was long in his ſervice, and could not but be well acquainted with the ſecrets of the family, aſſures us, that his father died with but a very cold conceit of him (c), which, ſome thought, proceeded from his extraordinary affection for his younger ſon Walter Devereux, who, it ſeems, had quicker and more lively parts in his childhood. When Walter Earl of Eſſex breathed his laſt in Ireland, he recommended this ſon of his, then in the tenth year of his age, to the protection of Thomas Radcliffe Earl of Suſſex, and to the care of William Cecil Lord Burleigh (d), whom he appointed his guardian. Mr. Waterhouſe, then Secretary for Ireland, a perſon equally favoured by his father, and Sir Henry Sidney, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, had the immediate direction of his perſon and eſtate, which, though not a little injured by his father's public ſpirit, was, however, very conſiderable; and the regard ſhewn for his concerns, by the moſt powerful perſons at Court, was ſo remarkable, that Mr. Waterhouſe made no difficulty of affirming, there was not, at that time, any man ſo ſtrong in friends as the little Earl of Eſſex (e). It was, certainly, out of reſpect to both families, that this gentleman laboured earneſtly to bring to a happy concluſion a treaty of marriage, marriage, which had been for ſome time on foot between Mr. Philip, afterwards Sir Phlip, Sydney, the Lord-Deputy's ſon, and Penelope, ſiſter to the Earl of Eſſex; in which, however, he had not the ſucceſs he deſired (f). His application on behalf of the young Earl, that he might be preſerved in the poſſeſſion of thoſe honours which his father had enjoyed in Wales, and which were attended with power and influence rather than profit, had better fortune through the aſſiſtance of the Earl of Suſſex (g) who eaſily procured from the Queen this mark of favour for a tender youth, whoſe father had deſerved ſo well [A]. In 1578, when he was about twelve years of age, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Cambridge by the Lord Burleigh, who placed him in Trinity-College, under the care of Dr. Whitgift, then maſter of it, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury (h). He was educated there with much ſtrictneſs, and applied himſelf to learning with great diligence, ſo that, his quality conſidered, there were few young men of his ſtanding more diſtinguiſhed, either for ſolidity of judgment, or for an eaſy and eloquent manner of expreſſing their ſentiments (i). Some bold writers have aſſerted, that, as Dr. Whitgift roſe in his preferments (k), he ſunk in the eſteem of his pupil, who, as they would have us believe, conceived an early diſlike to Biſhops; but ſuch as knew the world well in thoſe days, and had the faireſt opportunities of knowing the Earl, aſſert the direct contrary, and that he continued always to treat the Archbiſhop as his particular friend, and to reſpect him as a parent (l). In 1582, having taken the degree of Maſter of Arts, he ſoon after left Cambridge (m), and retired to his own houſe at Lampſie in South Wales, where he ſpent ſome time in privacy and retirement; and was ſo far from having any thing of the eagerneſs or impetuoſity natural to youth, that, inſtead of being diſpleaſed, he became enamoured of his rural retreat (n); inſomuch, that it was with difficulty he was prevailed upon to leave it (o). His firſt appearance at Court, at leaſt as a candidate for royal favour, was in the ſeventeenth year of his age; when however he came thither, it is certain he could not have hoped, or even wiſhed, a better reception (p) [B]. [A] Whoſe father had deſerved ſo well.] We have mentioned Sir Edward Waterhouſe in the text, as the perſon who took care of the young Earl of Eſſex immediately after his father's death. He was indeed a very extraordinary perſon, and deſerves to be as much remembered as any man of his rank that ever lived. He was deſcended from an antient and honourable family ſeated in Hertfordſhire, where King Henry VIII. dining at his father's houſe, that Monarch, upon a view of his children, ſaid of Edward, who was the youngeſt, this will be the crown of your family (1). His parts were ſo great, and his probity ſo generally underſtood, that he was at once the favourite of the Earl of Eſſex, Sir Henry Sydney, and the Lord Burleigh. When the firſt was dying he is ſaid to have taken his leave of this gentleman with many kiſſes, crying out, Oh, my Ned, Oh my Ned, farewel! Thou art the faithfulleſt and friendlieſt Gentleman that ever I knew (2). His fidelity reached beyond the grave, for he immediately tranſported the Earl's dead corpſe to Wales, where he was infinitely beloved, and from thence, on the third of October, he wrote to the Earl of Suſſex, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, with a requeſt concerning the young Earl (3), 'That whereas 'his Lordſhip, for the education of his children, and 'payment of his legacies, by aſſurance in his life-time, 'and by his laſt Will and Teſtament, repoſed eſpe-'cially therein upon his Lordſhip, foraſmuch as the 'late Earl had in his life-time divers offices, as the 'keeping of the caſtle of Carmarthen, ſtewardſhip of 'divers of her Majeſty's ſeigneuries in thoſe parts of 'South Wales, the whole fees accuſtomed to ſuch 'offices not amounting to above one hundred marks: 'which fees his Lordſhip always beſtowed upon his 'under-offices; by occaſion of which offices, the in-'habitants in thoſe ſeigneuries did the rather depend 'upon his Lordſhip, and now would be ſorry that any 'other than the new Earl of Eſſex ſhould have com-'mandment in ſuch office over them: and becauſe he 'well underſtood that the having of theſe ſmall offices 'might be to the new Earl's great continuing of the 'hearts of his countrymen, and beſides might be the 'better able, when he ſhould come to years, to do 'ſervice to his Sovereign; he therefore was, in behalf 'of his Lordſhip and my Lord Treaſurer, to requeſt, 'that all theſe offices might be beſtowed upon this new 'Earl of Eſſex; which ſhould be as well executed as 'if his Lordſhip were of full age. And if occaſion of 'ſervice ſhould require, his Lordſhip might, although 'he were an infant, have the willing hearts of many 'to do him ſervice.' By this application theſe offices were preſerved to the young Earl, who ſpent his youth in thoſe parts, and had a very great intereſt there; ſo that the world wondered much in the laſt action of his life, that this Earl did not rather chooſe to bring over his friends into that part of the iſland from Ireland, where he had ſuch numbers at his devotion; but it was his hard fate to rely upon an influence which he had not, and to ſlight that which he really had (4).

[B] Or even wiſhed a better reception.] It is a very difficult thing to give a true account of this Lord's firſt introduction to favour, as the beſt authors we have not only contradict each other, but are frequently inconſiſtent with themſelves, in what they have left us upon this ſubject. Sir Henry Wotton ſays (5), 'that there 'was, for ſome time, a very ſtiff averſion in the Earl 'of Eſſex, from applying himſelf to Leiceſter, for 'what ſecret conceits he knew not' (which is not a little ſtrange, ſince this writer could not be ignorant of the report that his father was poiſoned by Leiceſter's procuring), 'but howſoever that humour was 'mollified by time, and by his mother, ſo to the 'Court he came under this Lord.' Sir Robert Naunton, who was very well acquainted with thoſe times, ſeems to doubt of this; for though he agrees that Leiceſter might have his reaſons for bringing that young Lord to court (6), 'yet (ſays he) that the ſon of a 'Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Viſcount Hereford, and 'Earl of Eſſex, who was of the antient Nobility, and 'formerly in the Queen's good grace, could not have 'a room in her favour without the aſſiſtance of Leiceſ-'ter, was beyond the rule of her nature, which, as 'I have elſewhere taken into obſervation, was ever 'inclinable to favour the Nobility.' Dr. Fuller reckons up, in his manner, the ſeveral titles which the young Earl had to Queen Elizabeth's kindneſs and affection, and amongſt the reſt he lays great weight upon his mother's intereſt, who was of the Queen's kindred. But Camden tells us the Queen hated his mother, which is probable enough, her character being none of the brighteſt. Upon the whole, the Earl of Clarendon ſeems to have given the cleareſt and moſt probable account of this matter (7): 'tho' 'the firſt approach, ſays he, of the Earl to court was 'under the ſhadow of the great Earl of Leiceſter, yet 'he owed him rather for his invitation thither, than 'his preferment there. For no queſtion he found ad-'vantage from the ſtock of his father's reputation, 'the people looking on his quality with reverence (for 'I do not find that any young Nobleman had yet ſur-'prized their hopes or drawn their eyes) and on his 'youth with pity, for they were nothing ſatisfied con-'cerning brought thither, amongſt other ſtrong recommendations, a fine perſon, an agreeable behaviour, and an affability which procured him many friends, beſides the rare qualities of true piety, unaffected zeal for the public welfare, and a warmth and ſincerity in his friendſhips, which entitled him to univerſal eſteem (q). He, by degrees, ſo far overcame that reluctance which he is ſaid to have ſhewn, to uſe the aſſiſtance of the powerful Earl of Leiceſter, that, towards the cloſe of the year 1585, he accompanied him, with many others of the nobility, to Holland, where we find him the next year in the field, with the title of General of the Horſe (r); and, in this quality, he gave the higheſt proofs of perſonal courage in the battle of Zutphen, September 22d, 1586, in which action Sir Philip Sydney was mortally wounded (s). It was for his gallant behaviour upon this occaſion that the Earl of Leiceſter conferred upon him the honour of a Knight-Banneret in his camp (t). On his return to England it very quickly appeared that the Queen not only approved but was deſirous alſo of rewarding his ſervices; and his father-in-law the Earl of Leiceſter, being advanced to the office of Lord Steward of her Majeſty's Houſehold, ſhe, on the 23d of December, 1587, made the Earl of Eſſex Maſter of the Horſe in his room (u). In the ſucceeding year, which ſome have held the moſt critical of that reign, he continued to riſe, and, indeed, almoſt reached the ſummit of his fortune; for, when her Majeſty thought fit to aſſemble an army at Tilbury, for the defence of the kingdom, in caſe the Spaniards had landed, ſhe gave the command of it, under herſelf, to the Earl of Leiceſter, and created the Earl of Eſſex General of Horſe (w), ſhewing him, upon that occaſion, not only as much countenance as his own high ſpirit could expect, but a degree of favour even ſuperior to that of Leiceſter (x); ſo that, from this time, he was conſidered as the favourite declared; and, if there was any mark yet wanting to fix the people's opinion in that reſpect, it was ſhewn by the Queen's conferring on him the moſt noble order of the Garter (y). We need not wonder that ſo quick an elevation, and to ſo great a height, ſhould ſomewhat affect the judgment of ſo young a man; therefore there will not appear any thing ſtrange in the eagerneſs he is ſaid to have ſhewn in diſputing the Queen's favour with Sir Charles Blount (z), who, in proceſs of time, became Lord Montjoy and Earl of Devonſhire; which, however, coſt him ſome blood; for that brave man taking diſtaſte at ſomewhat the Earl ſaid of a favour beſtowed upon him by the Queen, challenged him, and, in Marybone-Park, after a ſhort diſpute, wounded him in the knee; with which the Queen, who did not love to be controuled in her actions, was ſo far from being diſpleaſed, that ſhe ſwore a round oath, it was fit that ſome one or other ſhould take him down, otherwiſe there would be no ruling him (a). However, ſhe reconciled the rivals, and it will remain an honour to both their memories, that, profeſſing themſelves friends, they remained ſuch, ſo long as they lived together (b). In the beginning of the year 1589, the Earl of Eſſex took a very extraordinary ſtep, which, how much ſoever it might increaſe the reputation of his courage, did certainly no great credit to his prudence (c). Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake had undertaken an expedition for reſtoring Don Antonio to the crown of Portugal, which the Earl beheld as an action too glorious for others to perform while he was a ſpectator only. He followed the fleet and army therefore to Spain, and, having joined them at Corunna, proſecuted the reſt of the expedition with great vigilance and valour; which, however, was not attended with much ſucceſs, at the ſame time that it expoſed him to the Queen's diſpleaſure (d) [C]. At his return, however, he ſoon recovered her Majeſty's good graces; nor was

'cerning his father's death, who had been advanced 'to honourable dangers, by the mediation of ſuch as 'delighted not in his company. And if there were 'not any ſuch compaſſion in the Queen, yet ſurely ſhe 'beheld him as the ſon of an excellent man, that died 'in her ſervice, and had left a precious fame ſurviving.' This agrees perfectly well with what the Earl himſelf ſays, that he had but few friends when he firſt came to Court (8), and therefore we muſt refer the political endeavours of Leiceſter to plant him in the Queen's favour, either to leſſen the weight of his own attendance, and that burthen of public hate which fell upon him as a favourite, or elſe to his deſire of giving a counterpoiſe to Ralegh, who, though likewiſe of his own raiſing, had now ſpirit as well as ſtrength enough to ſtand upon his own legs, or to his return from Holland, where he had received the higheſt honours, behaved himſelf with ſo much courage, modeſty, and generoſity, upon all occaſions, that the fame of his actions abroad was the harbinger that procured him ſo good quarter at home (9). The Queen loved to ſee her Nobility reſpected and eſteemed by foreigners, more eſpecially when theſe honours did not leſſen a juſt ſenſe of their dependence upon, and duty to, herſelf, which was the caſe of this Earl, who, at the beginning, ſhewed ſuch a profound deference and ſubmiſſion to the Queen, as of all things wrought moſt upon her nature. Beſides, at that time, the Earl being a new man at Court, had no party that rendered him formidable, which made the Queen more eaſy in beſtowing her favours, eſpecially when ſhe ſaw this young Nobleman was very acceptable to the people; ſo that ſhe did not ſeem to make him ſo much her own, as to receive him for her favourite from their choice, which ſhe lived afterwards to repent (10).

[C] That it expoſed him to the Queen's diſpleaſure.] The reaſons which induced the Earl of Eſſex to riſque at once his life and the Queen's favour, by thruſting himſelf into the dangers of this expedition both by ſea and land, are very differently repreſented. Some ſay, that it was merely from a thirſt of glory that he quitted the pleaſures of a Court, to expoſe himſelf firſt at ſea, and then in the field (11); others, that his hatred to the Spaniards was what chiefly prompted him; while there want not thoſe again, who aſcribe that action to a ſofter paſſion, his pity for the unfortunate Don Antonio King of Portugal (12). Mr. Camden indeed ſuggeſts, that he flattered himſelf with the honour of commanding in chief, becauſe moſt of the officers ſtood indebted for his brother's aſſiſtance in obtaining their commiſſions (13). The truth ſeems to be, that he was inſtigated by a mixture of all theſe motives, excepting the laſt, and chiefly by the deſire of being preſent at ſettling the new King upon the throne of Portugal, was it long before this was teſtified to the world, by his obtaining new marks of favour, in grants of a very conſiderable value; a circumſtance in which his credit with the Queen ſeemed much ſuperior to that of all her other favourites (e). He had now loſt the ſupport of his father-in-law the Earl of Leiceſter, who died the preceding year, and who, though he was ſuppoſed to act the politician, in preferring him to the Queen's favour (if, indeed, that was at all his work), yet ſhewed the ſincerity of his affection to him by ſeveral clauſes in his will (f); notwithſtanding which loſs, he kept his ground at Court, and by careſſing Mr. Cartwright and others, looked upon as Puritans, ſeemed to affect becoming the head of that party which adhered to Leiceſter while living (g). About this time he ran a new hazard of the Queen's favour by a private, and, as it was then conceived, inconſiderate match with Frances, only daughter of Sir Francis Walſingham, and the widow of Sir Philip Sidney, which her Majeſty apprehended to be, in ſome meaſure, derogatory to the honour of the houſe of Eſſex (h); and though, for the preſent, this buſineſs was paſt by, yet it is thought that it was not ſo ſoon forgotten. In 1591, Henry the Fourth of France having demanded freſh aſſiſtance from the Queen, though he had already a body of her troops in his ſervice, ſhe was pleaſed to ſend the Earl of Eſſex with four thouſand men, a ſmall train of artillery, and a competent fleet, into Normandy, where it was propoſed that he ſhould join the French army, in order to undertake the ſiege of Rouen (i). The French King, however, either through want of power, the diſtraction of his affairs, or ſome other cauſe, neglected to perform his promiſe, notwithſtanding that Eſſex made a long and hazardous journey to his camp, at that Monarch's requeſt, in order to have concerted meaſures for giving the Queen ſatisfaction (k). Upon his return from this journey, which proved of little conſequence, Eſſex, to keep up the ſpirit of his officers, conferred the honour of knighthood upon many of them; a circumſtance with which the Queen was much offended (l). He likewiſe made excurſions from his camp to the very walls of Rouen; and the Earl, expoſing his perſon very freely in theſe ſkirmiſhes, came off indeed unhurt himſelf, but loſt there his only brother Walter Devereux, then in the flower of his age, being two years younger than the Earl (m). He returned ſome time after, to give an account of the ſtate of things to the Queen, and then came back to his charge, the ſiege of Rouen being formed, and the French King expreſſing a great deſire to become maſter of it. This winter-ſervice harraſſing the troops exceedingly, provoked Eſſex not a little, who ſolicited King Henry for leave to proceed in his manner, promiſing to make a breach with his own artillery, and then to ſtorm the place with the Engliſh troops; which the King, however, refuſed, as being not at all deſirous of having that rich place taken and plundered by the Engliſh in his ſight (n). which thoſe beſt acquainted with the hiſtory of theſe times, and with the conduct of that expedition (14), acknowledge to have been feaſible enough, if they had proceeded directly to Liſbon; but they failed by making an attempt upon Corunna, with which the Earl was not acquainted, and ran a great hazard by ſeeking the Engliſh fleet upon the coaſt of Portugal, while they were thus employed. His Lordſhip carried with him his brother Walter Devereux, Sir Philip Butler, Sir Roger Williams, and Sir Edward Wingfield (15). They joined the Engliſh fleet on the 13th of May, 1589; on the 16th they landed, and the ſame day the Earl ſkirmiſhed with the Spaniards. He was preſent in every action that paſſed in the neighbourhood of Liſbon, and, by a trumpet, challenged the Governor, or any of equal quality with himſelf, to ſingle combat (16). At length, when for want of artillery it appeared impracticable for them to become maſters of the caſtle, and their army, which had been much leſſened by the attack upon Corunna, diminiſhing daily, it was found neceſſary to return home, which they did towards the cloſe of the month of June (17). This may ſerve for a fair account of what happened to the Earl abroad in this adventure: as to the conſequences of it at home, they are very conciſely as well as elegantly repreſented by Sir Henry Wotton (18).

'All his hopes of advancement, ſays he, had like 'to have been ſtrangled almoſt in the very cradle, by 'throwing himſelf into the Portugal voyage without 'the Queen's conſent, or ſo much as her knowledge, 'whereby he left his friends and dependants near ſix 'months in deſperate ſuſpence what would become of 'him. And, to ſpeak truth, not without good rea'ſon: for firſt, they might well conſider, that he was 'himſelf not well plumed in favour for ſuch a flight: 'beſides that now he wanted a Lord of Leiceſter at 'home, for he was dead the year before, to ſmooth 'his abſence, and to quench the practices at Court. 'But above all, it lay open to every man's diſcourſe, 'that though the bare offence to his Sovereign and 'miſtreſs was too great an adventure, yet much more 'when ſhe might, as in this caſe, have fairly diſ'charged her diſpleaſure upon her laws. Notwith'ſtanding, a noble report coming home before him, 'at his return all was clear, and this excurſion was 'eſteemed but a ſally of youth: nay, he grew every 'day more and more in her gracious conceit. Whe'ther ſuch intermiſſions as theſe do ſometimes foment 'affection, or that having committed a fault he be'came the more obſequious and pliant to redeem it; 'or that ſhe had not received into her royal breaſt any 'ſhadows of his popularity.' The truth of this relation, with reſpect to the Queen's reſentment, will appear more clearly from her Majeſty's own letter (19) upon his firſt departure from Court.

pleaſed at this, and reſolved not to continue in a place where no reputation was to be gotten, firſt challenged the governor of Rouen, Mr. Villars, and, upon his refuſing to fight (o), left the command of the Engliſh troops to Sir Roger Williams, an officer of great courage and experience, and then embarked for England, where his preſence was become very neceſſary, his enemies having repreſented his behaviour in a very indifferent light to the Queen his miſtreſs (p) [D]. At this time he was exceedingly courted by very different ſorts of people; for many of the young Nobility, who were deſirous of entering into the world under the patronage of ſome eminent perſon, preferred the Earl, as well on account of his great affability to his followers, as becauſe of his known intereſt with the Queen (q). All the military men that were not of a very old ſtanding, looked upon him as their chief, and one from whoſe favour they were to derive preferment: the Puritan Miniſters alſo, and their dependents, conſidered him as the ſucceſſor to the Earl of Leiceſter, and, conſequently, as their protector (r). One need not wonder therefore, that, having ſuch power, he had ſo many enemies, and that theſe ſhould gain advantages over him in his abſence: but, upon his return, he triumphed for the moſt part; and the Queen, who looked upon herſelf as tied to him by former acts of kindneſs, ſeldom refuſed him any new marks of favour, for which he was importunate in his demands (s). We find him preſent in the Parliament which began at Weſtminſter, February 19th, 1592-3 (t), in which ſeſſion, chiefly through his intereſt, Sir Thomas Perrot, who had married his ſiſter, was reſtored in blood, which had been corrupted by the attainder of Sir John Perrot his father, who had been Lord-Deputy of Ireland; and in this ſeſſion it was that the Houſe of Peers paid a very extraordinary compliment to the Earl of Eſſex (u) [E].

[D] In a very indifferent light to the Queen his miſtreſs.] It is very ſeldom that ſkilful courtiers are at a loſs in framing general accuſations againſt ſuch as they would ruin, more eſpecially if they have an opportunity of doing this in their abſence. Againſt the Earl of Eſſex his enemies inſinuated, that having carried a fine body of troops under old and experienced officers out of the kingdom, with a promiſe of great things, he had nevertheleſs done little or nothing; that with ſome danger to himſelf, and much more to the troops, he had made a long journey to the French King, which ended in no more than an audience of compliment; that his fierce and haſty ſpirit had led him to thoſe uſeleſs and dangerous excurſions under the walls of Rouen, where he had loſt an only brother, the Qeeen a gallant officer, and the nation a perſon infinitely beloved; that whereas he was ſent abroad to ſerve his country, by reducing Rouen, which might ſerve as a place of arms, and a cautionary town for the ſecurity of Engliſh auxiliaries, he had ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the French Monarch, had ſerved him in the accompliſhment of other deſigns, leaving this, for which he was ſent, uneffected; and, laſtly, that notwithſtanding his troops had been very little in ſervice, they had ſuffered ſo much as not to be able to keep the field without recruits; ſo that, in all this time, the Queen had been loſing her ſubjects and acquiring nothing (20).

(20) Sir Henry Wotton, Sir Robert Naunton, Camden, &c.

But the Earl of Eſſex, upon his return, defended himſelf with great ſenſe and ſpirit againſt this accuſation. He ſhewed that the inaction of the troops upon their firſt going over was a great affliction to him, but far from being his fault, as he was continually labouring to perſuade the King to comply with his agreement, and to undertake the ſiege of Rouen, which, if he could not bring about, it was far from being a crime, though he knew it to be a misfortune; that to remove this inaction he made a hazardous journey to the King's quarters, in which he ſhewed his ſtrong deſire for accompliſhing what he was ſent for; that he had expoſed himſelf in thoſe excurſions as much as any man; and as he was principally wounded by the loſs of his brother, ſo the credit of the nation, inſtead of ſuffering, was raiſed by that high eſteem which the French expreſſed of the bravery ſhewn by the Engliſh in thoſe encounters; that the aſſiſtance he had given the French King and his Generals, was to remove thoſe obſtacles which prevented the ſiege, and which, if not removed, it had never been undertaken; that the loſs which the army had ſuſtained was through the fortune of war, and not from any fault of his, ariſing chiefly from diſeaſes, great inclemency of the weather, and the want of thoſe conveniencies which the allies ought to have furniſhed, and which, notwithſtanding all the inſtances he could make, had been neglected (21).

(21) See the Earl's Apology, addreſſed to Mr. A. Bacon, and the authors before cited.

The French Hiſtorians do all the juſtice imaginable to the Queen's punctuality in performing her promiſes, and to the zeal of the Earl of Eſſex in promoting the ſervice (22). They acknowledge that the ſiege was chiefly retarded by the Marſhal de Biron's opening the trenches before the fort of St. Catherine's: they add, that having demanded the government of the place when it ſhould be taken, and the King having told him that he was under a promiſe to another, the Marſhal was inclined to let that enterprize fail (23); and they farther admit, which is a full juſtification of the Earl of Eſſex, that he offered with his own troops to have opened the trenches between the Mountain of St. Catherine and the town (24), in which, if his advice had been followed, the place muſt certainly have been taken before the Duke of Parma could have marched to its relief.

[E] Paid a very extraordinary compliment to the Earl of Eſſex.] As this matter of fact appears to be of a very ſingular, as well as of a very commendable nature, it was judged that the reader would not be diſpleaſed with ſeeing it taken notice of here. On Tueſday the 13th of March, 1592-3, the Biſhop of Worceſter took notice that ſeveral poor ſoldiers were ſeen begging in the ſtreets, who were wounded or maimed in the ſervice of their Queen and country, in France, in the Low Countries, or on the ſeas; and therefore moved, that their Lordſhips would condeſcend to a contribution for their relief. This was immediately agreed to, and it was ordered, that every Archbiſhop, Marquis, Earl, and Viſcount, ſhould pay forty ſhillings; every Biſhop thirty ſhillings; and every Baron twenty ſhillings; which ſums the Biſhop of Worceſter was appointed to receive from the Lords Spiritual, and the Lord Norris from the Temporal Peers; the diſtribution of the ſaid collection being referred by their Lordſhips to the Earl of Eſſex and the Lord Willoughby of Ereſby (25). On Thurſday the 5th of April following, the Houſe of Lords made a farther order, reciting that before mentioned, that it had been complied with, and that the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, had alſo contributed very largely; but the number of diſtreſſed objects being great, and the relief but ſmall, it was farther decreed by them, That all the Lords of Parliament who had been abſent, and did not contribute before the end of the ſeſſion, ſhould be required by the Lords who had their proxies, or by the Lord Keeper, to pay double the ſums before mentioned; and notice is likewiſe taken of an order to the ſame purpoſe by the Houſe of Commons: it is added at the cloſe, if any Lord Spiritual or Temporal ſhould refuſe to do this, which it was hoped in honour none would, there ſhould be means uſed to levy the ſame (26).

About

About this time alſo the Queen, who had given him ſo many marks of her favour, added to them a new honour, which was, at the ſame time, a very high teſtimony of her confidence, by cauſing him to be ſworn one of the members of her moſt honourable Privy-Council (w). He met, however, in this, and in the ſucceeding years, with various cauſes of chagrin, partly from the loſtineſs of his own temper, but chiefly from the artifices of thoſe who envied his great credit with the Queen, and were deſirous of reducing his power within bounds. Occaſion was taken, in this reſpect, from a dangerous and treaſonable book, written abroad by Parſons the Jeſuit, and publiſhed under the name of Doleman, with intention to create diſſention in England about the ſucceſſion to the crown (x); which book, as the whole deſign of it was moſt villainous, ſo, from a ſuperior ſpirit of malice, it was dedicated to the Earl of Eſſex, on purpoſe to create him trouble; in which it had its effect (y). But what chiefly grieved and broke his ſpirits, or, rather, ſoured them, was his perceiving plainly, that, though he could, in moſt ſuits, prevail for himſelf, yet he was able to do little or nothing for his friends, as particularly appeared in the caſe of Sir Francis Bacon, which, though the Earl bore with ſome impatience, yet it gave him an opportunity of ſhewing the greatneſs of his mind, by giving that Gentleman a ſmall eſtate in land, which ought to have bound him better to his fortunes (z) [F]. Indeed, the Earl of Eſſex was never wanting, upon any occaſion, to his friends, as many of the writers of thoſe times agree, and of which Camden gives a remarkable inſtance in the year 1595, in his attending the funeral of Sir Roger Williams, an old experienced officer, whom he had long encouraged and ſupported; though the roughneſs of his behaviour had expoſed him to the diſlike of Sir Walter Raleigh, and other conſiderable perſons (a). But whatever diſadvantages Eſſex might labour under from intrigues at Court, yet, in times of danger, the Queen had commonly recourſe to his aſſiſtance. Thus, in 1596, when the Spaniards in the month of April laid ſiege to Calais, and the diſcharges from their batteries were heard at Greenwich; an army was haſtily raiſed, and marched towards Dover, the command of which was given to the Earl of Eſſex (b): the Queen intended to have embarked theſe troops for the aſſiſtance of the French, which, however, they wiſely declined, being willing rather to let the Spaniards keep Calais for a little while, than ſee it reſcued from them by the Engliſh, who would, preſuming on their old rights, probably keep it for ever (c). The Queen, however, taking advantage of that warm diſpoſition which appeared in her people, to contribute, as far as in them lay, to keep the war at a diſtance, and to prevent the Spaniards from meditating a ſecond invaſion, ordered a fleet to be equipped for attacking Cadiz, the beſt part of the expences being born by the principal perſons engaged in that enterprize (d). The command of this army and fleet was, with joint authority, intruſted to Robert Earl of Eſſex, and Charles Lord Howard, then Lord High Admiral of England, with whom went many of the moſt diſtinguiſhed officers, both for the land and ſea ſervice, that were then in England; the Council being compoſed of Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Conyers Clifford; the fleet, for its number of ſhips, and for the land ſoldiers and mariners aboard, being the moſt conſiderable that, in thoſe times, had been ſeen (e). On the firſt of June they ſailed from Plymouth, but were forced to put back by a contrary wind, which changing, they took the firſt opportunity of putting again to ſea. On the 18th of the ſame month they ar-

[F] Which ought to have bound him better to his fortunes.] There are few circumſtances relating to the life of this noble perſon that do greater honour to his memory, than the reſpect he ſhewed for men of parts and learning, in which he acted with ſo much ſincerity and greatneſs of mind, as evidently demonſtrated, that if on any occaſion he had recourſe to their ſervices, they were ſure to find in him not only a kind and very acceſſible patron, but a real friend, and, to the utmoſt of his power, a conſtant and zealous protector. It was this diſpoſition of mind that led him to afford ſo many teſtimonies of friendſhip to Mr. Daviſon, when he laboured under his misfortunes (27); to teſtify ſuch kindneſs to his ſon, as appears in that admirable letter of his which is ſtill extant, and of which it is hard to ſay, whether the peruſal of it raiſes a higher idea of his parts or of his probity. It was this turn of his that induced him to cauſe the immortal Spenſer to be interred at his expence (28). It was this that, in the latter part of his life, engaged him to take the ingenious Sir Henry Wotton, and the learned Mr. Cuffe, into his ſervice, as in his earlier days he had engaged thoſe incomparable brothers, Anthony and Francis Bacon, to ſhare his fortunes and his cares (29). He had a high opinion (as, indeed, who had not?) of the eloquence, and other great abilities of the younger brother, whoſe pen he uſed, when either his want of leiſure or his diffidence would not allow him to employ his own, which indeed was ſecond to none. It was the ſenſe he had of the great ſagacity, the ſtrong penetration, and the extenſive knowledge of the elder brother, more eſpecially in foreign affairs, that inſpired him with a deſire of having him for his conſtant companion, in order to which he gave him an apartment in his houſe, a plentiful penſion out of his purſe, beſides large preſents for occaſional ſervices (30). Some appearances there are, that ſpeak neither of theſe brothers ſo hearty in his intereſt as might have been expected from the ſtrong ties of gratitude they were under. But we muſt not always truſt appearances, more eſpecially in caſes where direct and plain proofs might certainly be had, if the ſuſpicion raiſed upon thoſe appearances were in reality well founded. As to Anthony Bacon, we have already ſhewn that whatever precautions he took for his own ſafety, his affection to and for his noble patron followed him beyond the grave. His brother Francis was of a warmer, but at the ſame time of a leſs firm and ſteady temper. He was ſuſceptible both of hopes and fears, and ſtill more ſuſceptible of praiſe; and, with much of his eloquence, had a tincture of Tully's vanity, as well as his timidity; otherwiſe he would never have pleaded the Queen's taking a liking to his pen in defence of a declamation againſt the memory of his friend (31). His refuſal might indeed have coſt him dear; but it would have preſerved his reputation, which is more tarniſhed in this than in any other point of his private character.

rived at Cape St. Vincent, where they met with an Iriſh bark, which informed them, that the port of Cadiz was full of ſhips, and that they had no notice whatever of the ſailing of the Engliſh fleet, or that ſuch an expedition was ſo much as intended (f). After this welcome news they purſued their voyage, and, on the 20th in the morning, they anchored near St. Sebaſtian's, on the weſt ſide of the iſland of Cadiz, where the Admiral would have had the forces debarked, in order to their immediate attacking the town; which Eſſex cauſed to be attempted, but found to be impracticable, and, upon the advice of Sir Walter Raleigh, deſiſted (g). Camden, indeed, charges this raſhneſs upon Eſſex; but Sir Walter Raleigh, who is certainly better authority in this point, ſtates it the other way (h). It was then propoſed by the Earl to begin with attacking the fleet, which was a very hazardous enterprize, but, at laſt, agreed to by the Lord Admiral; of which, when Eſſex received the news, he threw his hat into the ſea for joy. The next day this gallant reſolution was executed with all imaginable bravery; and, in point of ſervice, none did better, or hazarded his perſon more, than the Earl of Eſſex (i), who, in his own ſhip, The Due Repulſe, went to the aſſiſtance of Sir Walter Ralegh, and offered, if it had been neceſſary, to have ſeconded him in boarding the St. Philip (k). The Spaniards behaved very gallantly, ſo long as there were any hopes, and when there were none, ſet fire to their ſhips, and retired (l). The Earl of Eſſex then landed eight hundred men at the Puntall; and, having firſt taken proper meaſures for deſtroying the bridge, next attacked the place with ſo much fury, that it was very quickly taken, and, the next day, the citadel ſurrendered upon a capitulation, by which a great ranſom was ſtipulated for the town (m). An offer was then made of two millions of ducats to ſpare the ſhips; and more might have been obtained, but the Lord Admiral ſaid, He came there to conſume, and not to compound; of which when the Spaniards were informed, they reſolved to have the burning of their own fleet, which they accordingly ſet on fire; their loſs by which was computed at twenty millions (n). The Earl was very deſirous of keeping Cadiz, which he offered to have done with a very ſmall garriſon; but the Council differed from him in opinion; ſo that, having plundered the iſland, and demoliſhed the forts, they embarked on the 5th of July, and bore away for the port of Faro in Algarve, which they plundered and deſtroyed: thence they proceeded to Cape St. Vincent, and being driven by a briſk wind out to ſea, it fell under conſideration, whether they ſhould not ſail for the Azores, in hopes of intercepting the Plate-Fleet, which was carried in the negative; and the Earl's propoſal, with two of her Majeſty's ſhips, and ten others, to make this attempt, was rejected likewiſe (o); which Mr. Camden attributes to the deſire of ſome of the officers, who had made large booties, to get their treaſure ſafe on ſhore (p). They looked in, however, at Corunna, and the Earl would have then proceeded to St. Andero and St. Sebaſtian; but others thinking they had done enough, the fleet returned proſperouſly to Plymouth, on the 8th of Auguſt following, and the Earl, with his ſquadron, two days after (q). He was very well received by the Queen, and highly applauded by the people; but, as it was too common with him, not entirely ſatisfied in himſelf; which induced him to write (at a time when ſome faults were imputed to him) a kind of narrative of this exploit, and a cenſure upon other men's conduct; which gained him little credit, and did him leſs good (r) [G]. Yet, whatever the ſentiments might be of the graver and wiſer part of [G] Gained him little credit, and did him leſs good.] It is commonly ſaid, that, upon the Earl of Eſſex's returning from Cadiz, his glory and his power were both in their utmoſt ſplendour: the Queen and her people being equally diſpoſed to afford the kindeſt reception to their joint favourite. We may, however, form ſome doubt of this from various reaſons, of which we will mention only a few: Firſt then, the Queen was unwilling the Earl ſhould have gone at all, if he could have been perſuaded to have ſtaid at home: ſhe took amiſs his objections to a divided command, and gave many other teſtimonies of her entertaining ſome prejudices againſt him before his departure (32). Next, at his return he was blamed for his partiality to the land officers, for his countenancing opinions directly oppoſite to thoſe of the majority, and for miſrepreſenting the reaſons upon which the ſentiments of the majority were grounded, which, on his firſt coming home, had much weight, and prevented, as will be ſeen in a ſucceeding note, his being able to provide, by his recommendations, for his beſt friends (33). In order to ſupport and maintain himſelf, the Earl drew up a narrative, in which he ſhewed the advantages, and diſplayed the beneficial conſequences, of this expedition, 'in 'which, ſays he, the Engliſh took two galleons, 'routed fifteen gallies with an equal number of ſhips, 'freed many of their countrymen condemned to the 'gallies, and releaſed ſeveral Spaniards from impriſon-'ment; took the beſt fortified city in all Spain, and 'ſtayed thirteen days in their country; brought home, 'beſides the galleons aforeſaid, a hundred braſs guns, 'with a rich booty: and the ſailors, but eſpecially the 'ſoldiers, great plunder. The enemy loſt thirteen of 'his moſt ſerviceable ſhips, forty India merchant men, 'and four others; beſides vaſt quantities of ammuni-'tion, proviſions, &c. rendering it almoſt impoſſible 'he ſhould in ſome time appear again at ſea in a for-'midable manner (34).' If he had ſtopped here it had been well, for as this did credit to all, ſo there is no doubt that all would have joined in ſupporting the credit which it gave them. But it fell out that the Earl, forgetting his own miſtakes, and more eſpecially the making of ſo many Knights, the far greater part from amongſt his own dependants, would needs write a cenſure of this voyage, by ſetting down whatever was omitted in the proſecution of it, and then, by way of anſwer to theſe objections, imputing all miſcarriages to other men, by which he raiſed to himſelf many implacable enemies, and there is too much reaſon to believe did not gain one friend. A ſpecimen of the laſt objection and its anſwer will abundantly confirm this obſervation, and at the ſame time give great light into his perſonal hiſtory, as well as a ſtrong inſtance of his capacity for writing well, if he had choſen his ſubject better (35).

Objection. 'That ſince the chief of our ſervice 'conſiſted in the taking or deſtroying the Spaniſh ſhip-'ping and naval ſtores, why did we not look into 'their principal ports, and do them all the miſchief we 'were able?

of the Court, it appears plainly, that, upon his return from this expedition, the Earl of Eſſex ſtood very high in the favour of the Queen, and of the nation; and, perhaps, it might have gained him an acceſſion of favour with the former, if the Earl had not enjoyed ſo much of the latter, or had ſeemed to value it leſs than he did: but, as he had little of diſſimulation in his temper, ſo the warmth with which he diſcovered either his affection or diſlike, expoſed him continually to the ſiniſter practices of his enemies, who were thoroughly ſkilled in thoſe arts which he knew leaſt about (s). They inſinuated, therefore, to the Queen, that, conſidering the Earl's popularity, it would not be at all expedient for her ſervice to receive ſuch as he recommended to civil employments: and this they carried ſo far, as to make even his approbation deſtructive to mens' fortunes (t), whom they had encouraged and recommended themſelves; a thing hardly to be credited, if we had not the higheſt evidence to prove it [H]. It was a natural conſequence that the Earl, who wanted not penetration enough to ſee, or ſpirit to reſent this, ſhould behave towards thoſe he took to be the authors of ſuch counſels with viſible marks of anger

'Anſwer. That my end in going to Cadiz was not 'only becauſe it was a principal port, but the moſt 'likely to be held by us, in regard not only to the 'ſituation and natural ſtrength thereof, but that alſo 'from thence we might (if ſome greater ſervice did 'not divert us) go to all the ports betwixt that and the 'nethermoſt parts of Biſcay, which ſeemed better to 'me than to have alarmed the enemy firſt in the midſt 'of his country, or the neareſt parts thereof to ours, 'in regard that by acting in that manner, our attempts 'would have been more difficult, and our retreat at 'laſt from thoſe parts leſs ſafe, conſidering the wants, 'ſickneſs, and other inconveniences, which generally 'attend fleets and armies in long voyages. But after 'we had done what we could at Cadiz, it was by all 'our ſea-officers thought a capital offence, ſo much as 'to mention the paſſing over the bar of St. Lucar.

'Between St. Lucar and Liſbon there is not any good 'port, and from the latter I was reſtrained by my in'ſtructions: nay, though we had been permitted to 'have gone thither, yet I found our ſeamen of the 'ſame caſt that Sir Francis Drake and his company 'were, when they loſt the opportunity of taking that 'place, not caring to paſs by the caſtle of St. Julian.

'From Liſbon to the Groyne there is not any port 'capable of containing either the King of Spain's, or 'other large ſhipping; but to the latter place I at 'length prevailed with them, not without great diffi'culty, to go, having both vowed and proteſted 'againſt their refuſal, and even parted company with 'them, when they offered to hold on their courſe; but 'when we came to the mouth of the harbour, and 'ſent in ſome veſſels, we could not diſcover any thing 'there; nor at Ferrol; for in that port we alſo 'looked.

'After this we held our laſt council; and then I 'urged going to St. Andrew's Paſſage, St. Sebaſtian's, 'and all the principal ports along the coaſt; but the 'Lord Admiral abſolutely refuſed going farther, com'plaining of wants, and repreſenting the danger of 'being embayed, with many other inconveniences, in 'which opinion Sir Walter Raleigh confirmed him, ſo 'that both of them ſeemed deſirous to have the ho'nour of fruſtrating the deſign; and as to our landing 'at the Groyne, and attempting the town, they would 'by no means hear of it, but every one preſently 'cried out, let us make ſail homewards; ſince which 'time they have uſed ſuch ſpeed, that by my endea'vouring to bring with me the St. Andrew taken at 'Cadiz, and the fly-boat with our artillery, I have 'loſt company with them all, except Monſieur 'Duvenvoord and his ſquadron, and ſome ſmall 'ſhips (36)."

(36) Sir Henry Wotton ſpeaks much like a courtier, if this be the piece of which he ſpeaks when he ſays, that the Cadiz Expedition was the Earl's moſt fortunate action, and no leſs modeſt; for there he wrote with his own hand a cenſure of his omiſſions.

[H] If we had not the higheſt evidence to prove it.] It is a juſt obſervation made upon theſe times, that the great Stateſmen knew how to poiſon with oil, and to break men's fortunes by contributing to their exaltation. The rivals of the Earl of Eſſex, whenever he made any propoſals for the public ſervice, were ſure to provoke him with objections, which, out of the warm ſincerity of his heart, he commonly anſwered by promiſing to perform even more than he firſt offered, and then they were ſure to find out pretences for ſending thoſe with him, who would perplex him as much in the execution, as they had done in the firſt contrivance of his project. But how ſucceſsful ſoever theſe arts might be in the cabinet of a Princeſs now full of years and of ſuſpicions, and ſurrounded with the enemies of Eſſex, yet it could not impoſe upon the nation; for which reaſon it did not in the leaſt leſſen that Nobleman's popularity; and therefore thoſe who envied his greatneſs, contrived to render this criminal, by repreſenting to the Queen, that though ſhe might ſafely beſtow honours and employments upon the Earl himſelf, in order to avail herſelf of his great virtues and extraordinary talents, yet nothing could be more dangerous to her tranquillity, than to receive into her ſervice even ſubordinate Miniſters of his recommendation; becauſe being already maſter of the military, he would by that means draw the civil power into his hands. We have ſeen that he could not reſtore Daviſon whom the Queen had made Secretary of State, and whom ſhe thought fitter for that office than any other man. We have ſeen that he could not make Sir Francis Bacon Solicitor-General, though he exerted for that purpoſe the whole ſtrength of his intereſt. We ſhall now ſee, that a promotion being reſolved, his approbation was ſufficient to prevent it; and, what is ſtill more extraordinary, the perſon injured reſents the good will of the Earl, inſtead of taking amiſs that inſolent abuſe of power which other Miniſters had exerciſed in ſetting him aſide, and this in breach too of their own promiſes. The perſon thus treated was Sir Thomas Bodley; and, as nobody can deſerve better credit in this buſineſs, he ſhall tell his ſtory himſelf, who having acknowledged that the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh intended to have made him Secretary of State, in caſe the Earl of Eſſex, upon the general rumour of it, had not highly commended him, tells us, that he had learned from his ſon the Earl of Salisbury, that they had no other motive to ſet him aſide, but the Earl's good opinion, which was grounded only on his belief of Bodley's merit, who, upon this ſubject, makes theſe reflections (37): 'When I had thoroughly now 'bethought me firſt in the Earl, of the ſlender holdfaſt 'he had in the favour of the Queen, of an endleſs 'oppoſition of the chiefeſt of our Stateſmen, like ſtill 'to wait upon him; of his perilous, and feeble, and 'uncertain advice, as well in his own, as in all the 'cauſes of his friends: and when moreover for my'ſelf I had fully conſidered, how very untowardly 'theſe two Counſellors were affected unto me, upon 'whom before in cogitation I had framed all the fa'brick of my future proſperity; how ill it did concur 'with my natural diſpoſition, to become, or to be 'counted, either a ſtickler or partaker in any public 'faction; how well I was able, by God's good bleſ'ſing, to live of myſelf, if I could be content with a 'competent livelihood; how ſhort time of further life 'I was then to expect by the common courſe of na'ture: when I had, I ſay, in this manner repreſented 'to my thoughts my particular eſtate, together with 'the Earl's, I reſolved thereupon to poſſeſs my ſoul 'in peace all the reſidue of my days: to take my full 'farewel of State employments, to ſatisfy my mind 'with that mediocrity of worldly living that I had 'of my own, and ſo to retire me from the court, which 'was the epilogue and end of all my actions and en'deavours of any important note, till I came to the 'age of fifty-three.' This event happened at the time the great perſons beforementioned were at open enmity, and before that treaty was concluded, of which the reader will have an ample account in the ſucceeding note.

and diſcontent; and this conduct of his made him frequently upon bad terms even with the Queen herſelf, who was a Princeſs very jealous of her authority, and, in caſes of this nature, bore but very indifferently with any expoſtulations (u). However, as well out of her natural kindneſs to him, as from a deſire of ſhewing a juſt acknowledgment for his late ſervice, ſhe was pleaſed, on the 19th of March, 1597, to appoint him Maſter of the Ordnance, by patent (w.) This ſeems to have had a good effect, in quieting the mind, and raiſing the ſpirits, of this great Nobleman, who, upon the report that the Spaniards were forming a new fleet at Ferrol and Corunna, for the invaſion of Ireland at leaſt, if not England, readily offered his ſervice to the Queen, and chearfully declared, as Camden aſſures us, that he would either defeat this new armada, which had threatened England for a year together, or periſh in the attempt, as one willingly devoted for the ſervice of his country (x). The Queen, well pleaſed with this propoſal, gave it all the countenance that could be deſired, and cauſed a conſiderable fleet, though not ſo conſiderable as the action required, to be equipped for this ſervice. The Earl of Eſſex was appointed General, Admiral, and Commander in Chief, the Lord Thomas Howard Vice, and Sir Walter Raleigh Rear, Admirals; the Lord Montjoy was Lieutenant-General of the land-forces, and Sir Francis Vere, Marſhal. We may gueſs at the intereſt which the Earl had in the ſucceſs of this voyage by the number of his friends, who engaged therein as volunteers; and, amongſt them of the Nobility, were the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, and the Lords Cromwell and Rich (y). His ſanguine hopes however were, in ſome meaſure, diſappointed; for ſailing about the 9th of July from Plymouth, they met, at ſixty leagues diſtance, with ſo rough a ſtorm, and of four days continuance, that they were obliged to put back to Plymouth, where they remained wind-bound for the ſpace of a month (z), in which time a great part of their proviſions was conſumed. While the fleet was thus laid up, the Earl of Eſſex and Sir Walter Raleigh ſet out poſt for the court, in order to receive freſh inſtructions (a). The propoſals made by Eſſex, even after this diſappointment, were very bold and great, but, as Camden ſeems to inſinuate, very difficult and dangerous, if not impracticable; ſo that the Queen would not countenance his projects, but rather left the direction of the expedition to the Commanders in Chief, according as the ſeaſon and circumſtances might encourage or permit (b). The ſame Hiſtorian, and almoſt all who have written upon this ſubject after him, ſpeak of an old miſunderſtanding between Eſſex and Sir Walter Raleigh before they left England, which was productive of moſt of the miſchiefs that afterwards happened; which there is good reaſon however to believe a groundleſs imputation upon both (c) [I]. As ſoon as the fleet was repaired, and the land forces were debarked that, by the Queen's command, were to remain at home, they ſailed again from Plymouth the 17th of Auguſt, having now two points in view, the one to burn the Spaniſh fleet in their own harbours, the other to intercept the ſhips they expected from the Weſt Indies. Camden blames Eſſex for appearing openly within ſight of the Spaniſh coaſt, and thereby alarming the enemy; but Sir William Monſon acquaints us with the true reaſon of the Earl's conduct, which was, by making a ſhow of a few ſhips to draw out the enemy's fleet, it being found impoſſible to [I] Which there is good reaſon, however, to believe a groundleſs imputation upon both.] There ſeem to be few opinions better founded than that which, with due caution, admits the private letters of perſons of good ſenſe and experience, written at the time when things were tranſacted, to be the beſt documents for ſuch points, either of public or of private Hiſtory, as are not likely to be generally known with the ſame degree of certainty as facts of another ſpecies. Amongſt other papers of a very curious and inſtructive nature, which have been publiſhed lately in a very valuable collection, are the letters of Rowland White, Eſq. to Sir Robert Sydney, at that time Governor of Fluſhing. Mr. White was Sir Robert's agent at Court; and from theſe letters it appears, that the Nobleman, on whoſe favour Sir Robert chiefly relied, was the Earl of Eſſex; ſo that we cannot well have better authority, in reference to what paſſed at Court in thoſe days, than the informations of this gentleman, concerned to make the cloſeſt enquiries he could, and bound in honour to relate what proved the reſult of them with the utmoſt fidelity. We learn from him, that, in the beginning of the year 1597, there were great intrigues at Court, where Secretary Cecil was the moſt favoured Counſellor, had long private conferences with the Queen, and retarded or advanced men's ſuits at his pleaſure (38). Eſſex at this time was in ſome diſcontent, though a great favourite likewiſe, and kept or was ſaid to keep his bed, when he was not very ſick, receiving frequent meſſages from the Queen, and having alſo private audiences (39). In the beginning of the month of March Sir Walter Raleigh had ſeveral private interviews with the Earl, in order to bring about a good underſtanding between him and the Secretary, which he urged would have ſerved good conſequences, ſuch as making the Queen eaſy, removing a great obſtacle in the management of public affairs, and contributing not a little to the forwarding the ſchemes concerted for humbling the common enemy (40). It is eaſy to ſee from hence, that there could be no pique between the Earl and Sir Walter Raleigh; for if there had, Sir Robert Cecil was too wiſe a man to have employed him. While this treaty was in negotiation, there was a competition for the office of Warden of the Cinque Ports, Sir Robert Cecil ſupporting the new Lord Cobham, and the Earl of Eſſex recommending Sir Robert Sydney firſt, and finding that would not do, ſtanding for it himſelf, upon which it was propoſed that he ſhould accept of the Maſterſhip of the Ordnance, which he did (41). Soon after this, Sir Henry Leigh was, at the recommendation of the Earl of Eſſex, made Knight of the Garter (42); and the Earl concurred in promoting the Lord Berows to the government of Ireland. In May the treaty was in a manner concluded; the Earl, by the mediation of Sir Walter Raleigh, was reconciled to the Secretary; and they concerted together all the meaſures preparatory to the Iſland Expedition; and from the ſame letters we learn, that Sir Walter Raleigh, who was entruſted with the care of victualing the fleet, had been remarkably civil to the Earl of Eſſex in what related to the proviſion of his own ſhip; and when they were obliged to return by contrary winds, Mr. White repreſents their coming to London together as the effects of their perfect intelligence, and does not give the leaſt hint of any variance between them.

burn them in port (d). He alſo inſinuates, that Sir Walter Raleigh kept at a diſtance from the fleet, which was another diſcouragement; but, from the beſt accounts we have, this alſo appears to be a groundleſs imagination (e). Sir Walter is afterwards ſaid to have ſeparated from the fleet by deſign, under pretence of repairing his ſhip; but Sir William Monſon tells us plainly, that this ſeparation was owing to an involuntary miſcarriage in Eſſex himſelf (f). When they joined again at the iſlands, it appears plainly that Eſſex and Raleigh were very good friends, notwithſtanding there were ſome on both ſides who laboured all they could to incenſe them againſt each other. When they had refreſhed at Flores, Eſſex commanded Ralegh to ſail for Fayall, which he intended to attack with the whole fleet; but Sir Walter coming there firſt, and apprehending that the ſmalleſt delay might have prevented their deſign, very gallantly attacked, and very happily ſucceeded, in making himſelf maſter of the iſland before the arrival of Eſſex with the reſt of the fleet (g). This gave occaſion to Sir Walter's enemies to repreſent his vigilance and activity in the light of diſobedience and contempt to Eſſex, which occaſioned very high diſputes; but, by the interpoſition of Lord Thomas Howard, all things were compromiſed, Sir Walter excuſed what had happened to the Earl, and the Earl accepted his excuſe (h). As the relations of this, which is called the Iſland Voyage, already publiſhed, are very exact, and in themſelves larger than this whole life, it cannot be expected that we ſhould enter here into all the other particulars of this voyage: we ſhall therefore content ourſelves with obſerving, that, notwithſtanding the Spaniſh fleet eſcaped, and ſome other untoward accidents happened, in which the Earl was not altogether without blame, yet three ſhips from the Havannah, the cargoes of which amounted to near one hundred thouſand pounds, were taken, by which the beſt part of the expences of the undertaking was defrayed, and ſo the fleet returned to England towards the cloſe of October (i). In reſpect to what Camden ſuggeſts, that, after their arrival in England, Eſſex and Raleigh accuſed each other, by which great diſturbances were occaſioned (k), there is ſome reaſon to doubt the matter of fact, and to believe they were both wiſer men, and knew their reſpective intereſts better than to act in ſuch a manner [K]. It is very true, that the Earl of Eſſex, upon his return from the Iſland Voyage, ſhewed evident ſigns of deep diſpleaſure, retired to his houſe at Wanſtead, and, under pretence of ſickneſs, abſented himſelf from the ſervice of Parliament then ſitting; and it is alſo very true which Camden reports, that his diſſatisfaction aroſe from the Lord Admiral's being created Earl of Nottingham in his abſence, with ſome particular clauſes in the preamble of his patent, which, as they were highly honourable for that noble Peer, Eſſex conceived threw ſome diſparagement upon himſelf (l). But as to what the ſame Hiſtorian inſinuates, that he was no leſs diſpleaſed that Sir Robert Cecil was advanced to be Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaſter, becauſe he conſidered him as his principal antagoniſt, and a faſt friend to Sir Walter Raleigh (m), there is ſome reaſon to queſtion; and in the notes it will be ſhewn, that the firſt was the great if not the ſole cauſe of the Earl's diſquiet, that his diſtaſte was very far from being peeviſh or unreaſonable, and that thoſe who are reputed to have been his greateſt enemies, were, in reality, the very perſons that procured this noble perſon the ſatisfaction he deſired [L]. This ſatisfaction conſiſted in creating the Earl of Eſſex

[K] Than to act in ſuch a manner.] In the text we have given ſeveral inſtances of Mr. Camden's inclination to repreſent the diſputes between the Earl of Eſſex and Sir Walter Raleigh as the principal cauſe of the miſcarriages in this voyage, which, from the facts contained in the laſt note, ſeem not very probable. We may add to this, that Sir Arthur Gorges, who wrote the very beſt account of this voyage, tells us, that when the Earl and Sir Walter met at Flores, the Earl acquainted him with the ſurmiſes that had been vented of his abſence, and named to him ſome who had taxed him ſecretly, and yet pretended to love him; upon which Sir Arthur makes the following reflexion (43): 'Though the Earl had many doubts and 'jealouſies buzzed into his ears againſt him, yet I 'have often obſerved, that both in his greateſt actions 'of ſervice, and in the time of his chiefeſt recreations, 'he would ever accept of his counſel and company, 'before many others who thought themſelves more in 'his favour.' In reference to the high diſpute at Fayall, Sir Henry Wotton tells us, that when one, whoſe name he ſays he need not remember, preſſed the Earl to put Sir Walter at leaſt to a Court Martial, he anſwered (44), That I would do if he were not my friend. Some copies indeed read, if he were my friend, which perhaps is the true reading. We may very eaſily reconcile all this, by ſuppoſing that both the Earl and Sir Walter might have their reaſons for not letting the world know how far they were friends. Mr. White, in his Letters to Sir Robert Sydney during the Earl's abſence on this expedition, obſerves, that the creation of Barons, which it was intended ſhould have preceded the meeting of Parliament, was, by Secretary Cecil, put off till the Earl's return (45), and this plainly ſhews that he kept, or would be thought to keep, that treaty of good correſpondence which he had concluded with his Lordſhip.

[L] The ſatisfaction he deſired.] In order to apprehend this matter clearly, we muſt firſt learn what was the true cauſe of the Earl of Eſſex's diſcontent, which was very far from being ſo idle or unreaſonable as ſome have repreſented it. The Lord Admiral Howard had, in his abſence, been raiſed from the degree of a Baron to the title of Earl of Nottingham, and in the preamble of the patent his taking of Cadiz is particularly mentioned. Now, by virtue of a regulation made in the reign of Henry VIII. the Great Chamberlain of England, the Earl Marſhal, the Admiral, and the Steward of the Houſhold, were to have precedency in Parliament of all Peers of the ſame rank; ſo that if the Earl of Eſſex had attended the ſervice of the Houſe, the Earl of Nottingham, though created but a few days before, would have taken place of him in virtue of this regulation (46), though in the ſervice for which he was raiſed to his new title, the Earl of Eſſex had the precedency, and had no reaſon to believe that the Queen was not perfectly ſatisfied with his behaviour in that expedition. It was this that occaſioned his retiring from Court, and ſhewing ſuch high marks of diſcontent, with the motives of which, when the

Eſſex Earl-Marſhal of England, which was done December 28th, 1597 (n), and he took his place in Parliament accordingly on Wedneſday the 11th of January following: but whereas Camden reports, that this office had been ſuppreſſed, or lain dormant, from the death of the Earl of Shrewſbury, whence it might be inferred, that it was a very extraordinary thing for the Queen to be drawn to this promotion, it is clearly a miſtake, the Earl of Suſſex ſitting, in this very Parliament, as Earl-Marſhal, and having precedence accordingly (o). We may add to this, that Camden himſelf had occaſion to conſider this point of the ſucceſſion, power, and prerogative of the Earls Marſhal of England very cloſely; nor is it at all improbable that it was upon this very occaſion; for the Earl of Eſſex is the laſt Marſhal mentioned in his liſt, and he ſhews very fully his hereditary claim to that great honour (p). It is generally agreed, that this noble perſon had nothing of diſſimulation in his nature, and therefore, having obtained this new favour of the Queen, he was perfectly well pleaſed, and very readily promiſed Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State, who was appointed to execute a commiſſion of great importance to the French King, that nothing to the prejudice of his intereſt ſhould be done in his abſence, without which promiſe the Secretary would not have gone; and this he not only performed with the utmoſt punctuality, but even diſcharged the Secretary's buſineſs, in his abſence, with the utmoſt care and vigilance; and all this time there were no quarrels with Sir Walter Raleigh, or ſo much as the leaſt coldneſs. On the contrary, Sir Walter knowing that the Earl had engaged himſelf to his relation Sir Robert Sydney, in reference to the poſt of Vice-Chamberlain, which was then vacant, he declined ſoliciting for it purely out of reſpect to Eſſex (q). But in the month of May, 1598, Sir Robert Cecil returning to England with new notions in relation to the peace, there quickly aroſe freſh diſputes in the Council about the expediency of that meaſure, which was very earneſtly as well as eloquently preſſed by the old and wiſe Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, and as warmly decried by the Earl of Eſſex, who wanted not very plauſible reaſons in ſupport of what he ſaid (r). The Treaſurer, at length, grew into a great heat, inſomuch that he told the Earl of Eſſex, that he ſeemed to be intent upon nothing but blood and ſlaughter. The Earl explained himſelf upon this, that the blood and ſlaughter of the Queen's enemies might be very lawfully his intention; that he was not againſt a ſolid but a ſpecious and precarious peace; that the Spaniards were a ſubtle and ambitious people, who had contrived to do England more miſchief in time of peace than of war; and that as to an enemy, whoſe hands it was impoſſible to bind by treaty, it was better not to tie up our own (s). The Treaſurer at laſt drew out a Prayer-Book, in which he ſhewed Eſſex this expreſſion, Men of blood ſhall not live out half their duys (t). Yet Camden, from whom we have all this, acknowledges, that many thought the arguments of Eſſex had weight, and that, in reality, his chief concern was for the honour and happineſs of his native country, which he thought might be better promoted by an open war, which would always keep the King of Spain's hands full at home, than by an unſteady peace, which might give his Catholic Majeſty time to recover his ſucceſſive loſſes, and allow him leiſure alſo to practiſe his uſual arts for weakening us (u). As the Earl knew well enough, that various methods would be uſed to prejudice the common people againſt him, more eſpecially ſuch as, in any degree, got their living by trade, or thought themſelves oppreſſed by the taxes levied for the ſupport of the war, he reſolved to write a vindication of his own proceedings, and to deliver his own arguments with all the advantages that his own pathetic eloquence could give them (w), which he addreſſed to his dear friend Anthony Bacon, and which ſtill remains a memorial of his great virtues and admirable abilites [M]. About this time died the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh (x), which Queen was thoroughly acquainted, ſhe ſhewed herſelf ſo little pleaſed, that the Earl of Nottingham thought proper to retire, though he was Lord Steward as well as Lord Admiral, and going to his houſe at Chelſea gave out that he was ſick (47). The Queen immediately laid the fault upon the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh and Sir Robert Cecil, who, ſays Mr. White, with infinite proteſtations, execrations, and vows, denied it. However, to ſet matters right again, they had recourſe to Sir Walter Raleigh, whom they ſent to the Earl of Eſſex to diſpoſe him to admit of ſome expedient (48), which is certainly a proof that Sir Walter and he were not upon bad terms, or had been accuſing one another to the Queen. By his interpoſition the Earl was content, that his hereditary claim to the dignity of Earl Marſhal being admitted, by which he recovered his precedency again, he was willing to forget what was paſt; and it is very remarkable, that, after this agreement was made, Mr. White writes to Sir Robert Sydney, that the world exceedingly wondered to ſee the too great familiarity that was grown between the Earl of Eſſex, Sir Robert Cecil, and Sir Walter Raleigh: none but they enjoy him, ſays he, and they carry him away as they liſt (49). This is a very ſingular piece of ſecret Hiſtory, and ſets the whole of theſe tranſactions in a new point of light.

[M] Of his great virtues and admirable abilities.] The title of this work runs thus: To Mr. Anthony Bacon, an Apologie of the Earle of Eſſexe, againſt thoſe which falſlie and maliciouſlie take him to be the only Hindrance of the Peace and Quiet of his Countrie (50). In it he gives a ſuccinct and very impartial account of the undertakings and conduct of his whole life; he declares his love of peace; and his diſlike of war when it is a worſe evil than a bad peace; he explains the cauſes for ſuſpecting the ſincerity of the Spaniſh offers; obſerves, that when they treated before, they at the ſame time laboured to corrupt Dr. Lopez, the Queen's Phyſician, to poiſon her; and even at this time he aſſerts, that there was one Anthony Rolles, a priſoner in the Tower, who came over with a commiſſion from the King of Spain, to offer him, the Earl of Eſſex, whatever title, preferment, or penſion he ſhould deſire, for taking their part (51). He next opens the political motives that might, in all probability, induce the Catholick King to conclude a peace, without any true which was a great misfortune to the Earl of Eſſex, ſince the remembrance of his father, the truſt repoſed in him by committing this his eldeſt ſon to his care, and the reſpect and obedience which had been ſhewn him by the young Lord for ſeveral years, preſerved in him a tenderneſs for his perſon, and a real concern for his fortunes. But when that great Counſellor was gone, thoſe who hated the Earl acted without any reſtraint, croſſed whatever he propoſed, ſtopped the riſe of every man he loved, and treated all his projects with an air of ſupercilious contempt, except one, which they thought would be his ruin. By the death of the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh the Chancellorſhip of the Univerſity of Cambridge became vacant, upon which, as the higheſt mark of their reſpect poſſible, that learned body choſe the Earl of Eſſex (y) in his room. Upon this account he went down to pay them a viſit, was entertained at Queen's College with great magnificence, and, as a proof of their general affection, the room in which he lay was, long after, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Eſſex Chamber (z). We may account this as one of the laſt inſtances of this great man's felicity, for he was now advanced too high to ſit at eaſe; and thoſe who longed for his honours and employments, very buſily ſtudied how they might bring about his fall. The firſt great ſhock he had given him in the Queen's favour, was on the ſcore of the perſon he propoſed to be ſent over to Ireland, before he was drawn to have thoughts of going thither himſelf; and though, in appearance, he was reconciled and reſtored to the Queen's favour, yet there is good reaſon to doubt whether it was ever recovered in reality (a), or at leaſt to the degree in which he formerly held it. The reader will find the cauſe, the circumſtances, and the conſequences of this quarrel, in the notes [N]. An event happened much about this time, which ſhewed the ſentiments the enemies of England had of this noble perſon, and ought therefore to have endeared him to ſuch as had a real affection for their country. There was one Edward Squire ſeized and impriſoned for treaſon, and his caſe came out to be this: he had been a groom in the Queen's ſtables, went afterwards to ſea with Sir Francis Drake, was taken priſoner and carried to Spain, where he was perſuaded by a Jeſuit to undertake poiſoning the Earl of Eſſex, and afterwards Queen Elizabeth; for performing which he had poiſon given him in a bladder (b). He found means to rub this, as he was directed, upon the pommel of the Queen's ſaddle, got himſelf afterwards recommended to ſerve on board the Earl's ſhip in the Iſland Voyage, where, in like manner, he poiſoned both the arms of his great chair; yet no effect followed in either caſe (c). Upon this, the Spaniſh Jeſuit ſuſpecting the man, and not his drug, cauſed information to be given in England againſt Squire, who, finding himſelf betrayed by his Confeſſor, opened the whole ſcene, and plainly acknowledged his endeavours to diſpatch both the Queen and true intention of living at quiet; the great advantages that might ariſe from thence to Spain, and bad conſequences to us and our allies, more eſpecially the States of Holland, of whoſe government and intereſts he diſcourſes with great clearneſs and capacity; and ſhews how fit he was to manage, as he did that very year, a new treaty between the Queen his Sovereign and that Republick (52).

[N] In the notes.] We have the beſt, indeed the only full account of this matter from Camden, who was a very judicious man, as well as furniſhed with the beſt memoirs of that reign that were to be procured, and therefore we will give it in his words. Having mentioned the motives alledged by Eſſex for carrying on the war, he proceeds thus (53): 'There followed after this,' ſays he, 'a pretty warm diſpute between the Queen and Eſſex, about the choice of ſome fit and able perſon to ſuperintend the affairs of Ireland, at which none were preſent but the Lord Admiral; Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary; and Windebanke, Clerk of the Seal: for whereas the Queen looked upon Sir William Knolles, uncle to Eſſex, as the moſt proper perſon for that charge; and Eſſex contending that Sir George Carew would much better execute that office (perhaps on purpoſe to get rid of him), and when the Queen could by no means be perſuaded to approve his choice, he quite forgot himſelf and his duty, and turned his back upon his Prince in a kind of contempt. The Queen, not able to bear his inſolence, beſtowed on him a box on the ear, and bade him go and be hanged. He immediately clapped his hand on his ſword, and the Lord Admiral ſtepping in between, he ſwore a great oath he neither could nor would put up an affront of that nature, nor would he have taken it at the hands of Henry VIII. himſelf, and in a great paſſion immediately withdrew from the Court. The Lord Keeper adviſed him, in a ſerious and conſiderate letter, to apply himſelf to the Queen for pardon (54), alledging, that 'twas the beſt way to ſtoop to her anger for the preſent, remembering that paſſage of Seneca, If the law puniſhes a guilty perſon he muſt ſubmit to juſtice; if one innocent he muſt yield to fortune. If he had given the Queen a juſt offence, 'twas not in his power to make her amends; whereas if ſhe had done him an injury, he was obliged in prudence, duty, and religion, to bear with his Sovereign, to whom he had ſo many obligations, for that there was a vaſt difference between a Prince and a ſubject. He ſent the Lord Keeper his anſwer in a long and paſſionate letter, which his friends afterwards unadviſedly divulged, wherein he appealed from the Queen to God Almighty, in expreſſions ſomething to this purpoſe: 'That there is no tempeſt ſo boiſterous as the reſentment of an angry Prince: that the Queen was of a flinty temper: that he well enough knew what was due from him as a ſubject, an Earl, and Grand Marſhal of England, but did not underſtand the office of a drudge or a porter: that to own himſelf a criminal was to injure truth, and the author of it, God Almighty: that his body ſuffered in every part of it by that blow given him by his Prince: that 'twould be a crime in him to ſerve a Queen who had given him ſo great an affront. What! was it impoſſible for crowned heads to do wrong, and ſo to ſtand accountable to their ſubjects? Was any power below of an unlimited nature? And did not Solomon ſay, that he is a fool who laughs when he is ſtricken? They only that were gainers by the miſcarriages of Princes were obliged to take the indignities they offered, and thoſe who ſuſpected the omnipotence of the Deity, might, if they pleaſed, place it in earthly Princes: for my part,' ſaid he, 'I have ſuffered ſo many and great injuries, that I cannot but reſent them from my very heart.' However, in a little time he became more pliant, received his pardon, and was re-admitted into the Queen's favour, who always thought it a leſs crime to offend a perſon, than to proſecute him with a perfect hatred. However, his friends were apt to date his ruin from this unlucky circumſtance, having made this remark, That fortune ſeldom careſſes a caſt-off favourite a ſecond time, and Princes once diſobliged are ſeldom heartily reconciled.

the Earl, for which he was deſervedly executed (d). The miſeries of Ireland continued all this time, or rather increaſed; and when propoſals were made, in the Queen's Council, for ſending over a new Governor, with certain reſtrictions, Eſſex took occaſion of ſhewing, that nothing had been hitherto ſo expenſive as an ill-timed frugality, and that the Iriſh rebels had been the only gainers by the reſtraints put upon the Engliſh Deputies (e). Thoſe who hated this noble perſon were not diſpleaſed when they found him in this diſpoſition, and at length took in their turn occaſion, from his objections, to ſuggeſt, that the total reduction of that iſland was to be expected from none but himſelf; which at firſt he declined; but perceiving that he could enjoy little quiet or comfort at home, that it was with difficulty he maintained his credit, and that by failing the expectations of his friends he ſhould gradually loſe them, he conſented to accept that fatal preferment, and agreed to go over into that kingdom, which had been the grave of his father's fortunes, and which his beſt friends foreſaw would prove the gulf of his own (f). It is indeed true, that he had a great army granted him, and that due care was taken for the payment of it; that his powers were very large, and his appointments very great; but theſe were obtained with many ſtruggles, and notice was taken of every thing he promiſed, or ſeemed to promiſe, in order to obtain them (g); and, when all things were regulated, he was ſo far from going with alacrity, as to a place which he had ſought, and to a command which he had meditated for the ſake of greater things, that he ſeemed rather to look upon it as a baniſhment, and a place aſſigned him for a retreat from his Sovereign's preſent diſpleaſure, rather than a potent government beſtowed upon him by her favour [O]. On the 12th of March, 1598-9, his commiſſion for Lord Lieutenant paſſed the Great Seal (b), and, on the 27th of the ſame month, about two in the afternoon, he ſet out from Seething Lane, and paſſed through the city in a plain habit, accompanied by many of the Nobility. He was attended by vaſt crowds of people out of town; and it was obſerved, with a view perhaps to prepare the world to have a bad opinion of his conduct, that the weather was exceeding fair when he took horſe, but by that time he came to Iſlington there was a heavy ſtorm of rain, attended with thunder and lightning (i). The like bad weather he met with at ſea, ſo that he did not arrive at Dublin, or take upon him his charge, before April 15th, 1599 (k). He found things in that country in a ſtate very different from what he expected, and perceived that there was nothing to be done, at leaſt to any purpoſe, till he was well acquainted with the country in which he was to act. He found likewiſe that the new-raiſed men he had brought over were altogether unfit for action, till they were ſeaſoned to the country, and well acquainted with diſcipline (l). Theſe conſiderations hindered him from marching directly to Ulſter, for fear Tir-Oen ſhould make any advantage of his weakneſſes; and the Council deſiring that he would ſuppreſs ſome diſorders in Munſter, he thought that a fair occaſion of exerciſing his new troops, and did it effectually (m). On his return to Dublin, that very day two months on which he had received the government, he wrote a letter to the Queen, containing a free, fair, and full repreſentation of the ſtate of things in that country; which moſt admirable performance, pointing out all the ſteps that were afterwards taken, and by which his ſucceſſor made an end of the war, remains upon record in Ireland (n); but of the contents thereof not a ſyllable is mentioned in Camden, or the reſt of our hiſtorians. This letter he ſent over to the Queen by his Secretary, in hopes that from thence ſhe might have derived a juſt notion of the ſtate of things in that iſland; but it produced no ſuch effect. On the contrary, the Queen was exceedingly provoked that he had not marched into Ulſter, in order to attack Tir-Oen, and repeated her orders upon that head in very ſtrong terms (o). Before theſe arrived, Sir Henry Harrington, with ſome of the freſh troops, had been worſted by the O'Brians; which ſo provoked Eſſex, that he cauſed the remains of thoſe troops to be decimated (p); which, with the throwing a ſoldier overboard in his laſt expedition, with his own hands, are the only inſtances of ſeverity that are recorded of him (q). When he received the Queen's orders, and was on the point of marching into Ulſter, he was prevailed upon to enter the country of Ophaly, to reduce the O'Conners and the O'Moores, which he performed; but his troops were ſo harraſſed and diminiſhed thereby, that, with the advice and conſent of the Council of Ireland, he wrote home for a recruit of two thouſand men (r). In the midſt of theſe croſſes in Ireland, an army was ſuddenly raiſed in England, under the command of the Earl of Nottingham; nobody well knowing why, but, in reality, from the ſuggeſtions of the Earl's enemies to the Queen, that he rather meditated an invaſion on his native country, than the reduction of the Iriſh rebels (s). At length Eſſex, intending for Ulſter, ſent orders to Clifford, who commanded at Connaught, to march towards the enemy on that ſide, that Tir-Oen might be obliged to divide his forces; which was executed, but with ſuch ill fortune, that the Engliſh, being ſurprized, were beaten, with the loſs of their Commander in Chief, together with Sir Alexander Ratcliffe, and one hundred and forty men (t). Upon the arrival of the ſuccours which he had demanded, the Lord Lieutenant marched, though with a ſmall force, againſt Tir-Oen, in the latter end of the month of Auguſt; but, on the eighth of September following, was prevailed upon to confer with him alone at the ford of Ballaclynch; and afterwards with counſellors on both ſides, when he concluded a truce for ſix weeks; and ſo from ſix weeks to ſix weeks, till May, provided that, on a fortnight's notice, either party might be at liberty to reſume the war (u). He was led to this by the weak and deſperate reſolution he had taken of returning to England, whither he had once ſome thoughts of tranſporting a body of his forces; but was diſſuaded from it by his friends. However, upon receiving a ſharp letter, directed to him and the Council, from the Queen, he determined to ſtay no longer, ſettled the government in the beſt manner he could, and, with a few of his friends, came over to England (w). He arrived before any notice could be received of his deſign; went directly to the court at Nonſuch; and preſented himſelf to the Queen on the 28th of September, where he met with a tolerable reception, but was, ſoon after, committed, treated with a mixture of kindneſs and ſeverity, till, upon his abſolute ſubmiſſion, he was brought before ſome of the Privy Council, ſeverely reprimanded, diſmiſſed from the Board, ſuſpended from the exerciſe of all his great offices, excepting that of Maſter of the Horſe, and committed to a Keeper, Sir Richard Barkley, who was, not long after, withdrawn (x). Such was the iſſue of the Queen's reſentments. As for what happened afterwards, it was the effect of his own ill conduct, wrought up to a degree of madneſs from the artifices of his ſubtle enemies [P]. In

[P] From the artifices of his ſubtle enemies.] It may not be amiſs, for the ſake of preſerving the connection of this great man's hiſtory, and to prevent that confuſion which may eaſily happen from two diſtinct proceedings againſt him upon this affair, to ſet down the dates a little more particularly, but at the ſame time as conciſely as poſſible. He was preſently after his arrival, that is, on the ſecond of October, confined in the houſe of the Lord Keeper Egerton very ſtrictly, ſo that even his family were not permitted to ſee him, his friends had little countenance at Court, and the Queen ſpoke with more or leſs vehemence, but ever with diſpleaſure (57). But her Majeſty being informed, that the people both in town and country took great liberty in their diſcourſes, the Lords of the Council in the Star-chamber, at the laſt ſitting in Michaelmas term, on the twenty-eighth of November, 1599, were commanded to ſay, what they thought might juſtify what had been done, and put a ſtop to theſe murmurs. The Lord Keeper began with obſerving, that the Queen was an abſolute Princeſs, and yet condeſcended to inform her people, that the army lately ſent into Ireland was ſuch a one as a King's ſon might have thought it an honour to command, and a better than our antient Kings had to conquer France; that ſhe forgave the perſon ſhe choſe to command it a debt of eight thouſand pounds, and put into his purſe a gift to the value of twenty-two thouſand; that the ſcheme of the war was laid down in Council, which himſelf approved; that he followed quite another courſe in Ireland, and contrary to the Queen's expreſs commandment, which was a contempt of a very high nature; and ſince his return the Privy-Council of Ireland had diſavowed his actions; and of theſe points the Lord Keeper directed the Juſtices of Peace to give full information in their reſpective counties. The Lord Treaſurer Buckhurſt ſhewed how the Queen's treaſure had been waſted; the Lord Admiral Nottingham magnified the promiſes the Earl made before he went; his ſaying that he would make the earth tremble beneath him; that notwithſtanding this the army had ſuffered much diſhonour, was greatly weakened, and ſuch propoſals of peace brought over, as, with a great oath, he ſwore the Queen would hazard her perſon, and die amongſt them, before ſhe would grant. The Lord Chamberlain Hunſdon ſaid only, that the army was great, and that with ſuch an officer at their head as the Earl of Eſſex it might have endangered Spain. Sir Francis Knolles ſpoke to the ſame effect. The Secretary, Sir Robert Cecil, in a ſpeech full of proteſtations, in which he ſtiled thoſe who diſliked the Queen's Miniſters the devil's children and wicked ſpirits, affirmed, that in a little more than ten years the Queen had ſpent three millions four hundred thouſand pounds upon Ireland; that the Earl had a royal army; that he had diminiſhed it without doing any thing; that he returned, contrary to her Majeſty's expreſs commands; and that if he had ſtaid but twenty days longer the Queen had ſent him a ſucceſſor (58). The Earl was not preſent at that time, nor had any opportunity of defending

In the ſummer of the year 1600 he recovered his liberty, and, in the autumn following, he received Mr. Cuffe, who had been his ſecretary in Ireland, into his counſels; who laboured to perſuade him, that ſubmiſſion would never do him any good; that the Queen was in the hands of a faction, who were his enemies; and that the only way to reſtore his fortune, was to find a means of obtaining an audience, in which he might be able to repreſent his own caſe, let the means be what it would (y). The Earl heard this dangerous advice without conſenting to it, till he found there were no hopes of getting his farm of the ſweet wines renewed: then it is ſaid that, giving a looſe to his paſſion, he let fall many vehement expreſſions, and, amongſt the reſt, this fatal reflection (z), That the Queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was become as crooked as her carcaſe. Camden ſays (a), that this was aggravated by ſome of the Court Ladies, whom he had diſappointed in their intrigues. The Earl of Clarendon ſeems to ſuſpect the truth of it (b); but another great Hiſtorian, who knew all the paſſages of thoſe times well, is more clear in this reſpect (c). We have elſewhere traced the progreſs of his unlucky contrivance, in which he ſeemed to act rather as the inſtrument of his enemies, in ſhaping his own and his friends deſtruction, than as a man of abilities (which ſurely he did not want) ſtruggling with the frowns of fortune (d). Thoſe enemies, who had exact intelligence of all that he propoſed, having provided effectually againſt the execution of his deſigns, hurried him upon his fate by a meſſage ſent on the evening of the 7th of February, requiring him to attend the Council; which he declined (e.) He then gave out that they ſought his life, kept a watch in Eſſex-Houſe all night, and ſummoned his friends for his defence the next morning. The Queen, being informed of the great reſort of people of all ranks to the Earl, ſent the Lord Keeper Egerton, the Earl of Worceſter, Sir Francis Knolles (his uncle by the mother's ſide), and the Lord Chief-Juſtice Popham, to know his grievances, whom, after a ſhort and ineffectual conference, he confined; and then, attended by the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Sands, the Lord Monteagle, and about two hundred Gentlemen, he went into the city, where the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Cromwell, and ſome other Gentlemen, joined him; but his dependence on the populace failed him; and Sir Robert Cecil prevailing upon his brother the Lord Burleigh to go with Sir Gilbert Dethick, then King at Arms, and proclaim Eſſex and his adherents traitors, in the principal ſtreets, the Earl found it impoſſible to return to his houſe by land; and, therefore, ſending Sir Ferdinando Gorges before to releaſe the Chief-Juſtice, who, for his own ſake, thought fit to extend that order to the reſt of the Privy-Counſellors; the Earl, with his principal attendants, returned in boats to Eſſex-Houſe, which was quickly inveſted by the Earl of Nottingham, Lord Admiral, with a great force, to whom, after many diſputes, and ſome blood ſpilt, he and his adherents at laſt ſurrendered (f). Eſſex was carried that night to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's palace at Lambeth, with the Earl of Southampton, and the next day they were ſent to the Tower (g). On the 19th of the ſame month they were arraigned before their Peers, and, after a long trial, the moſt material circumſtances of which we have had occaſion to mention elſewhere, they were found guilty, and ſentence of death pronounced by the Lord Buckhurſt, who ſat as Lord High Steward (h). Upon this melancholy occaſion all that Eſſex ſaid was, If her Majeſty had pleaſed, this body of mine might have done her better ſervice; however, I ſhall be glad if it may prove ſerviceable to her any way (i). After he was remanded to the Tower, there were great pains taken to draw from him very large and full confeſſions; which was the more eaſy, as he was truly and ſincerely pious; and, after he was once perſuaded that his project was of a treaſonable nature, made it a point of conſcience to diſcloſe all he knew, though it was highly prejudicial to his friends, and could do no good to himſelf; and, indeed, he did not appear either to deſign or deſire it (k). Two reaſons ſeem eſpecially to have moved ſuch as ſet on foot theſe practices, by which the honeſty of Eſſex was rendered fatal even to his laſt breath, and they were ſuch as became politicians, who had nothing but ſelf-intereſt in view, which, if they could promote, they had not either conſideration or pity for others. The firſt was, that, by his proper confeſſion, they might effectually eſtabliſh the truth of his plot, increaſe the number of its circumſtances, heighten the apparent danger of its conſequences, and thereby furniſh plentiful materials for proclamations, ſermons, and declarations (l), which might remove from the unhappy Earl all means of obtaining mercy, excite in the Queen the utmoſt horror, and, at the ſame time, defending himſelf. His confinement continued all the winter with the ſame ſeverity. This threw him into a grievous fit of ſickneſs, from which he recovered but ſlowly, through his exceſſive anxiety. At length he was permitted to ſee his Lady, and ſome hopes were given him, as if the Queen meant to humble and not to cruſh him. Laſt of all he was brought to a public audience, before a Committee of the Privy Council and others, in the Lord Keeper's houſe, June 5, 1600, where, for eleven hours, he heard all the ſpeeches that were made againſt him with great humility, kneeling, till, upon the motion of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he was allowed to ſtand, then to lean, and at laſt to ſit upon a ſtool (59). But he knelt again when he received his ſentence, and though no mention was made of his poſt of Maſter of the Horſe, yet the Earl of Worceſter performed the functions of it, and he had no aſſurance of his being reſtored (60). He was remanded into cuſtody, and his keeper continued with him till the 27th of Auguſt, and then he was permitted to retire to Ewelme-lodge in Oxfordſhire (61).

terrify her with diſmal apprehenſions, while the nation in general was aſtoniſhed, and its affection for the unhappy ſufferer cooled, or, at leaſt, confounded. In all this, for a time, they gained their end [Q]. The other motive was finding out evidence againſt the chief of his adherents, many of them of great quality, and ſome alſo of great fortune, whom they meant to let eſcape out of the briars, provided nevertheleſs that they left their fleeces behind them, in which they were likewiſe but too ſucceſsful (m), rendering highly profitable to themſelves that clemency which their Royal Miſtreſs would have extended freely. Camden adds to this another circumſtance, which wants explaining: he ſays, that he diſcovered many in Scotland, France, and the Low-Countries, who were embarked with him, beſides others in England, and the Lord Montjoy, who ſucceeded him in the government of Ireland; ſo that their numbers obliged the Queen to diſſemble what ſhe knew: he adds, that he gave a confeſſion under his hand, which his enemies ſhewing to King James ſome time after, brought him and his friends into great diſeſteem with that Prince (n). We ſhall endeavour to give ſome light into this in the notes [R].

After

[Q] They gained their end.] What it was that in thoſe times the enemies of this unfortunate Peer laboured to impute to him, ſeems to be moſt clearly ſtated by Heylyn (62), as Sir William Dugdale well obſerves; and his account is the true key to what was ſuggeſted by the Attorney-General Coke at the Earl's trial, and is covertly inſinuated in the long Declaration of treaſons, drawn at the Queen's command by Sir Francis Bacon, and much altered by direction, as himſelf confeſſes. Take this paſſage in Heylyn's own words: 'While the Prelates of the Church were buſied upon diſputes, the Preſbyterians found themſelves ſome better work, in making friends, and faſtening on ſome eminent patron to ſupport their cauſe. None fitter for their purpoſe than the Earl of Eſſex, gracious amongſt the military men, popular beyond meaſure, and as ambitious of command as he was of applauſe. He had his education in the houſe of the Earl of Leiceſter, and took to wife a daughter of Sir Francis Walſingham, who fitted and prepared him for thoſe applications which hitherto he had neglected, upon a juſt fear of incurring the Queen's diſpleaſure. But the Queen being now grown old, the King of Scots not much regarded by the Engliſh, and very-ill obeyed by his natural ſubjects, he began to look up towards the Crown, to which a title was drawn for him as the direct heir of Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Glouceſter, one of the younger ſons of King Edward III. This man the Puritans cry up with moſt infinite praiſes, both in their pulpits and in their pamphlets, telling him that he was not only great in honour and the love of the people, but temporis expectatione major, far greater in the expectation which his friends had of him. And he accordingly applies himſelf to thoſe of the Puritan faction; admits them to places of moſt truſt and credit about his perſon; keeps open houſe for men of thoſe opinions to reſort unto, under pretence of hearing ſermons; and hearing no ſermons with more zeal and edification than thoſe which ſeemed to attribute a power to inferior Magiſtrates for curbing and controuling their undoubted Sovereigns. Which queſtionleſs muſt needs have ended in great diſturbance to the Church and State, if he had not been outwitted by Sir Robert Cecil, Sir Walter Raleigh, and the reſt of their party in the Court, by whom he was firſt ſhifted over into Ireland, and at laſt brought upon the ſcaffold, not to receive a crown, but to loſe his head. Which happened very opportunely for King James of Scotland, whoſe entrance might have been oppoſed, and his title queſtioned, if this ambitious man had proſpered in his undertakings, which he conducted generally with more heat than judgement.'

[R] In the notes.] We have elſewhere mentioned a letter written to Anthony Bacon, Eſq. concerning the death and confeſſion of this unfortunate Peer (63); and in that we find a fair and genuine account of his Lordſhip's real intentions, correſponding exactly with what Camden hints, who was unwilling to ſpeak plainer, becauſe, as he elſewhere confeſſed, he knew King James's thoughts upon this matter, notwithſtanding they were none of the plaineſt; for ſometimes he ſtiled Eſſex his martyr; and, at others, he expreſſed no great kindneſs for him. What follows will ſufficiently account for both, and fulfil all that has been promiſed for it in the text (64).

(63) See the article of BACON (ANTHONY) in this Dictionary.

'After his Lordſhip's condemnation, upon his ſuit 'to the Lords, there was ſent to him one Aſhton, that 'was preacher in his houſe, a man baſe, fearful, and 'mercenary, but ſuch a one, as, by a formal ſhew of 'zeal, had gotten a good opinion of that noble Lord, 'who that way (being himſelf moſt religious) might 'eaſily be deceived. How the man was prepared I 'touch not; but how he dealt, the ſubſtance of which 'was his own confeſſion to a worthy perſon, as he 'well knoweth, I will fully relate unto you. At his 'coming to my Lord he found his Lordſhip exceeding 'chearful, and prepared with great contentation for 'his end, with whom he began to deal to this effect: '"My Lord, I am unfeignedly ſorry to ſee no more 'ſenſe in you of theſe great and fearful ſins into 'which you have fallen, whereby you have diſhonoured God, ſhamed your profeſſion, offended your 'Sovereign, and pulled upon yourſelf many notes of 'infamy. You have now manifeſted to the world, 'that all your ſhew of religion was mere hypocriſy; 'that you are in heart either an Atheiſt or a Papiſt, 'which doth plainly appear, in that all your inſtruments, followers and favourers, were of this quality, 'moſt of them men of no means, but either baſe perſons whom you had raiſed, or ſuch as had lewdly 'conſumed their own patrimony. And if there were 'any of better condition for their ſtate, yet were they 'either recuſants, or ſuch as were diſcontented with 'the preſent government, ſo as the badneſs of both 'your cauſe and action doth herein ſhew itſelf, that 'not one man, but of the ſort beforementioned, took 'your part or liked your courſe. Beſides, however 'you would colour it with other pretences, your end 'was an ambitious ſeeking of the crown, the hope 'whereof, for their own raiſing, made theſe men ſo 'follow, animate, and applaud you. So that if by a 'true confeſſion and unfeigned repentance you do not 'unburthen yourſelf of theſe ſins, you ſhall carry out 'of the world a guilty ſoul before God, and leave 'upon your memorial an infamous name to poſterity. 'Therefore I will ſay to you, as Joſhua did to Achan '(for you have diſhonoured God more than ever he 'did), Give glory to God, and make confeſſion of your 'faults; for, as Solomon ſaith, He that hides his ſins 'ſhall not proſper."

'Many more words of gall and bitterneſs to this 'effect he ſpake, as himſelf confeſſed, wherein, tho' 'peradventure I may forget in the preciſeneſs of form, 'I religiouſly proteſt I fail not in the ſubſtance and 'matter. My Lord with this ſtrange ſtile was much 'amazed, his expectation being ſo greatly deceived, 'as looking rather in his caſe for a comforter, than ſo 'bitter and ſlanderous an accuſer, who after a ſad and 'ſilent pauſe made anſwer to this effect: "Mr. Aſhton, 'you have laid grievous things to my charge, of 'which, if I could not with truth free and clear myſelf, I might juſtly be holden one of the moſt unworthieſt creatures on earth. And I aſſure you, to 'have theſe reports carried and believed in the world, 'is more grievous to me than a thouſand deaths. 'Firſt, touching my Religion, I have always abhorred 'atheiſm and ſuperſtition, believing in the true God, 'and deſiring to ſerve him in that form of his worſhip

(64) In the Appendix to the genuine addition of Camden's Annals by T. Hearne.

After drawing out of Eſſex all that he could ſay, and thereby rendering death more deſirable to him than life, the 25th of February was fixed for his execution, as to which the Queen was irreſolute to the very laſt, ſo that ſhe ſent Sir Edward Cary to countermand it; but, as Camden ſays, conſidering afterwards his obſtinacy, his refuſing to aſk her pardon, and declaring that his life was inconſiſtent with her ſafety, ſhe countermanded thoſe orders, and directed he ſhould die (o). There is a ſtrange ſtory current in the world about a ring, which the Earl of Clarendon ſtiles a looſe report, that crept into diſcourſe (p) ſoon after his miſerable end. Yet a foreign writer, of great reputation, gives us this as an undoubted truth, and that upon the authority of an Engliſh Miniſter, who might be well preſumed to know what he ſaid; and therefore, in the words of that writer, we ſhall report it (q) [S]. The manner of the Earl's ſuffering death is ſo largely related in Camden, and

'profeſſed and maintained in England, in which from 'my infancy I was brought up, and have conſtantly 'holden the profeſſion thereof to this day. True it is, 'in thoſe publick ſervices wherein I have been em-'ployed, I have had uſe of men of ſundry qualities; 'but, howſoever I loved their valour, faithfulneſs, and 'knowledge of ſervice that were not religious, I was 'ever grieved for the want thereof in them, and 'neglected no opportunity I poſſibly could gain to 'bring them unto it. For the crown I never af-'fected it, neither, praiſe I God, was I ever ſo care-'leſs of my ſoul, as, by ſeeking a crown on earth, to 'which I had no manner of title, to deprive my ſoul 'of a crown in Heaven where I have ſo aſſured hope. 'Neither am I ignorant what ſucceſs God, in his juſ-'tice, hath laid upon ſuch ambitious courſes in ages 'paſt. But being a principal member in this common-'wealth, I could not but ſee and feel what miſery was 'near unto my country, by the great power of ſuch as 'are known indeed to be Atheiſts, Papiſts, and Pen-'ſioners, to the mortal enemies of this kingdom. 'I knew myſelf bound in conſcience as a Chriſtian to 'prevent the ſubverſion of religion; and, as an En-'gliſhman, to have regard of my native country. 'The only means left to turn away theſe evils was, 'to procure my acceſs to her Majeſty, with whom I 'aſſured myſelf to have had that gracious hearing, that 'might have tended to the infinite happineſs of this 'State, both in removing evil inſtruments from about 'her perſon, and in ſettling a ſucceſſion for the crown, 'to the preventing of Spaniſh ſervitude, and ſaving of 'many thouſand Engliſhmen's lives: no, no, Mr. Aſh-'ton, I never deſired other condition than the ſtate of 'a ſubject, but only to my Sovereign, and not to baſe 'and unworthy vaſſals under her.' 'My Lord,' ſaith 'Aſhton, 'theſe are general ſpeeches, and not unlike 'to thoſe you uſed at your arraignment, and not much 'more believed of me now than they were of many 'then. You muſt remember you are going out of the 'world, you know what it is to receive ſentence of 'death here, but yet you know not what it is to ſtand 'before God's judgment ſeat, and to receive the ſen-'tence of eternal condemnation. Leave therefore all 'glorious pretences, free your conſcience from the 'burthen of your grievous ſins, for I proteſt I cannot 'believe that you had any other pretence than that I 'have told you, or can name one man (other than 'ſuch as I have mentioned) that was either adviſer, 'perſuader, or approver of your purpoſes. Neither 'ſee I any reaſon why, that I being watchman over 'your ſoul, ſhould not as well have been adviſed 'withal if theſe things had been ſo, as any other.' 'His Lordſhip with infinite grief replied, 'Mr. Aſhton, 'I cannot marvel though my proteſtations are not be-'lieved of my enemies, when they ſo little prevail 'with a man of your quality. But I am able to tell 'you that are a Miniſter and preacher of the Goſpel 'and the meſſenger of God to me at this my laſt end, 'by particulars ſo to confirm that which I have ſpoken, 'as you ſhall no longer doubt of it.' Then his Lord-'ſhip ſhewed him, as he confeſſed, his whole end to 'tend to the ſettling of the ſucceſſion by Act of 'Parliament on the King of Scotland, as the true and 'indubitate heir, after her Majeſty, of this kingdom; 'and named to him ſundry worthy perſons, both of 'religion, honour, and ſtate, that had their conſents, 'and were engaged with him therein. Aſhton, hav-'ing very attentively marked my Lord's words, made 'this reply: 'Theſe be great matters your Lordſhip 'hath opened unto me, and the concealing of them 'may touch my life. Alſo I hold myſelf bound in 'allegiance to reveal them: beſides, the publiſhing of 'them may give ſatisfaction to many that hold the 'ſame opinion of your courſes which I did; and fur-'ther, it may be dangerous to her Majeſty's perſon in 'ſome practice hereafter, by them, or ſome of their 'inſtruments, the burthen whereof your ſoul muſt 'bear, if you can and do not prevent it, and I will be 'a witneſs againſt you that you have ſpoken it.' Thus 'being extremely urged, he made confeſſion according 'to the premiſſes, namely, that he meant to have 'eſtabliſhed the King of Scots's title in ſucceſſion, and 'that in this intention he had many of the worthieſt 'perſons of the land in conſent with him; which alſo 'he had an earneſt purpoſe to have revealed at his 'death, as Aſhton and others have confeſſed, but that 'he was ſo mightily diſſuaded and commanded to the 'contrary as a thing that might tend to the great dan-'ger of her Majeſty's perſon.'

[S] We ſhall report it.] There are without doubt many falſhoods and fables relating to our Hiſtory, recorded very ſeriouſly in foreign writers, for want of having a due knowledge of our cuſtoms and conſtitution. Thus the French Ambaſſador here, or his ſon (65), wrote a letter to the Duke de Rohan, in which he aſſures him, that Eſſex's eloquence put all his Judges to ſilence at his trial, and that the Lords were all intoxicated with drink and tobacco when they brought him in guilty. Camden has refuted a ſtory that prevailed very early, as if Queen Elizabeth had ſhewn the head of the Earl of Eſſex to the French Ambaſſadors, who were ſent to congratulate her upon diſcovering his conſpiracy (66). But we know with the greateſt certainty, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty Henry IV. was brought to believe there was any truth in it; and that he told the Queen's Miniſter, when he aſſured him that the Earl deſired to die in private, that he knew the contrary, and that Eſſex had deſired earneſtly that his laſt declarations might be made in publick (67). But to the point; the Chevalier Louis Aubery de Maurier, who was many years the French Miniſter in Holland, a man of great parts and unſuſpected veracity, delivers this tale in the following words (68): 'It will not, I believe, be thought 'either impertinent or diſagreeable to add here what 'Prince Maurice had from the mouth of Mr. Carleton, 'Embaſſador from England in Holland, who died Se-'cretary of State: ſo well known under the name of 'my Lord Dorcheſter, and who was a man of great 'merit. He ſaid, that Queen Elizabeth gave the Earl 'of Eſſex a ring in the height of her paſſion for him, 'ordering him to keep it, and that whatever he ſhould 'commit ſhe would pardon him when he ſhould return 'that pledge. Since that time the Earl's enemies 'having prevailed with the Queen, who beſides was 'exaſperated againſt him for the contempt he ſhewed 'for her beauty, which, through age, began to decay, 'ſhe cauſed him to be impeached. When he was con-'demned, ſhe expected that he ſhould ſend her the 'ring, and would have granted him his pardon ac-'cording to her promiſe. The Earl, finding himſelf 'in the laſt extremity, applied to Admiral Howard's 'Lady, who was his relation, and deſired her, by a 'perſon whom he could truſt, to return the ring into 'the Queen's own hands. But her huſband, who was 'one of the Earl's greateſt enemies, and to whom ſhe 'told this imprudently, would not ſuffer her to acquit 'herſelf of the commiſſion; ſo that the Queen con-and others, that we ſhall not meddle with it here, farther than to obſerve, that, as many actions of his life ſpoke him a hero, ſo this laſt action ſhewed him a true Chriſtian, by manifeſting

'ſented to the Earl's death, being full of indignation 'againſt ſuch a proud and haughty ſpirit, who choſe 'rather to die than to implore her mercy. Some time 'after, the Admiral's Lady fell ſick, and being given 'over by her Phyſicians, ſhe ſent word to the Queen 'that ſhe had ſomething of great conſequence to tell 'her before ſhe died. The Queen came to her bed-'ſide, and having ordered all the attendants to with-'draw, the Admiral's Lady returned her, but too late, 'that ring from the Earl of Eſſex, deſiring to be ex-'cuſed that ſhe did not return it ſooner, having been 'prevented doing it by her huſband. The Queen re-'tired immediately, being overwhelmed with the ut-'moſt grief: ſhe ſighed continually for a fortnight 'following, without taking any nouriſhment, lying 'a-bed entirely dreſſed, and getting up an hundred 'times a night. At laſt ſhe died with hunger and 'with grief, becauſe ſhe had conſented to the death of 'a lover who had applied to her for mercy. This 'melancholy adventure ſhews, that there are fre-'quent tranſitions from one paſſion to another, and 'that as love often changes to hate, ſo hate, giving 'place ſometimes to pity, brings the mind back again 'into its firſt ſtate.' Sir Dudley Carleton, who is made the author of this ſtory, was a man who deſerved the character that is given of him, and could not but be well informed of what paſſed at Court; but who-ever conſiders the age of Queen Elizabeth at the time when the Earl of Eſſex firſt entered her preſence, will find it difficult to believe the Queen ever conſidered him in the light of a lover. This Counteſs of Nottingham was the daughter of the Lord Viſcount Hunſdon, related to the Queen, and alſo by his mother to the Earl of Eſſex. Before we part with this ſubject it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that ſomething of truth there certainly is as to the Queen's death being haſtened by an accident relating to a ring, and by her reflecting on the death of the Earl of Eſſex. In the ceremony of her coronation ſhe was wedded to the kingdom with a ring, which ſhe always wore, till, the fleſh growing over it, it was filed off a little before her deceaſe. About the ſame time obſerving, that the loſs of Eſſex, and the confuſion of his friends, had put her entirely into the hands of thoſe who began to neglect her, and to court her ſucceſſor, ſhe could not help ſaying, in an exceſs of paſſion, They have now got me in a yoke, I have nobody left me that I can truſt, my condition is the perfect reverſe of what it was (69). It is alſo true, that a melancholy ſenſe of this brought her to her end about twenty-five months after the death of Eſſex.

 [Notwithſtanding the copious account which our ingenious predeceſſor has given of Robert Devereux, the ſecond Earl of Eſſex, ſuch were the eminence and celebrity of his character, that the article is ſtill capable of farther additions. Theſe additions, however, will be chiefly of a private and perſonal nature; for it is not neceſſary to enter more largely, than has already been done, into a detail of events which occur in all the general hiſtories of the time.

It has been thought that the Earl of Eſſex did not diſplay, in his tender years, any promiſes of extraordinary capacity; and it is ſaid, in the article, that his father died with but a very cold conceit of him. But if we may judge of him from a Latin letter, which was written by him to Lord Burleigh, when he was not quite eleven years of age, it will appear that a wrong judgment had been formed concerning the deficiency of his early abilities. The letter, which is preſerved in "Murdin's Collection of State Papers," is as follows: "Voluntati tuæ et amicorum deſiderio ſatis-'feci, honoratiſſime domine; primum enim me rus 'contuli, ubi omnibus videbar gratiſſimus; quaprop-'ter tibi mittenti, et illis me excipientibus immor-'tales gratias habeo. 'To the Right Honorable my very good 'Lord and patron, the Lord Burghley,
'Lord High Treſerour of England.'

It may, indeed, be ſuggeſted, nor is it an unnatural ſuggeſtion, that, in this compoſition, our young Nobleman might receive aſſiſtance from his preceptors. But, on the other hand, it ſhould be conſidered how ſtrict and ſevere was the education of that time; and eſpecially, that ſuch a man as Lord Burleigh, who was the Earl's guardian, was not likely to be impoſed upon by the appearance of improvements in his ward which he did not poſſeſs.

It is taken notice of in the article, how anxious the Earl of Eſſex was for the advancement of his friends, and how much he was hurt when his endeavours to procure their promotion were unſucceſsful. Of this many proofs occur in Dr. Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, where the Earl's character in the point we are ſpeaking of is amply diſplayed. In that work great light is thrown upon his temper and conduct in general, and various minute circumſtances are recorded concerning him, for which we muſt refer to the book itſelf. Such particulars however, as ſeem to demand peculiar attention ſhall not be omitted. Among other things which will be found in Birch's Memoirs, is a very copious detail of the Earl of Eſſex's connections and correſpondencies with Anthony and Francis Bacon, and with the famous Spaniard, Antonio Perez, whoſe curious ſtory is related in Geddes's Tracts.

When Eſſex was no more than twenty-one years of age, he was competitor with the Lord Chancellor Hatton for the Chancellorſhip of the Univerſity of Oxford, which had become vacant by the death of the Earl of Leiceſter, on the fourth of September, 1588. Into this Univerſity our young Earl had been incorporated Maſter of Arts in the preceding April. He did not ſucceed in the conteſt; for being generally conſidered as a patron of the puritan party, as his deceaſed father-in-law had been, the intereſt of the Lord Chancellor, ſupported by that of Archbiſhop Whitgift, carried the election againſt him (71). He was again diſappointed, in a ſimilar attempt, which he made at the latter end of the year 1591, upon the death of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton. On this occaſion, a majority of the electors would have declared in his favour, had they not been influenced by the authority of the Queen, who recommended by letters Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurſt, and he was accordingly choſen (72). Notwithſtanding this and other oppoſitions to the Earl of Eſſex's wiſhes, which he deeply felt, her Majeſty, at different times, was very peculiar and open in manifeſting her regard to him. At the play and dancing of the twelfth night of 1593-4, ſhe appeared in a high throne, richly adorned, and next to her chair was the Earl, 'with whom ſhe often 'deviſed in ſweet and favourable manner.' (73).

The Earl of Eſſex's device, at a public tilting at court, in the year 1595, affords ſuch a ſpecimen of the manner in which the gallantry of the age was diſplayed, that an account of it will probably not be unacceptable to our readers. Some time before his lordſhip came in himſelf to the tilt, he ſent his page with a ſpeech to the Queen, who returned with her Majeſty's glove; and when he came himſelf, he was met by an old hermit, a Secretary of State, a brave ſoldier, and an Eſquire. The firſt preſented him with a book of meditations; the ſecond with political diſcourſes; manifeſting that he was far leſs careful of his body than his ſoul, and much more afraid of his ſin than of his puniſhment (r). His character is very fully drawn by Sir Henry Wotton, courſes; the third with orations of brave-fought battles; and the fourth was his own follower, to whom the other three imparted much of their purpoſes before the Earl came in, and each of them endeavoured to perſuade his Lordſhip to that particular courſe of life, which was ſuitable to their own inclinations. Then came unexpectedly into the tilt-yard the ordinary poſt boy of London, in rags, and all bemired, upon a poor lean jade, galloping and blowing for life, and delivered to the Secretary a packet of Letters, which he immediately offered to the Earl; and with this dumb ſhew the eyes of the ſpectators were fed for that time. In the after-ſupper before the Queen, the hermit delivered a well-penned ſpeech to move the Knight to leave his vain following of Love, and to betake himſelf to heavenly meditations; the Secretary's ſpeech tended to engage him to follow matters of State; and the ſoldier's perſuaded him to the war. But the Eſquire anſwered them, and concluded with an excellent exhortation, that the Knight would never forſake his miſtreſs's love, whoſe virtue made all his thoughts divine, whoſe wiſdom taught him all true policy, and whoſe beauty and worth were at all times able to make him fit to command armies. He ſhewed them the defects and imperfections of all their courſes, and repreſented that of ſerving his Miſtreſs as the beſt. Some unjuſt conſtructions were made of the ſpeeches in the Earl's device, the characters of the hermit and Secretary being applied to two of the Lords, and that of the Soldier to Sir Roger Williams. The Queen ſaid, if ſhe had known that ſo much would have been ſpoken concerning her, ſhe would not have been preſent that night; upon w h c ſhe retired to bed (74). If theſe diverſions of our anceſtors ſhould incur blame on account of their pedantry, it ſhould be conſidered, on the other hand, that there was a dignity in them, and that they were calculated to unite inſtruction with recreation.

In Birch's Memoirs, among other proofs of the high eſteem in which the Earl of Eſſex was held by the moſt eminent of his contemporaries, mention is made of a letter that was written to him by Henry the Fourth of France, ſtrongly expreſſive of the regard which he entertained for his Lordſhip. The King declares that the Earl's correſpondence was as dear to him as his friendſhip was valuable. "I wait," adds his Majeſty, "from my good fortune proper opportunities for doing "you ſome agreeable ſervice, and to enjoy the honour "of your preſence, in order that my words and ſen- "timents may confirm the feeble aſſurances of my "letters (75). It appears, likewiſe, that the greateſt and wiſeſt perſons in Holland were much devoted to Eſſex (76).

One of the moſt ſtriking circumſtances of the Earl of Eſſex's life is the blow which he received from the Queen; and his behaviour on that occaſion may be conſidered as giving the turn to his fate. Some obſervations on this event occur in note [N]; and our predeceſſor has inſerted a ſhort abſtract of the letter which was ſent by the Earl in reply to one that he had received from the Lord Keeper, Sir Thomas Egerton. But the abſtract is remarkably inaccurate, being made from a very imperfect copy; beſides which, the whole letter is ſo admirably written, and ſo ſtrongly diſplays the ſpirit, temper, and character of Eſſex, that we ſhall oblige our readers by inſerting it without mutilation or abridgment. To render the view of the ſubject more complete, we ſhall prefix that letter of Sir Thomas Egerton's, to which the Earl's is an anſwer.

The Lord Keeper's letter, dated the 15th of October, 1598, was as follows:

'My very good Lord,

'It is often ſeen, that he that is a ſtander-by, ſeeth 'more than he that playeth the game; and for the 'moſt part any man in his own cauſe ſtandeth in 'his own light, and ſeeth not ſo clearly as he ſhould. 'Your Lordſhip hath dealt in other men's cauſes, and 'in great and weighty affairs, with great wiſdom and 'judgment. Now your own is in hand, you are not 'to contemn and refuſe the advice of any that love 'you, how ſimple ſoever. In this order I rank my- 'ſelf, among others, that love you; none more ſim- 'ple, and none that loves you with more true and 'honeſt affection; which ſhall plead my excuſe, if 'you ſhall either miſtake or miſconſtrue my words 'or meaning: yet in your Lordſhip's honourable 'wiſdom I neither doubt nor ſuſpect the one nor the 'other. I will not preſume to adviſe you, but ſhoot 'my bolt as near the mark as I can, and tell you 'what I think.

'The beginning and long continuance of this ſo 'unſeaſonable diſcontent you have ſeen and proved, 'by which you may aim at the end. If you hold 'ſtill your courſe, which hitherto you find worſe and 'worſe (and the longer you tread this path, the far- 'ther you are ſtill out of the way) there is little hope 'or likelihood that the end will be better than the 'beginning. You are not ſo far gone, but you may 'well return. The return is ſafe, but the progreſs 'dangerous and deſperate in this courſe you hold. 'If you have any enemies, you do that for them, 'which they could never do for themſelves; whilſt 'you leave your friends to open ſhame and contempt, 'forſake yourſelf, overthrow your fortunes, and 'ruinate your honour and reputation; giving that 'comfort to our foreign foes, as greater they can- 'not have. For what can be more welcome and 'pleaſing news to them, than to hear, that her Ma- 'jeſty and the realm are maimed of ſo worthy a 'member, who hath ſo often and ſo valiantly quailed 'and daunted them? You forſake your country, 'when it hath moſt need of your help and counſel: 'and laſtly, you fail in your indiſſoluble duty, which 'you owe to your moſt gracious Sovereign; a duty, 'not impoſed upon you by nature and policy only, 'but by the religious and ſacred bond, in which the 'divine majeſty of GOD hath, by the rule of Chriſ- 'tianity, obliged and bound you.

'For the four firſt, your conſtant reſolution may 'perhaps move you to eſteem them as light; but, 'being well-weighed, they are not lightly to be re- 'garded: and for the two laſt, it may be your private 'conſcience may ſtrive to content yourſelf; but it is 'not enough. Theſe duties ſtand not alone in contem- 'plation and inward meditation; their effects are 'external, and cannot be performed but by external 'actions; and where that faileth, the ſubſtance itſelf 'faileth.

'Now this being your preſent ſtate and condition, 'what is the beſt to be done herein? and what is 'the beſt remedy for the ſame? My good Lord, I 'want wiſdom and lack judgment to adviſe you; but 'I will never want an honeſt and true heart to will 'and wiſh you well; nor, being warranted by a good 'conſcience, forbear to ſpeak what I think. I have 'begun plainly. I hope your Lordſhip will not be 'offended if I proceed ſtill after the ſame faſhion. 'Benè cedit, qui tempore cedit. And Seneca ſaith, Lex 'ſi nocentem punit, cedendum eſt juſtitiæ; ſi innocentem, 'cedendum eſt fortunæ. The beſt remedy is not to 'contend and ſtrive, but humbly to ſubmit. Have 'you given cauſe, and yet take ſcandal to yourſelf? 'Why, then all you can do is too little to make ſa- 'tisfaction? Is cauſe of ſcandal given to you? Yet 'policy, duty, and religion, inforce you to ſue, yield, 'and ſubmit to your Sovereign, between whom and 'you there can be no proportion of duty. And GOD 'himſelf requireth it as a principal bond of ſervice to 'himſelf. When it is evident, that great good may 'enſue of it to your friends, your country, and ſove- 'reign, and extreme harm by the contrary, there 'can be no diſhonour or hurt to yield; but in not 'doing it, is diſhonour and impiety. The difficulty, 'my good Lord, is to conquer yourſelf, which is 'the height of all true valour and fortitude, where- 'unto all your honourable actions have tended. Do 'it in this, and GOD will be pleaſed, her Majeſty 'well ſatisfied, your country will take good, and 'your friends comfort by it: yourſelf (I mention 'you laſt, for I know of all theſe you eſteem yourſelf 'leaſt)

'leaſt, ſhall receive honour, and your enemies (if 'you have any) ſhall be diſappointed of their bitter 'ſweet hope.

'Thus have I uttered what I think, ſimply and 'truly, and leave you to determine. If I have erred, 'it is error amoris, and not amor erroris. Conſtrue, I 'beſeech you, and accept it, as I mean it, not as an 'advice, but as an opinion to be allowed or can-'celled at your pleaſure. If I might conveniently 'have conferred with you myſelf in perſon, I would 'not then have troubled you with ſo many idle blots. 'Yet whatſoever you ſhall judge of this mine opi-'nion, be you well aſſured, my deſire is to further 'all good means that may tend to your good. And 'ſo wiſhing you all honourable happineſs, I reſt,

"poor friend,

'THO. EGERTON, C. S.'

The Earl's anſwer, dated the 18th of October, was in theſe terms:

'My very good Lord,

'Although there is not that man this day living, 'whom I would ſooner make a judge of any queſtion 'that did concern me, than yourſelf; yet muſt you 'give me leave to tell you, that in ſuch a caſe I 'muſt appeal from all earthly judges; and if in any 'then ſurely in this, where the higheſt judge upon 'earth hath impoſed upon me, without trial or hear-'ing, the moſt heavy judgment that ever hath been 'known: but ſince I muſt either anſwer your Lord-'ſhip's arguments, or forſake my juſt defence, I will 'force my aching head to do me ſome ſervice for a 'ſmall hour or two, although againſt my will. I 'muſt firſt then deny my diſcontentment, which was 'forced, to be any humorous diſcontentment, and 'that it was unſeaſonable, or of too long continuance. 'Your Lordſhip ſhould rather condole with me, 'than expoſtulate about the ſame: natural ſeaſons 'are expected here below; but violent and unſea-'ſonable ſtorms come from above. There is no tem-'peſt to the paſſionate indignation of a prince; nor 'yet at any time is it ſo unſeaſonable, as when it 'lighteth upon thoſe who might expect an harveſt of 'their careful and painful labours. He that is once 'wounded muſt feel ſmart while his hurt be cured, 'or that the part be ſenſeleſs; but no cure I expect, 'her Majeſty's heart being obdurate againſt me; and 'to be without ſenſe I cannot, being made of fleſh 'and blood. But, ſay you, I may aim at the end. 'I do more than aim, for I ſee an end of all my good 'fortunes, and I have ſet an end to my deſires. In 'this courſe do I any thing for mine enemies? When 'I was in the court, I found them abſolute; and 'therefore I had rather they ſhould triumph alone, 'than they ſhould have me attendant on their cha-'riots. Do I leave my friends? When I was a 'courtier, I could yield them no fruits of my love 'unto them. Now I am become an hermit, they 'ſhall bear no envy for their love towards me. Do 'I forſake myſelf, becauſe I do enjoy myſelf? or do 'I overthrow my fortune, for that I build not a for-'tune of paper-walls, which every puff of wind 'bloweth down? Do I ruinate mine honour, be-'cauſe I leave following the purſuit, or wearing the 'falſe badge or mark of the ſhadow of honour? Do 'I give courage and comfort to the foreign foe, be-'cauſe I reſerve myſelf to encounter with him; or 'becauſe I keep my heart from baſeneſs, although I 'cannot keep my fortune from declining? No, my 'good Lord, I give every of theſe conſiderations its 'due right, and the more I weigh them, the more 'I find myſelf juſtified from offending in any of 'them. As for the two laſt objections, that I forſake 'my country, when it hath moſt need of me, and 'fail in that indiſſoluble duty which I owe unto 'my Sovereign; I anſwer, that if my country had at 'this time any need of my public ſervice, her Ma-'jeſty, that governs the ſame, would not have driven 'me into a private kind of life. I am tied unto my 'country by two bands: in public peace, to diſ-'charge carefully, faithfully, and induſtriouſly, the 'truſt which is committed unto me; and the other 'private, to ſacrifice for it my life and carcaſe, which 'hath been nouriſhed in it. Of the firſt I am freed, 'being diſmiſſed, diſcharged, and diſabled, by her 'Majeſty. Of the other nothing can free me but 'death, and therefore no occaſion of my perfor-'mance ſhall offer itſelf, but I will meet it half-way. 'The indiſſoluble duty which I owe to her Majeſty 'is only the duty of allegiance, which I never will, 'nor never can, fail in. The duty of attendance is 'no indiſſoluble duty. I owe her Majeſty the duty 'of an Earl and of Lord Marſhal of England. I have 'been content to do her Majeſty the ſervice of a clerk, 'but can never ſerve her as a villain or a ſlave. But 'yet, you ſay, I muſt give way unto the time: So I 'do; for now I ſee the ſtorm come I put myſelf into 'the harbour. Seneca ſaith, we muſt give place unto 'fortune. I know that fortune is both blind and 'ſtrong, and therefore I go as far out of her way as I 'can. You ſay, the remedy is not to ſtrive. I nei-'ther ſtrive nor ſeek for remedy. But, ſay you, I 'muſt yield and ſubmit. I can neither yield myſelf 'to be guilty, or this imputation laid upon me to be 'juſt. I owe ſo much to the author of all truth, as I 'can never yield falſhood to be truth, or truth to be 'falſhood. Have I given cauſe, aſk you, and take 'ſcandal, when I have done? No; I give no cauſe 'to take ſo much as Fimbria's complaint againſt me, 'for I did totum telum corpore recipere. I patiently bear 'all, and ſenſibly feel all, that I then received, when 'this ſcandal was given me. Nay more, when the 'vileſt of all indignities are done unto me, doth reli-'gion enforce me to ſue? or doth GOD require it? 'Is it impiety not to do it? What, cannot princes 'err? Cannot ſubjects receive wrong? Is an earthly 'power or authority infinite? Pardon me, pardon 'me, my good Lord, I can never ſubſcribe to theſe 'principles. Let Solomon's fool laugh, when he is 'ſtricken; let thoſe that mean to make their profit of 'princes, ſhew to have no ſenſe of princes injuries; 'let them acknowledge an infinite abſoluteneſs on earth 'that do not believe in an abſolute infiniteneſs in hea-'ven. As for me, I have received wrong, and feel 'it. My cauſe is good; I know it; and whatſoever 'come, all the powers on earth can never ſhew more 'ſtrength and conſtancy in oppreſſing, than I can ſhew 'in ſuffering whatſoever can or ſhall be impoſed upon 'me. Your Lordſhip, in the beginning, maketh 'yourſelf a looker-on; and me a player of my own 'game; ſo you can ſee more than I can; yet muſt 'you give me leave to tell you in the end of my an-'ſwer, that ſince you do but ſee, and I ſuffer, I muſt 'of neceſſity feel more than you do. I muſt crave 'your Lordſhip's patience to give him, that hath a 'crabbed fortune, licence to uſe a crabbed ſtyle; and 'yet whatſoever my ſtyle is, there is no heart more 'humble to his ſuperiors, nor any more affected to-'wards your Lordſhip, than that of

We muſt not paſs over in ſilence the extract which is given, in note [2], from Heylin's Hiſtory of the Preſbyterians. If that hiſtorian is to be credited, Eſſex had formed the ambitious deſign of making himſelf King. But this aſſertion appears to have been made entirely without foundation. The ſuppoſition of the Earl's having entertained ſuch a purpoſe had probably no other ſource than the idle ſurmiſes and ſuſpicions of the time, which the bigotry of Heylin was very ready to admit. That Dugdale ſhould quote the paſſage from Heylin with approbation, reflects no honour either upon his candour or his judgment (78). The reflection on the Earl of Eſſex, as having aimed at Royalty, is not only without authority, but (78) Dugd. Bar. Tome II. p. 181.

contrary to the moſt deciſive evidence. In all the accuſations produced againſt him, when he was brought before the eighteen commiſſioners, aſſembled at York Houſe, on the fifth of June, 1600, conſiſting of the principal officers of ſtate, and when he was treated with great ſeverity, no charge of the kind we are ſpeaking of was ever once mentioned. Nay, Secretary Cecil, who was ſufficiently hoſtile to him, repeatedly acquitted his Lordſhip of all thoughts of diſloyalty (79). If it ſhould be ſuggeſted, that, in his laſt mad attempt, he might have a view to the throne, the ſuggeſtion will be fully refuted by reading his converſation with Aſhton, his chaplain, at a time when he exonerated his conſcience, and, with great contrition and ſincerity, made a confeſſion of whatever he had done amiſs. In that converſation, which is related in note [R], he ſays, 'for the crown, I 'never affected it, neither, praiſe I God, was I ever 'ſo careleſs of my ſoul, as, by ſeeking a crown on 'earth, to which I had no manner of title, to deprive my ſoul of a crown in heaven, where I have 'ſo aſſured hope.' He farther adds, 'No, no, Mr. 'Aſhton, I never deſired other condition than the 'ſtate of a ſubject, but only to my ſovereign, and not 'to baſe and unworthy vaſſals under her;' and in concluſion he declares, that his whole end was to obtain the ſettling of the ſucceſſion, by act of Parliament, on the King of Scotland, as the true and undoubted heir, after her Majeſty, of this kingdom. It is ſurprizing that our ingenious predeceſſor, with the whole paper before him, containing Eſſex's converſation with Aſhton, and which he has inſerted at large in the article, ſhould have been induced to give any degree of approbation to the extract from Heylin.

In Murdin's State Papers is a curious letter, written by Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1601, to Sir Robert Cecil, evidently relative to the Earl of Eſſex, and which at once ſhews both the malignity and the boldneſs of Raleigh's mind. It is as follows:

'Sir, I am not wiſe enough to give you adviſe, 'butt if you take it for a good councell to relent 'towards this tirant, you will repent it, when it ſhall 'be too late. His malice is fixt, and will not evapo'rate by any your mild courſes, for he will aſcribe 'the alteration to her Majeſty's puſillanimity, and not 'to your good nature, knowing that you work but 'upon her humour, and not out of any love towards 'him. The leſs you make him, the leſs he ſhall be 'able to harm you and yours. And if her Majeſties 'favour faile him, he will againe decline to a common 'parſon. For after-revenges fear them not. For 'your own father, that was eſteemed to be the con'triver of Norfolk's ruin (80), yet his ſon (81), fol'loweth your fathers ſon, and loveth him. Humours 'of men ſucceed not, but grow by occaſions, and 'accidents of tyme and power. Somerſet (82) made 'no revenge on the Duke of Northumberland's heares. 'Northumberland (83) that now is, thinks not of 'Hatton's (84) iſſue. Kelloway lives, that murdered 'the brother of Horſey, and Horſey let him go by 'all his life-time. I could name a thouſand of thoſe; 'and therefore after-fears are but prophecies, or 'rather conjectures, from cauſes remote. Look to 'the preſent, and you do wiſely. His ſon ſhall be the 'youngeſt Earle of England but one; and if his father 'be now keipt down, Will. Cecill (85) ſhall be able 'to keip as many men at his heeles as he, and more 'to. He may alſo matche in a better houſe than his; 'and ſo, that feare is not worth the fearing. But if 'the father continue, he will be able to break the 'branches, and pull up the tree, root, and all. Loſe 'not your advantage: if you do, I rede your deſtiny.

'Let the Queen hold Bothwell (86) while ſhe hath 'him. He will ever be the canker of her eſtate and 'Sawfty. Princes are loſt by ſecurity, and preſerved by 'prevention. I have ſeen the laſt of her good days 'and all ours after his liberty.

The ſtory of the ring, and the relations of the Queen's paſſion for the Earl of Eſſex, were long regarded by many writers as romantic circumſtances. But theſe facts are now more generally believed. Hume, Birch, and the moſt judicious hiſtorians give credit to them. Dr. Birch, in his "Hiſtorical View "of the Negociations between the Courts of England, "France, and Bruſſels, from the year 1592 to 1617," has confirmed Maurier's account (given in note [S]) by the following narrative, which was often related by the Lady Elizabeth Spelman, a deſcendant of Sir Robert Cary, Earl of Monmouth, whoſe acquaintance with the moſt ſecret tranſactions of Queen Elizabeth's court is well known.

'When Catharine Counteſs of Nottingham, wife 'of the Lord High Admiral, and ſiſter of the Earl 'of Monmouth, was dying, (as ſhe did, according 'to his Lordſhip's own account, about a fortnight be'fore the Queen) ſhe ſent to her Majeſty, to deſire 'that ſhe might ſee her, in order to reveal ſomething 'to her Majeſty, without the diſcovery of which ſhe 'could not die in peace. Upon the Queen's coming, 'Lady Nottingham told her that while the Earl of 'Eſſex lay under ſentence of death, he was deſirous 'of aſking her Majeſty's mercy, in the manner pre'ſcribed by herſelf, during the height of his favour; 'the Queen having given him a ring, which being 'ſent to her as a token of his diſtreſs, might intitle 'him to her protection. But the Earl, jealous of 'thoſe about him, and not caring to truſt any one 'with it, as he was looking out of the window one 'morning, ſaw a boy, with whoſe appearance he 'was pleaſed; and, engaging him by money and 'promiſes, directed him to carry the ring, which he 'took from his finger, and threw down, to Lady 'Scroope, a ſiſter of the Counteſs of Nottingham, 'and a friend of his Lordſhip, who attended upon 'the Queen; and to beg of her, that ſhe would pre'ſent it to her Majeſty. The boy, by miſtake, carried 'it to Lady Nottingham, who ſhewed it to her 'huſband, the Admiral, an enemy of Lord Eſſex, in 'order to take his Advice. The Admiral forbid her 'to carry it, or return any anſwer to the meſſage; but 'inſiſted upon her keeping the ring.

'The Counteſs of Nottingham having made this 'diſcovery, begged the Queen's forgiveneſs; but 'her Majeſty anſwered, God may forgive you, but I 'never can; and left the room with great emotion. 'Her mind was ſo ſtruck with this ſtory, that ſhe 'never went to bed, nor took any ſuſtenance, from 'that inſtant: for Camden is of opinion, that her 'chief reaſon for ſuffering the Earl to be executed, 'was his ſuppoſed obſtinacy, in not applying to her 'for mercy.' (88).

(88) Birch's Hiſtorical View, p. 206, 207. note.

With reſpect to the queſtion whether Queen Elizabeth was in Love with Eſſex, Mr. Walpole has conſidered it at large, and has treated upon it with his uſual vivacity. What he has advanced on the ſubject is ſo curious and entertaining that we ſhall give it at ſome length.

'I am aware that it is become a mode to treat the 'Queen's paſſion for him as a romance. Voltaire 'laughs at it, and obſerves, that when her ſtruggle 'about him muſt have been the greateſt (the time of 'his death) ſhe was ſixty-eight———had He been 'ſixty-eight, it is probable ſhe would not have been 'in love with him. As a great deal turns upon this 'point, and as there are the ſtrongeſt preſumptions 'of the reality of her Majeſty's inclination for him, 'I ſhall take leave to enter into the diſcuſſion.

'I do not date this paſſion from her firſt ſight of 'him, nor impute his immediate riſe to it, as ſome 'have done, who did not obſerve how nearly he was 'related to the Queen, as appears by the following 'ſhort table:

Thomas

	Robert Earl of Eſſex.

'His mother being couſin to the Queen, and wife of 'her great favourite, Leiceſter, eaſily accounted for 'young Eſſex's ſudden promotion; it went on rapidly 'without thoſe ſupports. At twenty he was made 'Maſter of the Horſe; the next year General of the 'Horſe at the camp at Tilbury, and Knight of 'the Garter. On theſe dignities were afterwards 'heaped the great poſts of Maſter of the Ordnance, 'Earl Marſhal, Chancellor of Cambridge, and Lord 'Lieutenant of Ireland—Lofty diſtinctions from a 'Princeſs ſo ſparing of her favours—of what ſhe was 'ſtill more ſparing, he obtained to the value of '300,000 l. In one of her letters ſhe reproached him 'with her great favours beſtowed without his deſert: 'In every inſtance but in his and Leiceſter's, ſhe was 'not wont to over-pay ſervices.

'His early marriage with the widow of Sir Philip 'Sidney did not look as if he himſelf had any idea 'of her Majeſty's inclination for him: perhaps he 'had learned from the example of his Father-in-law, 'that her Majeſty's paſſions never extended to ma-'trimony. Yet before this he had inſulted Sir Charles 'Blount, on a jealouſy of the Queen's partiality. 'Inſtead of ſentimental ſoftneſs, the ſpirit of her 'father broke out on that occaſion: ſhe ſwore a round 'oath, "that unleſs ſome one or other took him "down, there would be no ruling him."

'Lord Clarendon, in his ſenſible anſwer to Sir 'Harry Wotton's parallel of the Earl of Eſſex and 'the Duke of Buckingham, obſerves, that the former 'endeavoured rather to maſter the Queen's affection 'than to win it: if he was croſſed in a ſuit, he ab-'ſented himſelf from court, and made her purchaſe 'his return. A fond woman may be moulded thus; 'it is not the method practiſed on Princes by mere 'favourites. When Charles the Firſt on ſome jealouſy 'reſtrained the Earl of Holland to his houſe, the 'Queen would not cohabit with the King till the re-'ſtraint was taken off. Whenever Eſſex acted a fit 'of ſickneſs, not a day paſſed without the Queen's 'ſending often to ſee him; and once went ſo far as 'to ſit long by him, and ordered his broth and things. 'It is recorded by a diligent obſerver of that court, 'that in one of his ſick moods he took the liberty of 'going up to the Queen in his night-gown. In the 'height of theſe fretful fooleries, there was a maſk at 'Black-Friars on the marriage of Lord Herbert and 'Mrs. Ruſſel. Eight Lady-maſkers choſe eight more 'to dance the meaſures. Mrs. Fitton, who led them, 'went to the Queen and woed her to dance. Her 'Majeſty aſked what ſhe was?——AFFECTION—ſhe 'ſaid. AFFECTION!—ſaid the Queen;—AFFEC-'TION IS FALSE.——Were not theſe the murmurs 'of a heart ill at eaſe?—Yet her Majeſty roſe and 'dawnced.——She was then ſixty-eight:——Sure it 'was as natural for her to be in love!

'That her court and cotemporaries had an uniform 'opinion of her paſſion is evident from many paſſages. 'Sir Francis Bacon, in a letter of moſt ſenſible advice 'to the Earl, in which he diſſuades him from popular 'courſes, which the Queen could not brook in her 'greateſt favorites, ſays to him, "win the Queen; "I will not now ſpeak of favour or affection, but of "other correſpondence and agreeableneſs."——That 'is, do not be content with her prepoſſeſſion in your 'favour, but humour and make yourſelf agreeable to 'her. "How dangerous," adds he, "to have her "think you a man not to be ruled, that has her "affection and knows it; that ſeeks a popular reputa-"tion and a military dependence." He advites the 'Earl not to play or ſtratagem with too long journeys 'from her; and bids him conſult her taſte in his very 'apparel and geſtures. He concludes remarkably 'with adviſing the Earl even to give way to any other 'inclination ſhe may have, "for whoſoever ſhall tell "me that you may not have ſingular uſe of a favorite "at your devotion, I will ſay he underſtandeth not "the Queen's affection, nor your Lordſhip's con-"dition." The Queen herſelf Sir Francis adviſed, 'as knowing her inclination, to keep the Earl about 'her for ſociety. Oſborne aſcribes Eſſex's preſump-'tion to the fond opinion which he entertained that 'the Queen would not rob her eyes of the dear 'delight ſhe took in his perſon. But the moſt marked 'expreſſion is one of Henry the Fourth of France to 'the Queen's own Embaſſador Sir Antony Mildmay, "Que ſa Majeſté ne laiſſeroit jamais ſon Couſin "d'Eſſex s'eſloigner de ſon cotillon." Sir Antony 'reporting this to the Queen, ſhe wrote four lines 'with her own hand to the King, which one may 'well believe were ſharp enough, for he was near 'ſtriking Sir Anthony, and drove him out of his 'chamber.

'When the Earl had offended the Queen ſo much 'by his abrupt return from Ireland, he was treated 'with a whimſical fond mixture of tenderneſs and ſe-'verity. Though he burſt into her bed-chamber as 'ſhe was riſing, ſhe talked to him long with coolneſs 'and kindneſs. When her other counſellors had re-'preſented his boldneſs, ſhe reſented it too. She 'ſuſpended him from all his offices but the Maſterſhip 'of the Horſe; ſhe gave him a keeper, but who was 'ſoon with-drawn. On hearing Eſſex was ill, ſhe 'ſent him word with tears in her eyes, "that if ſhe "might with her honour, ſhe would viſit him."—— 'Theſe are more than ſymptoms of favour: royal 'favour is not romantic; it is extravagant, not galant.

'If theſe inſtances are problematic, are the follow-'ing ſo? In one of the curious letters of Rowland 'White, he ſays, "the Queen hath of late uſed the "fair Mrs. Bridges with words and blows of anger." 'In a ſubſequent letter he ſays, "the Earl is again "fallen in love with his faireſt B.; it cannot chuſe "but come to the Queen's ears, and then he is un-"done. The Counteſs hears of it, or rather ſuſpects "it, and is greatly unquiet." I think there can be 'no doubt but that the faireſt B. and the fair Mrs. 'Bridges were the ſame: If ſo, it is evident why 'ſhe felt the weight of her Majeſty's diſpleaſure.

'It is indeed a very trifling matter for what reaſon 'a Prince chuſes a favourite; nor is it meant as any 'reproach to this great woman, that ſhe could not 'diveſt herſelf of all ſenſibility: her feeling, and 'maſtering her paſſion adds to her character. The 'favourites of other Princes never fail to infuſe into 'them their own prejudices againſt their enemies: 'that was not the caſe with Elizabeth: ſhe was more 'jealous of the greatneſs ſhe beſtowed, than her ſub-'jects could be. How did ſhe mortify Leiceſter, 'when the States heaped unuſual honours on him! 'For Eſſex, it is evident from multiplied inſtances 'that his very ſolicitation was prejudicial. Bacon 'ſays to his brother Antony, "againſt me ſhe is "never peremptory but to my Lord of Eſſex." 'Amongſt the papers of the Bacons is a moſt ex-'traordinary letter from Lord Treaſurer Burleigh to 'Lord Eſſex, recounting unmeaſured abuſe that he 'had received from the Queen, on her ſuſpecting 'Burleigh of favouring the Earl.——So quick was 'her nature to apprehend union where ſhe loved to 'diſunite, and with ſuch refinement did old Cecil 'colour his inveteracy. Her Majeſty was wont to 'accuſe the Earl of opiniaſtreté, and that he would not 'be ruled, but ſhe would bridle and ſtay him. On 'another occaſion ſhe ſaid, "ſhe obſerved ſuch as "followed her; and thoſe which accompanied ſuch as "were in her diſpleaſure, and that they ſhould know "as much before it were long." No wonder the ſpending a great part of his ſubſtance in the cauſe of both. His projects were high, but very honourable, and the difficulties with which they were embarraſſed ſeemed rather to invite

'Earl

'Earl complained "that he was as much diſtaſted "with the glorious greatneſs of a favorite, as he was "before with the ſuppoſed happineſs of a courtier." 'No wonder his mind was ſo toſt with contradictory 'paſſions, when her ſoul, on whom he depended, 'was a compoſition of tenderneſs and haughtineſs!— 'nay, when even œconomy combated her affection! 'He profeſſes, "that her fond parting with him, "when he ſet out for Ireland, pierced his very ſoul." 'In a few weeks ſhe quarrelled with him for demanding a poor ſupply of one thouſand foot and three 'hundred horſe.

'Having pretty clearly aſcertained the exiſtence of 'the ſentiment, it ſeems that the Earl's ruin was in 'great meaſure owing to the little homage he paid to 'a Sovereign, jealous of his perſon and of her own, 'and not accuſtomed to pardon the want of a proper 'degree of awe and adoration! Before his voyage to 'Ireland, ſhe had treated him as ſhe did the fair Mrs. 'Bridges——in ſhort, had given him a box on the 'ear for turning his back on her in contempt. What 'muſt ſhe have felt on hearing he had ſaid "that ſhe "grew old and cankered, and that her mind was "become as crooked as her carcaſe!" What provocation to a woman ſo diſpoſed to believe all the flattery 'of her court! How did ſhe torture Melville to 'make him prefer her beauty to his charming Queen's! 'Elizabeth's foible about her perſon was ſo well 'known, that when ſhe was ſixty-ſeven, Veriken the 'Dutch Embaſſador told her at his audience, "that he "had longed to undertake that voyage to ſee her "Majeſty, who for beauty and wiſdom excelled all "other princes of the world." The next year Lord 'Eſſex's ſiſter, Lady Rich, interceding for him, tells 'her Majeſty, "Early did I hope this morning to "have had mine eyes bleſſed with your Majeſty's "beauty.——That her Brother's life, his love, his "ſervice to her beauties did not deſerve ſo hard a "puniſhment.——That he would be diſabled from "ever ſerving again his ſacred Goddeſs! whoſe excellent beauties and perfections ought to feel more "compaſſion (89)."

(89) Royal and Noble Authors, Vol. I. p. 129—141.

It is with great propriety that Mr. Walpole has placed the Earl of Eſſex among the noble authors of England. The various pieces written by him, moſt of which are noticed in the article, juſtly entitle him to that diſtinction; and he has a farther claim to it from the numerous Letters of his which occur in the different collections of State Papers, and eſpecially in "Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth." 'But of all his compoſitions," ſays Mr. Walpole, 'the moſt excellent, and in many reſpects equal to 'the performances of the greateſt geniuſes, is a long 'Letter to the Queen from Ireland, ſtating the ſituation of that country, in a moſt maſterly manner, 'both as a General and Statesman, and concluding 'with ſtrains of the tendereſt eloquence, on finding 'himſelf ſo unhappily expoſed to the artifice of his 'enemies during his abſence. It cannot fail to excite 'admiration, that a man raviſhed from all improvement and reflection at the age of ſeventeen, to be 'nurſed, perverted, fondled, dazzled in a court, 'ſhould notwithſtanding have ſnatched ſuch opportunities of cultivating his mind and underſtanding!" 'In another Letter from Ireland, he ſays movingly, "I provided for this ſervice a breaſt-plate but not a "Cuiraſs, that is, I am armed on the breaſt, but "not on the back." (90).

(90) Ibid. p. 156, 157.

It has been ſurmiſed that the Earl of Eſſex uſed the pen, firſt, of Francis Bacon, and afterwards of Cuffe. Speaking of Bacon, Dr. Birch obſerves, that it is certain that Eſſex did not want any ſuch aſſiſtance, and could not have had it upon many and moſt important occaſions, which required him to write ſome of the moſt finiſhed of his epiſtolary performances, the ſtyle of which is not only very different from, but likewiſe much more natural, eaſy, and perſpicuous than that of his friend, who acknowledges it to be far better than his own (91). With regard to Cuffe, Mr. Walpole remarks, that he might have ſome hand in collecting the materials relative to buſineſs, but that there runs through all the Earl's Letters a peculiarity of ſtyle, ſo adapted to his ſituation and feelings, as could not have been felt for him or dictated by any body elſe (92).

(91) Birch's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, Vol. II. p. 20.

It was as a proſe-writer that the Earl of Eſſex excelled, and not as a poet. He is ſaid to have tranſlated one of Ovid's Epiſtles; and a few of his Sonnets are preſerved in the Aſhmolean Muſeum. They diſplay, however, no marks of poetic genius. 'But 'if Eſſex,' ſays Mr. Warton, 'was no poet, few 'noblemen of his age were more courted by poets. 'From Spenſer to the loweſt rhymer he was the ſubject of numerous Sonnets, or popular ballads. I 'will not except Sydney. I could produce evidence 'to prove, that he ſcarcely ever went out of England, 'or even left London, on the moſt frivolous enterprize, without a paſtoral in his praiſe, or a panegyric in metre, which were ſold and ſung in the 'ſtreets. Having intereſted himſelf in the faſhionable 'poetry of the times, he was placed high in the 'ideal Arcadia now juſt eſtabliſhed: and, among 'other inſtances which might be brought, on his 'return from Portugal, in 1589, he was complimented 'with a poem, called, "An Egloge gratulatorie "entituled to the Right Honorable and renowned "Shepherd of Albion's Arcadia, Robert Earl of "Eſſex, and for his returne lately into England." 'This is a light in which Lord Eſſex is ſeldom viewed. 'I know not if the Queen's fatal partiality, or his 'own inherent attractions, his love of literature, his 'heroiſm, integrity, and generoſity, qualities which 'abundantly overbalance his preſumption, his vanity, 'and impetuoſity, had the greater ſhare in dictating 'theſe praiſes. If adulation were any where juſtifiable, it muſt be when paid to the man who endeavoured to ſave Spenſer from ſtarving in the 'ſtreets of Dublin, and who buried him in Weſtminſter-Abbey with becoming ſolemnity. Spenſer 'was perſecuted by Burleigh, becauſe he was patroniſed by Eſſex (93)."

(92) Walpole, ubi ſupra, p. 156, note.

No ſmall degree of popularity has always adhered to the character and memory of the Earl of Eſſex. A ſtrong proof of this is his having been the ſubject of four different Tragedies. We refer to the "Unhappy Favourite," by John Banks: the "Fall of "the Earl of Eſſex," by James Ralph; the "Earl "of Eſſex," by Henry Jones; and the "Earl of "Eſſex," by Henry Brooke. It is no part of our preſent buſineſs to enter into the merit of theſe ſeveral publications.

An account of the manner of the Earl of Eſſex's death, which is far more particular than what is commonly to be met with, and may be edifying to pious minds, ſhall be inſerted from Dr. Birch's Memoirs.

'Upon Aſh-wedneſday the 25th of February, 1600-1, 'the Earl, about one in the morning, had warning 'given him by the lieutenant of the Tower to prepare himſelf for death that day; upon which he roſe 'from his bed, and deſired Dr. Barlow, Dr. Montford, and Mr. Aſhton, all then with him, to join 'with him in the exerciſes ſuitable to his preſent ſituation, and the ſtate into which he was going; and 'Mr. Aſhton preached, at the deſire of the two doctors. His Lordſhip, among other things, told them 'that the principal reaſon of his requeſting a private 'execution within the Tower, for which he thanked 'GOD and her Majeſty, was his apprehenſion, that 'if it had been public, the acclamations of the citizens 'ſhould have hoven him up. Between the hours of ſeven 'and eight he was brought to the place of execution 'within the Tower, where a ſcaffold being ſet up in 'the court, and a form near the place, upon which 'ſat the Earls of Cumberland and Hertford, the Lord 'Viſcount Bindon, the Lord Thomas Howard, the 'Lord Darcy, the Lord Compton, and the Lord Morley, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen to the 'number of about an hundred; and among them Sir 'Walter Raleigh, who retired before the Earl's death 'into the armoury, where he ſaw it, without having 'been ſeen by his Lordſhip, and was ſo affected by it 'that he ſhed tears. The Earl was conducted to the 'ſcaffold by the Lieutenant, and about ſixteen partiſans of the guard, and was dreſſed in a gown of 'wrought invite than to deject him. He was, however, too covetous of Royal Favour, and, ſome ſay, not reſpectful enough to the Royal Perſon; and, if there was any truth in this, his fault

' wrought velvet, a black ſattin ſuit, a felt black hat, ' a little ruff about his neck, being attended from his ' chamber by the three divines, whom he requeſted ' not to leave him, but obſerve him, and recall him, ' if either his eye, countenance, or ſpeech, ſhould ' bewray any thing, which might not beſeem him ' for that time; and all the way deſired the ſpectators ' to pray for him. At his coming to the ſcaffold, he ' vailed his hat, and with obeiſance to the lords ſpoke ' to this effect:

" My Lords, and you my Chriſtian Brethren, who " are to be witneſſes of this my juſt puniſhment, I " confeſs to the glory of GOD, that I am a moſt " wretched ſinner; and that my ſins are more in " number than the hairs of my head. I confeſs, that " I have beſtowed my youth in wantonneſs, luſt, and " uncleanneſs; that I have been puffed up with pride, " vanity, and love of this world's pleaſures: and that " notwithſtanding divers good motions inſpired into " me from the Spirit of GOD, the good which I " would, I have not done; and the evil, which I " would not, that have I done. For all which I hum- " bly beſeech my Saviour Chriſt to be a Mediator to " the eternal Majeſty for my pardon; eſpecially for " this my laſt ſin, this great, this bloody, this cry- " ing, this infectious ſin, whereby ſo many have for " love to me been drawn to offend GOD, to offend " their Sovereign, to offend the world. I beſeech " GOD to forgive it us, and to forgive it me, moſt " wretched of all! I beſeech her Majeſty, and the " ſtate, and miniſters thereof, to forgive us: and I be- " ſeech GOD to ſend her Majeſty a proſperous reign, " and a long, if it be his will. O Lord! grant her a " wiſe and underſtanding heart! O Lord! bleſs her, " and the Nobles and the Miniſters of the Church " and State! And I beſeech you and the world to " hold a charitable opinion of me for my intention " towards her Majeſty, whoſe death I proteſt I never " meant, nor violence to her Perſon. I never was, I " thank GOD, Atheiſt, not believing the Word and " Scriptures; neither Papiſt, truſting to my own me- " rits; but hope for ſalvation from GOD only by the " mercy and merits of my Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. This " faith I was brought up in; and herein I am ready " to die; beſeeching you all to join your ſouls with " me in prayer, that my ſoul may be lifted up by faith " above all earthly things in my prayer; for now I " will give myſelf to my private prayer. Yet for that " I beſeech you to join with me; I will ſpeak, that " you may hear me."

' As he turned himſelf aſide to put off his gown, ' Dr. Montford requeſted him to remember to pray to ' GOD to forgive all his enemies, if he had any. To ' whom he anſwered, I thank you for it; and ſo turn- ' ing himſelf again to the Lords and the reſt, ſaid, ' I deſire all the world to forgive me, even as I do freely ' and from my heart forgive all the world. Then ' putting off his gown and ruff, and preſenting himſelf ' before the block, and kneeling down, he was, by ' Dr. Barlow, encouraged againſt the fears of death; ' to whom he anſwered, "That having been divers " times in places of danger, where death was neither " ſo preſent nor yet ſo certain, he had felt the weak- " neſs of the fleſh; and therefore in this great conflict " deſired GOD to aſſiſt and ſtrengthen him:" and ſo, ' with eyes fixed on Heaven, after ſome paſſionate ' pauſes and breathings, he began his prayer in effect ' following:

" O GOD, Creator of all things, and Judge of all " men, thou haſt let me know, by warrant out of thy " Word, that Satan is then moſt buſy when our end " is neareſt; and that Satan being reſiſted, will flee: " I humbly beſeech thee, to aſſiſt me in this my laſt " combat; and ſeeing thou acceepteſt ever of our de- " ſires as of our acts, accept, I beſeech thee, of my " deſires to reſiſt him, as of true reſiſtance, and per- " fect by thy grace what thou ſeeſt in my fleſh to be " frail and weak. Give me patience to bear, as be- " cometh me, this juſt puniſhment inflicted upon me " by ſo honourable a trial. Grant me the inward " comfort of thy Spirit. Let thy Spirit ſeal unto my " ſoul an aſſurance of thy mercies. Lift my ſoul above " all earthly cogitations; and when my life and body " ſhall part, ſend thy bleſſed angels, which may re- " ceive my ſoul, and convey it to thy joys in Heaven!"

' He then prayed for all eſtates of the realm, con- ' cluding with the Lord's prayer, and reiterating this ' petition, Lord Jeſus, forgive us our treſpaſſes! Lord ' Jeſus, receive my ſoul! After this, he deſired to be ' informed what was fit for him to do in diſpoſing ' himſelf for the block; upon which the executioner ' on his knees preſented himſelf, aſking him forgive- ' neſs: to whom the Earl ſaid, I forgive thee; thou ' art welcome to me: thou art the miniſter of juſtice. ' At which time Dr. Montford requeſted him to re- ' hearſe the Creed, which he did, repeating every ' article after the divines. He afterwards opened and ' put off his doublet, and ſtood in a ſcarlet waiſtcoat, ' till being ready to lie down, he ſaid, that he would ' only ſtretch forth his arms, and ſpread them abroad, ' for then he would be ready. So bowing towards ' the block the divines requeſted him to ſay the two ' firſt verſes of the Fifty-firſt Pſalm, which he did; ' and then inclining his body ſaid, " In humility and " obedience to thy commandment, in obedience to " thy ordinance, to thy good pleaſure, O GOD, I " proſtrate myſelf to my deſerved puniſhment! Lord, " be merciful to thy proſtrate ſervant." After this he ' laid himſelf flat on the boards, and placing his head ' on the block ſtretched out his arms with theſe laſt ' words, which he was requeſted to ſay, Lord, into thy ' hands I recommend my ſpirit. His head was ſevered ' from his body by the executioner at three ſtrokes, ' the firſt of which abſolutely deprived him of all ſenſe ' and motion.

Secretary Cecil acknowledged, that his Lordſhip " ſuffered with great patience and humility, only (not- " withſtanding his reſolution, that he muſt die) the " conflict between the fleſh and the ſoul did appear " thus far, that in his prayers he was fain to be helped, " otherwiſe no man living could pray more Chriſtianly " than he did."

' Such was the laſt ſcene of the life of Robert Earl ' of Eſſex; whoſe penitence, humility, and piety ' ſhewn in it were treated with contempt and ridicule ' by men of no religion, and particularly by Marſhal ' De Biron, who ſaid, that his Lordſhip died more like ' a miniſter than a ſoldier; but who received his own ' deſerved death about fifteen months after with all the ' rage of a madman (95).'

(94) Birch, ubi ſupra, Vol. II. p. 481—484.

A farther Quotation from Mr. Walpole, and another from Mr. Hume ſhall conclude our additions to the important article of the Earl of Eſſex. 'On a ' review of his character," ſays Mr. Walpole, 'it ' appears that if the Queen's partiality had not in- ' flated him, he would have been one of the braveſt ' generals, one of the moſt active ſtateſmen and the ' brighteſt Mecænas of that accompliſhed age. With ' the zeal, though without the diſcretion of Burleigh, ' he had nothing of the dark ſoul of Leiceſter. ' Raleigh excelled him in abilities, but came not near ' him in generoſity. It was no ſmall merit to have ' inſiſted on giving Bacon to that orb from which one ' of Bacon's firſt employments was to contribute to ex- ' pel his benefactor. The Earl had a ſolemn tincture ' of religion, of which his enemies availed themſelves ' to work him to the greateſt blemiſh of his life, the ' diſcovery of the abettors of his laſt raſh deſign. He ' had ſcarcely a fault beſides which did not flow from ' the nobleneſs of his nature. Sir Henry Wotton ſays ' he was delicate in his baths: it was a ſlight luxury, ' and proceeded ſo little from any effeminacy in his ' perſon, that he read letters and attended to ſuitors ' the whole time he was dreſſing. Brutality of man- ' ners is not eſſentially neceſſary to courage. Leona- ' tus, one of Alexander's Generals, no unmanly ' ſchool, in all the marches of the army was followed ' by camels loaded with ſand, which he got from ' Egypt, to rub his body for his gymnaſtic exerciſes. ' Eſſex was gallant, romantic, and oſtentatious: his ' ſhooting matches in the eye of the city gained him ' great popularity: the ladies and the people never fault was inexcuſable, the Queen preventing his merit by her favours, as well as rewarding it by honours. Nor did he feel the Sun-ſhine only, but the dew of the Court; ſince, if the Lord Treaſurer Buckhurſt computed right, and he was no enemy to my Lord of Eſſex, he received in grants, penſions, and places, to the amount of three hundred thouſand pounds: but then, as he received all this from, he ſpent it for, the Publick: and if he ſometimes appeared covetous, it was that he might be always generous; for, to his honour be it ſpoken, learning never approached him ungraced, merit unrewarded, or want without receiving relief. His Sovereign's favour he loſt often; the fidelity of his friends, and the affection of the people, never; yet he ſometimes truſted thoſe who had been formerly his enemies, and was not fortunate in all his enterprizes, which renders the wonder greater. As to his perſon, he is reported to have been tall, but not very well made, his countenance reſerved, his air rather martial than courtly, very careleſs in dreſs, and very little addicted to trifling diverſions. Learned he was, and a lover of learned men, wrote with that facility which is the true mark of genius, with that cloſeneſs and perſpicuity which is the happieſt fruit of learning, and that noble ſimplicity which is the characteriſtick of a great mind. Sincere in his friendſhip, but not ſo careful as he ought to have been in making a right choice; ſound in his morals, except in the point of gallantry, and thoroughly well affected to the Proteſtant religion, of which he had very juſt notions, deſpiſing alike the meanneſs of Superſtition, and the folly of Infidelity. He died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, leaving, by his wife, only one ſon Robert (b), of whom in the next article, and two daughters; Frances, who became the wife of William firſt Earl (then Marquis) of Hertford, and laſtly Duke of Somerſet (c); and Dorothy, who firſt married Sir Henry Shirley, of Stanton-Harold in the county of Leiceſter, Bart. and afterwards to William Stafford, of Blatherwyck in the county of Northampton, Eſq. (d). He left alſo, by Mrs. Southwell, a natural ſon named Walter.

'ceaſed to adore him. His genius for ſhows and 'thoſe pleaſures that carry the image of war, was as 'remarkable as his ſpirit in the profeſſion itſelf. His 'impreſſes and inventions of entertainment were much 'admired; and his device was a diamond with this 'motto, DUM FORMAS MINUIS." (95).

'The Earl of Eſſex,' ſays Mr. Hume, 'was but 'thirty-four years of age, when his raſhneſs, impru-'dence, and violence, brought him to this untimely 'end. We muſt here, as in many other inſtances, 'lament the inconſtancy of human nature, that a per-'ſon endowed with ſo many noble virtues, generoſity, 'ſincerity, friendſhip, valour, eloquence, and in-'duſtry, ſhould, in the latter period of his life, have 'given reins to his ungovernable paſſions, and involved 'not only himſelf but many of his friends in utter 'ruin. The Queen's tenderneſs and compaſſion for 'him, as it was the cauſe of thoſe premature honours 'which he attained, ſeems, on the whole, the chief 'circumſtance which brought on his unhappy fate. 'Confident of her partiality towards him, as well as 'of his own merit, he treated her with a haughtineſs 'which neither her love nor her dignity could bear; 'and as her amorous inclinations, in ſo advanced an 'age, would naturally make her appear ridiculous, 'if not odious, in his eyes, he was engaged by an 'imprudent openneſs, of which he made profeſſion, to 'diſcover too eaſily thoſe ſentiments to her. The 'many reconciliations and returns of affection, of 'which he had ſtill made advantage, induced him to 'venture on new provocations, till he puſhed her 'beyond all bounds of patience; and he forgot, that 'though the ſentiments of the woman were ever ſtrong 'in her, thoſe of the Sovereign had ſtill, in the end, 'appeared predominant." (96).]

DEVEREUX (ROBERT) ſon to the former, and the third Earl of Eſſex of this family. He was born ſome time in the year 1592, at Eſſex-Houſe in the Strand (a), and, at the time of his father's unhappy death, was under the care of his grandmother by whom he was ſent to Eton ſchool, where he received the firſt tincture of a learned education (b). In the month of January 1602, he was removed to the Univerſity of Oxford, entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Merton-College, where he had an apartment in the Warden's lodgings, then Mr. Savile, afterwards the celebrated Sir Henry Savile, his father's dear friend, and who, for his ſake, was exceedingly careful in ſeeing that he was learnedly and religiouſly educated (c). The very next year he was reſtored to his hereditary honours (d); and in 1605, King James making a viſit to the Univerſity of Oxford, our young Earl of Eſſex was created Maſter of Arts on the 30th of Auguſt, for the firſt time, which, very probably, he had forgotten, or he would not have received the ſame honour above thirty years afterwards (e). At this time Henry Prince of Wales, attended by his Tutor Sir Thomas Chaloner, was matriculated of this Univerſity, and, at this time alſo, from a ſuppoſed harmony in their tempers, we are told, that there was a great intimacy between his Royal Highneſs and the Earl of Eſſex. They were both of a ſerious diſpoſition, yet much inclined to rough and robuſt exerciſes, more eſpecially tennis, at which, it is ſaid, a quarrel enſued between them, attended with ſuch conſequences, as made the King's interpoſition neceſſary (f) [A]. The remainder of this year, and the beginning of [A] As made the King's interpoſition neceſſary.] There is ſome cauſe to wonder, conſidering the great figure this Nobleman made in the world, that we ſhould never have had any tolerable account of his life and actions. As for that written by Mr. Codrington (1), it is not only entirely defective in point of method, but it is alſo very barren of facts, ſuch only excepted as are collected from the news writers of thoſe times. The ſame thing may with equal juſtice be ſaid of Winſtanley's account of this great Peer (2). Yet it is chiefly from theſe accounts that Mr. Wood (3) has taken the memoirs he has given us of this noble perſon, but of the next, the Earl ſpent in academical ſtudies becoming his age and quality, and ſuitable to the gravity of his temper. In the mean time Robert Earl of Saliſbury, and Lord High Treaſurer of England, who had acted as Prime Miniſter from the time of the King's acceſſion, perceiving that this young Nobleman was like to ſucceed to his father's fortune as well as titles, and to become a favourite both with Prince and People, grew very deſirous that the antient enmity between their families might be extinguiſhed; and, as he had married his ſon and heir-apparent to the Lady Catherine Howard, eldeſt daughter to the Earl of Suffolk, he projected a marriage between the Earl of Eſſex and Lady Frances Howard, the ſecond daughter of the ſame noble Peer (g), which proving acceptable enough to both families, took place accordingly, January 5th, 1606, the Lady being thirteen and the Earl fourteen years of age (h). The new-married couple being too young to cohabit together, the Earl was ſent to improve himſelf by travel, and the young Counteſs of Eſſex remained with her mother (i). His Lordſhip ſpent about four years beyond the ſeas, and returned in the year 1610, with the reputation of being one of the beſt accompliſhed Noblemen of his time (k). The Counteſs of Eſſex, in this ſpace, became diſtinguiſhed for her beauty, but at the expence of her diſcretion, the world having made free with her reputation (l), upon which it is certain that ſhe ſet too little value [B]. It does not however appear, that any of theſe untoward reports reached the ear of her Lord upon his coming to England; for he was very deſirous of conſummating the marriage, and was ſo indulgent as to look upon the averſion ſhewn by the Lady, as the but then they are much better ranged and digeſted. As to this ſtory of the Earl's quarrel with Prince Henry it ſtands upon the credit of Codrington, who mentions no time when it happened, for that is ſupplied by the conjecture of Mr. Wood, in which he has ſhewn great judgment, by placing it in that period, when, if there be any truth in it, this event muſt have happened. Take the relation in Mr. Codrington's own words: 'Prince Henry and the young Earl, ſays he, delighting themſelves one morning with the exerciſe and the 'pleaſure of the tennis-court, after that a ſet or two 'were played, there did ariſe ſome difference upon a 'miſtake: from bandying of the ball, the Prince being 'raiſed into a choler, did begin to bandy words, and 'was ſo tranſported with his paſſion, that he told the 'Earl of Eſſex that he was the ſon of a traitor. The 'Earl of Eſſex was then in the flouriſh of his youth, 'and full of fire and courage, and being not able to 'contain himſelf, he did ſtrike the Prince with his 'racket on the head, and that ſo ſhrewdly, that (as it 'is ſaid) ſome drops of blood did trickle down. The 'news of this was preſently brought to the King's ear, 'who having examined the buſineſs, and fully under-'ſtood the manner and the occaſion of it, did diſmiſs 'the Earl without any great check, and being a true 'peacemaker, he told his ſon, that he who did ſtrike 'him then, would be ſure with more violent blows 'to ſtrike his enemy in times to come.' It is ſurprizing that Mr. Wilſon, who lived many years as a domeſtic ſervant with the Earl of Eſſex, and who took ſo much pains to do juſtice to the Earl's actions, both in his public hiſtory, and in his private memoirs of his own life, which are now printed, ſhould ſay nothing of this; more eſpecially when he had ſo fair an opportunity, as in that paſſage where he endeavours to account for King James's diſlike to the Earl (4), from that inſtinct, or ſecret prediction that divine fate often imprints in the apprehenſion, whereby he did foreſee in him a hand raiſed up againſt his poſterity, ſince, without doubt, this quarrel with, and ſtriking the Prince, had been a much more ſatisfactory reaſon. Beſides, this ſtory does not well agree with the ſpirit of Prince Henry, who would ſcarcely have borne ſuch an inſult, or with that prudence for which he was ſo remarkable, as to be very unlikely to give any ſuch provocation, more eſpecially as his father, in common diſcourſe, often ſtiled the Earl of Eſſex his martyr, whence it is improbable the ſon ſhould take him for a traitor.

(4) Hiſtory of Great Britain, &c.

[B] That ſhe ſet too little value.] It appears from the judicial proceedings for diſſolving this marriage, that the Counteſs of Eſſex was about thirteen when ſhe contracted it (5): the Earl returned from his travels four years after; ſo that her love intrigues muſt have commenced very early: it is not however very eaſy to diſcover with whom ſhe had that familiarity which ſullied her reputation before the Earl's return. Mr. Wilſon tells us (6), 'that ſhe, growing to be a beauty 'of the greateſt magnitude in that horrizon, was an 'object fit for admirers, and every tongue grew an 'orator at that ſhrine. The Prince of Wales, now in 'his puberty, ſent many loving glances as Ambaſſadors 'of his good reſpects, and amorous expreſſions are fit 'ſubjects for jealous reproaches to work on.' What he adds ſoon after, in reference to Prince Henry's quitting her, and the cauſe of it, ſeems to have happened after the Earl of Eſſex came home. Read it in his own words: 'This Lady being taken with the growing 'fortunes of Robert Car Viſcount Rocheſter, and 'grounding more hope upon him than the uncertain 'and hopeleſs love of the Prince, ſhe caſt her anchor 'there, which the Prince ſoon diſcovered, and ſlighted 'her accordingly. For dancing one time among the 'ladies, and her glove falling down, it was taken up 'and preſented to him by one that thought he did him 'acceptable ſervice; but the Prince refuſed to receive 'it, ſaying publicly, he would not have it, it was 'ſtretched by another, meaning the Viſcount: this 'was an aggravation of hatred between the King's ſon 'and the King's friend.' Another writer of great diſtinction, who dealt very much in ſecret hiſtory, and who is believed to have been as well verſed in it as any man of his time, gives us a very plain and clear account of this, interwoven with greater matters, with which, as a curioſity, we will gratify our readers. Speaking of the Counteſs of Eſſex, he ſays (7), 'She 'was ſo delicate in her youth, as, notwithſtanding that 'ineſtimable Prince Henry's martial deſires, and ini-'tiation into the ways of godlineſs, ſhe being ſet on by 'the Earl of Northampton, her father's uncle, firſt 'caught his eye and heart, and afterwards proſtituted 'herſelf to him, who reaped the firſt fruits of her vir-'ginity. But thoſe ſparks of grace, which even then 'began to ſhew their luſtre in him, with thoſe more 'heroic innated qualities derived from virtue, which 'gave the law to his more adviſed actions, ſoon raiſed 'him out of the ſlumber of that diſtemper, and taught 'him to reject her following temptations with indigna-'tion and ſuperciliouſneſs. God beſt knows, whether 'that haſtened his end; moſt certain it is, that ſome 'months before his Highneſs's death, Viſcount Ro-'cheſter's familiarity and her's took its firſt initiation 'by Mrs. Turner's procurement. The Scots have a 'conſtant report amongſt them, as I learned from one 'of them, that Sir Thomas Overbury, ſeeing divers 'croſſings and oppoſitions to happen between that 'peerleſs Prince and ſaid Rocheſter, by whoſe means 'only he expected to riſe; and fearing it would in the 'end be a means to ruin Rocheſter himſelf, did firſt 'give that damnable and fatal advice, of removing 'out of the way and world that royal youth by faſ-'cination, and was himſelf afterwards in part an in-'ſtrument for the effecting of it; and therefore, ſay 'they in Scotland, it happened by the juſt judgmeat 'of God afterwards, as a puniſhment upon him, that 'he himſelf died by poiſon.'

(5) So it is ſet forth in her libel, and the fact is admitted for truth in the Earl's Anſwer.

effects

effects of that modeſty which ought to have been her greateſt ornament. While he was ſoliciting her conſent to go down and live with him at his ſeat in Staffordſhire, he was ſurprized with the ſmall-pox, which were either of the moſt malignant kind, or were rendered ſo by the adminiſtration of drugs, which were the very reverſe of Phyſick (m). However, the Earl's youth, temperance, and ſtrong conſtitution, got the better of the diſeaſe, and the Earl of Suffolk compelled his daughter to comply with her huſband's deſires, and to go down with him to Chartley (n). There her head ran upon the Viſcount Rocheſter, who was at once the King's favourite and her's; and, in hopes of becoming one day his wife, ſhe entered into a variety of wicked practices againſt the health as well as honour of her Lord; and, at length, having overcome all ſenſe of ſhame, ſhe inſtituted a public ſuit againſt him, before Commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe, in 1613 (o), which remains a blemiſh to our publick hiſtory [C]. In the latter end of the month of September ſentence was pronounced by the major part of theſe Commiſſioners, that the marriage was null and void with reſpect to the parties, becauſe of the frigidity alledged by the Counteſs, and acknowledged by the Earl to be in him with reſpect to her; from which, however, diſſented Dr. Abbot, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. King, Biſhop of London, Sir John Bennet, Francis James, and Thomas Edwards, Doctors of Laws (p). The Lady being thus at liberty from a huſband ſhe did not love, married with great pomp and ſplendour, before the cloſe of the year, the man with whom ſhe was ſo much enamoured; while the Earl of Eſſex, to whom the diſgrace, from the thing itſelf, was doubled by the circumſtances which attended it, endeavoured to hide himſelf in the country from the obſervance of the world, and the reproach to which he was expoſed from the bad conduct of an unhappy woman, born to be undone by that beauty for which ſhe was ſo much admired (q). His own venerable caſtle of Chartley in Staffordſhire, which deſcended to him from the antient family of Ferrers, was commonly the place of the Earl's reſidence, where he lived with great magnificence, in a friendly correſpondence with all the Gentlemen of the country round about, and, in proceſs of time, with as general affection and reſpect from all ranks and degrees of people as he could poſſibly deſire. Sometimes he made a tour to Drayton, where his grandmother the Counteſs of Leiceſter reſided, and ſometimes he viſited his brother-in-law the Earl of Hertford in Wiltſhire (r). Manly ſports, ſuch as hunting, ſhooting, and riding long journies, made a great part of his ſummer recreations. In the winter, good cheer, feaſting, with maſks and plays, compoſed commonly by Arthur Wilſon, who was his Groom of the Chambers, ſerved to mitigate my Lord's melancholy, and to give the Country Gentlemen content (s). In this manner he paſſed near ſeven years, and then, in the ſpring of 1620, the war being hot in the Palatinate, his Lordſhip, at the requeſt of his friend Henry Earl of Oxford, reſolved to go thither, under the command of Sir Horatio Vere, an old ſoldier, and one of great reputation (t). The two Earls propoſed to raiſe each a regiment, but carried over companies only for the preſent; compoſed however, for the moſt part, of Gentlemen, who went rather to acquire knowledge in the art of war, than to obtain either pay or preferment in that ſervice (u) [D]. Though the fatigues and diſappointments they met with, in [C] Which remains a blemiſh to our public Hiſtory.] It was without doubt a great weakneſs in King James to give that countenance which he did to this wicked affair; but he was at that time ſo much addicted to his favourite, afterwards Earl of Somerſet, that he was willing to contribute in any manner whatever to his ſatisfaction (8). It is however highly probable, his Majeſty was perſuaded that the Earl of Eſſex gave his conſent to it: neither was this altogether void of truth, for the Earl, tired with his wife's humours, diſpleaſed with the world's talk, and deſirous to be reſtored to his former free and happy ſtate of life, was willing enough, upon the perſuaſion of the Earl and Counteſs of Suffolk, to part with his Lady; ſuppoſing, at that time, it might be done without loſs of reputation (9). A commiſſion having paſſed the Great Seal in the ſummer of the year 1613, the libel was filed in the month of June, and the Earl put in his anſwer on the 5th of July. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury was very much diſturbed at this, being equally diſpleaſed, that, by colluſion between the parties, the bond of matrimony ſhould be diſſolved, or that the new diſtinction which the King ſo much approved, that my Lord was impotens in genere verſus hanc, ſhould take place, the ſad effects of which, with reſpect to the reputation of the Commiſſioners, and the ill conſequences that muſt attend ſo bad a precedent in the face of the world, he clearly foreſaw. Upon this he deſired to examine the Earl of Eſſex more particularly; which was refuſed, becauſe the Earl, hearing the outcry this matter made, and how much it touched his own character, had altered his ſentiments (10). This forced the Commiſſioners to go on in another way, and to truſt entirely to the evidence of the Lady, ſupported by corroborating circumſtances of a very ſtrange, or rather of a very ſhameful nature. At laſt, September 25, the ſentence of nullity was pronounced, and December 26 the Lady was married again to the Earl of Somerſet in the King's Chapel, the foreign Miniſters invited to the marriage, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in a manner compelled to honour it with his preſence (11). To add to the Earl of Eſſex's perplexity, he was called upon to pay back his wife's fortune, which did not agree at all with his circumſtances, whoſe quality obliged him to live at the very extent of his income. That he might anſwer this demand he was compelled to cut down his fine woods at Adderſton; nor would this have done, if his grandmother, the Counteſs of Leiceſter, had not ſupplied him with a conſiderable ſum of money, to prevent his ſelling a part of his eſtate (12). We need not wonder therefore, that the Earl of Eſſex was not over-fond of the Court, or that King James, after buſying himſelf ſo much in this matter, ſhould not be well-pleaſed with the ſight of a man, who, in ſo tender a point, had been ſo groſsly injured.

[D] Than to obtain either pay or preferment in that ſervice.] It is ſaid by more writers than one, that the Earl of Eſſex went abroad to learn the art of diſcipline and arms, that he might be the more capable of doing ſervice to his country. It is much more probable, that the accompanying the Earl of Oxford, and the diverting his own melancholy thoughts, were at this in their firſt martial adventure might have diſcouraged them from proceeding, yet theſe Lords went over again into Holland in 1621, and, in quality of volunteers, put themſelves under the direction of Prince Maurice of Naſſau, and, by their behaviour, merited the general applauſe of the whole army (w). They returned in the winter to England, where they both ſteered the ſame courſe, in giving ſome oppoſition to the deſigns of the Court in Parliament, where, though the Earl of Eſſex was never eloquent, yet he ſpoke very pertinently, and was very well heard. Into the royal preſence he came but ſeldom, perceiving that he was not very agreeable to the King; which was attributed to the roughneſs of his deportment, and his affecting the manner and garb of a ſoldier (x). An accidental affair induced King James to publiſh more of his mind in this reſpect than he intended, or indeed than it was any way fit he ſhould. The caſe was this: the Nobility of England in general were much diſpleaſed with this Monarch's profuſion of honours, ſo contrary to the practice of his predeceſſor, and which, they apprehended, leſſened the dignity of the Peerage (y). Yet what troubled them moſt was, the vanity of ſome Gentlemen of large eſtates, who, by mere dint of money, procured to themſelves either Scotch or Iriſh titles of Viſcounts and Earls, in right of which they pretended to take place of Engliſh Barons. To remedy this grievance a petition was drawn up, and preſented to the King, in which the matter was ſtrongly but ſuccinctly ſtated; which petition was ſubſcribed by thirty-three of the Nobility, amongſt whoſe names the Earl of Eſſex makes the third. King James was highly diſpleaſed with this application, and, as if he had conſidered it as flowing entirely from the Earl of Eſſex, diſcharged upon him the greateſt part of his reſentment, making uſe, as we are told, amongſt others, of this expreſſion, I fear thee not Eſſex, if thou waſt as well beloved as thy father, and had forty thouſand men at thy heels (z). This ſour treatment at Court gave the Earl ſo much a greater reliſh for his military expeditions abroad, which, with no other reward than the increaſe of his reputation, he followed the two next ſummers; and, in 1624, when the States of the United Provinces were allowed to raiſe four regiments, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men in England, he commanded a third, and the Lord Willoughby the fourth, which is the more remarkable, as theſe two noble Peers were afterwards at the head of oppoſite armies in our unfortunate Civil War; the Lord Willoughby, by title of Earl of Lindſey, having the command of the King's army, as the Earl of Eſſex had of that of the Parliament (a). This expedition was none of the moſt fortunate, and a great ſickneſs breaking out in the army carried off the Earl of Southampton and his ſon, and the Earl of Oxford, who died before Breda (b). In 1625 a grand ſupply was ſent from England; but, by ſome ill management, the forces were kept ſo long on board the tranſports, that an time his principal motives, rather than any foreſight he could then have of what afterwards fell out. His company was to have conſiſted of two hundred and fifty men; but ſuch was his intereſt, and the general affection borne him, that when he came to muſter his company in Holland, it conſiſted of full three hundred, ſo that the pay of fifty men came out of his own pocket (13). The Marquis of Spinola, with the Auſtrian army under his command, being in full march for the Palatinate, Prince Henry of Naſſau, with a ſmall body of troops, of which the Engliſh made a part, undertook to follow him, and to join that army which the Princes of the Union had raiſed for the defence of that electorate, which his Highneſs accordingly performed with great addreſs. In this march the inhabitants of the town of Coblentz, very unexpectedly, and without any reaſon given, fired upon the Engliſh from their ramparts, when a cannon ball paſſed between General Vere and the Earl of Eſſex, who were talking together, and wounded one Mr. Flood, who ſtood behind them (14). After they had with much difficulty joined the army of the Princes, who, by that junction, became ſuperior in force to Spinola, the war was carried on in a very dilatory manner, till the ſeaſon of the year rendered it impracticable to keep the field any longer; and then the Engliſh forces being put into garriſon in the Palatinate, the Earl returned home through France, where he met with a very odd adventure, of which Mr. Wilſon, his Hiſtorian, gives us the following account (15): 'We had,' ſays he, 'from Frankendale, 'a convoy of a hundred horſe, which brought us into 'Lorrain. From Mentz we travelled by ourſelves 'into France, and came to Compeigne in Champagne, 'where my Lord ſent away moſt of his train the ſtrait 'way to Bologne, and himſelf, with ſome few of us, 'took poſt, though he went three miles out of the 'way to come to the poſt-road. The next ſtage was 'Gourney; where the knaviſh Poſt-Maſter ſeeing us 'likely to be good gueſts, to keep us there all night, 'delayed, or rather, indeed, refuſed us horſes, pretending he could not furniſh them till morning. Which 'being contrary to my Lord's intention, for he took 'the poſt-road to make more haſte, not to hinder him, 'he was much troubled. And as we were wrangling 'for this coarſe entertainment with our hoſt, my 'Lord's horſes (the Gentlemen and Grooms who went 'with them miſtaking the way) came by. Which ſeen, 'his Lordſhip with joy preſently mounted his own 'horſes, to go the next ſtage. The inn-keeper, deceived of his prey, fell into raging and railing, 'which my Lord not brooking, ran after him with a 'cudgel (for his words were very provoking) to give 'him a parting blow. The inn-keeper's activity carried him to a garret, where, thruſting his head out 'at a window, he cried, Murder! Murder! with a 'fury, not thinking there were three ſtories betwixt 'him and his danger. It ſeems it was enough; for 'before we got twelve ſcore yards in the ſtreet, we 'found ourſelves barricadoed with carts, and encircled 'with five hundred people, men, women, and children, with pitchforks, ſwords, and guns, ſmiths with 'iron bars, and every one with that came next to hand 'beſet us. We had each a caſe of piſtols, and cloſely 'ſtood upon our guard. The confuſion and noiſe was 'great; no man knew for what. But we were very 'ſenſible of ſome knocks from a little hill above us, 'by Friers, who had filled their laps with ſtones, and 'kindly diſtributed them among us. Above half an 'hour we ſtood in this condition, ſtaring on one another (no man but the virtuous Friers offering us injury), expecting what they had to lay to our charge. 'At laſt a gentleman came to us who was a lieutenant 'of horſe, wiſhing us to put up our ſwords and piſtols 'if we loved our ſafety. For if we had done any miſchief it was impoſſible to eſcape; if we had done 'none, we ſhould receive none. So he went from us 'to examine the buſineſs; and in a quarter of an hour 'returned, pacified the people, and opened the way 'to us. My Lord commanded me to give him two 'Engliſh pieces; but he refuſed them.'

epidemick diſtemper broke out amongſt them, which differed very little from the plague, and carried off the greateſt part (c). Upon the death of King James, and a Parliament being ſummoned to meet at Oxford, the Earl of Eſſex came over in the ſummer, and found the plague raging at home, and with no leſs violence at Oxford than at London (d). That Parliament breaking up abruptly, his Lordſhip went from Oxford to his brother the Earl of Hertford's houſe in Wiltſhire, where he remained for ſome time. Out of this retirement he was drawn by an order from the King to repair to Court, with intention to employ his Lordſhip in an expedition againſt Spain; to which he was eaſily perſuaded, as having an inclination to carry ſtill higher that reputation which, under his noble father's happy command, the Engliſh had attained at Cadiz (e). He was not, however, ſo fortunate, and, indeed, there hardly ever was an attempt made by the Engliſh that did leſs credit either to their courage and conduct, than this naval enterprize, which, as it was badly contrived, was ſtill worſe executed [E]. At his return he waited upon the King, and gave him a ſhort account of the diſappointments they had met with, and of the cauſes of thoſe diſappointments; after which he did not remain long at Court, where he was, in ſome meaſure, out of his element, but returned to his old ſeat in Staffordſhire, where, for a few weeks, his friends and his books took up all his time (f). In the ſummer of 1626 he returned again to his command in the Low-Countries, and marched with the reſt of the army into the Duchy of Cleves, where, that year, they had no great ſucceſs; and yet the Engliſh forces abroad were ſo miſerably harraſſed with fatiguing marches, and dangerous diſeaſes, flowing from an unwholeſome climate, that it was thought expedient to embody all the four regiments in one corps, under the command of General Morgan, and to march that into the country of Bremen; upon which the Earl of Eſſex, conceiving it not for his honour to remain abroad, thought fit to return home (g). He arrived in England at a time when it might have been expected that his martial genius, and military experience, would have recommended him to ſome conſiderable command, great preparations being made, at that juncture, for an expedition in ſupport of the French Proteſtants. There is no doubt of the Earl's affection for that cauſe, or of his willingneſs to hazard his life upon ſuch an occaſion: but, as the Duke of Buckingham had formed a reſolution to command in chief, we need not wonder that the Earl of Eſſex, who valued himſelf not a little on the antiquity of his family, declined ſerving under him, and, to avoid all invitations, retired, as uſual, to his ſeat at Chartley (h). He came up, however, the next year, to attend his duty in Parliament, where things ran very high; and ſuch as had no good will to the great favourite, puſhed him, with much violence, to the great diſpleaſure of his Royal Maſter, and by impeding the publick ſervice to the no ſmall detriment of the nation (i). We find the Earl of Eſſex again at Chartley in the ſummer following, when, upon the murder of the Duke of Buckingham, he diſpatched Mr. Wilſon, now become his Secretary, to Portſmouth, who performed his journey, of nearly three hundred miles, in three days, which argues that he went upon ſome buſineſs of conſequence, but of what nature is to us entirely unknown (k). The winter of that year the Earl ſpent at the houſe of his brother the Earl of Hertford, at Netley in Wiltſhire, which wrought a notable change in his circumſtances. There happened to be with his ſiſter the Counteſs of Hertford, as a viſitor, one Mrs. Elizabeth Paulet, a very beautiful young Lady, daughter to Sir William Paulet, of Eddington in the ſame county, who was a natural ſon of the Marquis of Wincheſter's (l). With this Lady the Earl was ſo much taken, that ſhe was preſſed to ſtay the Chriſtmas holidays; and, notwithſtanding the misfortunes he had met with from his firſt unlucky marriage, the Earl concluded this with ſome precipitation, marrying his ſecond Lady in the ſpring of the year following (m). It was in conſequence of this marriage, and the diſlike which the new Counteſs had to him, that the Earl was forced to part with Mr. Arthur Wilſon, in whom he had re-

[E] Which, as it was badly contrived, was ſtill worſe executed.] It was a very unlucky omen, at the very beginning of a new reign, to undertake ſo ſtrange an expedition as this was, of which none who were competent judges had any hopes at all. The reaſon aſſigned for it was, the ill uſage received from Spain, in the negotiation for the Prince's marriage, and in the buſineſs of the Palatinate; but the truth was believed to be, that it was to gratify the Duke of Buckingham's reſentment againſt the Condé Olivarez, and to raiſe his reputation with the people; for at firſt it was intended that he ſhould have commanded the fleet (16): afterwards Sir Edward Cecil was choſen for that command, and for that purpoſe created Viſcount Wimbledon. The Earl of Eſſex and he were great friends: and therefore the King ſent for the Earl, and prevailed upon him to go the voyage in quality of Vice-Admiral (17). The fleet and tranſports conſiſted of about one hundred and twenty ſail, having about ſixteen thouſand ſeamen and ſoldiers on board. They ſailed, the Admiral from Plymouth, and the Earl of Eſſex with his ſquadron from Falmouth, on the 8th of October, 1625, and, after ſome hard weather, which they had reaſon to expect at that ſeaſon of the year, arrived upon the coaſt of Spain, where they performed very little. The Earl of Eſſex, indeed, took a fort, that gave the ſoldiers an opportunity of drinking freely of Spaniſh wines, and this threw them into fevers and fluxes. The Commander in Chief ſhewed himſelf every way unfit for ſuch a charge. He was continually conſulting, giving orders, and iſſuing inſtructions, which the ſeamen never minded; ſo that after much time, and many men loſt, he thought fit to return a few days before the arrival of the Plate Fleet, and came back to England at the very cloſe of the year (18). This untoward buſineſs did not fix the leaſt imputation upon the Earl, who did what little there was done, but was not able to engage the General to act with that ſpirit neceſſary to preſerve diſcipline, and render an army victorious.

posed the greateſt truſt and confidence (n). This ſhews that the Earl was far from being a moroſe huſband; and yet, in a ſhort time, there grew ſome ſuſpicions of this Lady's behaviour; notwithſtanding which the Earl owned a child of which ſhe was brought to bed, and cauſed it to be baptized by his own name Robert, which ſon of his lived to be about five years old (o). But the Earl was divorced from his Lady in about two years, on account of her familiarity with one Mr. Uvedale; and, from this time, his Lordſhip ſeems to have laid aſide all thoughts of the Ladies, and to have addicted himſelf entirely to cares of another nature (p). His temper differed, in many things, from that of his father, whom, notwithſtanding, he endeavoured to imitate in others, more eſpecially in courting the favour of the people, careſſing the Miniſters that were looked upon as puritanically affected, profeſſing an extraordinary friendſhip for military men, and being likewiſe a kind patron to the Poets; methods that, in thoſe ſtirring and tumultuous times, raiſed him a great character, and enabled him to become an inſtrument either of much good, or of much hurt, to the publick (q). There is no notice taken in any of our Hiſtories, publick or private, of this Nobleman's going to Ireland, ſo that we are abſolutely ſtrangers to the motives upon which he undertook that voyage; but that he actually went thither in 1632, and was extremely well received by the Lord-Deputy Wentworth, afterwards the famous Earl of Strafford, is very certain, as well as that this produced very ſtrong profeſſions of friendſhip on both ſides (r). The Noble Hiſtorian tells us, that this was afterwards changed into an oppoſite diſpoſition, from the conduct of the Earl of Strafford, in reſpect to the Clanrickard family, for which he informs us, that the Earl of Eſſex had a great regard (s); as, indeed, he very well might, ſince the Earl of St. Alban's and Clanrickard married his mother (t). He paſſed his days after his uſual manner, either at his own ſeat, or thoſe of his friends, and, as occaſion required, at his houſe in London, till the publick ſervice called him again into the view of the world, which was in the year 1635, when King Charles reſolved to vindicate his ſovereignty of the ſeas againſt the French and Dutch, who had formed a deſign of invading it (u). It was with this view that the King equipped a ſtout fleet, under the command of the Earl of Lindſey, to anſwer the purpoſes before mentioned: and at the ſame time, a ſmaller ſquadron of twenty ſail put to ſea for the guard of the coaſts, and protection of the trade of England, which, with the title of Vice-Admiral, was commanded by the Earl of Eſſex; and both fleets had all the ſucceſs that could be deſired; for, though the French and Dutch joined their naval forces, they were able to do nothing; and, towards the cloſe of the year, the States ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to compliment the King upon the birth of the Princeſs Elizabeth, which, as a judicious writer obſerves, was a teſtimony of reſpect, flowing purely from this diſplay of his Majeſty's power at ſea (w). In 1639 the foreign enemies of the King and kingdom having artfully wrought upon the temper of the Scots, and excited them to rebellion, the King found himſelf under a neceſſity of employing force to reduce them, and, having raiſed a noble army, appointed the Earl of Arundel General, the Earl of Eſſex Lieutenant-General, and the Earl of Holland General of the Horſe (x). Eſſex, with a part of the army, had orders to advance to Berwick, and, in his march thither, he met with ſeveral Scotch Noblemen, who pretending to be well affected to the King, informed him of the great ſtrength of their countrymen, of their march towards England, and of the great hazard he muſt run by approaching them with ſo inconſiderable a force. The Earl heard them, quickened his march, took poſſeſſion of Berwick, found the Scots had, in reality, hardly any forces, and, if the King had ſent him proper orders, would have marched on to Edinburgh, and reduced that people to their duty (y). The Scots, upon the approach of the King's army, addreſſed themſelves to the King's Generals, and eſpecially to the Earl of Eſſex, with great humility. The other two received their applications kindly enough; but Eſſex behaved with becoming dignity, ſent their letters to the King, and, when his Majeſty was prevailed upon to liſten to an accommodation, refuſed to have any concern in it, or ſo much as to receive the viſits of the Scots Commiſſioners till the pacification was ſigned (z). When there was no farther occaſion for his ſervice he was diſmiſſed, rather with coldneſs than civility, which could not but diſguſt a man of his high ſpirit (a). In 1640 the Earl of Eſſex both received and returned mortifications; for the Scots broke through all they had promiſed, and raiſed a powerful army, which obliged the King to have, once more, recourſe to a regular force, with which he marched northwards; but, in this expedition, the Earl of Eſſex had no command (b). Upon the death of the Lord Aſton, who was Warden of Needwood Foreſt, cloſe by the Earl of Eſſex's houſe at Chartley, his Lordſhip aſked it as a favour to ſucceed him; and was refuſed in ſuch a manner, that he could not avoid taking it for an affront (c). On the 28th of Auguſt he ſigned a petition to the King, with eleven other Peers, to terminate theſe diſputes without blood, and for the ſpeedy calling of a Parliament (d). On Michaelmas-day following the King appointed him one of the Commiſſioners for treating with the Scots at Rippon; and when the Long Parliament was begun, which obliged the King to think of popular meaſures, the Earl of Eſſex, together with ſeveral other Noblemen, was ſworn of the Privy-Council on the third of February (e). At this time the Noble Hiſtorian is very clear, that, whatever diſtaſtes his Lordſhip might have conceived againſt certain men, or certain meaſures, he was perfectly well affected to the Conſtitution, as well in Church as in State (f) [F]. In the month of May 1641, the Earl of Eſſex was made Lord Chamberlain of the King's Houſhold, upon the removal of the Earl of Pembroke; which was not well received by the angry men in the Houſe of Commons, who fancied that the Earl of Pembroke had loſt the King's favour by his inclination to them (g). At this ſeaſon ſome of the wiſeſt perſons about his Majeſty would have perſuaded him to have declared Eſſex General of his army, as the moſt effectual means of preſerving it; with which advice, however, he would not comply. On the other hand, thoſe who were for driving things to extremities, and had framed a bill for taking the militia from the King, propoſed to give the command of all the forces by land to the Earl of Eſſex, and to devolve the power at ſea upon the Earl of Northumberland, with a view, in all probability, to gain over thoſe two great Peers entirely to their intereſts (b). When his Majeſty had taken a reſolution of making a journey into Scotland, and found it neceſſary to appoint a ſingle perſon to have the chief command in the ſouthern parts of the kingdom during his abſence, he, in the beginning of Auguſt, ſigned a commiſſion, appointing the Earl of Eſſex Lieutenant-General of all his forces on this ſide Trent, with a power of increaſing their number if it ſhould be found neceſſary (i). This mark of royal confidence could not be greater than that which was afterwards beſtowed upon him, in a very unuſual manner, by the Houſe of Lords; for, having taken a reſolution to adjourn themſelves for a certain time, they, by an order, dated September 9th, appointed a Standing Committee, of which the Earl of Eſſex was Chairman (k). On the King's return from Scotland things began to run more and more into confuſion, the populace aſſuming a moſt unbounded liberty, and coming in ſuch a tumultuous manner to Whitehall and Weſtminſter, as created no ſmall apprehenſion, both to the King and to the Parliament. In order to remove this, the Houſe of Commons, on the third of January, petitioned his Majeſty for a guard out of the city, under the command of his Lord Chamberlain the Earl of Eſſex, of whoſe fidelity to the King and Commonwealth, they ſaid, no queſtion was ever made (l). This his Majeſty thought fit to decline, and the very next day, being the 4th of the ſame month, he went in perſon to the Houſe of Commons, and demanded the five members (m). Upon the diſturbances which followed, his Majeſty thought proper to retire from his Capital, and requiring, upon that occaſion, his Houſehold ſervants to attend him, the Earls of Eſſex and Holland pleaded their obligation (n) to aſſiſt in the deliberations of the Houſe of Peers; upon which they were removed from their reſpective employments. We are told by the Noble Hiſtorian, that this was entirely the work of the Earl of Holland, who, when he found Eſſex reſolved and prepared to go, aſſured him they ſhould be both murdered at Hampton-Court, which engaged him to go with that Earl into the city; and this was ſo reported to the King as to induce him to treat both with the ſame ſeverity; which was not only a little imprudent, but proved, as the wiſeſt men in thoſe times thought, extremely fatal (o) [G]. By degrees, and with the mixture

[F] He was perfectly well affected to the Conſtitution as well in Church as in State.] It is certainly a thing difficult enough to come at the true characters of the principal perſons on both ſides in this unhappy war; yet with reſpect to the Earl of Eſſex it is generally agreed, that he was a Nobleman of very upright intentions. Sir Philip Warwick (19), who ſpeaks the leaſt favourably of him, allows, that he was no ill ſoldier, and valued much among the men of that profeſſion: he ſays he was a man much diſobliged at Court, and of ſuch a natural confuſed ſpirit, that he was not able to diſcern the ill conſequences of his indifference towards the Crown; but at the ſame time he confeſſes, the Court was not artificial enough to make that right uſe of him, which his intereſt amongſt the ſoldiers, and his blunt, plain Engliſh nature, might have been formed into, by a ſeeming confidence. The Noble Hiſtorian tells us plainly, he had no ambition of title, or office, or preferment, but only to be kindly looked upon, and kindly ſpoken to, and quietly to enjoy his own fortune; and without doubt no man in his nature more abhorred rebellion than he did; nor could he have been drawn into it by any open and tranſparent temptation, but by a thouſand diſguiſes and couzenages. His pride ſupplied his want of ambition, and he was angry to ſee any other man more reſpected than himſelf, becauſe he thought he deſerved it more, and did better require it. For he was in his friendſhips juſt and conſtant, and would not have practiſed foully even againſt thoſe that he took to be his enemies. No man had credit enough with him to corrupt him in point of loyalty to the King, while he thought himſelf wiſe enough to know what reaſon was. But the new notions were too hard for him, and intoxicated his underſtanding, ſo that he quitted his own to follow theirs, who, as he thought, wiſhed as well, and judged better than himſelf. He adds, that when he accepted the commiſſion to be General, he did it with a view of being the preſerver, and not the deſtroyer, of the King and kingdom (20). We have this character fully confirmed by Denzil Lord Holles, who could not but be well acquainted with this Nobleman's real intentions, and was too honeſt to miſrepreſent them (21). The kindneſs he ſhewed to ſuch of the clergy as fell under the diſpleaſure of the Biſhops, was owing to the compaſſion of his nature, and the ſincerity of his zeal for the eſſentials of religion, as the Earl of Clarendon tells us (22), with great candour. 'The Earl of Eſſex,' ſays he, 'was rather diſpleaſed with the perſon 'of the Archbiſhop, and ſome other Biſhops, than in'devoted to the function; and towards ſome of them 'he had great reverence and kindneſs, as Biſhop 'Moreton, Biſhop Hall, and ſome other of the leſs 'formal and more popular Prelates; and he was as 'much devoted as any man to the Book of Common 'Prayer, and obliged all his ſervants to be conſtantly 'preſent with him at it, his houſhold Chaplain being 'always a moſt conformable man, and a good ſcho'lar.'

[G] Extremely fatal.] It is very certain, that, as the Earl of Eſſex was coldly treated at Court, ſo he was never taken into the counſels or confidence of thoſe of the other party, who reſolved to hide from him as much as poſſible their real intentions, and to let him ſee nothing but fair pretences, that might induce him to become their inſtrument (23). The truth of this appears by the meſſages he carried from the King to the Houſe of Peers; and ſtill more from his behaviour upon the King's coming to the Houſe of Commons, and demanding the five members; for he inſtantly moved the Houſe of Lords to intercede on their behalf, ſuppoſing them to be in real danger, and that the King's reſentment would have been fatal to them; at which thoſe in the ſecret ſmiled, knowing well, that thoſe members were to the full as ſecure as the King himſelf (24). It is, indeed, ſtrange that he altered his reſolution upon any thing told him by the Earl of Holland, becauſe he was a man of whom he had formerly mixture of a great deal of art, the Earl of Eſſex was wrought upon to accept the honour, or, rather, to ſuſtain the burthen that was intended to be impoſed upon him; and, about the middle of July 1642, he was declared General of the army raiſed for the ſafety of the King's perſon, and defence of both Houſes of Parliament (p), and complimented with their votes of living and dying with him. It is believed, that the Earl accepted this office in hopes that it would have produced a ſpeedy end of theſe troubles; but he was quickly undeceived in that point, by finding, that the King had an army about him, and ſo much reſented his Lordſhip's behaviour, that he had cauſed him to be proclaimed a traitor, and refuſed to accept an application for peace, becauſe it came from his hands (q). On the 9th of September following the Earl of Eſſex marched out of London in great pomp and ſplendour, attended by both Houſes of Parliament, to the rendezvous of the army, which was appointed to be at Northampton, where about fifteen thouſand men were aſſembled, and there his ſtandard, which was orange colour, was firſt diſplayed againſt the King (r). He marched from thence to Worceſter, his Majeſty being then at Shrewſbury, where having recruited his army, and finding himſelf leſs at a loſs for men than for the means of ſubſiſting them, he began his march directly towards London (s), Octob. 14th. The Earl of Eſſex followed his Majeſty from Worceſter; but the King, being leſs incumbered with baggage, gained ground, and might, poſſibly, have accompliſhed what he had in view, if his Majeſty, diſdaining to be purſued, had not turned back, and, on Sunday, October 23d, engaged the army of the Parliament, under the Earl of Eſſex, between Keinton and Edgehill in Warwickſhire, where both ſides claimed the victory, though neither had any great reaſon [H]. He retired after this diſpute with his forces to War-

formerly no good opinion. But, as the Earl of Clarendon juſtly obſerves, it was much ſtranger that the Court ſhould make no difference in the puniſhment of their offences, where there was ſo wide a difference between the perſons. The Earl of Holland held all that he had by the favour and from the bounty of the Crown, which had raiſed him to what he was (25); whereas the Earl of Eſſex had received great diſobligations, and even in reſpect to his office of Lord Chamberlain, was allowed to have done full as much favour to the Court in accepting his white ſtaff, as was expreſſed by conferring it on him. Yet there is ſomething very extraordinary, and at the ſame time nothing improbable, in what the Noble Hiſtorian ſuggeſts, that the taking from him that white ſtaff, trivial as the circumſtance ſeems, was the true ſource of the Civil War. He reaſons thus (26): if the King had excuſed the attendance of the Earl of Eſſex, had ſignified to him ſo much, and continued him in his employment, he would never have accepted the commiſſion to be General of the Parliament's army, from the punctuality of his temper, and the conſideration of his being immediately in the King's ſervice. If he would not have accepted that commiſſion, there could have been no army, for it was chiefly his reputation that raiſed it, in which alſo Whitlocke agrees (27); and if no army could have been raiſed, an agreement muſt have been made, which would have prevented all the misfortunes, miſchiefs, and miſeries, that afterwards enſued.

(27) This we find alſo handſomely expreſſed in May's Hiſt. of the Parliament.

[H] Though neither had any great reaſon.] Whoever looks for truth in Hiſtory, will find it difficult enough to be met with in moſt caſes, but in none more viſibly than in the accounts given us of battles, where, generally ſpeaking, they rather diſcover the inclinations of the writer than the real ſtate of facts, which are alſo very difficult to be got at. In point of numbers the armies were not very unequal: that of the Earl of Eſſex would have been ſuperior in this reſpect to the King's, if all his forces had been with him; but ſome of his beſt regiments did not come up till the battle was in a manner over. On the other hand, if the King's army that engaged was actually more numerous, it was much worſe armed. A great part of it conſiſted of Welſhmen, who had nothing but pitchforks and cudgels; but they came to their buſineſs with a good-will, and as they charged with the firſt, ſo ſuch as returned from that field picked up arms ſufficient to make a better appearance when they were next called to action. It is certain that the King was the aggreſſor in this battle, from a point of honour, that he would not be purſued, or rather, becauſe he accounted it a dangerous thing to continue his march to London with ſuch a force in his rear. In reference to the perſonal behaviour of the Earl of Eſſex, what follows is the moſt juſt and the moſt particular of any that I have met with (28). 'The Earl of Lindſey, with a pike in his 'hand, led on the main body of the army, in which 'was the King's own regiment, encountered by the 'Lord General Eſſex, who expoſed himſelf to all the 'danger that a battle could make, firſt leading on his 'troop, then his own regiment of foot, and breathing 'courage into them, till, being diſſuaded by divers 'from engaging himſelf too far, he returned to the 'reſt of the army to draw them on. The chief regi-'ments having begun the battle, Sir Philip Stapleton, with a brave troop of gentlemen (which were 'the General's life-guard, and commanded by him), 'charged the King's regiment on their right flank 'within their pikes, and came off without any great 'hurt, though thoſe pikemen ſtoutly defended themſelves; and the muſqueteers, being good firemen, 'played fiercely upon them. The battle was hot at 'that place, and ſo many of the King's ſide ſlain, that 'the Parliament army began to be victorious there: 'they took the ſtandard-royal, the bearer, Sir Edward 'Varney, being ſlain; and the General, the Earl of 'Lindſey, ſore wounded, was taken priſoner. But 'the ſame fortune was not in every part, for the 'King's right wing, led by Prince Rupert, charged 'fiercely upon the left wing of the other (conſiſting 'moſtly of horſe), and prevailed altogether, for the 'Parliament troops ran almoſt all away in that wing, 'and many of their foot companies, diſmayed with 'their flight, fled all away before they had ſtood one 'charge. Colonel Eſſex being utterly forſaken by that 'whole brigade which he commanded, went himſelf 'into the van, where he performed excellent ſervice, 'both by direction and execution, till, at the laſt, he 'was ſhot in the thigh, of which he ſhortly after died. 'Some part of their diſheartening was cauſed by the 'revolt of their own ſide; for Sir Faithful Forteſcue, 'at the beginning of the fight, inſtead of charging the 'enemy, diſcharged his piſtol on the ground, and 'with his troop wheeling about, ran to the King's 'army, to whom he had formerly given notice thereof 'by his Cornet. The Parliament army had undoubtedly been ruined that day, and an abſolute victory 'gained on the King's ſide, if Prince Rupert and his 'purſuing troops had been more temperate in plundering ſo untimely as they did, and had wheeled 'about to aſſiſt their diſtreſſed friends in other parts of 'the army; for Prince Rupert followed the chaſe to 'Keynton town, where the carriages of the army were, 'which they preſently pillaged, uſing great cruelty, 'as was afterwards related, to the unarmed waggoners and labouring men. A great number of the flying Parliament-ſoldiers were ſlain in that chaſe, which 'laſted two miles beyond Keynton, and ſo far till the 'purſuers were forced to retire, having met with Colonel Hampden, who marched with the other bri-'gade

Warwick, and from thence returned, in obedience to the preſſing ſolicitations of the Parliament, with as much diligence as it was poſſible, to London, where he was received with all the reſpect and veneration poſſible. On the 7th of November he had the thanks of the Houſes given him in a very ſolemn reſolution, and a preſent beſides of five thouſand pounds (t). Theſe ceremonies were diſturbed by the approach of the King's army, which, having taken Reading, continued their march directly to London, Prince Rupert making himſelf maſter of Brentford. The Lord-General Eſſex went immediately to Turnham-Green, where he aſſembled his forces, which were greatly augmented by the timely arrival of the city trained-bands under the Earl of Warwick, who gave up his command as ſoon as he came to the army, which faced the King's troops all day, but ſuffered them, at length, to retire, without fighting (u). This was a tranſaction attended with much wonder on both ſides. The Noble Hiſtorian ſays, that the Earl of Eſſex made the right uſe of the ſuperiority of his troops, by keeping them in order of battle, the major part of them being ſuch as he could not have relied on if he had engaged, but ſeems to blame the King for not attacking them (w); and Sir Philip Warwick is of the ſame opinion (x). On the other hand Whitlocke aſſures us, the King's army was in a very indifferent condition in all reſpects, and had not ammunition enough to have ſerved them for a briſk charge (y). The beginning of the year 1643 was ſpent in a treaty, the Parliament having ſent Commiſſioners for that purpoſe to Oxford, and, at the requeſt of the King, enlarged the time originally allowed them to the 15th of April; and the very ſame day, the treaty breaking off abruptly, the Earl of Eſſex began his march with their army towards Oxford (z). It was the deſire of ſome of the moſt active men in the party, that the Earl might ſtrike at the root as they called it, that is, beſiege Oxford, and make himſelf maſter of the perſon of the King. But whether he found that impracticable, or was not much inclined to that ſervice, ſo it was, that he turned off to Reading, which he inveſted on the 17th. Sir Arthur Aſton commanded in it for the King, with a garriſon of between three and four thouſand men; but the town, being a long and irregular built place, would not admit of proper fortifications; and beſides, the garriſon wanted powder to ſuch a degree, that, in ten days time it was ſurrendered; and for this Colonel Richard Fielding, who made the capitulation, the Governor being wounded, was ſentenced at Oxford to loſe his head; but, however, he did not ſuffer (a). The articles granted by the Earl of Eſſex were but ill obſerved by his ſoldiers, of which he ſhewed his reſentment in a very high degree (b). After this ſucceſs great things were expected from him by the Parliament; but a ſickneſs which prevailed in his army, and its not being ſupplied ſo well as hitherto it had been, weakened him very much, and put it out of his power to do any thing of importance; which ſo much irritated ſome of the leading men in Parliament, that they talked of removing him, and of giving the command to Sir William Waller; but he being preſently after defeated at Rowndway-Down, an end was put to that ſcheme (c). The Lord-General Eſſex was not at all a ſtranger to what was ſaid and thought of him at London; and, as he was a man of great plainneſs and ſincerity, he was reſolved to leave them in no doubt as to what were his real intentions; and, therefore, wrote the Parliament a letter of ſo extraordinary a nature (d), that we have judged it neceſſary to inſert it in the notes [I]. While the Earl, with his army, quartered

'gade of the army that brought on the artillery.' As to the King's ſtandard, it was given by the General to his Secretary, Mr. Chambers; from whom it was taken by one Captain Smith, and carried back to the King, to whom the General intended to have reſtored it in caſe it had not been thus recovered (29). The Parliament claimed the victory on account of their keeping the field of battle; for they ſtood all night upon the ſame ground where the King's army was drawn up; and as to the King's title to the victory, it conſiſted in the taking of Banbury the next day, from whence it appears that great faults were committed on both ſides. If the Earl of Eſſex had marched to Banbury, the reputation of his arms had been much raiſed, which at that time was a thing of great conſequence; and if after the taking of Banbury the King had marched to London, he would have reaped all the fruits of a victory whether he had it or not (30).

[I] To inſert it in the notes.] We have in another place mentioned the diſpoſition of the Parliament at this juncture, when two parties, that agreed in nothing elſe, joined in preſſing the Earl to advance towards Oxford, one deſiring nothing ſo much as to make an end of the war; and the other, with equal paſſion, thirſting for the deſtruction of the King. The Lord General Eſſex knew, that the former was as much out of his power as the latter was diſtant from his will. It was very much againſt his judgment that he advanced to Tame, where the heat of the weather, and the marſhineſs of the ſoil, increaſed the diſtemper in his army, ſo that hundreds were diſabled in a day; yet he ſtill received the ſame preſſing meſſages from London, in anſwer to which he wrote the following letter (31).

'Mr. Speaker,

'I would have given you the true relation of the 'ſkirmiſh on Sunday laſt, between ſome of the horſe 'and the enemy near Buckingham, but Sir Philip 'Stapleton and Colonel Goodwin being then upon the 'ſpot, I refer the relation thereof unto them. Since 'when, being informed that the King had ſent more 'forces to Buckingham to maintain that place, and 'bring theſe parts into contribution, where the enemy 'ſtaid untill the army came within two miles of them, 'and then made haſte away towards Banbury, not-'withſtanding they had perſuaded the people that they 'would not quit the place till they had beaten me out 'of the country. I then underſtanding that they were 'fled, held it not fit to go to the town with my army; 'but ſent Colonel Middleton with ſome horſe to clear 'that town and coaſt; which they did, and then ad-'viſed where to quarter with moſt conveniency for our 'army, and moſt ready for the enemy, the Queen's 'forces being like to join with them very ſuddenly: 'and that our army may the better ſerve the Parlia-'ment and city, and counties adjacent, and be more tered about Tame in Oxfordſhire, they ſuffered not a little by the continual enterprizes of Prince Rupert, who had a numerous body of horſe in their neighbourhood; and his endeavours would, probably, have been more ſucceſsful againſt any other General than the Earl of Eſſex, who was not only extremely vigilant, but alſo very ready to repair in perſon to any poſts that were attacked, by which he prevented the ill conſequences that would otherways have attended ſudden impreſſions (e). All his care, and all his courage, expreſſed in their ſervice, did not, however, entirely ſatisfy the Houſe of Commons; as, on the other hand, his Lordſhip was very far from being well pleaſed with that temper which prevailed amongſt them; and moſt of the Nobility, who had hitherto concurred with them, inclined now to the Earl's opinion (f). At this juncture it appears, from the beſt authority, that the King and the Earl of Eſſex were equally deſirous of putting an end to this unhappy war; and that each had it in his power, as well as will, to have accompliſhed this good deſign, if both had not ſuffered themſelves to be fatally diverted from their intentions, and thereby loſt an opportunity, the like of which never offered itſelf to either of them any more (g) [K]. The King, over perſuaded by thoſe who had the leaſt knowledge even, and perhaps the leaſt affection for, his cauſe, having a better army than he had yet brought into the field, marched towards Glouceſter, which, on the 10th of Auguſt, he inveſted (b). It had a numerous garriſon, commanded by Colonel Maſſey, who made a vigorous and obſtinate reſiſtance, and this weakened the King's army exceedingly, which, without doubt, was leaſt fit for that ſervice. The city of London being greatly alarmed at the news of this ſiege, which affected them in their trade for the preſent, and gave them a bad proſpect of their ſecurity for the future, the Parliament made an advantage of this diſpoſition in their own people, and, on the twenty-firſt of the ſame month, publiſhed an order, forbidding any ſhops to be opened till Glouceſter was relieved (i). In order to effect this, all ways and means were practiſed to ſettle the mind of the General; and next, part of the London trained bands and auxiliaries were ordered to recruit his army; ſo that, on the 29th of the ſame month, the Earl of Eſſex marched from Ayleſbury with an army very little ſhort of twenty-thouſand men (k). He proceeded with much caution, and though his motions were obſerved by General Wilmot, with a great body of horſe, yet he carried his point, obliged the King to raiſe the ſiege, entered Glouceſter in triumph September 15th, and, ſoon after, ſurprized Cirenceſter, where the King had two regiments of horſe, and very conſiderable magazines (l).

'ſafely

'ſafely ſupplied with money from London, and lie 'moſt conveniently to join the forces with the Lord 'Gray in Northamptonſhire, I was adviſed to march 'to Great Brickhill, as the moſt fit place for all pur-'poſes: the enemies chief ſtrength being in horſe, 'and this army neither recruited with horſe, arms, nor 'ſaddles, it is impoſſible to keep the counties from 'being plundered, nor to fight with them but when 'and where they liſt, we being forced when we move 'to march with the whole army, which can be but 'ſlowly, ſo that the counties muſt ſuffer much wrong, 'and the cries of poor people are infinite. If it were 'thought fit to ſend to his Majeſty, to have peace, 'with the ſettling of religion, the laws and liberties 'of the ſubject, and to bring unto juſt trial thoſe chief 'delinquents that have brought all this miſchief to 'both kingdoms; and as my Lord of Briſtol ſpake 'once in Parliament, how we may be ſecured to have 'thoſe things performed hereafter: or elſe, if his Ma-'jeſty ſhall pleaſe to abſent himſelf, there may be a 'day ſet down to put a period to all theſe unhappy 'diſtractions by a battle, which, when and where 'they ſhall chooſe, that may be thought any way 'indifferent, I ſhall be ready to perform that duty I 'owe you; and the propoſitions to be agreed upon 'between his Majeſty and the Parliament, may be 'ſent to ſuch an indifferent place, that both armies 'may be drawn near the one to the other, that if 'peace be not concluded, it may be ended by the 'ſword: no officers of the army to be of the committee, 'nor no intercourſe to be between them.

'SIR,

Great Brickhill,
July 9, 1643.

'I am your aſſured friend,

'ESSEX.'

[K] To either of them any more.] In order to explain this matter thoroughly, which is in itſelf equally curious and important, we muſt obſerve, that factions ran very high both at Oxford and Weſtminſter; yet thoſe who wiſhed well to the King and kingdom had the ſame views in both places, that is, were very deſirous of ſeeing peace reſtored, and the conſtitution preſerved, by an agreement upon moderate terms. In order to this, the King was adviſed to publiſh the utmoſt conceſſions he was inclined to make, and to give the ſtrongeſt aſſurances in his power with reſpect to their being conſtantly adhered to, and then to have marched with his army, which was in a very good condition, directly up to London; which, if he had done, ſays Whitlocke (32), it is believed he might have done his buſineſs: but the King was prevailed upon by the Lord Culpepper to undertake the ſiege of Glouceſter, which, by an obſtinate reſiſtance, ruined his army to ſuch a degree as he could never retrieve. Sir Edward Walker, who had the beſt opportunity of knowing the King's real intentions (33) in ſuch points, affirms, that he was afraid ever to comply with that advice, from an apprehenſion that there would be no reſtraining the licence of the ſoldiers, and that by concluding the war in this manner, he ſhould totally deſtroy his capital. But without determining any thing as to the King's motive, certain it is that he loſt his opportunity. As to the Earl of Eſſex, the zeal he ſhewed for the good of the nation, and the authority he had by being at the head of the army, gave many of the Lords courage to ſpeak their minds freely, and to ſhew their diſtaſte to violent meaſures; but finding they loſt ground in Parliament by the exorbitant ſtretches of power which the Houſe of Commons aſſumed to themſelves, and which the Republicans had with great addreſs transferred to a committee, where they had a conſtant majority, the Lords propoſed to the Earl of Eſſex their retiring, with their friends in the Houſe of Commons, to him and the army for protection, which they judged muſt ſoon have brought thoſe who remained at Weſtminſter to a compliance (34). The Earl thought this might prove a blemiſh to his honour, upon which the Lords, not thinking themſelves ſafe any longer where they were, withdrew into the King's quarters. Thus this opportunity was loſt of doing all that the Earl took up arms to do, while his and the King's antagoniſts, by conſidering nothing as juſt or unjuſt, but as it contributed to or claſhed with their views, brought their projects to bear, and the kingdom into confuſion.

His

His Lordſhip continuing his march into Berkſhire, Prince Rupert, with his horſe, incommoded his rear very much; and the King, with his foot, being arrived near Newbury, the Earl found himſelf obliged to fight, which accordingly he did, on the 20th of September, with very great reputation to himſelf, in reſpect both to courage and conduct; though, after all, it was but a drawn battle, or, if any, the King had the title to the victory; for by it he opened a paſſage to London, if he had loſt no time in the proſecution of that deſign, for which, it is ſuppoſed, he fought (m). But as he let ſlip this opportunity, ſo Eſſex improved that negligence, and, with great diligence and dexterity, marched to Reading, and from thence nearer London. His army being quartered at Windſor, and in the neighbourhood, the Earl, with ſome of the great officers, went to London, where the Speaker came to compliment him at Eſſex-Houſe, as did the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, in their ſcarlet gowns; and his behaviour at Newbury fight was magnified to as high a degree as their eloquence could reach (n). The Earl afterwards returned to the army; but, upon receiving orders to join Sir William Waller, he ſent for anſwer, That he held it not for their ſervice; after which jealouſies daily increaſed, and, at laſt, a committee was appointed for recruiting and reforming the army, which gave him a great deal of diſtaſte (o) and uneaſineſs: yet his opinion, That he was bound in honour to do nothing to the prejudice of thoſe who intruſted him, hindered him from giving any countenance to the applications he received from the Lords and Commons aſſembled at Oxford; while thoſe in Parliament, who diſliked his conduct, took the neceſſary meaſures for curtailing his army, and making the forces he commanded inferior to thoſe at the head of which they had placed their own creatures (p). In the ſpring of the year 1644, the Earl of Eſſex, in obedience to the preſſing ſolicitations of his maſters, marched into Oxfordſhire, and, advancing to Abingdon, General Wilmot quitted the town upon his approach, and retired towards Oxford, which gave him an opportunity of advancing within a mile of that place on one ſide, at the ſame time that Sir William Waller, with his forces, came almoſt as near it on the other (q). The King was thought to be effectually blocked up in that city, and this ſituation of his equally alarmed his own friends and the enemies of the Earl of Eſſex. One of the King's Privy-Council apprehended his ſituation to be ſo deſperate, that he adviſed him to render himſelf into the hands of Eſſex; to which the King anſwered, It was poſſible he might fall into Eſſex's hands, but it ſhould be when he was dead (r). On the other hand, the inveterate party in the Parliament apprehended nothing ſo much as that this might really happen; and therefore they wrote a ſhort and peremptory letter, directing him, in caſe of any application of that kind, to do nothing without their orders (s). The King, on the 29th of May, quitted Oxford in the duſk of the evening, marched all night between the two armies, and got ſafe out of their reach (t). Upon this the Earl of Eſſex ſent Waller orders to follow him, as having a lighter body of troops. About this he made ſome ſcruples, but the Earl inſiſting upon his orders, Waller, at length, obeyed, but complained to the Parliament, who wrote in very quick terms to the Lord-General, who ſubſcribed his anſwer, Your innocent, though ſuſpected, ſervant (u). He then marched into Dorſetſhire, where he took Weymouth, and relieved Lyme; while the King, in the mean time, with great addreſs, gave Waller the ſlip, and returned to Oxford on the twenty-firſt of June, where in a ſhort time he aſſembled an army of ten thouſand men, and, gaining ſome advantage over Waller, followed the Earl of Eſſex into the Weſt, where all the forces he then had were (w). By the perſuaſion of Lord Roberts, who believed he had a great intereſt in Cornwall, Eſſex was engaged to march thither, where, by degrees, the King drove him to the ſea, and ſhut him up in ſuch a manner, that he could neither tell how to fight, or find any thing for his ſoldiers to eat. In this ſituation the King wrote him a very kind letter, with propoſals for a treaty, which he rejected, as he had done a propoſal of the ſame ſort from the King's officers, aſſigning, as his reaſon, that he had no authority (x). In theſe deſperate circumſtances his horſe, under the command of Sir William Balfour, broke through, or rather ſlipped by, the King's army, and, on the firſt of September, the Earl of Eſſex, with a few of the officers he moſt eſteemed, embarked at Foy, and eſcaped to Plymouth, leaving his foot under Major-General Skippon, who ſubmitted to be diſarmed, gave up their artillery and ammunition, and were conducted through the King's quarters into thoſe of the Parliament (y). The Earl himſelf quickly embarked on board a man of war, and returned to London, where he was received with all outward marks of reſpect and eſteem (z); which gave him, however, but very little ſatisfaction [L]. [L] But very little ſatisfaction.] We have very full accounts of the ſtate and ceremony with which the Lord General was received by the Parliament, who were extremely well pleaſed with his ſending them the letters written him by the King's officers, and by his Majeſty himſelf, on the ſubject of peace. Perhaps ſome amongſt them were the more ceremonious, as thinking they had him now in their power; and that, underſtanding as they did the art of raiſing money, and obliging the people to pay for a rod to ſcourge themſelves, he might at length be laid aſide like an old ſtaff, now they found their ſtrength increaſe, though at their firſt ſetting out they were not able to move without leaning upon him. As for the Earl, he was very ſenſible of their former treatment, concerning which a Noble writer gives us a free and full detail, which cannot but prove ſatisfactory to the reader. Having mentioned the Earl's detaching Sir William Waller after the King, while the month of October, the armies under the Earl of Manchester and Sir William Waller having joined, the Earl of Essex went down again, to put himself at the head of that army which was intended to attack the King in his return from the West to Oxford (a). Great preparations were made for that purpose, and great expectations there were at London of the event; but, before this could be accomplished, the Earl of Essex fell sick; upon which a Committee of Lords and Commons were appointed to visit him, and to express the affection of both Houses to him; but, if we may judge from what Whitlocke has written upon this subject, there was something more in the matter, and they were instructed to make him a compliment of another kind (b) [M]. However that might be,

(a) Whitlocke's Mem. p. 105.

while he marched westward himself, contrary to the route that had been laid down for him, he proceeds thus (35): 'Accordingly he gave that account to the 'Parliament and Committee of the two kingdoms, 'with his desire of their directions. They were so 'mad to see themselves defeated of their plot, that 'they would not, for many days, return him any an'swer at all. His disobedience was blown up and trum'peted about by them and their agents: some of 'whom did not stick to say, It were better my Lord 'of Essex and his whole army were lost and ruined, 'than the Parliament not obeyed, and that by their 'consents, he nor his army should be looked after or 'cared for more; a maxim they have forgotten now, 'in the case of Sir Thomas Fairfax and his army's not 'disobedience, but open rebellion; but they were as 'good as their words then, and did most maliciously, 'wilfully, and treacherously (as to the Parliament's 'cause, which they seemed to be zealous in) suffer 'General and army to be lost, and the whole west left 'farther out of the Parliament's reach than at any time 'before. Sir Arthur Haslerigg posted up to London, 'breathing out nothing but ruin and destruction to the 'Earl of Essex, spoke it out in the hearing of several 'persons, that he would ruin him, or be ruined him'self. His malice and violence was so great at the 'Committee of the two kingdoms, where he and his 'party were prevalent, that a report was thence 'brought down to the House of Commons, by which 'Sir William Waller was taken off from following the 'King; and by that means the King was left at li'berty to bend his whole force for the West, after my 'Lord of Essex, which he presently did. At last they 'left my Lord of Essex at liberty to proceed in that 'Western expedition, but with a resolution to let him 'perish. He takes in Weymouth, and some other 'towns, goes on as far as Cornwall, whither the King's 'forces follow him at the heels, cut off all provision 'from him, press upon him exceedingly, and put 'him to very great straights. He engaged in a coun'try enclosed with deep ditches and strong fences, 'that he could neither break through nor march 'away; but sends letter upon letter, messenger upon 'messenger, to the Parliament, representing his con'dition, and how easy it was, with a small force sent 'upon the back of the King's army, if but only a 'good party of horse, to stop their provisions, and turn 'the tables, straighten them, and free him, than 'which certainly nothing had been more easy, and 'would have saved the kingdom a mass of treasure, 'and thousands of good men's lives, which the con'tinuance of the war, after that time, did cost. But 'our masters did not desire then to see the war at an 'end: they had not the sword in those hands they 'would have it, for to break the King's forces, well 'knowing they must then have had a peace, and such 'a peace as had carried with it an establishment of the 'King's government, a keeping up the Nobility and 'Gentry: all things must have returned into their 'proper channel; and the security of the Parliament 'and kingdom being provided for, the law of the land 'must have taken place, their arbitrary empire been 'at an end, and their design wholly defeated. There'fore my Lord of Essex must not be relieved, but sa'crificed to their ambition; the King's army must be 'yet preserved, to give them a colour to new model 'theirs, and put the power into the base hands of 'their creatures, which should keep the kingdom in a 'perpetual bondage; and though they ended the war 'with the King, yet never made peace, but continued 'to grind the faces, and break the backs of the 'people, with taxes and free quarters, to maintain an 'army when no enemy was left: in a word, they go'vern by the sword; the height of all misery and sla'very any land can undergo.'

(35) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Holles, p. 23—26.

[M] A compliment of another kind.] Whoever considers the passage cited in the former note, will very easily discern what temper the dominant party were in with respect to the Earl of Essex. He had still indeed the title of General, and they were not desirous he should have any more. This was the return they made him whose reputation had first raised them an army: that was a work which he only could do, but they were now entering upon works which they very well knew he neither could nor would do. This message to him therefore had an outward form of civility (36), but withal an inward mixture of reproach: the former served to amuse the people who had a high reverence for the General, the latter was to prevent his obstructing their designs. Whitlocke gives this cautious, and yet very intelligible account, of that Janus-faced compliment; for it is observable that these three Earls of Essex were made unhappy by their virtues, flattered out of their reason, and exalted to the highest honours by those that meant to make their fall the greater. But let us hear Whitlocke (37): 'The Houses being 'informed that the Lord General was not well, and 'stayed behind the army, they sent a Committee of 'the Lords and Commons to visit him, and to express 'the affections of both Houses to him. This was not, 'as was given out, a piece of courtship, but I think 'real, and there was cause enough that it should be 'so, the General having so highly deserved from 'them. Yet there were some had designs against him, 'and were desirous to remove him from his command, 'because they were jealous that he was too much in'clined to peace, and favouring of the King and his 'party. I think I knew as much of his mind as others 'did, and always observed him wish for peace, yet 'not upon any dishonourable or unjust terms. He was 'a lover of Monarchy and Nobility, which he sus'pected some designed to destroy, together with Gen'try, Ministry, and Magistracy, which humour began 'then to boil up; but he resolved to support them, 'and wanted not advice to that end. But the jealou'sies upon him who was a most faithful and gallant 'man, and servant to the publick, gave him great 'trouble in his thoughts; and they did work so high 'with his enemies, that some gave out he was by pri'vate intimation to forbear engaging in this service, 'and for certain he was not in it.'

 [To this Article only a few Additions will be found to be necessary. The refinement of the noble historian, Lord Clarendon, as related in note [G], is carried so far, that it can scarcely avoid exciting a smile on the face of an intelligent reader. According to his Lordship, the taking of the white staff from the Earl of Essex was the true source of the civil war. But Lord Clarendon's reasoning on the subject will not stand the test of a severe examination. It is true, that in the order of Divine Providence, there is a wonderful concatenation of events, and that the greatest revolutions may be essentially connected with circumstances apparently very trivial. But this argument will not apply, with any peculiar propriety, to the present case. It can never be rationally believed, that the civil war would not have taken place if the Earl of Essex had retained his office of Lord Chamberlain. That war was founded on causes too mighty, and on dispositions too much agitated and enflamed, to have been prevented by the Earl's maintaining some connection with the Court. If he had refused the com-

be, certain it is, that, when the Parliament army ſurrounded the King's, who was much inferior in ſtrength, in the town of Newbury, and attacked him on the 27th of the month laſt mentioned, the Earl of Eſſex was not in that action, which the Parliament called a victory; but the King made a good retreat, put his artillery into Dunnington-Caſtle, and, about a week after, having recruited his forces, marched thither, and brought off his train. After this engagement the Earl of Eſſex gave orders for ſlighting Newbury, with which the Parliament was much offended (c). On his return to London he found things in great confuſion, and, which was not a little extraordinary, his two rivals, the Earl of Mancheſter and Sir William Waller, as much diſſatisfied as himſelf, and, in point of truſt and confidence, exactly in the ſame ſituation that he was (d). The Earl, however, was very ſenſible of the hand that principally hurt him, and had formed a reſolution of being too quick for him. In order to this he held a Council at Eſſex-houſe, at which were preſent the Chancellor of Scotland, and the reſt of the Scots Commiſſioners, Mr. Denzil Holles, Sir Philip Stapleton, and other friends of the Earl, and to which Serjeant Maynard and Mr. Whitlocke were invited (e). The point there debated was, the attacking Lieutenant-General Cromwell in Parliament, as an incendiary; which was very fully and clearly opened by the Lord Chancellor Loudon; and the members of the Houſe of Commons, who were preſent, were very hearty in the deſign, and thought it mand of the Parliament army, ſome other perſon would have been found for that purpoſe; and, conſidering the temper of the times, men would not have been wanting to enliſt themſelves in a conteſt in which they imagined their deareſt rights to be concerned.

The Earl of Eſſex's ſpeech and proteſtation at the head of his army, on the twenty-fourth of September, 1642, ſhall here be inſerted, as being little known, and reflecting honour on his character.

'Gentlemen and Fellow Soldiers,

'Ye are at this time aſſembled for the defence of 'his Majeſty, and the maintenance of the true Proteſ-'tant Religion, under my command: I ſhall therefore 'deſire you to take notice what I, that am your Gene-'ral, ſhall, by my honour, promiſe to perform to-'wards you, and what I ſhall be forced to expect that 'you ſhall perform towards me.

'I do promiſe, in the ſight of Almighty God, that 'I ſhall undertake nothing but what ſhall tend to the 'advancement of the true Proteſtant Religion, the 'ſecuring of his Majeſty's Royal Perſon, the mainte-'nance of the juſt privilege of Parliament, and the 'liberty and property of the ſubject; neither will I 'engage any of you into any danger, but (though for 'many reaſons I might forbear) I will in my own 'perſon run an equal hazard with you; and either 'bring you off with honour, or (if God have ſo de-'creed) fall with you, and willingly become a ſacri-'fice for the preſervation of my country.

'Likewiſe I do promiſe, that my ear ſhall be open 'to hear the complaint of the pooreſt of my ſoldiers, 'though againſt the chiefeſt of my officers; neither 'ſhall his greatneſs, if juſtly taxed, gain any privilege; 'but I ſhall be ready to execute juſtice againſt all, from 'the greateſt to the leaſt.

'Your pay ſhall be conſtantly delivered to your 'commanders; and if default be made by any officer, 'give me timely notice, and you ſhall find ſpeedy 'redreſs.

'This being performed on my part, I ſhall now de-'clare what is your duty toward me, which I muſt 'likewiſe expect to be carefully performed by you.

'I ſhall deſire all and every officer to endeavour, 'by love and affable carriage, to command his ſol-'diers; ſince what is done for fear, is done unwil-'lingly; and what is unwillingly attempted, can never 'proſper.

'Likewiſe it is my requeſt, that you be careful in 'the exerciſing of your men, and bring them to uſe 'their arms readily and expertly, and not to buſy 'them in practiſing the ceremonious forms of military 'diſcipline; only let them be well-inſtructed in the 'neceſſary rudiments of war, that they may know to 'fall on with diſcretion, and retreat with care; how 'to maintain their order, and make good their 'ground.

'Alſo I do expect that all thoſe who have volun-'tarily engaged themſelves in this ſervice, ſhould an-'ſwer my expectation in the performance of theſe en-'ſuing articles;

'1. That you willingly and chearfully obey ſuch as, 'by your own election, you have made commanders 'over you.

'2. That you take ſpecial care to keep your arms 'at all times fit for ſervice, that upon all occaſions you 'may be ready, when the ſignal ſhall be given, by 'the ſound of drum or trumpet, to repair to your 'colours; and ſo to march upon any ſervice, where 'and when occaſion ſhall require.

'3. That you bear yourſelves like ſoldiers, with-'out doing any ſpoil to the inhabitants of the country: 'ſo doing you ſhall gain love and friendſhip, where 'otherwiſe, you will be hated and complained of; and 'I, that ſhould protect you, ſhall be forced to puniſh 'you according to the ſeverity of law.

'4. That you accept and reſt ſatisfied with ſuch 'quarters as ſhall fall to your lot, or be appointed you 'by your Quarter-maſter.

'5. That you ſhall, if appointed for centuries or 'perdues, faithfully diſcharge that duty; for, upon 'fail hereof, you are ſure to undergo a very ſevere 'cenſure.

'6. You ſhall forbear to profane the Sabbath, either 'by being drunk, or by unlawful games; for whoſo-'ever ſhall be found faulty muſt not expect to paſs un-'puniſhed.

It was probably an obedience to theſe orders that enabled the Parliamentary army to acquire a popularity which the Royal army did not always attain.

As to the ſuſpicion of the Earl of Eſſex's having been poiſoned, it can only be regarded as one of the many groundleſs ſurmiſes which were long entertained with regard to the deceaſe of eminent perſons, eſpecially if their deaths were ſudden. Different accounts have been given of the Earl's death. Some have aſcribed it to an apoplexy; but Ludlow, who was probably well informed, ſays that it was occaſioned by his having over-heated himſelf in the chace of a ſtag in Windſor Foreſt (39).]

might

might be executed with all the ſucceſs that could be deſired (f). But the two Lawyers, though they pretended to be no friends to Cromwell, threw cold water upon the project, and repreſented it in ſuch a light as intimidated the Scots Commiſſioners, and ſo the matter ended, at leaſt there; but Whitlocke owns, that the conſultation came to the knowledge of Cromwell, who treated Maynard and himſelf the better for it, and, no doubt, hated the Earl of Eſſex for it ſo much the more (g). The Self-denying Ordinance, by which all the Members in both Houſes were to be deprived of their commands, was, by this time, brought into Parliament; and though it made a ſlow paſſage through the Houſe of Lords, yet it was at laſt carried, Sir Thomas Fairfax fixed upon to be the new General, and the clauſe for the ſecurity of the King's perſon left out of his commiſſion; which was a plain indication of what was to follow, and of the true deſign of new modelling the army (h). On the 2d of April, 1645, the Earl of Eſſex ſurrendered his commiſſion, but not without ſome viſible marks of diſcontent (i). It was then thought proper to reduce a part of the troops that had ſerved under him, and that too without paying them; to which ſome of the horſe quartered in Hertfordſhire were not willing to ſubmit, and the friends of the new model propoſed, as the ſhorteſt method, to cut them to pieces. Mr. St. John alſo wrote a letter to the Committee of Hertfordſhire, to excite the people to fall upon them; but theſe extremities were prevented by the Earl of Eſſex's interpoſing, and prevailing upon them to acquieſce (k). In the beginning of December, the ſame year, the Parliament voted, that the Earl of Eſſex ſhould be made a Duke (l), as they had formerly voted him ten thouſand pounds a year; but he had no benefit by theſe votes, nor was there any great care taken for the payment of his arrears. It is generally allowed, that, after he laid down his command, he began to have different apprehenſions of things, and to have been very deſirous of preventing thoſe miſeries that he plainly ſaw were coming upon theſe nations. His intereſt and credit were to the laſt very great, and ſome have thought, if he had lived longer, that he would have endeavoured to have exerted them for the public ſervice (m). But, being ſeized with a ſudden and violent illneſs, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon, he died greatly lamented, at Eſſex-houſe in the Strand, September 14th, 1646 (n). The Parliament directed a public funeral for him, which was performed, with great ſolemnity, on the 22d of October following, in the Abbey-Church of St. Peter, Weſtminſter (o), when Mr. Richard Vines preached his funeral ſermon to a very great audience, compoſed of perſons of very great diſtinction; and the number would certainly have been much larger, if the Parliament had not made an order, that neither his brother the Marquis of Hertford, nor any who had borne arms for the King, ſhould be preſent at that ceremony (p). Such was the end of this Great Man, in whom the title of Eſſex became extinct, and whoſe virtues deſerved that his memory ſhould be tranſmitted to poſterity with greater care and attention than had been hitherto paid to it, and which we have endeavoured to accompliſh.

D'EWES (Sir SYMONDS), Knight and Baronet, an accurate Hiſtorian, a judicious Critick, an eminent Antiquary, an inquiſitive ſearcher into many different branches of ſcience, and a communicative friend, as well as generous patron of learned men (a). He was deſcended from a very antient family in the Low-Countries, his anceſtors retiring hither very early (b), and acquiring a very conſiderable ſettlement in the county of Suffolk; by which he was born to a large paternal eſtate, and was well-allied in that county, as may be proved from indubitable authorities [A]. He was the ſon of Paul D'Ewes, Eſq. by his wife Cecily, daughter and ſole heireſs of Richard Symonds, of Coxden in the county of Dorſet (c). He drew his earlieſt breath, as himſelf informs us, at the ſeat of his grandfather before-mentioned, December 18th, 1602 (d): and, having acquired the firſt tincture of letters in his father's houſe, the pregnancy of his parts became ſo apparent, that, in the ſixteenth year of his age, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Cambridge, and entered a Fellow-Commoner there, of St. John's College, under the tuition of the famous Dr. Richard Holdſworth, July the 9th, 1618 (e). It does not appear either how long he remained there, or whether he took any degree: but this is very certain, that, in return for the great acquiſitions he made in that celebrated ſeat of the Muſes, he preſerved a filial reverence for the place, and expreſſed ſo warm a concern for its reputation, as ſeems to have expoſed him to the reſentment of ſome peeviſh writers, who cannot bear that any notions ſhould be queſtioned, and much leſs contradicted, which they have once embraced, or in favour of which they have thought fit to declare (f). His inclinations to collect the beſt materials, for the forming a correct and complete Hiſtory of Great Britain, ſhewed themſelves very early, ſince he aſſures us himſelf, that he began to put his deſign in execution when he was not above eighteen years of age (g). He was no leſs ſtudious in preſerving the hiſtory of his own times, ſetting down carefully the beſt accounts that he was able to obtain of every memorable tranſaction at the time it happened (h); an inſtance or two of which, and thoſe very curious in their kind, the reader will find in the notes [B]. This laudable diſpoſition, in ſo young a man, recommended him to the eſteem and acquaintance of perſons of the firſt rank in the Republick of Letters, and amongſt theſe to the celebrated Sir Robert Cotton, who introduced him likewiſe to the famous Mr. Selden (i); which circumſtances we learn from himſelf, together with the opinion he entertained of theſe great men, which the reader will not probably think unworthy of his notice [C]. In the year 1626 he married Anne, daughter to Sir William Clopton of Eſſex, who, though very young, was an exquiſite beauty, and, though his paſſion ſeems to have increaſed for her, after ſhe became his wife, to a degree of extra-

He died of the ſweating ſickneſs in the month of July 1551, having lived under the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI. He married Alice Ravenſcroft, by whom he left iſſue, as appears from his will (2), four ſons, Gerard, James, Peter, and Andrew. His eldeſt ſon, Gerard D'Ewes, lies buried in the iſle of Upminſter church in Eſſex, having been Lord of the manor of Gains, alias Upminſter. He died April 12, 1591, leaving by his wife, Grace Hinde, a ſon, Paul D'Ewes, Eſq; and a daughter Alice, who married William Lathom, Eſq; who repurchaſed this manor of Gains, alias Upminſter, which he had ſold to his father-in-law (3).

As to the firſt, having deſcribed the tilting in the preſence of the French Embaſſador, brother to the great favourite of Lewis XIII, the Conſtable Luynes, on Monday January 8, 1620-21, in the Tilt-Yard over-againſt Whitehall, he proceeds thus (4): 'After this, moſt of the tilters, except the 'Prince, went up to the French Lords in a large 'upper room of the houſe, ſtanding at the lower end 'of the Tilt-Yard, and I crowding in after them, 'and ſeeing the Marquis of Buckingham diſcourſing 'with two or three French Monſieurs, I joined to 'them, and moſt earneſtly viewed him for about half 'an hour's ſpace at the leaſt, which I had opportu-'nity the more eaſily to accompliſh, becauſe he ſtood 'all that time he talked bareheaded. I ſaw every 'thing in him full of delicacy and handſome features, 'yea his hand and face ſeemed the more accompliſhed, 'becauſe the French Monſieurs that had inveſted him 'were very ſwarthy hard-favoured men. That he was 'afterwards an inſtrument of much miſchief both at 'home and abroad, is ſo evident upon record as no 'man can deny, yet this I do ſuppoſe proceeded ra-'ther from ſome jeſuited incendiaries about him, than 'from his own nature, which his very countenance pro-'miſed to be affable and gentle.' The ſecond paſſage is this (5):

(4) Life of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, fo. 53. b.

'February 1622-23, there happened on Monday 'the 17th day of this month, ſo ſtrange an accident 'as future ages will ſcarcely believe it; for Charles 'Prince of Wales began his journey from London into 'Spain on Monday the 17th day of February, with 'the beloved Marquis of Buckingham, Sir Francis 'Cottington, and Mr. Endymion Porter, only in his 'company, who, beſides the King himſelf, were the 'only men acquainted with the Prince's reſolution. 'Their going was ſo ſecretly carried, as none I be-'lieve knew of it in England till they were landed in 'France; through which kingdom they paſſed by 'poſt-horſe into Spain. The journey was thought ſo 'dangerous, being above eleven hundred Engliſh 'miles by land, beſides the croſſing the ſeas between 'Dover and Calais, as all men were generally enſadded 'at the adventure, often wiſhing it had been better 'adviſed upon, although all knew the Spaniards durſt 'do the Prince no harm, ſo long as his royal ſiſter 'and her illuſtrious offſpring ſurvived. Soon after 'followed the Lord Hayes, Earl of Carliſle, and 'paſſed into France, to excuſe to that King the 'Prince's ſudden and ſecret paſſing through his king-'dom without giving him a viſit. All men now took 'it for granted, that the Prince's marriage with the 'Infanta Maria, the King of Spain's ſiſter, was con-'cluded on, and that he went over only to conſummate 'it; no man imagining that he would take up ſuch a 'reſolution upon uncertainties, eſpecially occaſioning 'ſo vaſt an unneceſſary expence, at a time when the 'King's wants preſſed him much. But God, whoſe 'decree binds Princes as well as peaſants, had other-'wiſe diſpoſed; ſo as our royal ſuitor arriving at Ma-'drid in Spain on Friday the $\frac{7}{17}$th of March, about 'three weeks after his departure from London, and 'taking ſhip for his return into England on the $\frac{19}{29}$th 'of September then next enſuing, ſtayed in Spain 'about ſeven months, in all which time he ſeldom ſaw 'or ſpake with the Spaniſh Princeſs, nor could ever 'receive a fair and ſincere denial from her brother, 'although her marriage had been abſolutely diſpoſed 'of by her father's laſt Will and Teſtament, he be-'queathing her to Ferdinand, ſon and heir of Fer-'dinand II, the Emperor of Germany, who after-'wards did accordingly eſpouſe her.'

[C] Unworthy of his notice.] Before we give the reader this paſſage, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that our author's journal was entirely made for his own private uſe and advantage, and ſeems to have been written purely for the ſecuring ſuch of his own thoughts as he was deſirous to review, and for preſerving ſuch informations as he received upon his enquiries (6); and as he had not any intention, or perhaps the leaſt foreſight, that theſe notices of his might be made publick, ſo nothing contained in them ought to be conſidered as any way derogatory from the reputation of thoſe of whom he ſpeaks. We will now proceed to the remarks made by our author. 'On Tueſday Septem-'ber 28, 1624, going, as I frequently uſed, to viſit 'Sir Robert Cotton, England's prime Antiquary, I 'there met Mr. John Selden of the Inner Temple, a 'man of deep knowledge, and almoſt incomparable 'learning, as his many publiſhed works do ſufficiently 'witneſs, with whom Sir Robert, our joint-friend, 'brought me acquainted, and we held ever after a good 'outward correſpondence; but both of them being 'more learned than pious, I never ſought after, or ever 'attained, unto any great entireneſs with them, yet 'I had much more familiarity with Sir Robert Cotton 'than with Mr. Selden, being a man exceedingly puft 'up with the apprehenſion of his own abilities.'

(6) This appears plainly from ſeveral of the author's reflections upon the facts ſet down in his life.

We ought likewiſe to conſider, that in thoſe induſtrious times, it was the cuſtom, amongſt ſuch eminent perſons as had an opportunity of attaining extenſive intelligence, to commit almoſt every thing to writing. Thus the learned and judicious Earl of Clarendon wrote his own life (7) at large, out of which he drew a great part of his materials for his excellent Hiſtory. Mr. Whitlocke, in like manner, digeſted what occurred to him moſt worthy of notice into that large work of his, which has been ſince publiſhed; and as different men have different ſentiments, ſo it may not be amiſs to quote here a paſſage of his relating to Mr. Selden (8).

(8) Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 71.

'Divers members of both Houſes, whereof I was 'one, were members of the Aſſembly of Divines, and 'had the ſame liberty with the Divines, to ſit and de-'bate, and give their votes in any matter which was 'in conſideration amongſt them. In which debates 'Mr. Selden ſpake admirably, and confuted divers of 'them in their own learning. And ſometimes when 'they had cited a text of Scripture to prove their aſſer-'tion, he would tell them, Perhaps in your little pocket 'Bibles with gilt leaves (which they would often pull 'out and read) the tranſlation may be thus, but the 'Greek, or the Hebrew, ſignifies thus and thus; and 'ſo would totally ſilence them.'

vagance (k), yet it did not hinder him from profecuting his ſtudies with equal vigour and diligence; inſomuch that, when he was little more than thirty years of age, he had, with infinite care and labour, finiſhed that large and accurate work (l); which contributes not a little to explain the moſt important tranſactions of one of the moſt glorious reigns in our Hiſtory, but will likewiſe ſerve to tranſmit his own name and memory with luſtre to poſterity [D]. In 1639 we find him High-Sheriff of the county of Suffolk (m), having been ſome time before knighted. The ſame year, having occaſion to write to Archbiſhop Uſher, he mentioned that Hiſtory of Great Britain, in making collections for which he had already ſpent upwards of twenty, and, in the writing it, thirteen years; and was ſo unfortunate as to let fall a hint, that this hiſtory might, poſſibly, furniſh emendations in almoſt every page of Camden's Britannia (n); which letter of his coming to light, among other epiſtles to that learned Prelate, has drawn upon him the heavieſt cenſures, as if he had been prompted to this expreſſion from a mixture of vanity and envy, without any competent capacity (o); in which, perhaps, there is as much wrong done to him, as he is ſuppoſed to have done to Camden [E]. In the Long Parliament, which was ſummoned

It muſt certainly be allowed, that as this was a very great and uſeful, ſo it was alſo a very painful and laborious undertaking, ſuch a one as few men would have ventured upon, and ſtill fewer would have accompliſhed with that ſkill and accuracy which appear in this performance, the benefits derived from which might well have reſtrained ſome ſplenetick perſons from ſpeaking ſo ſlightly as they do of the author's abilities (9). That account which he has given us of his motives to this undertaking, and the manner in which it is executed is very large and ſatisfactory, and a few paragraphs from thence will ſhew us what ſort of a work this is, and what ſort of a man he was who compiled it. Theſe are his words:

(9) Thom. Hearne in Præfat. Lib. Nig. Scaccarii, p. x.

'Becauſe I know the original Journal Books of 'either Houſe to be more judiciouſly obſerved, and 'more to be eſteemed, than the collections of any pri'vate men, therefore I have diſtinguiſhed, by ſome 'annotation or animadverſion, what is taken out of 'them, or what out of any other material whatſoever. 'Nor are thoſe animadverſions of mine own at any 'time added, without ſome neceſſary motive, or upon 'ſome good ground. Very copious indeed they are 'in the two firſt Journals of the Upper Houſe, and 'Houſe of Commons, in ann. 1 Regin. Eliz. becauſe 'all matters of form were to be once for all diſcuſſed. 'In all the other Journals they are more ſuccinct and 'infrequent.

'I confeſs it coſt me many days, beſides other ex'pences, to bring theſe enſuing volumes to that per'fection in which I now enjoy them. In which, be'ſides the abundance of the knowledge in this kind 'eſpecially gained by it, which Sir Edward Coke, 'Knt. a learned writer of this age, calls Lex Parlia'mentaria, I have, as I much deſired, done ſome 'honour to the memory of that glorious Queen, Eng'land's royal Elizabeth, in that I have collected in one 'body the ſum of the agitations of all her Parliaments, 'or at leaſt ſo much of them as could poſſibly be 'gotten, being a work not only ſingular, in reſpect 'that I am the ſole enjoyer of it, but alſo becauſe I 'reſt confident, that never any other man attempted 'it, much leſs brought it to perfection. Which I the 'rather believe, becauſe, when I was one day diſ'courſing with Sir Robert Cotton, the Prime Anti'quary of this our age, not long before his deceaſe, 'touching the two aforeſaid volumes he had of the 'Journals of this Queen's reign, that I wondered he 'would treaſure up in his library ſuch fragmentary and 'imperfect ſtuff, he made me no other anſwer but 'that he was compelled to ſtore up them, becauſe he 'knew not how to come by any better; and cer'tainly, if this work, which I have now by God's 'providence finiſhed, had been performed by any 'other, it could not have been hid from him, who 'was a very ſedulous gatherer, as of other rarities, ſo 'eſpecially of parliamentary paſſages, for about the 'ſpace of forty years before his death.

'Touching the rarities and treaſures of knowledge 'contained in theſe enſuing volumes, to omit many 'things, thus much it ſhall not be amiſs to premiſe, 'that there may not only hence be gathered whatſo'ever almoſt concerns the privileges, cuſtoms, and 'uſages of either Houſe, but hiſtorical matter alſo 'touching the Church and State; and in the whole 'frame may be frequently ſeen the admirable wiſdom 'of her Majeſty, and this her great Council, in the 'happy quenching of ſuch emergent differences as 'aroſe, and in their timely proviſion againſt the am'bitious Spaniard, the reſtleſs and irreconcileable ene'my of her Majeſty's religion, perſon, and realms.

'In all Parliaments, and ſeſſions of Parliaments, the 'Journals of the Houſe of Commons, do, for the moſt 'part, much excel thoſe of the Upper Houſe, in va'riety and abundance of obſervable matter, and in 'their copious and orderly relating each day's 'paſſage.

'I ſhall not need further to enlarge myſelf, but 'here to ſhut up this preſent diſcourſe, this inſtant 'Friday the 3d day of February, Anno Dom. 1631, 'that though through God's Providence I have finiſhed 'theſe volumes, which are intended chiefly for my 'own private uſe and my poſterity's; yet I have 'already entered upon other and greater labours, con'ceiving myſelf not to be born for myſelf alone, ac'cording to that old ſaying, Melius mori, quam ſibi 'vivere (10).'

(10) This ſentence occurs more than once in his other writings.

The greateſt men may miſtake in their conjectures, and this appears to have been the caſe of our author, in reſpect to his being the only perſon that ever thought of a work of this nature; for we find that it was not only thought of by another perſon, but in part executed; and it was the publication of this that brought the more ample collection of Sir Symonds D'Ewes to ſee the light. A certain Prelate, who, upon other occaſions, ſhews himſelf no great admirer of our author, has however done him all the juſtice imaginable with reſpect to this (11). His words are theſe: 'Heyward Townſhend, an eminent Member of the 'Houſe of Commons, preſerved the debates in Parlia'ment of her laſt fourteen years, which long after 'the author's death were publiſhed under the title of 'Hiſtorical Collections, &c. But this, as vaſt an 'undertaking as it ſeems to be, is only a part of that 'more comprehenſive one of Sir Symmonds D'Ewes, 'whoſe Journal of both Houſes, during her whole 'reign, was ſoon after given us in print.' This was a noble ſpecimen of his ſteadineſs and diligence in perfecting what he had once undertaken, and may ſerve to convince us, that he proſecuted with ſpirit his reſolution of comparing the Hiſtory of Great Britain with the records which, as he himſelf aſſures us, he formed in the month of April 1620.

[E] As he is ſuppoſed to have done to Camden.] We find the charge againſt this gentleman very mildly and modeſtly ſtated by Biſhop Gibſon in his life of Camden, prefixed to the Engliſh tranſlation of his Britannia. Theſe are his words (12): 'In the year '1607 he put the laſt hand to his Britannia, which 'gained him the titles of the Varro, Strabo, and Pau'ſanias

'ſanias of Britain, in the writings and letters of other 'learned men. Nor did it ever after meet with any 'enemies that I know of, only Sir Simon D'Ewes en'couraged us to hope for animadverſions upon the 'work, after he had obſerved to a very great man, 'that there was not a page in it without a fault. But 'it was only threatening, and neither the world was 'the better, nor Mr. Camden's reputation e'er the 'worſe for it.' This is a very ſoft tranſlation of a very harſh paragraph in Dr. Smith's Life of the ſame author, in which he aſſures us (13), 'that this work 'was univerſally approved by all proper judges, one 'only, Sir Simon D'Ewes, excepted, who moved,' ſays he, 'by I know not what ſpirit of envy, gave out that 'there was ſcarcely a page,' &c. In this track we find Biſhop Nicholſon in his account of the Britannia, where he ſays (14), 'Some early attempts were made 'by an envious perſon, one Brook or Brookmouth, to 'blaſt the deſervedly great reputation of this book, 'but they periſhed and came to nothing, as did like'wiſe the terrible threats given out by Sir Symmonds 'D'Ewes, that he would diſcover errors in every page.' Let us now conſider the grounds upon which theſe great men have gone in prejudice to the memory of a perſon, who, for any thing that appears, had nothing of that bad ſpirit which is here imputed to him. He was ambitious of holding a correſpondence with Archbiſhop Uſher, to whom, in a long Latin letter, he gives an account of himſelf (15), of the pains he had taken in collecting a great library of the choiceſt pieces that regarded the Engliſh Hiſtory; and adds farther, that he had ſpent 13 years in his labours to compile an accurate Engliſh Hiſtory; to which he ſays he was principally moved by obſerving the many miſtakes of the common writers; and indeed, ſays he, what can be expected from them, conſidering that even in the ſo much admired Britannia of Camden himſelf, there is not a page, at leaſt hardly a page, without errors. The reader will conſider that this was a private letter, written to a Prelate, whoſe ſtation in the learned world was not at all inferior to that which he held in the Church. One would have imagined, from what theſe writers have ſaid, that this Gentleman had publiſhed his ſentiments of the Britannia to all the world, with a view to leſſen Camden's work, and exalt the merit of his own: whereas the fact, as the reader ſees, is quite otherwiſe. Beſides, amongſt the letters printed by Dr. Smith, there is one from Sir John Savile to Camden (16), in which there is ſuch a number of corrections as may ſerve to render what our author has advanced not altogether incredible. There is without doubt a great reſpect due to the memory of learned men; but then this ought to be joined with a juſt regard for learning and truth; which qualification being admitted, Sir Symonds D'Ewes will not appear either ſo vain or ſo envious a perſon as they would make him.

[F] Muſt be left to the judgment of the reader.] It is to be obſerved, that this ſpeech of Sir Symonds D'Ewes was occaſional, and involuntary. A bill for four ſubſidies, towards the relief of the King's army in the northern counties, had been twice read in the Houſe of Commons, and the Committee who drew the bill, having placed Cambridge before Oxford, an occaſion was ſought to tranſpoſe thoſe names, when the bill came to be debated in a grand Committee of the whole Houſe, which was on Saturday January 2, 1640, and then our author ſtood up to prevent the putting of a queſtion, and ſpoke as follows (17):

(17) See the title in note [G.]

'I ſtand up to perſuade, if it may be, the declining 'of the preſent queſtion, and the further diſpute of 'this buſineſs. Yeſterday we had a long debate 'about the putting out of a word, and now we are 'fallen upon the diſpute of putting one word before 'another. I account it no honour to Cambridge that 'it got the precedence by voices at the former Com'mittee, nor will it be any glory to Oxford to gain it 'by voices here, where we all know the multitude of 'borough towns of the weſtern parts of England do 'ſend ſo many worthy members hither, that if we 'meaſure things by number and not by weight, Cam'bridge is ſure to loſe it. I would therefore propound 'a more noble way and means for the deciſion of the 'preſent controverſy than by queſtion, in which, if 'the univerſity of Oxford, which for mine own part I 'do highly reſpect and honour, ſhall obtain the prize, 'it will be far more glory to it than to carry it by 'multitude of voices, which indeed can be none at all. 'Let us thererore diſpute it by reaſon, and not make 'an idol of either place; and if I ſhall be ſo convinced, 'I ſhall readily change my vote, wiſhing we may find 'the ſame ingenuity in the Oxford men.

'There are two principal reſpects, beſides others, 'in which theſe famous Univerſities may claim pre'cedence each of other.

'Firſt, in reſpect of their being, as they were, places 'of note in the elder ages.

'Secondly, as they were antient nurſeries and ſeed'plots of learning.

'If I do not therefore prove, that Cambridge was 'a renowned city at leaſt five hundred years before 'there was a houſe of Oxford ſtanding, and whilſt 'brute beaſts fed, or corn was ſown, on that place 'where the ſame city is now ſeated; and that Cam'bridge was a nurſery of learning before Oxford was 'known to have a grammar-ſchool in it, I will yield 'up the bucklers. If I ſhould loſe time to reckon up 'the vain allegations produced for the antiquity of 'Oxford by Twine, and of Cambridge by Caius, I 'ſhould but repeat Deliria ſenum; for I account the 'moſt of that they have publiſhed in print to be no 'better. But I find my authority without exception, 'that, in the antient catalogue of the cities of Britain, 'Cambridge is the ninth in number, where London 'itſelf is but the eleventh; and who would have thought 'that ever Oxford ſhould have contended for prece'dence with Cambridge, which London gave it above 'twelve hundred years ſince? This I find in Gildas 'Albanius his Britiſh ſtory, who died about the year '520, being the antienteſt domeſtick monument we 'have, page 60. And in a Saxon anonymous ſtory, 'written in Latin, touching the Britons and Saxons, 'page 39, who ſaith of himſelf, that he lived in the 'days of Penda King of the Mercians, in the tenth 'year of his reign, and that he knew him well, which 'falls out to be near upon the year 620. And, laſtly, 'I find the catalogue of the ſaid Britiſh cities, with 'ſome little variation, to be ſet down in Nennius his 'Latin ſtory of Britain, page 38, and he wrote the 'ſame, as he ſays of himſelf, in the year 880. They 'all call it Cair-grant, the word Cair, in the old 'Celtique tongue, ſignifying a city.

'Theſe three ſtories are exotick and rare monu'ments remaining, yet only in antient manuſcripts 'amongſt us, not known to many, but the authority 'of them is irrefragable and without exception. The 'beſt and moſt antient copies that I have ſeen of 'Gildas Albanius and Nennius, remain in the univer'ſity library of Cambridge, being thoſe I have vouched, 'and the Saxon anonymous in a library here near us. 'This Cair-grant, is not only expounded by Alfred of 'Beverly to ſignify Cambridge, but alſo by William de 'Ramſay Abbot of Croyland, in his manuſcript ſtory 'of the life of Guthlacus, ignorantly in thoſe elder 'days reputed a ſaint. The ſaid William goes further, 'and ſays, it was ſo called à Granta flumine. This 'place remained ſtill a city of fame and repute a long 'time under the reign of the Engliſh Saxons, and is 'called in divers of the old manuſcript Saxon An'nals Ԓnantceaꞇtep. And notwithſtanding the great 'devaſtations it ſuffered, with other places, by reaſon 'of the Daniſh incurſions, yet in the firſt tome or 'volume of the book of Domeſdei (for now I come to 'cite record) it appears to have been a place of con'ſiderable of his Sovereign, created a Baronet (u). But, upon the breaking out of the Civil War, he adhered to the Parliament; and we find his name in the liſt of thoſe members who took the Solemn League and Covenant, purſuant to an order of the Houſe of Commons, February 3d, 1643 (w). This did not hinder his having a ſincere veneration for the conſtitution of his country, and a loyal affection to the perſon of his Prince; ſo that when things came to extremities, and it was found neceſſary to purge the Parliament, by turning out of it all who were of ſuch old-faſhioned principles; and, for this purpoſe, a guard of ſoldiers was ſent thither, December 6th, 1648 (x), Sir Symonds D'Ewes was amongſt the number (y). Thoſe that were left in the Houſe, indeed, ſent to the commanding officer to reclaim him, and the reſt of the Members in his condition; but to no purpoſe, for he was never allowed to enter thoſe doors again ſo long as he lived. When it was thus put out of his power to render any farther ſervice to the publick, he gave himſelf up entirely to the proſecution of thoſe ſtudies which had been always the principal delight he enjoyed, in the innocent occupations of a private life. He digeſted into order the vaſt collections he had made, in reference to the antiquities of this kingdom in general, and ſeveral adjacent counties in particular; ſome volumes of which are yet preſerved, and remain inconteſtible evidences of his wonderful diligence, and excellent diſpoſition (z). He collated and tranſcribed ſeveral ancient records and monuments of paſt times, ſuch as the BLACK BOOK of the EXCHEQUER (a), which he had ſome thoughts of publiſhing. He made a noble collection of Roman coins, of which, as he was a very good judge himſelf, in reſpect to their value, ſo he ſpared no expence that appeared neceſſary for accompliſhing the ends (b) he propoſed in making that collection. He was a great patron of learned men, and very free in his communications, as appears from the acknowledgments made by the induſtrious Mr. Weever, who received great helps (c) from him in carrying on his large and uſeful work. That he was not, as ſome have repreſented him, a vain man, may appear from hence, that ſcarcely any thing of his writing appeared in his lifetime [G]. He was rather deſirous of being uſeful to the literary world in another way, that is, in the way of a collector of ſcarce, curious, and valuable pieces, more eſpecially ſuch as regarded the hiſtory, antiquities, and records of this nation; to which ſtudies, when he had once addicted himſelf, he was, in a great meaſure, weaned from the general and indeterminate purſuit of knowledge, with the deſire of which he had been before poſſeſſed (d). It was the deep ſenſe he had of the great advantages that might ariſe to his country, from the application of a man of learning and fortune to things of this nature, his juſt conception of the deficiencies in moſt of the hiſtories publiſhed in and before his time, and the great examples he had before his eyes of the learned Camden, the beneficent Sir Robert Cotton, and the judicious Mr. Selden, that inſpired him with a ſtrong inclination of compoſing, or, at leaſt, amaſſing the materials for thoſe great works, that, we have his own authority to prove, were the principal objects of his care for many years,

'ſiderable moment, having in it decem Cuſtodias, and 'a caſtle of great ſtrength and extent, and ſo I have 'done with Cambridge as a renowned place.

'And now I come to ſpeak to it as it hath been a 'nurſery of learning: nor will I begin higher with it 'than the time of the learned Saxon Monarch King 'Alfred, becauſe I ſuppoſe that no man will queſtion 'or gainſay, but that there are ſufficient teſtimonies of 'certain perſons that did together in Cambridge ſtudy 'the arts and ſciences much about the time. And it 'grew to be a place ſo famous for learning about the 'time of William the Firſt, the Norman, that he ſent 'his younger ſon Henry thither to be there inſtructed, 'who himſelf being afterwards King of England by 'the name of Henry the Firſt, was alſo ſurnamed 'Beauclerk, in reſpect of his great and invulgar knowledge. If I ſhould undertake to alledge and vouch 'the records and other monuments of good authority, 'which aſſert and prove the increaſe and flouriſhing 'eſtate of this univerſity in the ſucceeding ages, I 'ſhould ſpend more time than our great and weighty 'occaſions at this preſent will permit: it ſhall therefore ſuffice to have added, that the moſt ancient and 'firſt endowed college of England was Valence college 'in Cambridge, which, after the foundation thereof, 'as appears by one of our Parliament Rolls remaining 'upon record in the Tower of London, received the 'new name or appellation of Pembroke Hall. It is in 'Rotu. Parliam. de ann. 38 H. VI. Numb. 31. It 'appearing therefore ſo evidently, by all that I have 'ſaid, that Cambridge is in all reſpects the elder ſiſter, 'which I ſpeak not to derogate from Oxford; my 'humble advice is, that we lay aſide the preſent queſtion, as well to avoid diviſion amongſt ourſelves, as 'to entomb all further emulation between the two ſiſters, and that we ſuffer the preſent bill to paſs as it 'is now penned; and the rather, becauſe I think Oxford had the precedence in the laſt bill of this nature 'that paſſed this houſe.'

[G] Appeared in his life-time.] The only piece of his which is known to deſerve that title, is that the reader has ſeen in the foregoing note, which was printed under the following title:

"A Speech delivered in Parliament by Sir Symonds "D'Ewes, touching the Antiquity of Cambridge. Lond. "1642, 4*to.*"

In thoſe days, when there were ſome people living who were thought to know as much of our ancient Hiſtory and records as moſt folks, and but for whom certainly we had known but little of them, this ſpeech was held ſo far from being idle or ridiculous, that it gave this gentleman a great reputation. We may be very well ſatisfied of this, ſince the following tract, which is commonly aſcribed to John Selden, Eſq. was ſuſpected, by ſuch as pretended to have great inſight into matters of that kind, to have fallen from the pen of our learned author, and the point is left undecided by a great Critick in ſuch learning (18).

"A Brief Diſcourſe concerning the Power of Peers "and Commons in Parliament, in point of Judicature. "Lond. 1640. 4to."

If this was really of his writing, it is a very ſtrong proof that he was not covetous of applauſe, ſince he neither owned it publicly, nor gave any private intimation to his friends that might ſecure his title. On the other hand, if the ſuppoſing it to be his ariſes purely from conjecture, it muſt give us a very high opinion of his credit in thoſe days, ſince the very raiſing a doubt whether this belonged to him or to Selden, does the higheſt honour to his character as an Antiquary.

and which, it is highly probable, he carried to ſome degree of perfection (e) [H]. This diſpoſition of his procured him very great reſpect and eſteem from the ableſt and wiſeſt perſons of his times, ſuch as the learned Spelman, the famous Selden, and many others (f). But later writers, either for want of better knowing this gentleman's real character, or for ſome other reaſons, have not treated his memory with that decency (g) that might have been expected; and, therefore, the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find, in the notes, a very ſhort and modeſt vindication of our author and his writings from their cenſures [I]. He

[H] To ſome degree of perfection.] The reader will perceive, by what has been already quoted from his Preface to the Journals of Parliament in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, that as he was far from inclining to hide them from the publick, ſo, on the other hand, he had no intention to acquire fame to himſelf in his life-time by the publication of them. His diſpoſition was the very ſame with regard to his other great undertakings. He was conſcious to himſelf of the uncertainty whether he might finiſh all or any of them, but this did not hinder him from beginning of them, as appears from his own words, which will beſt expreſs his meaning (19).

(19) At the cloſe of his Preface to his Journals of the Parliaments in the Reign of Q. Elizabeth.

'The chief of the works beforementioned, and by 'me intended for the publick good, are theſe enſuing:

'A General Hiſtory of Great Britain, from the firſt 'Inhabitants to the preſent Times, to be drawn eſpecially out of Record, and other abſtruſe and exotick 'Monuments, for the reformation of all the Chronicles or Hiſtories of this kind yet extant, which will 'require ſeveral volumes.

'The Survey of Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, and Cambridgeſhire, out of Records or Original Deeds.

'The Antiquity of the Municipal or Common Laws 'of the Realm before the Norman Conqueſt, out of 'Record alſo for the greateſt part, or other invulgar 'materials. For which I have a deſire alſo, if my 'time will ſuffice for collection, to add a ſecond part 'out of the Itinerant and Plea Books, chiefly remaining in the Treaſury at Weſtminſter,

'Theſe I have propoſed to myſelf to labour in, beſides divers other ſmaller works, as well Theological 'as moral, like him that ſhoots at the ſun, not in 'hopes to reach it, but to ſhoot as high as poſſibly his 'ſtrength, art, or ſkill will permit. So, though I 'know it impoſſible to finiſh all theſe during my ſhort 'and incertain life, having already entered into the 'thirtieth year of my age, and having many unavoidable employments and cares of an eſtate and family, 'yet if I can but finiſh a little in each kind, it may 'hereafter ſtir up ſome able judgments to add an end 'to the whole, in the ſame way and ſearch I ſhall have 'waded in before them. In the mean time I ſhall always pray, as I do ſincerely deſire, that by all my 'endeavours GOD may be glorified, the truth divine 'or human vindicated, and the publick benefited.

'SIMONDS D'EWES.'

[I] And his writings from their cenſures.] It cannot but be eſteemed an action right in itſelf, grateful with reſpect to the dead, and uſeful to the Republick of Letters, when care is taken to revive the memory of worthy men, and to reſcue them from miſrepreſentation, which is worſe than oblivion. Sir Simonds D'Ewes, having been bred under Dr. Richard Holdſworth of St. John's in Cambridge, who was a man of moderate principles, though ſteadily attached to the Conſtitution in Church and State; came into the world with ſentiments that did not much recommend him to Archbiſhop Laud, and other warm Divines. But for all this he was ſincerely religious; and though his affection to liberty induced him to ſtay with the Parliament, where we find, by ſeveral fine ſpeeches (20), that he was a great maſter in thoſe parts of learning moſt uſeful to a Senator, yet he was far from inclining either to Anarchy or a Commonwealth. He very well knew, that the former muſt make way for tyranny of ſome ſort or other, and that the latter was altogether incompatible with the laws of England, and with the temper and intereſts of the nation. It is to be hoped therefore, that the Reverend Mr. Fuller was not afraid of giving offence, when he drew up his notes concerning this worthy perſon, which are not only deſtitute of any remarkable facts, and without method, but without dates alſo, one only excepted, and that falſe (21). He might, without doubt, have been better informed, if he had taken any degree of pains; and therefore his omiſſions in this reſpect are the leſs excuſable. Doctor Smith, a very learned and good man, to whoſe care we owe the beſt memoirs of ſome of the greateſt men that have flouriſhed in this kingdom, was unluckily prejudiced againſt the memory of Sir Simonds D'Ewes, on account of his preſuming to think Camden not infallible (22); and what he has written upon this ſubject being tranſcribed by Mr. Bayle, foreigners can have no other idea of this Gentleman than as he has painted him, a man envious of the merit of others, and having very little of his own (23). Yet it is very certain D'Ewes had the greateſt honour for Camden, whom he mentions very reſpectfully, though he tells us in his Preface to his Journals of the Parliaments of Queen Elizabeth, that they will enable his reader to correct many things in the Annals written by this great man of that reign: but he gives due praiſes to his performance; and it was his eſteem for his memory, though he did not carry that ſo far as to be in love with his miſtakes, that betrayed him into the expreſſion for which he has been cenſured. Biſhop Nicolſon, in his dry way, ſneers at Sir Symonds D'Ewes more than once (24), and hints, that though he promiſed much he had performed little; which is the more extraordinary, when in his Preface he very plainly points out where the vaſt collections made by this painful Antiquary are to be found (25). We need however wonder the leſs at this, when at the ſame time he ſpeaks ſo harſhly of John Leland, the bulkieſt promiſes of ſuch noted writers commonly prove the moſt abotive, and the reaſon he gives for it is, deſpair of anſwering the world's raiſed expectations very much contributing to their miſcarriage (26). This remark provoked the laborious Mr. Hearne to remark upon him in his turn: yet the moſt abortive pieces of Leland, ſays he, are far better, and much more correct, than the moſt compleat performances of ſome writers (27). Notwithſtanding which obſervation, the very ſame Thomas Hearne has dealt moſt unkindly by our author. After he had undertaken to publiſh the Black Book of the Exchequer, he was generouſly ſupplied, by the late Edward Earl of Oxford, with the copy of that valuable piece made by our famous Antiquary, bearing this title, Liber niger parvus MS. Scaccarii ex parte rememoratoris Regis, integre tranſcriptus & cum Autographo accurate comparatus à meipſo Simonds D'Ewes. It was by the help of this communication Mr. Hearne was enabled to add a great many curious and inſtructive notes from the margin of our author's book. Yet in his Preface he has expreſſed his gratitude in the following character (28). 'The 'reader will not wonder at his leaving this work un-'publiſhed, contrary, as I believe, to his original in-'tention, when he ſhall underſtand that D'Ewes, though 'a man diligent and learned, was nevertheleſs vain 'and empty towards his ſacred Majeſty; like Selden, 'an enemy and adverſary; and one, who many things '(amongſt the reſt an Engliſh Hiſtory, for the writing 'of which, in my judgment, he was very little fit) 'having promiſed, compleated only a very few.' This is but one paſſage out of many in which he depreciates this Gentleman's character, which ſurely is a little hard, conſidering he would have had no opportunity of doing ſo, had he not availed himſelf of his labours. It has been already ſhewn, that this reproach, with reſpect to his political principles, was not very well founded: and perhaps Mr. Hearne would have dealt with him more ſoftly, if he had known that in the latter part of his life he was wont to obſerve, not by way of compliment to the Long Parliament, That they alone had paſſed more laws than all the Parliaments put together that had ſat before them (29). But whatever his principles might be with reſpect to Church and State, and whether theſe were allied to, or remote from, thoſe of the induſtrious Mr. Hearne, juſtice was certainly due to his writings, with which he ought to have been better acquainted before he pronounced ſo poſitively, that though he promiſed much he performed but little. Whoever conſiders that his promiſes and performances were equal ſecrets to the publick, till his private letters were printed, and his vaſt collections fallen into other hands, will be very probably of another opinion, and think that the character afforded him by a Reverend Hiſtorian, who was never ſuſpected of being a friend to the memories of men, who in their life-times ſhewed themſelves enemies to our Conſtitution in Church or State, is much more agreeable to truth, and to the real merits of the perſon concerned (30): 'We ſhall 'next, ſays he, mention Sir Simonds D'Ewes, a 'Gentleman educated at the Univerſity of Cambridge, 'celebrated for a moſt curious Antiquary, highly 'eſteemed by the great Selden, and particularly re-'markable for his Journals of all the Parliaments in 'Queen Elizabeth's reign, and for his admirable ma-'nuſcript library he left behind him, now in the hands 'of one of the greateſt geniuſes (31) in the age.' (31) The late Earl of Oxford.

 [There is ſomething in this article of that amiable partiality, in favour of the characters he deſcribes, by which Dr. Campbell is frequently diſtinguiſhed. Sir Symonds D'Ewes was undoubtedly worthy of notice as a diligent Collector, and a zealous Antiquary. He has added ſome valuable materials to the general body of Engliſh Hiſtory; and his "Jour-"nals of all the Parliaments during the Reign of "Queen Elizabeth," have thrown conſiderable light upon the tranſactions of that reign. But, beſides giving him thoſe praiſes to which he was entitled, our predeceſſor has gone farther in his vindication than appears to have been abſolutely neceſſary; and has taken too much pains, in particular, to exculpate Sir Symonds D'Ewes with regard to the cenſure which he paſſed upon Camden. It might have been ſufficient briefly to have obſerved, that the cenſure was delivered only in a private letter, without any view to its ever being publiſhed; and that, although it was haſtily and injudiciouſly written, it might not proceed from any malignity of mind. Indeed, that Sir Symonds had, in general, a ſincere reſpect for the memory of Camden, is evident from one of his wills, an extract from which is given in the fifteenth number of the "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica." In that will, which was made in 1626, he bequeaths a ſum of money for the erection of a monument to himſelf in Weſtminſter Abbey, juſt by Mr. Camden's tomb, on the right hand, and to be in every thing as nearly as poſſible according to the form and faſhion of that tomb (32).

(32) Bibl. Top. Brit. N° 15, Preface, p. xiii.

Another of the circumſtances which Dr. Campbell endeavours to extenuate, is Sir Simonds D'Ewes's ſpeech concerning the Antiquity of the Univerſity of Cambridge. We cannot, however, help regarding it as a pedantic declamation, delivered at a time when more important objects demanded the attention of Parliament. The cenſures paſt upon it we conſider as juſt, independently of any diſpute whether Oxford or Cambridge be the more ancient ſeat of literary education.

The moſt important of all Sir Symonds D'Ewes's ſpeeches is not mentioned in note G. It was ſpoken in a debate which took place on the ſeventh of July, 1641, on occaſion of the King's Manifeſto in favour of the Elector Palatine. The authors of the Parliamentary Hiſtory remark, that it deſerves particular notice, as containing a noble abſtract of the affairs of Europe for the laſt twenty years. It does, indeed, reflect great credit upon Sir Symonds's hiſtorical and political knowledge (33).

(33) Parliamentary Hiſt. Vol. ix. p. 467—475.

Among the Harleian manuſcripts, now in the Britiſh Muſeum, is a manuſcript Journal of the Life of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, written by himſelf. Conſiderable uſe was made of it by our predeceſſor, and ſeveral extracts from it have been printed by Thomas Hearne. But a ſtill larger number of them are publiſhed in the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, before referred to. Moſt of them relate to the tranſactions and characters of Sir Symonds's own time, and either have been, or will be noticed in their proper places. It may be ſufficient here to advert to a few particulars which more immediately reſpect Sir Symonds D'Ewes himſelf, and ſerves to diſplay the diſpoſition of his mind.

He has given, in his Journal, a minute account of his courtſhip and marriage. The only love-letter he had occaſion to ſend, and which was accompanied with a preſent of a diamond carcanet, was as follows:

"Faireſt,

"Bleſt is the heart and hand that ſincerely ſends "theſe meaner lines, if another heart and eye gra-"tiouſlie daigne to pittie the wound of the firſt, and "the numnes of the latter: and thus may this other "poore incloſed carcanett, if not adorn the purer "neck, yet be hidden in the private cabinet of her, "whoſe humble ſweetneſs and ſweet humility de-"ſerve the juſteſt honour, the greateſt thankfulneſs. "Nature made ſtones, but opinion jewels; this, "without your milder acceptance and opinion, will "prove neither ſtone nor jewel. Do but enhappie him "that ſent it in the ordinary uſe of it, who though "unworthie in himſelf, yet reſolves to continue your "humbleſt ſervant,

"Simonds D'Ewes (34)."

(34) Bibl. Top. Brit. ubi ſupra, p. 34—38.

That Sir Symonds D'Ewes's judgment and taſte with regard to wit were as contemptible as can well be imagined, will be evident from the following paſſage, taken from his account of Carr Earl of Somerſet, and his wife. "This diſcontent gave many ſatyrical wits "occaſion to vent themſelves into ſtingie libels, in "which they ſpared neither the perſons, families, nor "moſt ſecret avowtries of that unfortunate paire. There "came alſoe two anagrams to my handes, not unwor-"thie to be owned by the rareſt witts of this age, though "the firſt be reſolved into ſomewhat too broad an "expreſſion for ſoe nobly an extracted ladie:

"Frances Howard, "Thomas Overburie,
"Car finds a whore. ôô a buſie murther (35)"

(35) p. 13.

In his eſtimation of the merit of hiſtorical compoſition, Sir Symonds diſplayed a far ſuperior diſcernment. He was a paſſionate admirer of Thuanus's Hiſtory, anxiouſly applied to the younger Thuanus, to obtain copies of ſuch parts of it as had not hitherto been publiſhed, and was ſucceſsful in procuring a picture of that great Author, and another of the famous Admiral Coligni (36).

(36) Ibid. p. 52—54. 72—77.

Sir Symonds D'Ewes was ſtrongly tinctured with the Calviniſtical bigotry of the times. In his account of King James's Death and Funeral, he highly commends that monarch for his oppoſition to James Arminius, Conradus Vorſtius, and other blaſphemous Anabaptiſts. Speaking of the Duke of Buckingham, he ſays, "What his religion was, I am not able to averre; "yet it was obſerved in Parliament, that he pro-"cured himſelfe to be elected Chancellour of the "Univerſitie of Cambridge by the Arminian partie, "or the Enemies of God's Grace and Providence, "which till of late years have called themſelves Ana-"baptiſts, being the followers of Michael Servetus, "Lælius Socinus, and Sebaſtian Caſtellio, and have "been ſo named and written againſt by the Orthodox "Proteſtant partie for neare foure-ſcore yeares laſt "paſt; and were firſt called Arminians after the death "of James Arminius, Profeſſor of Divinity in Leyden "in Holland, about thirtie yeares paſt, who ſtole "much of that he wrote out of his great maſter Se-"baſtian Caſtellio, or out of the worke of Robert "Bellarmine, and other Jeſuits." Sir Symonds D'Ewes's characters of ſome of the principal perſons of the age appear often to be grounded only on common report, and to be mixed with no ſmall degree of prejudice. His account of Lord Bacon is eminently malignant; and indeed ought never to have been written, even in the moſt private manner, unleſs it had been ſubſtantiated by undeniable evidence. On the whole, we have not formed a high opinion

DICKINSON or DICKENSON (EDMUND) a celebrated Phyſician and Chemiſt in the reigns of Charles and James II. His family were originally of Ritington in Lancaſhire, but his father, the Reverend Mr. William Dickinſon, ſettled in Berkſhire, where he was Rector of Appleton. He married Mary, the daughter of Edmund Colepeper, Eſq. of Halingborne in Kent, by whom he had this ſon, who was born September the 26th, 1624, at Appleton in the county of Berks (a). He received the firſt rudiments of learning and languages at the famous College of Eton, whence, in 1642, he came to Oxford, and was admitted of Merton-Colege as one of the Eton Poſt maſters (b). June the 22d, 1647, he became Bachelor of Arts, and was admitted Probationer-Fellow of his College (c). On November 27th, 1649, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and was entered on the Phyſick line (d). July 3d, 1656 (e), he was admitted to his Bachelor's degree in that faculty, wherein he quickly diſtinguiſhed himſelf as well as in other branches of curious and uſeful knowledge, and, on July 17th, 1656, took the degree of Doctor (f). The firſt thing which made him known in the learned world, was an oration ſpoken by him in the Hall of Merton-College, July 10th, 1653, in defence of Freedom in Philoſophizing, which was highly and juſtly admired (g). In 1655 he publiſhed, at Oxford, his "Delphi Phœnicizantes," i. e. "Delphi derived from the "Phœnicians;" of which moſt learned piece it is hard to ſay, whether it gained the author more friends at home, or reputation abroad [A]. Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, had ſo juſt a ſenſe of the value of that work, and the worth of him who penned it, that he would gladly have perſuaded him to have applied himſelf to Divinity, and to have taken orders; but our author was fixed in his choice (h). The Warden and Fellows of Merton-College, in deference to his extraordinary merit, conferred on him the place of Superior Reader of Linacre's Lectures, which he held for ſome years (i). He then applied himſelf to Chemiſtry with much aſſiduity; and about this time it was that he received the firſt viſit from an illuſtrious French adept, who commended our author's ſkill and diligence, and encouraged him to proceed in his ſtudies (k). At length leaving the College, that he might practiſe his profeſſion more conveniently, he took a houſe in the High-ſtreet of Oxford, where he dwelt many years (l). In 1669 he married his firſt wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Luddington, of an antient family, ſeated at Carlton-Scroop in Lincolnſhire; by which Lady he had his only daughter (m). The mother dying in child-bed, was interred in St. Peter's Church

[A] Friends at home, or reputation abroad.] The title of this book at large runs thus: "Delphi Phœ-"nicizantes, ſive Tractatus in quo Græco, quicquid "apud Delphos celebre erat (ſeu Pythonis aut Apol-"linis Hiſtoriam, ſeu pæonica certamina & premia, "ſeu priſcam templi formam atque inſcriptionem, ſeu "Tripodem, Oraculum, ſpectes) è Joſuæ, &c. Hiſ-"toria Scriptiſque ſacris effinxiſſe, rationibus haud in-"concinnis oſtenditur. Et quamplurima quæ Philo-"logiæ ſtudioſis apprimè jucunda futura ſunt, aliter "ac vulgo ſolent, enarrantur." The ſcope of this tract was to prove, that the Greeks borrowed the ſtory of the Pythian Apollo, and all that rendered the oracle at Delphi famous, from the Holy Scriptures, and the book of Joſhua in particular. In treating this very obſcure ſubject, he ſhews a wonderful ſkill in the Hebrew, Arabic, and Greek tongues, a perfect knowledge of antiquity, and a moſt penetrating judgment. The quickneſs of his thoughts, the probability of his conjectures, and his profound erudition, deſerve the higheſt applauſe. The judicious Carpſov mentions him with much reſpect as a very uſeful commentator on Joſhua: to ſay the truth, there are abundance of ſtrokes in this piece which throw light on the darkeſt paſſages in ſacred and prophane hiſtory, which is the reaſon this diſſertation gave ſuch high ſatisfaction to the learned world (1). To this treatiſe were added, I. "Diatribe de Noæ in Italiam Adventu; ejuſque no-"minibus ethnicis." i. e. "A Diſſertation on the "coming of Noah into Italy, and of the names under "which he was known to the Heathens." In which are alſo a multitude of curious obſervations, as well philological and mythological, as hiſtorical. Struvius (2), the learned German, who has written ſo uſefully on literary hiſtory, takes notice of it, and ſome modern writers have borrowed from it without naming it at all. II. "De Origine Druidum." i. e. "Of the "Riſe of the Druids." This treatiſe, in relation to the eldeſt of our Britiſh philoſophers, is very conciſe, but diſcovers the author's great knowledge in our antiquities, and is particularly mentioned by Stollius (3), and the author honoured with the title of a moſt learned Antiquary by Reimanus (4). III. "Oratiuncula pro "Philoſophia liberanda." This is the oration mentioned in the text, as the firſt of our author's performances. Mr. Wood (5) tells us, that this was ſpoken, when, according to the ſtatutes of his houſe (Merton-College) he varied from the mind of Ariſtotle, and ſo it is marked in the end of the oration. IV. "Zach. "Bogan, Edmundo Dickenſon." This letter does our author as much honour as any of his own works. It is filled with citations from the moſt antient authors in ſupport of his opinions, and the higheſt commendations of his learning, induſtry, and judgment. "The Del-"phi Phœnicizantes" came out originally at Oxford in 1655, in 12mo. with a Dedication to Dr. John Goddard of the College of Phyſicians, London, and Warden of Merton College at Oxford. It was printed at Frankfort in 1669, 8vo. (6), of which edition Wood never heard; and at Rotterdam in 1691; by Crenius in the firſt Tome of his "Faſciculus Diſſertationum "Hiſtorico-critico-philologicarum," in 12mo, and not 8vo, as Wood ſays, which is an indication he had not ſeen it. He adds, This book is much valued by foreigners, and they ſpeak very honourably of it, and it's author (7) This muſt be underſtood of the foreigners Wood had converſed with (which were not a few) at Oxford. We have ſhewn the ſame thing from their writings; indeed what wonder, conſidering our author was ſcarcely thirty when he wrote this moſt learned tract;

at Oxford, where a monument is erected to her memory (n). He wedded ſome time after Helena, the daughter of * Mole, Eſq. of Ayleſbury, in the county of Bucks, who dying in a ſhort time, he continued ever after a widower (o). On the death of the famous Dr. Thomas Willis, which happened in 1684 (p), our author was prevailed on to remove to London, and there he took Dr. Willis's houſe, in St. Martin's lane, where he practiſed with great ſucceſs many years (q). Having been ſo happy as to reſtore to health, after all hopes of recovery were loſt, Henry [Bennet] Earl of Arlington, Lord Chamberlain to Charles II. that nobleman, in gratitude, introduced him to the King, who, in 1684, appointed him one of his phyſicians in ordinary, and phyſician to his houſhold (r). As that prince was a great lover of chemiſtry, and a conſiderable proficient therein (s), Dr. Dickenſon grew into great favour, and was honoured with much of his Majeſty's converſation in the royal elaboratory, which was under the King's bedchamber, and to which he had a private ſtair-caſe from thence (t). His favour laſted as long as the life of his Royal Maſter; and his brother and ſucceſſor King James the Second continued him in both places (u). In 1686, our author publiſhed in Latin his Epiſtle to Theodore Mundanus, the illuſtrious French adept before-mentioned, as alſo his anſwer, tranſlated from the French into Latin. This is one of the moſt curious, as it is abſolutely the moſt rational, piece that ever appeared on hermetick philoſophy, and is ſtill highly eſteemed [B]. Some ſmall time after the abdication of his unfortunate Maſter, Dr. Dickenſon retired from practice, being in years, and very much afflicted with the ſtone. He continued nevertheleſs to apply himſelf to his ſtudies; and, as he was a gentleman of great candour, and very communicative, ſo, at his houſe in St. Martin's-lane, there were frequent aſſemblies of the learned, who were willing to improve theſe valuable qualities in Dr. Dickenſon to their own advantage (w). He had long meditated a ſyſtem of philoſophy, not founded on his own conjectures, or the experiments of other men, but chiefly from the lights afforded by the Moſaick hiſtory, compared with the theories of the Antients. Part of this laborious work, when he had brought it into order, was unfortunately burnt. The Doctor, however, was not diſcouraged: he ſet about the ſame taſk again, and, at length, finiſhed and committed it to the preſs. It appeared in 1702, under the title of "Phyſica Vetus et Vera" (x). The ſame genius, the ſame learning, the ſame exquiſite judgment, and, above all, the ſame modeſt zeal for truth, and the ſame pious concern for revealed religion, were viſible in this, that had rendered his firſt treatiſe ſo much admired. All who had a taſte for Oriental learning, and the Corpuſcularian ſyſtem, which, in thoſe days, were not a few, highly applauded Dr. Dickenſon's book, and with ſuch it ſtill is, and ever will be, in great credit [C]. The reſt of his days

[B] And is ſtill highly eſteemed.] In order to give the reader a juſt idea of this moſt curious treatiſe, it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that Theodore Mundanus viſited our author Dickenſon firſt at Oxford, a little after the Reſtoration, perhaps in 1662 (8). He found him then a deep admirer of ſublime chemiſtry, and exhorted him to purſue his ſtudies with ſuch aſſurances as had probably great effect upon his mind, becauſe we find by his letter he had read Lully, Ripley, Philalethes, &c. and had actually employed much time in endeavouring to reach their ſenſe. In 1679 (9), Theodore Mundanus paid him a viſit at London, and renewed his acquaintance. It may, from circumſtances in the Doctor's epiſtle, be gathered, that he was by this time not a little cooled in his inclinations towards chemiſtry, at leaſt towards alchemy. And therefore to give him ſpirits to addreſs himſelf again to ſuch enquiries, Mundanus made two projections in his preſence (10). This is ſo ſtrange a fact, that to leave the Engliſh reader without ſcruple about it, we ſhall tranſcribe the words of Theod. Mundanus, writing to Dr. Dickenſon (11), who cauſed them to be printed. 'That therefore I might 'by an irrefragable argument, teſtify how high and 'how honourable an opinion I had conceived of you, 'as alſo that I might eſtabliſh your confidence in the 'principles of our philoſophy, and encourage you in 'your enquiries, I made two projections in your pre'ſence. Neither know I any thing which ought to 'induce you to ſcruple the truth of what I affirm to 'you, that though it is now forty years ſince I was 'Philoſophus Adeptus; i. e. an adept, or one perfect 'in the alchemiſtical ſcience, yet, yourſelf excepted, 'there are not three perſons, to whom, in that ſpace, 'I have made known myſelf or my art.' But, to ſtrengthen the thing ſtill farther, hear what Dr. Dickenſon himſelf ſays to Theodore Mundanus (12). "I "heretofore thought of the tranſmutation of metals, "juſt as we think of the ſtrange accounts we hear of "wonderful facts done, or odd cuſtoms which prevail, "in regions at a vaſt diſtance. So ſhould I have ever "thought, as till then, indeed, I did think, when "two years ago you had the goodneſs, by an illuſ"trious demonſtration, to take from me all power of "doubting any longer." It is now time to come to the book, which bore this title, "Epiſtola Edmundi "Dickinſon, M. D. et M. R. ad Theod. Mundanum, "Philoſophum Adeptum, de Quinteſſentia Philoſo"phorum et de vera Phyſiologia. Una cum Quæſ"tionibus Aliquot de ſecreta Materia Phyſica. His "Accedunt Mundani Reſponſia. OXONIÆ, E The"atro Sheldoni, anno 1686, 8vo." i. e. "Ed. Dick. "to Theod. Mund. an Adept of the Quinteſſence of "the Philoſophers, and the true Syſtem of Phyſicks. "As alſo certain Queries, as to the Materials in Al"chemy. To which are annexed the Anſwers of Mun"danus." The letter is dated from London, July 31, 1683, and the anſwer of Mundanus from Paris, September 22, 1684. It was not on this account that we called him a French Philoſopher in the text, but becauſe, when Dr. Dickenſon wrote in Latin, he choſe to anſwer in French. From this language his epiſtle was tranſlated by H. B. (13), whom I ſuppoſe to have been their common friend Dr. Becket. The book was reprinted at Rotterdam, 1699, 8vo (14). And there is a large account of it (as it well deſerved) in the Literary Journal mentioned in the margin (15.) One thing is very remarkable, that this curious piece eſcaped Profeſſor Boerhaave, who would otherwiſe have mentioned it in his ſo much eſteemed "Elementa "Chemiæ."

(y). He yielded to fate, through a ſevere fit of the ſtone, on the third of April, 1707, being then in the eighty-third year of his age, and was interred in the Church of St. Martin's in the Fields (z). He left behind him a character every way worthy of eſteem, as well as that (ſo juſtly acquired by his labours in his profeſſion, and his curious writings) of being one of the moſt knowing and ſucceſsful Phyſicians of his time; which, if we recollect that he was contemporary with Willis, Sydenham, Lower, &c. we ſhall the better comprehend its extent (a). Beſides the pieces before mentioned, he is ſuppoſed to have been the author of "Parabola Philoſophica, ſeu Iter Philareti ad Montem Mercurii (b)." i. e. "A Philoſophical Parable, or a Journey to the Mount of Mercury, by "PHILARETES;" no way inferior to any thing he owned. The reader is to know, that this ſplenetick perſon, having contracted a diſlike to our author during his reſidence in the Univerſity, could never mention him, on any occaſion, without ſuffering ſomewhat of his bitterneſs to appear, by which, without perceiving it, he deſtroys what he propoſes to effect, inaſmuch as ſhewing his partiality equally abates the credit of his teſtimony as a witneſs, and takes away all pretence for paſſing any cenſure upon him as a judge. "concerning the natural truth of the Moſaick Creation, in ſix Days. In which it is proved, that the "Method and Mode of the Creation of the Univerſe, "according to the Principles of True Philoſophy, are "ſtrictly and conciſely laid down by Moſes." It was printed again at Rotterdam, 1703, 4to, and Leoburg, 1705, 12*mo* (16). This ſhews the ſale it had in thoſe parts of Europe, where ſuch ſyſtems are moſt canvaſſed, and of conſequence their value beſt underſtood. As the author was an old-faſhioned writer, and not at all inclined to adopt opinions merely for their being plauſible, we need not wonder that ſome admirers of the moderns were but indifferently pleaſed with his performance. Amongſt theſe Stollius (17) hath explained himſelf in the cleareſt terms, though he confeſſes him to have been a man of great learning. But this cenſure of his ariſes from his diſlike of the Atomick ſyſtem, for there are parties among Philoſophers as well as Politicians. Fabricius (18) mentions him and it with reſpect, and ſo does the celebrated Buddeus in many places with due commendations (19). But what ſufficiently demonſtrates the wiſdom, judgment, and penetration of Dr. Dickenſon, is, that the famous Leibnitz, and the moſt learned Wolfius, have, in many things, followed his track.

[D] Worthy of no other author.] That we may not be ſuſpected of ſlandering the Oxford Antiquary, let his own words be produced. After mentioning our Author's being appointed Superior Reader of Linacre's Lecture in his own college, he goes on (20), "and "about that time ſpent much labour and money in the "art of Chemiſtry, kept an Operator, and gave out "to his acquaintance, that he would publiſh a book "thereof; but as yet there is nothing of that ſort ex"tant by him." We muſt underſtand this of Mr. Wood's knowledge, which, in his own opinion, was extenſive, though I much doubt it deceived him here. For if the Parabola Philoſophica was our author's, as I am thoroughly perſuaded it was, for reaſons that I ſhall preſently mention, then, without queſtion, it was the very treatiſe Dr. Dickenſon mentioned to his friends. But becauſe Anthony à Wood was not of the number, he was peeviſh enough to advance a falſe fact of his own ſhewing (though to be ſure he over-looked it); for our Author's letter to Mundanus (22) is mentioned in the ſame place; and therein is a conciſe ſyſtem of chemical principles. The arguments which induce me to believe he wrote the Parabola Philoſophica are theſe: 1. The judgment of Mundanus, who tells him he is ſure it is his. 2. The conformity of the ſtile and method. 3. Dr. Dickenſon publiſhing Mundanus's letter without diſowning the book.

[E] At large in a note.] The point diſcuſſed in the foregoing note ſufficiently demonſtrates what an inclination the Oxford Antiquary had to ſtrike at Dr. Dickinſon; and, as far as in him lay, to leſſen that great reputation which he had raiſed by his ſucceſsful labours in his profeſſion, and his learned writings. But the Doctor being living, it might not be expedient to proceed to greater lengths, at leaſt openly. However, he has ſufficiently vented his ſpleen, without naming the perſon againſt whom his envious ſhafts are directed; and yet ſo plainly pointing him out, as to leave no ſcruple or doubt upon the peruſer's mind who it is he means (22). The ſtory is too long to be inſerted here, and will fall in with greater propriety hereafter. In the mean time it may not be amiſs to obſerve whence the diſtaſte of Wood aroſe; and, indeed, it is ſo ſtrange a one, from his own account of the matter, which, had he not committed it to writing, the world could never have known, that it is not eaſy to conceive any thing more extravagant (23). Dr. Dickenſon was much Mr. Wood's ſenior in Merton-College; and, as himſelf ſays, very kind to him, when he firſt came thither (24). In proceſs of time, however, Dr. Dickenſon being Fellow of his College, of which what little eſtate Wood's family had was held, the money taken for fines on renewing of leaſes, which was paid to Dr. Dickenſon as Burſar or Treaſurer, were, in Mr. Wood's opinion, very high; and though he does not aſcribe this expreſsly to the Doctor, yet it ſeems to be the true ground of all his miſconſtructions of his conduct. There was a long diſpute in the college between the Fellows and their Warden, Sir Thomas Clayton; in which, though Dr. Dickenſon was of the ſame ſide with Mr. Wood, yet becauſe they did not ſucceed in their oppoſition, and the College was obliged to pay a very large debt contracted by the Warden, Mr. Wood will have it, that Dr. Dickenſon was gained by Sir Thomas Clayton's artifices and flattery; of which, except his own ſuſpicion, he offers no kind of evidence whatever (25). Hence, however, we may judge of his temper and diſpoſition, which ought to render us very cautious in giving an implicit credit to whatever he is pleaſed to ſay of his contemporaries. It muſt, indeed, be owned, that what he ſays of thoſe gentlemen who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their writings, in another work of his, is, for the moſt part, free from any of theſe objections (26); but then it is very well known that work received many caſtigations from Biſhop Fell, by whoſe care it was tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed; and it is as well known, that Mr. Wood complained loudly of this, and was highly diſpleaſed that any thing he had written ſhould be omitted or ſoftened on any account whatever (27). Theſe remarks were in juſtice due to the character of this learned and excellent perſon, and are by no means intended to leſſen that obligation which the publick certainly owes to the inde-

Our learned Phyſician left alſo behind him, in manuſcript, a treatiſe in Latin, on the Grecian Games, which, without queſtion, was extremely worthy of ſeeing the light, and hath

 [Among the encomiums which, in this Article, are paſſed upon Dr. Dickinſon, he is celebrated for his judgment. But we cannot allow that in that reſpect he was entitled to any great degree of praiſe. At a time when the Royal Society were purſuing the true road to Philoſophical Knowledge; when Boyle, Hooke, and other illuſtrious Members of that Society were enriching the world with their reſearches into nature, and when Newton had made his principal diſcoveries, what was the employment of Dr. Dickinſon? He meditated, and he accompliſhed, a Syſtem of Philoſophy, not founded on his own conjectures, or the experiments of other men, but chiefly from the lights afforded by the Moſaic Hiſtory, compared with the theories of the Ancients. That is, he ſought philoſophy where it is not to be found. He ſought for it in the Scriptures, which entirely relate to other objects, and in the juſtly exploded hypotheſes of antiquity. When to this we add, that he was zealouſly devoted to Alchemy, with what pretence can he be applauded for his exquiſite judgment? He might poſſeſs genius and learning; but ſurely he cannot juſtly be aſſerted to have been a judicious writer.

But there is a charge of a more ſerious nature, which has been brought againſt Dr. Dickenſon. The prime work publiſhed by him was, the "Delphi "Phœnicizantes," together with the Diſſertations annexed to it. It is allowed to be a work of profound erudition, whatever may be thought of the particular ſcheme which the Author has advanced and defended. If, however, Anthony Wood is to be credited, Dr. Dickinſon was not the writer of the "Delphi "Pnœnicizantes," but falſely aſſumed that honour to himſelf. According to Wood, the real author was Henry Jacob, who is recorded as having been a prodigy of learning. The ſtory, as it is related by the Oxford Antiquary, we ſhall give in his own words: "Before I go any farther, the reader is to under- "ſtand, that this our Author, Jacob, being ejected "in 1648, from Merton College, and ſo conſequently "from his Chamber, wherein he had left a trunk "full of books, as well written as printed, left "Oxon. And taking no care, or appointing any "friend for its ſecurity, his chamber-door, before "an year was expired, was broke open for a new- "comer, who finding the trunk there, did let it re- "main in its place for a time. At length, when no "man enquired after it, as the then poſſeſſor thereof "pretended, he ſecured it for his own uſe, broke it "open, and therein diſcovered a choice treaſure of "books: one of them, being a manuſcript, and fit "for the preſs, he diſguiſed, and altered it with "another ſtyle; and at length, after he had learned "Hebrew, and the Oriental Languages, to blind "the world, and had converſed openly with thoſe "moſt excellent in them, as Pocock and Bogan, of "Corpus Chriſti College, and any Grecian or Jew "that came accidentally to the univerſity, he pub- "liſhed it under this title, "Delphi-Phœnicizantes, "&c. (28)."

It is remarkable that our ingenious predeceſſor does not fairly meet this ſtory. He refers to it in note E, without directly mentioning it. He declares that it is too long to be inſerted, and that it will fall in with greater propriety hereafter; and he is very ſevere upon Anthony Wood for his diſlike to Dr. Dickinſon. But, all this while, why did not Dr. Campbell come directly to the point? Why did he not ſhew that Wood's charge was totally ill-founded? That he would not have failed to do this, if it had been in his power, is evident from his partiality to Dr. Dickinſon, and his endeavours to repreſent his abilities, writings, and learning, in a high point of view; inſtead of which he has plainly ſlunk from the queſtion. The writer of this note well recollects, that, between forty and fifty years ago, an opinion prevailed, that Dr. Dickinſon was not the author of the "Delphi Phœnicizantes." The fact, I remember, was mentioned to me by my Tutor, Dr. Doddridge, without any doubt of its truth; and this circumſtance was added, that Dr. Dickinſon had affected to repreſent the work as the fruit of his leiſure hours. It may farther be obſerved, though perhaps no great ſtreſs is to be laid upon the remark, that he was only thirty-one years of age when the book was publiſhed, and that the ſubject of it did not ſeem to lie in the courſe of his early ſtudies, which had been devoted to Medicine. If, however we give credit to Anthony Wood's ſtory, ſtill it cannot be denied, that Dr. Dickinſon was a man of ingenuity and learning, and that he was the real author of ſeveral performances, curious in their kind.

As ſo much has been ſaid concerning the claim which Henry Jacob has to be conſidered as having been the writer of the "Delphi Phœnicizantes," a ſhort account of him ſeems to be an act of juſtice due to his memory. He was the ſon of Henry Jacob, a learned Clergyman, ſome time beneficed in Kent, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing againſt Biſhop Bilſon, in the famous controverſy concerning Chriſt's Deſcent into Hell. The year of young Jacob's birth cannot exactly be aſcertained; but it is probable that he was born either in 1606 or 1607. As his father was warmly attached to Puritanical Principles, he was ſent abroad for education; in the courſe of which he was put under the tuition of the celebrated Erpenius, Profeſſor of Arabic in the Univerſity of Leyden. The conſequence of this was, that by the help of ſtrong natural parts, united with a vigorous application, Mr. Jacob, in a ſhort time, made a ſurprizing progreſs in Philological and Oriental Literature. When he was about twenty-two years of age he returned to England, and was recommended by Mr. William Bedwell, a noted Orientaliſt of that time, to William Earl of Pembroke, Chancellor of Oxford, as an extraordinary young man, who deſerved particular encouragement. Accordingly, that generous Nobleman immediately wrote to the Univerſity letters in his behalf, requeſting that he might be created Bachelor of Arts; to which degree he was admitted in January 1628-9. In the Earl's recommendation, Jacob was deſcribed as having profited in Oriental Learning above the ordinary meaſures of his age. Soon after he obtained the patronage of John Selden, Henry Briggs, and Peter Turner (men very famous in their generation); and, by their endeavours, was elected Probationer Fellow of Merton-College, in the year 1630. Not, however, being ſufficiently ſkilled in Logic and Philoſophy to carry him through the ſevere exerciſes of that Society, the Warden and Fellows tacitly aſſigned him the ſituation of Philological Lecturer. This being done, he was, for a while, diverted from his ſtudies by the neceſſity of attending to ſome law ſuits concerning his patrimony, at the concluſion of which he fell into a dangerous ſickneſs, and, by the ſudden loſs of his patron (the Earl of Pembroke) his life was in jeopardy. Biſhop Laud, that great encourager of literature, having ſucceeded the Earl in the Chancellorſhip of Oxford, a way was found out, from Merton-College Statutes, to make Mr. Jacob Socius Grammaticus, that is, Reader of Philology to the Juniors, a place which had been diſuſed for about a hundred years. Being now completely ſettled in his Fellowſhip, he occaſionally reſided with Mr. Selden, and aſſiſted him as an amanuenſis, in one of the works which he was publiſhing; and which, we apprehend, muſt have been the "mare clauſum." Selden, in acknowledging his obligations, ſtiles him, "Doctiſſimus Henri- "cus Jacobus." It is even underſtood, that Jacob added ſeveral things to the book, which Mr. Selden, finding them to be very excellent, permitted to ſtand. Nay, it is ſaid, that Jacob improved Selden in the Hebrew language. In 1636, Mr. Jacob was created Maſter of Arts; and, in the month of June, 1641, he was elected Superior Beadle of Divinity. At the beginning of the November of the following year, he was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Phyſic:

"But

hath been lately publiſhed (e). Before we diſmiſs this article it will be proper to obſerve, that, as our author wrote altogether in Latin, ſo he is among the number of thoſe Britiſh writers better known abroad than in his own country (f). To this alſo the ſubjects on which he wrote did, without a doubt, contribute not a little, being ſince his death leſs the objects of young peoples ſtudies, or of the notice of the learned. But, as there ſeems to be a ſpirit of enquiry reviving, and as the Oriental Languages begin to be again conſidered, the bringing this Life (hitherto ſhamefully neglected) into a work of this ſort, will certainly be approved; as alſo the large accounts given of his writings in the notes. This we the rather hope, becauſe, though no Engliſh writer is better known by his performances through the Northern parts of Europe than Dr. Dickenſon, yet no foreigner has touched one circumſtance of his life, becauſe (his works being all publiſhed in his life-time) they had no opportunity of acquainting themſelves with his character: a thing carefully provided againſt on their ſide, no writer of ſuch eminence dying in any other country of Europe but immediate care is taken of his memory; of which, were it in this place proper, numerous inſtances might be produced.

(e) Annexed to an account of the life and writings of Edmund Dickinſon, M. D. Lond. 1739. 8vo.

(f) As appears by the authorities cited in the notes.

"But his head," ſays Anthony Wood, "being always "over-buſy about critical notions (which made him "ſometimes a little better than crazed), he neglect-"ed his duty ſo much, that he was ſuſpended once, "if not twice, from his place, and had his Beadle's "ſtaff taken from him." In conſequence of the turn of the times, and his attachment to Archbiſhop Laud, he ſoon became expoſed to other calamities. Sir Nathaniel Brent, Warden of Merton College, ſilenced Mr. Jacob as Philological Lecturer; and, at length, he was totally deprived of his Fellowſhip, by the Parliamentary viſitors. Being now deſtitute of a ſufficient maintenance, he retired to London, where Mr. Selden aſſiſted him, gave him his clothes, and, among the reſt, an old ſcarlet cloak, the wearing of which rendered poor Jacob an object of mirth to ſome of his acquaintance, who, when they ſaw it upon his back, uſed to call him "Young Selden." "But being," ſays Wood, "a ſhiftleſs perſon, as "moſt mere ſcholars are, and the benefactions of "friends not ſufficing him," he ſold a ſmall patrimony, which he had at Godmerſham, in Kent, to ſupply his neceſſities, and died before the money was ſpent. He had brought on a bad habit of body by his cloſe application to his ſtudies. In the month of September, 1652, he retired to the city of Canterbury, where he was kindly entertained by Dr. William Jacob, a noted Phyſician of that place; but who, though of the ſame name, was not related to our Author. By this Gentleman Henry Jacob was cured of a Gangrene in his foot, which aroſe from a neglected ſore or gall, that he had contracted by walking in boots, according to the faſhion of the time. A tumour, however, having ſoon after broken out from one of his legs, his radical moiſture did, as from a flood-gate, violently run forth; and thus an end was put to his life, on the fifth of November, in the year before mentioned. The next day Dr. Jacob buried him in a manner anſwerable to his quality, in the midſt of the pariſh-church of All-Saints, in Canterbury. Anthony Wood ſays, that Mr. Jacob died about the year of his age forty-four. But if the circumſtances of his hiſtory be carefully compared together, it will be found that he was probably not leſs than forty-ſix years old at the time of his deceaſe. As to his character, it appears that he was an innocent, harmleſs, careleſs man, who was entirely devoted to the purſuits of Literature, and totally ignorant of the world.

From the catalogue of Mr. Jacob's Writings here annexed, it will be evident that he was a perſon of uncommon erudition. "Oratio inauguralis, ſub "Aditu prælectionis Philologicæ publicè habita apud "Collegium Oxonio—Merton." 4 Aug. 1636.—"Græca et Latina Poemata."—"Deſcription of "Oakley-Hole, near Wells." An. 1632, written in Engliſh Verſe.—"Annotationes in eam Partem Ora-"tionis inaug. in qua dicitur, Oratione ſoluta ſcrip-"ſit Ariſtæus Proconneſius." Theſe four pieces were publiſhed at Oxford, while the Author lived, in 1552, in quarto, by his intimate friend, Henry Birkhead, Fellow of All Souls College.

Mr. Jacob's other works, which have never found their way to the preſs, excepting the "Delphi Phœ-"nicizantes," in the manner already deſcribed, were as follows: "Etymotechnia Catholica," containing four Diatribes concerning the Original of Letters. The firſt, "De Ordine Alphabeti;" the ſecond, "De "Tranſitu Alphabeti;" the third, "De Numero, Fi-"gura, Poteſtate et Diviſione Literarum;" and the fourth called, "Geographiſtor Etymotechnicus"—"Gram-"matica Ebræa." No Engliſhman before his time did ever endeavour to make one after that way and manner which he did this.—"ΣΒΩ, vel Oſiris inven-"tus; de Coptiatis Originibus Commentatio.—"Geographumena." In which are many Aſſyriac and Egyptic Antiquities diſcovered.—"Pancarpia, "Opus ex Artibus et Linguis miſcellan." Imperfect. "Magnetologia, in Lib. 3. agentibus de triplici "Motu Magnetico Lapidali, Cœleſti et Animali, "&c."—"De Mari rubro," and another, "De "Hiſtoria Beli et Draconis."—"Libri Ebræo Rabbi-"nici in Bib. Bodleiana recenſiti," An. 1629 (29).

Henry Jacob might juſtly be reckoned among the number of unfortunate learned men ſo often ſpoken of by Bayle. What little preferment he did obtain was procured with difficulty; he was not permitted to hold it long; he was in a great meaſure dependent upon benefactions for ſubſiſtence; his conſtitution was impaired by intenſe ſtudy; he died comparatively young; his learned labours were, in general, conſigned to oblivion; and, in the moſt eminent inſtance in which this was not the caſe, he was deprived, by the hand of impoſture, of the fair fame to which he was entitled.] K.

DIGBY (Sir EVERARD) was deſcended from a very antient and honourable family, diſtinguiſhed by the confidence, and honoured with many teſtimonies, of royal favour, by ſeveral of our Monarchs, as well for the eminent abilities of their mind, as for the gallant exploits performed by them in the field (a) [A]. His father Everard Digby, of Dryſtoke (1). This Sir Everard, by Jaquetta, daughter of Sir John Elſis, left iſſue ſix ſons, of whom the eldeſt, Sir Everard Digby, was the anceſtor of this family; as Simon Digby, the ſecond ſon, was of the Digbys of Coleſhill in Warwickſhire, now repreſented by the Earl Digby of Sherborne, in Dorſetſhire, formerly Lord Digby, Baron of Geaſhill in the kingdom of Ireland, whence, as the reader will ſee in the text, deſcended the Earls of Briſtol (2). This Sir Everard Digby

[A] for the gallant exploits performed by them in the field.] In order to do juſtice to this family it is requiſite to obſerve, that though the Digbys of Warwickſhire were, and are ſtill, noble, yet the Digbys of the county of Rutland were of the elder houſe, which appears thus: Sir Everard Digby of Tilton in the county of Leiceſter, to take the family no higher, though that might be done from record, was ſlain at Towton-field, fighting there on the ſide of Henry VI.

Dryſtoke in Rutlandſhire, Eſq. was a perſon of great worth and learning; had his education at St. John's College, in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts; and, though a man of an independent fortune (b), gave very ſignal marks of his inclination to, and his great ſucceſs in, his ſtudies [B]. This Gentleman, of whom we are ſpeaking, was born ſome time in the year 1581, and educated with great care, but under the tuition of ſome Popiſh Prieſts; for, when he was about eleven years of age, he had the misfortune to loſe his father, who, as he was a man of ſound knowledge, and extenſive capacity, would, very probably, have given him better impreſſions, and have taught him to act rather by the light of his own reaſon, than merely according to the dictates of thoſe, who, by having the care of him in his infancy, had aſſumed a deſpotic empire over his ſpirit. In reſpect to his parts, however, he was very far from being at all deficient, abating his blind zeal for Popery, and his ſervile ſubmiſſion to the Prieſts (c). In his perſon he was remarkably handſome, very expert in his exerciſes, extremely modeſt and affable in his behaviour, ſo that he was juſtly reputed one of the fineſt Gentlemen in England (d). He was brought very early to the Court of Queen Elizabeth, where he was much taken notice of, and received ſeveral marks of her Majeſty's favour. On the coming in of King James he went likewiſe to pay his duty, as others of his religion did, was very graciouſly received, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, being looked upon as a man of a fair fortune, pregnant abilities, and a court-like behaviour (e). Theſe accompliſhments, aſſiſted by the influence of the Prieſts, who were perfectly ſatisfied, that, in purſuing his intereſt, they conſulted their own, procured his marriage to Mary, daughter and ſole heireſs of William Mulſho, Eſq; of Gothurſt in Buckinghamſhire, with whom he had a great fortune (f); which gave occaſion for his ſettlement of that, and of his own eſtate, upon the children of that marriage (g). One would have imagined, that, conſidering his mild temper, and happy ſituation in the world, he might have paſſed his days in honour and peace, without running the ſmalleſt hazard of meeting that dreadful and diſgraceful death, which has introduced his name into all our hiſtories. It happened, however, unfortunately for him, that, having a great acquaintance with Sir Thomas Treſham, a very active and zealous Papiſt, he poſſeſſed his mind with ſuch diſaffection to his Prince, ſuch falſe notions of the ill uſage that thoſe who ſtiled themſelves Catholicks had met with, and ſuch apprehenſions of ſtill greater miſchiefs ready to befal them, that he was ripe to receive any counſels that ſhould be given him, for redreſſing theſe pretended grievances, and preventing thoſe threatened evils, of how dangerous and deſperate a nature ſoever they might be (h) [C]. His intimate friendſhip with Robert Cateſby, Eſq. proved the means of his being drawn in to act againſt that government, towards which he had ſo long borne the utmoſt diſlike. This Mr. Cateſby was a man of determined courage, as well as great parts: he had been, for ſeveral years, very deep in all the plots formed by the Jeſuits; and, notwithſtanding that which had miſcarried in the beginning of this reign, he ventured to frame a new one in his own mind, which he communicated only to a few of his intimate friends, in the cloſe of the year 1604 (i); and this was, blowing up the Parliament-houſe with gunpowder. When they had taken all the methods for putting this abominable ſcheme in execution, they began to reflect, that they could make no uſe even of their ſucceſs, if they did not provide, at the ſame time, for an inſurrection, and the eſtabliſhment of a new government. It was therefore, upon mature deliberation, agreed by the confederates, at a meeting they held in the city of Bath, that Mr. Cateſby ſhould take in to their aſſiſtance whom he ſhould think fit, provided they were bound by the oath of ſecrecy which themſelves had taken (k). In purſuance of this reſolution, Mr. Cateſby applied himſelf to his friend Sir Everard Digby, whom he acquainted with the whole affair, and with their reſolution of ſeizing the Princeſs Elizabeth, and proclaiming her Queen, upon the execution of the Powder-treaſon at London; in which his aſſiſtance was particularly neceſſary, as ſhe was then at the Lord Harrington's, at Comb-Abbey, in Warwickſhire (l). To this Sir Everard willingly aſſented, and offered fifteen hundred pounds towards defraying the expences of this dark deſign, entertained Mr. Fawkes afterwards at his houſe (m), and, the weather being rainy, adviſed him, upon his return to London, to be very careful in obſerving that the powder was not damp. So induſtrious and indefatigable he was, that, when the reſt of the conſpirators, upon the diſcovery of their deſign, at the very point of execution, fled down into the country, they found him at Dunchurch, as had been concerted; and, in company with him, they retired towards Staffordſhire, where, after a deſperate defence, in which ſome of theſe unhappy men were ſlain (n) [D], Sir Everard Digby, and others, were taken (o). Upon the commitment of Sir Everard to the Tower, he perſiſted ſteadily to maintain his own innocence as to the Powder-treaſon, and abſolutely denied his having knowledge of any other perſons being embarked in this deſign, than ſuch as were either killed or taken; in which, notwithſtanding all the arguments that could be uſed by thoſe noble perſons before whom he was examined, he continued obſtinately firm (p). This reſolution of his did not proceed from any hopes of eſcaping, but from an earneſt deſire of avoiding, if poſſible, being the inſtrument of other men's ruin, or diſcloſing more than was already diſcovered, being ſtill ſatisfied that he was engaged in a good cauſe, and having much leſs concern about his life, than about the bad effects to that cauſe which the detection of this plot might produce (q). This, which is the ſtrongeſt proof of the infatuation that may be brought upon minds naturally virtuous, appears fully from a [D] In which ſome of theſe unhappy men were ſlain.] In this note we will give the reader a ſuccinct account of the proceedings of the conſpirators in town and country, which will ſhew how perfectly they had concerted their meaſures, and how punctual they were in executing each the part that had been aſſigned him. The 4th of November fell that year upon a Sunday, and it was paſt twelve at night when ſearch was made under the Parliament-houſe, and Mr. Guy Fawkes ſeized there booted and ſpurred (10). Mr. Piercy had early notice of this, and ſet out of town about four in the morning. Mr. Cateſby was gone the night before. Mr. Winter and the two Wrights ſoon followed (11). We come now to another part of the conſpiracy, ſtill ſtranger than any of the reſt, which is this: there was one John Grant, Eſq. a zealous Papiſt, who lived near Warwick; who, having collected ſeveral perſons of his own principles, and determined courage, they went on Monday-night, about the very time that Fawkes was ſeized in London, broke open the ſtables of one Mr. Bennock, at Warwick, who made it his buſineſs to break horſes for the menage, and took thoſe of ſeveral gentlemen that were in his hands, and coming well-armed, and being now well-mounted, made the beſt of their way to Dunchurch, where they found Sir Everard Digby and his party ready (12); and, on Wedneſday, the 7th of November, being joined by their accomplices from London, and knowing all their hopes had failed them there, they reſolved, as their laſt reſource, openly to take up arms; and father Teſmond, alias Greenwell, a Jeſuit, went into Lancaſhire to excite thoſe of their religion to join them (13). They had flattered themſelves with a great appearance in their favour; but they could never aſſemble above fourſcore, nor could they depend upon many of thoſe, or even upon their own ſervants (14). Sir Fulk Grevil, Deputy-Lieutenant, though an old and infirm man, ſeized the horſes and arms of ſeveral gentlemen in his neighbourhood in Warwickſhire, and made about fifteen of their followers priſoners (15). Sir Richard Verney, High-Sheriff of the county, likewiſe took ſome of them (16). On Thurſday they were at Robert Winter's houſe, where they had abſolution given them by Father Hammond, though in open rebellion (17). They were purſued through Worceſterſhire by Sir Richard Walſh, which forced them to take ſhelter at Holbitch, the ſeat of Stephen Lyttleton, in Staffordſhire, where Sir Richard, who was Sheriff of Worceſterſhire, with the people who came in to his aſſiſtance, ſurrounded them (18). He ſent a trumpet to ſummon them to ſurrender, promiſing to intercede with the King to ſpare their lives, for as yet they had no notice of the Powder Treaſon; but the conſpirators rejected this offer with contempt, and prepared to defend themſelves as well as they could. This was on the Friday; and finding their powder damp, they placed a ſmall parcel in a pan before the fire, upon a bag which held ſeventeen or eighteen pounds. A ſervant, who knew nothing of this, throwing ſome wood upon the fire, a ſpark flew out into the pan, which blew up all the powder, together with the roof of the houſe, and at the ſame time wounded Cateſby, Rookwood, and Grant (19). About eleven o'clock the Sheriff, and thoſe with him, attacked the houſe, when Thomas Winter was ſhot in the ſhoulder, both the Wrights were killed, Ambroſe Rookwood ſoon fell after: then as Winter, Cateſby, and Piercy, were ſtanding together, the two laſt were ſhot through by the ſame ball. Winter, being hurt in the belly by a pike, was taken (20), and upon this the reſt ſubmitted and were ſent up to London, excepting Robert Winter and Stephen Lyttleton, who for ſome weeks hid themſelves (21). Francis Treſham ſtayed in town, and for ſome time preſerved his liberty, but was at length ſeized, and made an ample confeſſion, but finding himſelf in a dying condition with the ſtrangury, denied again what he had ſaid, that it might be of no uſe (22).

[C] And deſperate a nature ſoever they might be] It is very remarkable, that the far greateſt part of the perſons embarked in this treaſon were Gentlemen of family and fortune. Robert Cateſby, Eſq. was a Gentleman of an antient family, whoſe anceſtor was a Privy-Counſellor and favourite to Richard III. Ambroſe Rookwood, and Francis Treſham, Eſquires, were men of large eſtates, and the latter undertook to advance two thouſand pounds upon this occaſion. Mr. Thomas Piercy was related to the Earl of Northumberland, and the King's ſervant: in ſhort, except Robert Keys, who had ſpent his fortune, and Thomas Bates, who was Mr. Cateſby's man, they were all perſons in ſuch circumſtances, as nothing but their furious zeal could have driven into ſuch a conſpiracy (6). The means by which Sir Everard Digby was wrought upon, himſelf affirmed to be theſe; Firſt, he was told that the King had broken his promiſes to the Catholicks; for which, however there was no foundation, ſince Watſon the Prieſt, who was executed in the firſt year of the King for treaſon, confeſſed, that having had acceſs to his Majeſty at Edinburgh twice, he told him plainly what thoſe of his religion had to expect, and this put him upon plotting againſt him. Mr. Piercy, a principal inſtrument in this conſpiracy, went likewiſe into Scotland upon the ſame errand, and had the like anſwer. He was next told, that ſeverer laws againſt Popery would be made in the next Parliament: that huſbands would be made liable for their wives offences; and that it would be made a præmunire only to be a Catholick. But the main point was, that the reſtoring of the Catholick religion was the duty of every member, and that, in conſideration of this, he was not to regard any favours received from the Crown, the tranquillity of his country, or the hazards that might be run in reſpect to his life, his family, or his fortune (7). All this himſelf, and very probably many of his companions, believed, or otherwiſe it is not eaſy to account for their involving themſelves in ſuch a ſeries of dangers, or for their adhering to each other with ſuch fidelity, that, in the courſe of ſeveral years intrigue, there was nothing divulged (8). But what is yet a ſtronger, and indeed an invincible proof, that it was a miſtaken notion of religion which guided them throughout, was the exceeding care they took to the very laſt, to prevent thoſe Prieſts from coming into any trouble by their means, who had brought all this deſtruction upon themſelves, for attaining which they ſcrupled nothing: Sir Everard Digby valuing himſelf in his private papers, upon affirming falſehoods to the Lords for this purpoſe; and Francis Treſham taking it upon his death, that he had not for ſeveral years ſeen father Garnet, upon account of a difference between them, the direct contrary of which was afterwards confeſſed by Garnet himſelf (9).

paper of his, written under his confinement, and ſent privately to his family [E]. When he was brought to his trial at Weſtminſter, January 27th, 1605-6, he was indicted for being acquainted with and concealing the Powder-treaſon, taking the double oath of Secrecy and Conſtancy, and acting openly, with other traitors, in rebellion; to which indictment he pleaded guilty (r). After this he endeavoured to extenuate his offence, by ſhewing the motives to it, which have been before explained; then requeſted, that, as he had been alone in the crime, he might alone bear the puniſhment, without extending it to his family, that his debts might be paid, and that he might be beheaded; to which he received no favourable anſwer (s). Yet the Earls of Northampton and Saliſbury, of whom the latter owned him for his relation, ſpoke mildly to him, and ſhewed him how very little ſervice his behaviour had done him, ſince Fawkes confeſſed, that he was acquainted with the Powder-treaſon; and many other things which he had laboured to conceal, were, by other means, found out (t). But, whatever he might ſay in his examinations, certain it is, that, upon his having ſome notice of its being thought, by his own party, a very wild and ill-concerted enterprize, in which he engaged, he could write a very clear defence againſt this imputation, though he refuſed to make any when his life was at ſtake; ſo much more did he fear reproach amongſt thoſe of his own communion, than a violent and ignominious death [F]. Yet, after ſentence of death was paſſed,

[E] And ſent privately to his family.] While Sir Everard Digby was priſoner in the Tower, he wrote in juice of lemon or otherwiſe, upon ſlips of paper, as opportunity offered; and got theſe conveyed to his Lady, by ſuch as had permiſſion to ſee him. Theſe notes, or advertiſements, were preſerved by the family as precious relicks, till, in the month of September, 1675, they were found at the houſe of Charles Cornwallis, Eſq. executor to Sir Kenelme the ſon of Sir Everard Digby, by Sir Rice Rudd, Baronet, and William Wogan, of Gray's Inn, Eſq. (23). The firſt of theſe papers runs thus:

(23) Annexed to the Proceedings againſt the Traitors, and other pieces relating to the Popiſh Plot, printed by the orders of Mr. Secretary Coventry, dated Dec. 12, 1678. No. 1.

'I have not named any, either living or dead, that 'ſhould have hurt my Lord Saliſbury, and only intended theſe general informations, to procure me acceſs of ſome friend, that I might inform my knowledge, for I never intended to hurt any creature, though it would have gained me all the world. As yet they have not got of me the affirming that I know any Prieſt particularly, nor ſhall ever do to the hurt of any but myſelf. At my firſt examination the Earl of Saliſbury told me, that ſome things ſhould be affirmed againſt me by Gerrat the Prieſt, who, ſaith he, I am ſure you know well. My anſwer was, if I might ſee him I would tell him whether I knew him or no, but by that name I did not know him; nor at Mrs. Vauxe's, as he ſaid I did, for I never ſaw a Prieſt there. Yeſterday I was before Mr. Attorney and my Lord Chief-Juſtice, who aſked me if I had taken the ſacrament to keep ſecret the plot as others did? I ſaid that I had not, becauſe I would avoid the queſtion of at whoſe hands it were. They told me that five had taken it of Gerard, and that he knew of the plot, which I ſaid was more than I knew.

'Now for my intention, let me tell you, that if I had thought there had been the leaſt ſin in the plot, I would not have been of it for all the world; and no other cauſe drew me to hazard my fortune and life, but zeal to God's religion. For my keeping it ſecret it was cauſed by certain belief, that thoſe which were beſt able to judge of the lawfulneſs of it, had been acquainted with it, and given way unto it. More reaſons I had to perſuade me to this belief than I dare utter, which I will never to the ſuſpicion of any, though I ſhould to the rack for it, and as I did not know it directly that it was approved by ſuch, ſo did I hold it in my conſcience the beſt not to know any more if I might.

'I have, before all the Lords, cleared all the Prieſts in it for any thing that I know. But now let me tell you what a grief it hath been to me, to hear that ſo much condemned, which I did believe would have been otherwiſe thought on by Catholicks. There is no other cauſe but this which hath made me deſire life, for when I came into priſon death would have been a welcome friend unto me, and was moſt deſired; but when I heard how Catholicks and Prieſts thought of the matter, and that it ſhould be a great ſin that ſhould be the cauſe of my end, it called my conſcience in doubt of my very beſt actions and intentions in queſtion; for I knew that myſelf might eaſily be deceived in ſuch a buſineſs; therefore I proteſt unto you, that the doubts I had of my own good ſtate, which only proceeded from the cenſure of others, cauſed more bitterneſs of grief in me than all the miſeries that ever I ſuffered; and only this cauſed me to wiſh life, till I might meet with a ghoſtly friend. For ſome good ſpace I could do nothing but with tears aſk pardon at God's hands for all my errors, both in actions and intentions, in this buſineſs, and in my whole life, which the cenſure of this, contrary to my expectance, cauſed me to doubt. I did humbly beſeech that my death might ſatisfy for my offence, which I ſhould and ſhall offer moſt gladly to the giver of my life. I aſſure you, as I hope in God, that the love of all my eſtate and worldly happineſs did never trouble me, nor the love of it ſince my impriſonment did ever move me to wiſh life. But if that I may live to make ſatisfaction to God and the world, where I have given any ſcandal, I ſhall not grieve if I ſhould never look living creature in the face again. And beſides that deprivations endure all worldly miſery, I ſhall not need to clear any living body either private or publick; for I never named any body, but reported that thoſe that are dead did promiſe that all forces in thoſe parts about Mr. Talbot would aſſiſt us; but this can hurt nothing, for they openly ſpoke it. You muſt be careful how you ſend, for Mr. Lieutenant hath ſtayed the * book, but take no notice of it. Let my brother ſee this, or know the contents: tell him I love his ſweet comforts as my greateſt jewel in this place. If I can I will convey in the tables a copy of a letter which I ſent yeſterday. It is, as near as I can underſtand, the meaning of the inſtruction: I perceive it works with the Lords, for I ſhall be ſent to them. Oh how full of joy ſhould I die, if I could do any thing for the cauſe which I love more than my life. Farewell my ——.'

[F] Than a violent and ignominious death.] This, which is the laſt of Sir Everard's papers, is alſo the moſt material, and muſt appear, to every impartial reader, an inconteſtible proof of what the Attorney-General Coke affirmed at the trial of theſe conſpirators; that their ſcheme was no more than an appendix to the plots framed by their party in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and, in a great meaſure, an improvement upon the ſcheme of Watſon and Clarke on King James's coming to the throne: it runs thus (24).

'My deareſt, the  I take at the uncharitable taking of theſe matters, will make me ſay more than ever I thought to have done. For, if this deſign had taken place, there could have been no doubt of other ſucceſs: for that night, before any other could have brought the news, we ſhould have known it by Mr. Cateſby, who ſhould have proclaimed the heir-apparent at Charing-Croſs, as he came out of town; to which purpoſe there was a proclamation drawn. If the Duke had not been in the Houſe, then was there a certain way laid for the paſſed, he ſeemed to be very much affected; for, making a low bow to thoſe upon the bench, he ſaid, If I could hear any of your Lordſhips ſay you forgave me, I ſhould go the more chearfully to the gallows. To this all the Lords anſwered, God forgive you, and we do (u). On Thurſday the 30th of January Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, were executed, purſuant to their ſentence, at the weſt-end of St. Paul's church, when Sir Everard is ſaid to have expreſſed a very different ſenſe of his crime from that which he had written concerning it after his confinement (x). But of this, and of a much more extraordinary circumſtance attending his tragical departure out of this life, ſome notice will be taken in the notes [G]. He left at his death two young

'poſſeſſing him; but, in regard of the aſſurance they 'ſhould have been there, therefore the greateſt of our 'buſineſs ſtood in the poſſeſſing the Lady Elizabeth, 'who, lying within eight miles of Dunchurch, we 'would have eaſily ſurprized before the knowled e of 'any doubt, this was the cauſe of my being there. If 'ſhe had been in Rutland, then Stoaks was near; and, 'in either place, we had taken ſufficient order to have 'been poſſeſſed of her. There were alſo courſes taken 'for the ſatisfying the people if the firſt had taken 'effect; as the ſpeedy notice of liberty and freedom 'from all manner of ſlavery, as the ceaſing of ward-'ſhips and all monopolies, which, with change, would 'have been more plauſible to the people if the firſt 'had been, than it is now. There was alſo a courſe 'taken to have given preſent notice to all Princes, and 'to aſſociate them with an oath anſwerable to the 'League in France. I have not uttered any of theſe 'things, nor ever thought to do. For my going from 'Dunchurch I had this reaſon: firſt, I knew that 'Fawkes could reveal me, for I muſt make choice of 'two beſides M. Cateſby, which I did of him and 'Mr. Winter. I knew he had been employed in great 'matters, and, till torture, ſure he carried it very 'well: ſecondly, we all thought, if we could procure 'Mr. Talbot to rife that  party at 'leaſt, to a compoſition * that was 'not little becauſe we had in our company his ſon-in-'law, who gave us ſome hope of, and did not much 'doubt of it. I do anſwer your ſpeech with Mr. 'Brown thus: Before that I knew any thing of the 'plot, I did aſk Mr. Farmer what the meaning of the 'Pope's brief was: he told me, that they were not '(meaning Prieſts) to undertake or procure ſtirs, but 'yet they would not hinder any, neither was it the 'Pope's mind they ſhould, that ſhould be undertaken 'for Catholick good. I did never utter thus much, 'nor would not but to you; and this anſwer, with 'Mr. Cateſby's proceedings with him and me, gave me 'abſolute belief that the matter in general was ap-'proved, though every particular was not known. I 'dare not take that courſe that I could to make it 'appear leſs odious, for divers were to have been 'brought out of the danger, which now would rather 'hurt them than otherwiſe. I do not think there 'would have been three worth ſaving that ſhould have 'been loſt. You may gueſs that I had ſome friends 'that were in danger, which I had prevented; but 'they ſhall never know it. I will do as much as my 'partner wiſheth; and it will then appear, that I have 'not hurt or accuſed one man; and howſoever I might, 'in general, poſſeſs them with fear, in hope to do the 'cauſe good, yet my care was ever to loſe my own 'life rather than hurt the unworthieſt member of the 'Catholick Church. Tell her, I have ever loved her 'and her houſe, and, though I could never ſhew it, 'I will not live to manifeſt the contrary. Her God 'I hope will remember me, who I am, in temporal re-'ſpects, indebted to: your ſiſter ſalute from me, whoſe 'noble mind to me, in this miſery, I will never '* my Lord of Arundel may do much 'with the Lord and the Queen. One that you write 'of, which dearly loveth him, and is dearly loved of 'him again, can tell him that I love him, and did 'manifeſt it in his ſight, and he might have found it: 'laſt time as I ſaw him was in his company, as I think. 'I am ſure when this was, he was there. If your 'mother were in town, you ſhould do it, to  'her. Farewell, and where you cannot underſtand, 'ſend to me by your next, and I will explain.'

[G] Some notice will be taken in the notes.] We have a pretty full account of the manner in which Sir Everard and his accomplices finiſhed their days; and that too penned within a very ſhort time after it happened: it runs thus (25). 'Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Grant, and Bates, according to their 'judgment, were drawn, hanged, and quartered, at 'the weſt-end of St. Paul's Church, in London, where 'all but Grant died very penitent. Sir Everard Digby 'proteſted, from the bottom of his heart, he aſked 'forgiveneſs of God, the King, the Queen, the Prince, 'and all the Parliament; and, if that he had known 'it at firſt to have been ſo foul a treaſon, he would 'not have concealed it to have gained a world; re-'quiring the people to witneſs he died penitent and 'ſorrowful for this vile treaſon and confident to be 'ſaved in the merits of his ſweet Saviour Jeſus, &c. 'He prayed kneeling about half a quarter of an hour, 'often bowing his head to the ground: in the ſame 'manner they all prayed, but no voice heard ſaving 'now and then, O Jeſu, Jeſu, ſave me, and keep me, '&c. Which words they repeated many times upon 'the ladder. Friday, the laſt of January, in the Par-'liament-Yard at Weſtminſter, were executed, as the 'former, Thomas Winter, Rookwood, Keyes, and 'Fawkes; which Fawkes, at his death, was more pe-'nitent than any of the reſt, and beſought all Catho-'licks never to attempt any ſuch bloody act, being 'a courſe which God did never favour nor proſper. 'Keyes, in obſtinacy, cohered much with Grant: 'they all craved teſtimony that they died Roman Ca-'tholicks; their quarters were placed over London 'gates, and their heads upon the Bridge.' It is very ſtrange, that no notice at all ſhould be taken, in this account, of that extraordinary circumſtance which Mr. Wood mentions as a thing generally known (26): That, when the executioner plucked out his heart, and, according to the manner, held it up, ſaying, Here is the heart of a traytor, Sir Everard made anſwer, Thou lieſt. This, continues Mr Wood, a moſt famous author mentions, but tells us not his name. This famous author is the Lord Bacon (27), and the paſſage referred to is this. 'We ourſelves indeed remember to have 'ſeen the heart of a man who was embowelled, ac-'cording to the cuſtom amongſt us in the execution of 'traytors, which, being thrown into the fire, as is 'uſual, ſprung up at firſt ſix foot high, and continued 'leaping gradually lower and lower between ſeven and 'eight minutes, as far as our memory reaches. There 'is alſo an old and credible tradition, of an ox that 'lowed after it was embowelled. But it is more cer-'tain that a man, who ſuffered in the manner we have 'before mentioned, his entrails being taken out, and 'his heart almoſt torn away, and in the hands of the 'hangman, was heard to utter three or four words of 'a prayer, which, we ſay, is more credible than what 'is reported of the ſacrifice, becauſe the friends of 'ſuch criminals are wont to give money to the execu-'tioner, that he may be the quicker in performing his 'work, and the ſooner put them out of their pain; 'whereas, in ſacrifices, we ſee no cauſe why the 'Prieſts ſhould uſe ſuch extraordinary diligence.' This proves no more than the poſſibility of ſuch a thing in Lord Bacon's opinion, but cannot be properly applied as a proof to this particular fact, from which, in all its circumſtances, it manifeſtly differs.  [This article exhibits one of the moſt curious and ſtriking inſtances that hiſtory affords of the power of bigotry and ſuperſtition over the human mind. Such was the ſubjugation of Sir Everard Digby's underſtanding and feelings to his religious principles, and the intereſt of the Church to which he was devoted, that he had no conception of there being the leaſt ſin in his young ſons, who were afterwards Sir Kenelme Digby and Sir John Digby, and expreſſed his affection towards them by a well-written and pathetic paper, which he deſired might be communicated to them at a fit time, as the laſt advice of their father. We ſhall take occaſion, in another place, to ſhew how the Powder-treaſon was really diſcovered, and by whom. At preſent it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that even this ſecond part of the deſign, in which Sir Everard Digby was to have acted, was likewiſe timely diſcovered; and, as the plot proved the ruin of Sir Everard, ſo that diſcovery was the riſe of his relation. For the Lord Harrington, who had the care of the Princeſs Elizabeth, having received ſome intimation of an intention to ſeize her, immediately ſent up John Digby, a younger ſon of Sir George Digby, to Court, with an account of all he knew; where the young Gentleman told his tale ſo well, as to acquire thereby the King's good graces, who, not long after, knighted him (y), employed him in a long negotiation in Spain, and, September 15th, 1622, created him Earl of Briſtol. His ſon was the famous George Lord Digby, who, while he bore that title, made ſo great a figure in the Houſe of Commons, was Secretary of State afterwards to King Charles I. and, ſucceeding to his father's title, attended King Charles the Second in his exile, was inſtalled Knight of the Garter in the month of April, 1661, and made a great figure throughout that reign. He was ſucceeded by his ſon John, who died in 1698, without iſſue, in whom the title became extinct, his younger brother Francis being killed in the Dutch war (z).

DIGBY (Sir KENELME) the ſon of the former, and a very famous Philoſopher in the XVIIth century. It is extremely difficult to fix the time of his birth, there being authorities for three different days; but the 11th of June, 1603, ſeems to have been generally received (a). It is ſaid, that King James reſtored his eſtate to him in his infancy (b); which, however, is a miſtake, ſince it was decided at law, that the King had no title to it. Both theſe points ſhall be cle ard up in the notes [A]. At the time of his father's unfor-

[A] Shall be cleared up in the notes.] The famous Antiquary of Oxford is clear and poſitive, that the birth of this gentleman ought to be fixed to the 11th of July 1603 (1), in ſupport of which he quotes two authorities that have very great weight with him, but not altogether ſo great with me (2). As to Dr. Napier of Buckinghamſhire, his work is written in a very bad hand; and I could give more inſtances than one, of nativities in his book that diſagree with the pariſh regiſters of perſons to whom they belong; and therefore an entry therein ought not to be looked upon as deciſive. Again, as to Mr. Gadbury, there is great probability that his date was borrowed from Dr. Napier's book; and if it was not, the ſame exceptions lie againſt it as have been urged againſt that. In the life-time of Sir Kenelme there is no doubt that the 11th of June was taken to be his birth-day. The famous Ben Jonſon, in a copy of verſes to his honour, ſpeaking of a ſea-fight his engaging in a conſpiracy of the moſt execrable nature, and which involved in it an aſtoniſhing complication of murder. It appears, too, that he was ſurprized and grieved to the laſt degree, that the plot ſhould be condemned by any Catholick. Nor was he ſingular in theſe ſentiments. The other perſons who were concerned in the conſpiracy gloried in the deſign, and they were moſt of them men of family, eſtate, and character. Mr. Hume's obſervations on the ſubject are worthy of being recited: "Neither," ſays he, "had the deſperate fortune of the conſpirators urged "them to this enterprize, nor had the former profli-"gacy of their lives prepared them for ſo great a "crime. Before that audacious attempt, their con-"duct ſeems, in general, liable to no reproach. "Cateſby's character had entitled him to ſuch regard, "that Rookwood and Digby were ſeduced by their "implicit truſt in his judgment; and they declared, "that, from the motive alone of friendſhip to him, "they were ready, on any occaſion, to have ſacrificed "their lives. Digby himſelf was as highly eſteemed "and beloved as any man in England; and he had "been particularly honoured with the good opinion of "Queen Elizabeth. It was bigoted zeal alone, the "moſt abſurd of prejudices maſqued with reaſon, the "moſt criminal of paſſions covered with the appear-"ance of duty, which ſeduced them into meaſures "that were fatal to themſelves, and had ſo nearly "proved fatal to their country (28)."

Dr. Campbell hath ſaid, in the text, that he ſhall take occaſion, in another place, to ſhew how the powder-treaſon was really diſcovered, and by whom; and, in the former edition, a reference was made to the article of Thomas Habington, in this Dictionary. But, in the courſe of the work, no ſuch article was given; nor do we think that the omiſſion is blamable. We cannot, however, help remarking, that it hath always appeared to us ſomewhat extraordinary, that the diſcovery of the plot ſhould ſolely be owing to the uncommon ſagacity of King James, in penetrating the hidden meaning of the letter to Lord Monteagle. Indeed, it muſt have been no ſmall degree of acuteneſs which could collect, from that letter alone, the particular nature and object of the conſpiracy, and the preciſe mode of carrying it into execution. James's flatterers, we are told, did not ſcruple to ſay, that he could never have diſcovered the myſtery without the immediate aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt. But the inſpiration of that Monarch will form no part of the creed of the preſent day. The fact ſeems to be, that Government had previous intimation of the plot. Welwood, in his Memoirs, aſſerts, that it was made known to the Engliſh Court by Henry the Fourth of France; and that Monſ. Sully was the perſon who, by commiſſion from his Royal Maſter, communicated the intelligence. It is certain, that about that time he was the French King's Embaſſador in England. There is other evidence, that the diſcovery of the deſign preceded Lord Monteagle's application to the Earl of Saliſbury. Cecil acknowledges, in a letter to Cornwallis, that he had intimation of ſome plot in hand. He mentions, likewiſe, that the whole affair was diſcovered before the letter to Lord Monteagle was communicated to James (29). At the ſame time, it might be wiſe to conceal the true ſource of information; and courtiers were glad of the opportunity of paying that tribute of flattery to the King which was ſo agreeable to the vanity of his character, and ſo congenial to the ſervile ſpirit of the age. We may add, that the Earl of Saliſbury expreſsly aſcribes the developement of the letter to Lord Monteagle, as referring to Gunpowder, to himſelf and the Lord Chamberlain (the Earl of Suffolk), in conjunction. If intelligence of a conſpiracy was communicated by Henry the Fourth of France, he might not know the particular manner in which it was to be executed] K.

unfortunate death he was with his mother at Gothurſt, being then but in the third year of his age. He ſeems to have been taken early out of her hands, ſince it is certain that he renounced the errors of Popery very young, and was carefully bred in the Proteſtant Religion; chiefly, as there is good reaſon to believe, under the direction of Archbiſhop Laud (c), then Dean of Glouceſter, who had a very great affection for him, and who had reclaimed a near relation of his from Popery (d). In 1618, Mr. Kenelme Digby was ſent to the Univerſity, and entered of Glouceſter-Hall (e), where the direction of his ſtudies was committed to Mr. Thomas Allen, one of the moſt learned and able men of thoſe times (f); though he had another member of that ſociety for his tutor. His being recommended to Mr. Allen was a great advantage to our young ſtudent; for Mr. Allen quickly diſcerned the natural ſtrength of his faculties, and that ſpirit of penetration which is ſo ſeldom met with in perſons of his age. He took pains, therefore, to ſhew him the right method of applying his wonderful capacity, which he frequently compared to that of the ſo-much-celebrated wit of Italy, Picus de Mirandula (g), to the ſublimer parts of Philoſophy; ſo that notwithſtanding his ſtay at Oxford was but between two and three years, yet, upon his leaving that Univerſity, in 1621, in order to travel, he was conſidered as a very extraordinary perſon, and ſuch high expectations of him raiſed as he lived afterwards to fulfil (h). Having made the tour of France, Spain, and Italy, and having been in all places remarkably well received, he returned to England in 1623; and being preſented to the King, at the Lord Mountague's houſe at Hinchinbroke, on the 23d of October, the ſame year, with high commendations of his learning, he there received the honour of knighthood in the preſence of Charles Prince of Wales and the famous Duke of Buckingham, then juſt returned out of Spain, where Mr. Digby had attended on his Royal Highneſs, as himſelf informs us (i). In a very ſhort time after Sir K. Digby rendered himſelf very remarkable, by the happy application of a ſecret which he met with in his travels, as to which we will, from his own authority, inform the reader fully in the notes [B]. (3) In his Underwoods, p. 243.

Theſe two verſes indeed do more honour to the hero than the Poet; but a man muſt have a ſtrange opinion of Johnſon's judgment, to believe he would falſify a date for the ſake of ſuch poetry. Mr. Wood indeed ſays, and very truly, that this action was not upon the 11th but upon the 16th of June (4), which is indeed a proof that the Poet miſtook the date of the battle, but not at all that he miſſed that of the birth-day, for ſixteenth would have run as well, at leaſt no worſe, than eleventh. After Sir Kenelme's death, we find the very ſame day, I mean the eleventh of June, fixed upon in his epitaph (5) and therefore it ſeems to have been the true date. In the fourth edition of Bayle's Dictionary (6), and in all the late editions of Moreri (7), there is an article of our Author, in which the day of his birth and of his death is ſaid to be the eleventh of March, but whence this date was borrowed it is impoſſible to conceive, becauſe I know not of any writer that has fixed either his death or his birth upon that day. But enough of this; let us now ſpeak of the eſtate of the family. The diſpute about it was determined in the Court of Wards, in Michaelmas term, the eighth of King James, that is, in 1610, and in what manner the reader ſhall learn from the beſt authority (8). 'Sir Everard Digby, ſeized in fee of the 'manor of Stoke in the county of Rutland, and of the 'manor of Tilton in the county of Leiceſter, held '(by way of admittance) of the King, by Knights 'ſervice in capite, by act executed in his life-time, 'and before any treaſon by him committed, conveyed 'the ſaid manors to the uſe of himſelf for life, and af'terwards to the uſe of his eldeſt ſon and heir apparent 'in tail, with divers remainders over to his other iſ'ſues. And afterwards the ſaid Sir Everard Digby 'was attainted and executed, for the heinous and hor'rible Powder-treaſon, committed after the ſaid con'veyance, his eldeſt ſon being then within age. 'The queſtion was, Whether the wardſhip of the 'body, or of the third part of the ſaid manors, ſhould 'be to the King by force of the ſtatutes of 32 and 34 'H. VIII? And it was reſolved by the two Chief-'Juſtices, the Chief Baron, and the whole Court of 'Wards, that the King ſhall never have wardſhip or 'primer-ſeiſin, but where there is an heir general or 'ſpecial. For the ſaid ſtatutes of 32 and 34 H. VIII. 'give wardſhip or primer-ſeiſin to the King, in divers 'caſes where there is no deſcent; as if the King's te'nant conveys his land for the advancement of his 'wife, preferment of his children, or payment of his 'debts, but doth not give wardſhip or primer-ſeiſin 'in any caſe, where there is not any heir general or 'ſpecial, becauſe wardſhip or primer-ſeiſin ought to 'be of the land of ſome anceſtor who has an heir.' Thus it appears that a certain writer was miſtaken in affirming, that, at the requeſt of his Queen, King Charles I. reſtored Sir Kenelme Digby to the large eſtate of his anceſtors (9). His father had taken due care in this reſpect, and it ſeems was very well adviſed (10), yet he died under great concern even as to that point; for diſcovering, when it was too late, the univerſal odium attending the Popiſh-powder-plot, and fearing this might prejudice even Courts of juſtice, or excite the Parliament in ſo very extraordinary a caſe, to make ſome law ex poſt facto, for increaſing the puniſhment of ſuch as were concerned in it, he not only doubted, but ſeems to have died under a perſuaſion, that his eſtate would be confiſcated (11).

[B] In the notes.] This ſecret of his was that which has ſince made ſo much noiſe in the world, under the title of the Sympathetic Powder, the virtues of which were, as he aſſures us, thoroughly enquired into by King James, his ſon the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Buckingham, with other perſons of the higheſt diſtinction, and all was regiſtered among the obſervations of the great Chancellor Bacon, to add, by way of Appendix, to his Natural Hiſtory (12). The matter of fact on which this was grounded, take in his own words: 'Mr. James Howell, well known for his pub'lick works, and particularly his Dendrologies, endea'vouring to part two of his friends engaged in a duel, 'ſeized, with his left hand, the hilt of the ſword of 'one of the combatants, and with his right hand laid 'hold of the blade of the other. They, being tranſ'ported with fury one againſt the other, ſtruggled to 'rid themſelves of the hindrance their friend made, 'that they ſhould not kill one another; and one of 'them roughly drawing the blade of his ſword, cut, to 'the very bone, the nerves and muſcles of Mr. How'ell's hand; and then the other, diſengaging his hilt, 'gave a croſs-blow on his adverſary's head, which 'glanced towards his friend, who, heaving up his ſore 'hand to ſave the blow, he was wounded on the back 'of his hand, as he had been before within. The 'two combatants, ſeeing Mr. Howell's face beſmeared 'with blood by heaving up his wounded hand, left 'fighting at once, and ran to embrace him; and hav-'ing

James, he made as great a figure in the new Court, though he was not remarkable for paying his homage to the great favourite. He became, notwithſtanding, a Gentleman of the Bedchamber, a Commiſſioner of the Navy, and a Governor of Trinity-houſe (k); which employments, if they added but little to the weight of his purſe, ſerved however to heighten his reputation. Some diſputes having happened with the Venetians in the Mediterranean, by which the Engliſh trade ſuffered, as well as by the depredations com' ing ſearched his hurts, they bound up his hand with ' one of his garters to cloſe the veins, which were cut ' and bled abundantly. They brought him home, and ' ſent for a ſurgeon; but this being heard at Court, ' the King ſent one of his own ſurgeons, for his Ma- ' jeſty much affected the ſaid Mr. Howell.

' It was my chance to be lodged hard by him, and ' four or five days after, as I was making myſelf ready, ' he came to my houſe, and prayed me to view his ' wounds, for I underſtand, ſaid he, that you have ex- ' traordinary remedies upon ſuch occaſions, and my ' ſurgeons are apprehenſive that it might grow to a ' gangrene, and ſo the hand muſt be cut off. In ef- ' fect, his countenance diſcovered that he was in much ' pain, which he ſaid was inſupportable, in regard of ' the extreme inflammation. I told him I would wil- ' lingly ſerve him; but if haply he knew the manner ' how I would cure him, without touching or ſeeing ' him, it may be he would not expoſe himſelf to my ' manner of curing, becauſe he would think it, per- ' haps, either ineffectual or ſuperſtitious. He replied, ' that the wonderful things which many have related ' unto me of your way of curing, make me nothing ' at all doubt of its efficacy. I aſked him then for ' any thing that had the blood upon it, ſo he preſently ' ſent for his garter wherewith his hand was firſt bound, ' and having called for a baſon of water, as if I would ' waſh my hands, I took a handful of powder of vi- ' triol which I had in my ſtudy, and preſently diſ- ' ſolved it. As ſoon as the bloody garter was brought ' me, I put it within the baſon, obſerving in the ' mean while what Mr. Howell did, who ſtood talking ' with a gentleman in a corner of my chamber, not ' regarding at all what I was doing; but he ſtarted ' ſuddenly, as if he had found ſome ſtrange alteration ' in himſelf. I aſked him What he ailed? I know not ' what ails me, replied he, but I find that I feel no ' more pain; methinks that a pleaſing kind of freſh- ' neſs, as if a wet cold napkin did ſpread over my ' hand, has taken away the inflammation that tor- ' mented me before. I anſwered, ſince you feel al- ' ready ſo good an effect of my medicament, I adviſe ' you to caſt away all your plaiſters, only keep the ' wound clean, and in a moderate temper betwixt heat ' and cold. This was preſently reported to the Duke ' of Buckingham, and a little after to the King, who ' were both very curious to know the circumſtance of ' the buſineſs, which was, that after dinner I took the ' garter out of the water, and put it to dry before a ' great fire. It was ſcarce dry but Mr. Howell's ſer- ' vant came running, that his maſter felt as much ' burning as ever he had done, if not more, for the ' heat was ſuch, as if his hand were betwixt coals of ' fire; I anſwered, that though that had happened at ' preſent, yet he ſhould find eaſe in a ſhort time, for I ' knew the reaſon of this accident, and I would pro- ' vide accordingly, for his maſter ſhould be free from ' that inflammation, it may be before he could poſ- ' ſibly return unto him, but in caſe he found no eaſe, ' I wiſhed him to come preſently back again; if not ' he might forbear coming. Thereupon he went, and ' at the inſtant I did put again the garter into the ' water, he found his maſter without any pain at ' all.

' King James, who had received a punctual infor- ' mation of what had happened, would fain know how ' it was done. I readily told him what the author, of ' whom I had the ſecret, ſaid to the Great Duke of ' Tuſcany on the like occaſion: it was a religious Car- ' melite, who came from the Indies and Perſia to Flo- ' rence; he had alſo been in China, and having done ' many ſtrange cures with his powder, after his arrival ' in Tuſcany, the Duke ſaid he would be very glad to ' learn it of him. The Carmelite anſwered, that it ' was a ſecret he had learnt in the Oriental parts, and ' he thought there was not any perſon in Europe who ' knew it but himſelf, and that it deſerved not to be ' divulged, which could not be done if his Highneſs ' meddled with the practice of it, becauſe he was not ' likely to do it with his own hand, but muſt truſt a ' ſurgeon, or ſome other ſervant, ſo that in a ſhort time ' divers others would come to know it as well as himſelf. ' But a few months after, I had an opportunity to do ' an important courteſy to the ſaid Fryar, which in- ' duced him to diſcover unto me his ſecret; and the ' ſame year he returned to Perſia, ſo that now there ' is no other knows this ſecret in Europe but myſelf. ' The King replied, that I need not be apprehenſive ' that he would diſcover any thing, for he would not ' truſt any body in the world to make experience of ' his ſecret, but that he would do it with his own ' hands, and therefore deſired ſome of the powder, ' which I delivered, inſtructing him in all the circum- ' ſtances, whereupon his Majeſty made ſundry proofs, ' whence he received ſingular ſatisfaction.'

If any inquiſitive reader ſhould demand, whether the Lord Bacon ever publiſhed this account or not, the anſwer muſt certainly be in the negative, and yet no inference can be fairly drawn from thence to the prejudice of Sir Kenelme Digby's relation; firſt, becauſe that noble Philoſopher never publiſhed his Appendix to his Natural Hiſtory, and next, becauſe in that very work he has given us of his own knowledge, and indeed as to his own perſon, a relation to the full as ſtrong as this, though of another kind (13). He tells us he had a wart from his childhood upon one of his fingers, and that being at Paris when he was about ſixteen years old, he had a great number of warts that broke out at both hands in a month's time, upon which the Engliſh Ambaſſador's Lady cauſed them to be rubbed with a piece of bacon with the rine on, which ſhe nailed upon the poſt of her window, which looked to the ſouth; and the conſequence of that was, that in the ſpace of five weeks all the warts died away, and amongſt them that which he had for ſeveral years. His Lordſhip likewiſe gives the receipt for making the weapon ſalve in the ſame place, upon which he makes ſeveral very judicious remarks.

The celebrated Mr. Bayle, in a letter of his dated March 27, 1697, has the following paſſage, which may prove acceptable to the curious reader (14). ' It ' is ſome time ago that I mentioned to you a Phy- ' ſician in Friezeland, who has performed ſeveral cures ' without giving any thing to his patients. He con- ' tents himſelf with mingling with their urine ſome- ' what, which, as the malady requires, either ſweats, ' vomits, or purges. He continues this practice, and ' I am told he was domeſtick to a certain great Lord of ' Italy, who was ſent for to the Court of Vienna to ' cure the Emperor, which he actually did. This man ' diſcovered his maſter's ſecret and has ſet up for him- ' ſelf. Yet he is not the only one who poſſeſſes it; ' for there are three others who purſue this practice as ' well as he: one is at Leyden, another at Antwerp, ' and another has been here in this city of Rotterdam ' for two or three months. He has been but lately in ' any degree of credit. His houſe is at preſent like ' the pool of Betheſda; all who are diſeaſed run thither. ' It is certain that he has cured ſome, and that he has ' ſweated a great many. The Phyſicians cry out ' againſt him with the utmoſt fury; and, as there are ' more in this country than in any other, who are apt ' to deny as impoſſible whatever they do not com- ' prehend, ſo there are numbers who join in the ſame ' outcry with the Phyſicians. But not being able to ' deny the fact that many have been ſweated, they at- ' tribute this to a prepoſſeſſed imagination. For my ' own part I cannot think it impoſſible, phyſically ' ſpeaking, that a man ſhould be made to ſweat by ' having ſomething put into his urine.' There was a German Phyſician, who, in the year 1700, undertook to cure diſeaſes in the ſame manner here in England (15).

mitted by the Algerines, Sir Kenelme Digby ſailed with a ſmall ſquadron thither in the ſummer of 1628, took ſeveral armed veſſels belonging to the Infidels, ſetting the Engliſh ſlaves that were on board at liberty; and, on the 16th of June, having gained a conſiderable victory with a very inferior force, he likewiſe brought the Venetians to reaſon; ſo that as he left England with a very high character as a Scholar, he returned to it with no leſs credit as a gallant Soldier and wiſe Commander (l). After his coming back to England, his antient friend and director of his ſtudies, Mr. Thomas Allen of Glouceſter-Hall, died there, full of years and reputation, having collected an excellent library of manuſcripts as well as printed books, many of which laſt he rendered as valuable as the firſt, by inſerting his learned notes in their margins; all which, as a teſtimony of his affection and eſteem for his eminent abilities, he beſtowed, by his will, upon Sir Kenelme Digby (m). This was in the year 1632, and Sir Kenelme, conſidering the great value of the manuſcripts, how much they were eſteemed in the Univerſity, and how ſerviceable they might prove to ſuch as conſecrated the greateſt part of their time to their ſtudies, moſt generouſly beſtowed them, the very next year, upon the Bodleian Library (n). Sir Kenelme continued, to this time, a Member of the Church of England; but going ſome time afterwards into France, he began to have ſome religious ſcruples, occaſioned, as it is ſuppoſed, by the vigorous ſolicitations of ſeveral zealous Eccleſiaſticks of the firſt rank; and having applied himſelf for about two years to the peruſal of books of controverſy, though, as he himſelf confeſſed, all of the ſame ſide, he, at length, changed his ſentiments, and, in 1636, reconciled himſelf to the Church of Rome (o); which, as it gave very great uneaſineſs to his friends in England, ſo to none more than to Archbiſhop Laud, who had borne him for many years a very particular affection (p). This occaſioned his writing to that Prelate a very large apology for his conduct, who returned him a very ample anſwer, full of tenderneſs and good advice, which is ſtill extant, and does great honour to the Archbiſhop's memory (q) [C]. His Grace had very little hopes that theſe admo-

[C] And does great honour to the Archbiſhop's memory.] This letter is dated from Lambeth, March 27, 1636. It is very large and full, written, not in decent terms only, but with great delicacy: ſome part of it the reader will expect to ſee, and we will give him what moſt concerns the perſonal hiſtory of this gentleman (16). 'Whereas you ſay that you have returned 'into that communion, who, from your birth, had 'right of poſſeſſion in you, and therefore ought to 'continue it, unleſs clear and evident proof (which you 'ſay ſurely cannot be found) ſhould have evicted 'you from it: Truly, Sir, I think this had been 'ſpoken with more advantage to you and your cauſe 'before your adhering to the Church of England than 'now; for then right of poſſeſſion could not have been 'thought little. But now, ſince you deſerted that 'communion, either you did it upon clear and evident 'proof, or upon apparent only. If you did it then 'upon clear and evident proof, Why ſay you now no 'ſuch can be found? If you did it but upon apparent 'and ſeeming proof, a ſemblance of very good reaſon '(as yourſelf calls it) why did you then come off from 'that communion till your proof were clear and evi-'dent? And why may not that which now ſeems 'clear and evident be but apparent, as well as that 'which then ſeemed clear unto you, be but ſemblance 'now? Nor would I have you ſay, that clear and 'evident proof cannot be found for a man in this 'caſe of religion to forego the communion which 'had right of poſſeſſion in him from his birth; for the 'propoſition is an univerſal negative, and of hard proof. 'And therefore, though I think I know you and your 'judgment ſo well, that I may not, without manifeſt 'wrong, charge you that you did in this great action, 'and ſo nearly concerning you, ad pauca reſpicere, 'which our great maſter tells us breeds facile and eaſy, 'rather than ſafe and warrantable, determinations; 'yet it will lie upon you not only in honour without, 'but alſo in conſcience within, to be able to aſſure 'yourſelf, that you did ad plurima, if not ad omnia 'reſpicere; the thing being ſo weighty in itſelf, and 'the miſerable diviſion of Chriſtendom (never ſuffi-'ciently to be lamented) making the doubt ſo great, 'that you who have been on both ſides muſt needs 'lie under the diſpute of both ſides, whether this laſt 'act of your's be not in you rather a relapſe into a for-'mer ſickneſs, than a recovery from a former fall.

'But againſt this, the temper of your mind (you 'ſay) arms you againſt all cenſures, no ſlight air of 'reputation being able to move you. In this I muſt 'needs ſay you are happy: for he that can be moved 'from himſelf by the changeable breath of men's lives, 'more out of than in himſelf, and which is a miſery 'beyond all expreſſion, muſt in doubts go to other 'men for reſolution, not to himſelf; as if he had no 'ſoul within him. But yet poſt conſcientiam fama, 'and though I would not deſire to live by reputation, 'yet I would leave no good means untried, rather 'than live without it.' And how far you have brought 'yourſelf in queſtion, which of theſe two, conſcience 'or reputation, you have ſhaken by this double change, 'I leave yourſelf to judge, becauſe you ſay your firſt 'was with a ſemblance of very good reaſon. And 'though you ſay again that it now appears you were 'then miſled, yet you will have much ado to make 'the world think ſo.

'The way you took in concealing this your reſolu-'tion, of returning into that communion, and the rea-'ſons which you give why you ſo privately carried it 'here, I cannot but approve. They are full of all 'ingenuity, tender and civil reſpects, fitted to avoid 'diſcontent in your friends, and ſcandal that might 'be taken by others, or contumely that might be re-'turned upon yourſelf. And as are theſe reaſons, ſo 'is the whole frame of your letter (ſetting aſide that I 'cannot concur in judgment) full of diſcretion and 'temper, and ſo like yourſelf, that I cannot but love 'even that which I diſlike in it. And though I ſhall 'never be other than that I have been to the worth of 'Sir Kenelme Digby, yet moſt heartily ſorry I am 'that a man, whoſe diſcourſe did ſo much content me, 'ſhould thus ſlide away from me before I had ſo much 'as ſuſpicion to awaken me, and ſuggeſt that he was 'going. Had you put me into a diſpenſation, and 'communicated your thoughts to me before they had 'grown up into reſolutions, I am a Prieſt, and would 'have put on what ſecrecy you ſhould have command-'ed. A little knowledge I have (God knows a little), 'I would have ventured it with you in that ſerious 'debate you have had with yourſelf. I have ever ho-'noured you ſince I knew your worth, and I would 'have done all offices of a friend to keep you nearer 'than now you are. But, ſince you are gone, and 'ſettled another way, before you would let me know 'it, I know not now what to ſay to a man of judg-'ment, and ſo reſolved. For to what end ſhould I 'treat, when a reſolution is ſet already? ſo ſet, as 'that you ſay no clear and evident proof can be found 'againſt it? nor can I tell how to preſs ſuch a man as 'you to ring the changes in Religion. In your power 'it admonitions would operate on the mind of Sir Kenelme Digby, which was certainly carried away with that veneration which he thought due to the faith of his anceſtors, and for which his father was underſtood to have died a martyr; and, perhaps, he was alſo influenced by that praiſe which he received from all ſides, upon the ſubject of his converſion (r). At leaſt this is certain, that, to ſhew at once his parts and his ſincerity, he wrote very eagerly in defence of his new, or rather old religion, that the world might take notice he was a thorough convert, and that it might ſeem he had done nothing precipitately, or without due conſideration (s). Theſe works of his were ſeveral times printed [D]. After a long ſtay in France, where he was highly careſſed, he came over to England, and was very well received by the Queen, who, in the year 1658, employed him, and Mr. Walter Mountague, in the management of an affair that afterwards made a very great noiſe (t). The King was, at that time, preparing for a war with the Scots, of which we have elſewhere given the reader ſome account (u); and his ſituation, at that time, was ſuch as induced him to aſk, as well as to accept, the aſſiſtance of ſuch of his ſubjects as were able and willing to ſupply him with money. The Nobility led the way, and the Clergy of the Church of England contributed, in a manner, proportionable rather to their zeal than to their intereſt (w). The Queen taking notice of this, and being very deſirous that thoſe of her religion ſhould not appear deficient in loyalty at ſuch a juncture, prevailed with the two Gentlemen before-mentioned to write a kind of circular letter to thoſe of the Romiſh perſuaſion throughout the kingdom, in ſupport of one of

'it was not to change; in mine it is not to make you 'change again. Therefore, to the moderation of 'your own heart, under the grace of God, I muſt and 'do now leave you for matter of Religion, but retaining ſtill with me, and entirely, all the love and 'friendlineſs which your worth won from me, well 'knowing that all differences in opinion ſhake not the 'foundations of Religion.

'Now to your poſtſcript, and then I have done. 'That I am the firſt, and the only perſon, to whom 'you have written thus freely: I thank you heartily 'for it. For I cannot conceive any thing thereby, 'but your great reſpect to me, which hath abundantly 'ſpread itſelf all over your letter. And had you written this to me with a reſtraint of making it further 'known, I ſhould have performed that truſt: but 'ſince you have ſubmitted to me, what further knowledge of it I ſhall think fit to give to any other perſon, I have, as I took myſelf bound, acquainted his 'Majeſty with it, who gave a great deal of very good 'expreſſion concerning you, and is not a little ſorry to 'loſe the ſervice of ſo able a ſubject. I have likewiſe 'made it known in private to Mr. Secretary Cooke, 'who was as confident of you as myſelf. I could 'hardly believe your own letters, and he as hardly my 'relation. To my Secretary I muſt needs truſt it, 'having not time to write it again out of my ſcribbled 'copy; but I dare truſt the ſecrecy in which I have 'bound him. To others I am ſilent, and ſhall ſo continue, till the thing open itſelf; and I ſhall do it 'out of reaſons very like to thoſe which you give, 'why yourſelf would not divulge it here. In the laſt 'place, you promiſe yourſelf that the condition you 'are in will not hinder me from continuing to be 'the beſt friend you have. To this I can ſay no 'more, than that I could never arrogate to myſelf to 'be your beſt friend: but a poor, yet reſpective, 'friend of yours I have been ever ſince I knew you: 'and it is not your change that can change me, who 'never yet left but where I was firſt forſaken, and not 'always there.'

[D] Theſe works of his were ſeveral times printed.] There is nothing more common, than for perſons, who have thought fit to alter their choice as to a religious ſyſtem, to vindicate this conduct of theirs by writings; and the higher their ſtation, the greater their character, the more extenſive their reputation, ſo much the more neceſſary works of this kind are thought, and, without queſtion, ſo much the more difficult they are found. Our author had exhibited the beſt excuſes in his power to make, and, very probably, in the beſt dreſs, to his Grace of Canterbury; and how theſe were received, as well as what the nature of them might be, we may eaſily conjecture from the preceding note. As to thoſe pieces which are to be the ſubject of this, their titles are theſe:

I. A Conference with a Lady about Choice of Religion. Paris, 1638. Lond. 1654. 8*vo*. This was a piece written in an eaſy, polite, and conciſe ſtyle, in which its author was peculiarly happy. His principal aim was to ſecure a general approbation of his conduct, by keeping to ſuch arguments as ſuited beſt with common underſtandings; and, at the ſame time, inſinuated, that, in the choice of a religion, an uninterrupted authority of the ſafety of ſalvation, in any communion, was of high importance, and that, with regard to ſpeculative points, liberty of opinion was not precluded. Dr. Twiſſe, one of the Aſſembly of Divines at Weſtminſter, wrote an anſwer to this treatiſe, which was never publiſhed.

II. Letters between the Lord George Digby and Sir Kenelme Digby, Knight, concerning Religion. Lond. 1651, 8*vo*. Theſe letters, though printed thirteen years after, were written at the time which we have aſſigned them. The firſt, from Lord Digby to Sir Kenelme Digby, is dated November 2d, 1638, from Sherborne; and therein his Lordſhip attacks the authority of the Fathers with reſpect to Articles of Faith, in which he ſhews, that though Proteſtants, as well as Papiſts, frequently appeal to them in points where they think their judgments agreeable to their own doctrines, yet in others, where they differ from them, they are rejected by both; whence he infers, their authority can be deciſive to neither. Sir Kenelme Digby, in his anſwer, dated at London, December 6th, 1638, takes a great deal of pains to apologize for the Fathers, and diſtinguiſhes between their ſentiments as to Articles of Faith, and ſuch points of doctrine in which, without prejudice to the Church, freedom of opinion may be allowed. As to the firſt he will have their authority deciſive, though not as to the ſecond. Lord Digby, in his anſwer, dated at Sherborne, March 29th, 1639, returns to the charge with great ſtrength of reaſoning. He ſhews, that rejecting ſuch a deciſive authority in the Fathers, does by no means infer a diſreſpect of them; and profeſſes, that though he cannot ground his faith preciſely upon what they deliver, he nevertheleſs believes them to have been ſincerely pious and excellent perſons. He obſerves, that, if ſuch an authority was due to them, as is contended for, it muſt be chiefly attributed to thoſe of the earlieſt ages; and that, with reſpect to the Fathers of the firſt three centuries, there are great diſputes about the genuineneſs of the writings aſcribed to them; and a doubtful rule can be no rule at all. He inſiſts farther, that their authority cannot be deciſive, becauſe ſometimes they contradict each other, ſometimes they are inconſiſtent with themſelves, ſometimes they teach what is not either received by Proteſtants or Papiſts, and ſometimes they ſhew a manifeſt want of ability in handling thoſe ſubjects of which they treat. In theſe letters there is great civility expreſſed on both ſides, inſomuch, that few controverſies have been managed with ſo little acrimony; which, after all, is the higheſt commendation that can be beſtowed upon them, ſince the matters to which they relate had been as juſtly and as concluſively debated, by other as able writers, long before.

her

her own, to excite their liberality at this ſeaſon (x). Theſe endeavours were attended with very conſiderable effects, which, however, ought undoubtedly to be attributed to principles of honour rather than any thing elſe; for we have very good authority to prove, that this proceeding was ill reliſhed at Rome, from whence inſtructions were ſpeedily ſent, to caſt a damp upon the loyalty of the Engliſh Papiſts (y) [E]. In the month of January, 1640, the Houſe of Commons ſent for Sir Kenelme Digby, in order to know how far, and upon what grounds, he had acted in this matter, which he opened to them very clearly (z); and the Queen herſelf alſo ſent a meſſage to the Houſe, in which ſhe ſtated her own concern in the matter, and the motives for her conduct; with which the Houſe was, or at leaſt ſeemed to be, ſatisfied (a). Yet upon an addreſs, that his Majeſty would remove ſuch as were of the Popiſh Religion from Court, and more eſpecially from his royal preſence, Sir Kenelme Digby and Mr. Walter Mountague were particularly named, and felt the effects of it (b). Upon the breaking-out of the civil war Sir Kenelme Digby, remaining at London, was, by the Parliament, committed priſoner to Wincheſter-Houſe (c), where, however, he was treated with great reſpect, was viſited by men of all parties, and ſome amongſt them of the firſt diſtinction (d). At length, in the year 1643, her Majeſty the Queen-Dowager of France having vouchſafed to write a letter, with her own hand, in favour of Sir Kenelme, and to procure his liberty; it was granted upon certain terms (e), and a very reſpectful letter written in anſwer to that of the Queen upon this ſubject (f) [F]. Before he quitted the kingdom, however, he was ſummoned

[E] Upon the loyalty of the Engliſh Papiſts.] We have, in as concile terms as poſſible, repreſented the matter of fact clearly in the text; whence it appears, that the Queen was the firſt mover in this affair. She ſays in her letter, that ſhe had ventured to anſwer for the zeal of the Catholicks; and that, after ſoliciting ſo often in their favour, ſhe was deſirous of preſenting his Majeſty with ſome marks of their gratitude (17). For the management of this affair, an aſſembly was called at London, of the principal perſons of that perſuaſion, in which Signior Con, the Pope's Nuncio to the Queen, preſided, by which aſſembly the Queen's propoſal was embraced and recommended, and, upon the letters of Digby and Mountague, treaſurers were appointed in the ſeveral counties to collect this contribution, which amounted to upwards of twenty thouſand pounds (18). As this money was intended for the ſupport of an army raiſed againſt the Scots, who, under pretence of religious diſputes, but in reality excited by emiſſaries from France, were in arms againſt the King, it is a point of ſome importance to know what the ſentiments were of the Court of Rome in a caſe of this nature; and theſe are preſerved to us in the following paper (19).

A Letter from the Pope to his Nuncio in England at the beginning of the War with Scotland; but badly tranſlated.

'You are to command the Catholicks of England 'in general, that they ſuddenly deſiſt from making 'ſuch offers of men, towards this northern expedition, 'as we hear they have done, little to the advantage of 'their diſcretion. And likewiſe it is requiſite, conſidering the penalty already impoſed, that they be 'not too forward with money, more than what law 'and duty enjoins them to pay, without any innovation at all, or view of making themſelves rather 'weaker pillars of the kingdom than they were before.

'Inform the Provincials of every order, that it is 'expreſsly prohibited no more aſſemblies (of what nature ſoever) ſhall admit of the Laity to have either 'voice or ſeſſion in it, being what will be urged for a 'precedent, tho' it is but only an uſurpation.

'Declare unto the beſt of the Peers and Gentlemen, 'by word of mouth or letter, that they ought not to 'expreſs any averſeneſs, in caſe the High Court of 'Parliament be called, nor ſhew any diſcontent at the 'acts which do not point-blank aim at religion, being, 'in general, the moſt fundamental law of that kingdom.

'Adviſe the Clergy to deſiſt from that fooliſh, nay, 'rather illiterate and childiſh cuſtom of diſtinction in 'the Proteſtant and Puritan Doctrine. And, eſpecially, this error is ſo much the greater, when they undertake to prove, that Proteſtantiſm is a degree nearer 'the Catholick Faith than the other; for, ſince both 'of them be without the verge of the Church, it is 'needleſs hypocriſy to ſpeak of it, yea, it begets more 'malice than it is worth.

'That the Provincials are herein required to give a 'general warning, throughout all orders, that no religious perſon ought to be ſeduced (by any Noblemen, 'either Officers of the Crown, or the like, who pretend to be ſchiſmatick) into a præmunire. For he 'that dares not follow the truth as his conſcience directs him, is not worthy to be ſought or followed by 'any of our faith. But, on the other ſide, we give the 'like command, that whoſoever is thought inclining 'to God in his heart, let no man be ſo raſh to boaſt 'and ſpeak it abroad.

'All buſy enquiries are forbidden; but eſpecially 'into arcanas of State.

'That none of the Church, whether Lay-Brother or 'Eccleſiaſtick, contribute ſo largely as they have done 'to the ſociety, but diſpoſe their charity that every 'order may partake alike.'

[F] Upon this ſubject]. Mr. Wood tells us, that Sir Kenelme Digby was very active for the King in the beginning of the Civil War (20): but it is moſt probable, that he was prevented from being active, ſince it is very evident that he was committed to Wincheſter-Houſe about the time it broke out, and continued in that confinement till he was diſcharged in the manner mentioned in the text. Mr. Hearne has preſerved the copy of a letter directed to the Queen-Regent of France, in the language of that country, a tranſlation of which follows (21).

'Madam,

'The two Houſes of Parliament having been informed, by the Sieur de Greſſy, of the deſire your 'Majeſty has, that we ſhould ſet at liberty Sir Kenelme Digby; we are commanded to make known 'to your Majeſty, that although the religion, the paſt behaviour, and the abilities of this Gentleman, might 'give juſt umbrage of his practiſing to the prejudice of 'the conſtitutions of this realm; nevertheleſs, having 'ſo great regard to the recommendation of your Majeſty, they have ordered him to be diſcharged, and 'have authorized us farther to aſſure your Majeſty, of 'their being always ready to teſtify to you their reſpects upon every occaſion, as well as to advance 'whatever may regard the good correſpondence between the two States. We remain,

'Your Majeſty's

'Moſt humble ſervants, &c.

By whom this letter was to be ſent does not appear, but, moſt probably, by the Committee to whom this matter was referred. In regard to the terms upon which this Gentleman was ſet at liberty, they will ſufficiently moned before a Committee of the Houſe of Commons, in order to give an account of any knowledge he might have of tranſactions between Archbiſhop Laud and the Court of Rome, and particularly as to an offer ſuppoſed to be made to that Prelate from thence of a Cardinal's hat. Sir Kenelme Digby aſſured the Committee, that he knew nothing of any ſuch tranſactions, and that, in his judgment, the Archbiſhop was what he ſeemed to be, a very ſincere and learned Proteſtant (g); of all which he took care that his Grace ſhould be informed, as well as that his enemies were very ſolicitous to diſcover any thing that might fix an imputation of that ſort upon his conduct (h). We may eaſily conceive, that a perſon of Sir Kenelme Digby's ſtudious and philoſophic genius could not be altogether idle even while under confinement, but that his thoughts would be ſometimes employed upon thoſe ſublime and important topicks which had formerly furniſhed matter for his meditations; and accordingly we find, that, during his reſidence in Wincheſter-Houſe, he compoſed two pieces at leaſt, that ſoon after ſtole abroad into the world, and kept alive that fame which their author had acquired in better times. Theſe two pieces regard the works of others, and may be juſtly eſteemed judicious criticiſms, as well as very learned philoſophical diſſertations [G]. His appearance at the Court of France, to return thanks to the Queen-Mother, for her gracious interpoſition in his favour, was highly acceptable to many of the learned in that kingdom, who had a very high opinion of his abilities, and were charmed with the life and freedom of his converſation, which is, on all hands, allowed to have been very agreeable, notwithſtanding that ſpirit of envy which purſued him living, and which has not ceaſed to perſecute his memory ſince his death (i). It is highly probable, that, about this time, having heard ſo much of the fame of Des Cartes, he reſolved to go and pay him a viſit at Egmond, the place he had choſen for his retreat, where he accordingly found him, and had a converſation with him upon a very remarkable ſubject (k); and though he did not declare to that Philoſopher who he was, yet Des Cartes preſently diſcovered him by his diſcourſe, which is a circumſtance worthy of notice [H]. Our author is alſo reported to have had many conferences with him after at Paris (l), where he ſpent the beſt part of the enſuing year in a cloſe application to his ſtudies, and in frequenting the aſſemblies of the learned in that city, where he was gene-

'Whereas upon the mediation of her Majeſty the 'Queen of France, it hath pleaſed both Houſes of 'Parliament to permit me to go into that kingdom; 'in humble acknowledgment of their favour therein, 'and to preſerve and confirm a good opinion of my 'zeal and honeſt intentions to the honour and ſervice 'of my country, I do here, upon the faith of a Chriſtian, and the word of a Gentleman, proteſt and promiſe, that I will, neither directly nor indirectly, negotiate, promote, conſent unto, or conceal, any practice or deſign, prejudicial to the honour or the ſafety 'of the Parliament. And, in witneſs of my reality 'therein, I have hereunto ſubſcribed my name, this '3d day of Auguſt, 1643.

'KENELME DIGBY.'

[G] As well as very learned philoſophical diſſertations.] Both were written in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, and are ſo full of deep learning, that the reader cannot help allowing there muſt have been prodigious ſtore in that magazine, which could furniſh ſuch variety and choice upon ſuch ſudden occaſions.

III. "Obſervations upon Religio Medici, occaſion-"ally written by Sir Kenelme Digby, Knt. Lond. "1643, 8vo." Theſe obſervations, digeſted into the form of a letter, were written in the night between the 22d and 23d of December, 1642, and addreſſed to Edward Earl of Dorſet, Sir Kenelme's great friend and patron, and who was a very great admirer of that famous piece written by the ingenious Dr. Browne. Whoever peruſes theſe obſervations carefully will diſcern that Sir Kenelme Digby was not either ſo credulous, or ſo ſuperſtitious a man as ſome have repreſented him; and though there are many crude and haſty cenſures in that letter, yet there are alſo ſome very ſtrong and ſenſible meditations upon very uncommon ſubjects.

IV. "Obſervations on the 22d Stanza, in the Ninth "Canto of the 2d Book of Spenſer's Fairy Queen. "Lond. 1644, 8vo." This likewiſe was a letter to Sir Edward Stradling, written haſtily, and containing a very deep philoſophical commentary upon the moſt myſterious verſes that ever fell from the pen of their learned author, and which are thought to have been admirably explained in this diſcourſe. Beyond all doubt, if Sir Kenelme Digby has reached the ſenſe of his author, it does very high honour to Mr. Spenſer, and might kindle a ſpirit of emulation in ſuch as read his excellent writings with delight, to attempt ſomething of the ſame kind with reſpect to other obſcure paſſages, which, cleared up in the ſame manner, would not fail of being very acceptable to the literary world.

[H] Which is a circumſtance worthy of notice.] The late very ingenious and knowing M. des Maizeaux, in the life of M. St. Evremond, tells us, this gentleman was informed by Sir Kenelme Digby, that, having read the writings of that great Philoſopher Des Cartes, he reſolved to go in perſon to Holland on purpoſe to ſee him (22). He did ſo, and found him in his retirement at Egmond. There that ſtudious and intelligent perſon received and converſed with him as a ſtranger, but after a conſiderable time ſpent in a free and learned diſcourſe upon a great variety of ſubjects, M. Des Cartes, who had ſeen ſome of his works, told him, that he did not doubt but he was the famous Sir Kenelme Digby. And if you, Sir, replied the Knight, were not the illuſtrious M. Des Cartes, I ſhould not have come on purpoſe to ſee you. Then Sir Kenelme Digby remarked to the Philoſopher, that our ſpeculative diſcoveries were, indeed, pretty and agreeable, but that after all they were too uncertain and unprofitable to take up a man's whole thoughts: that life was almoſt too ſhort to attain to the right knowledge of neceſſary things; that it would be much more worthy of him, who ſo well underſtood the frame of the human body, to ſtudy ways and means to prolong it, than to apply himſelf to the barren ſpeculations of Philoſophy. Des Cartes aſſured him that he had already conſidered that matter; and that to render a man immortal was what he would not venture to promiſe, but that he was very ſure it was poſſible to lengthen out his life to the period of the Patriarchs. When Monſ. de St. Evremond told M. des Maizeaux this particular, he added, that they were not ignorant in Holland that Des Cartes flattered himſelf he had made this diſcovery, and that he had heard ſeveral perſons talk of it who had known that Philoſopher; that Des Cartes's friends alſo in France knew it; and that Abbot Picot, his diſciple and martyr, being perſuaded that he had found out this great ſecret, would not believe the news of his death, and that, when he was aſhamed to doubt of it any longer, he cried, 'tis done and over, the world will ſoon be at an end.

rally well received, and, for the reaſons before aſſigned, greatly admired (m). He had now leiſure to digeſt that Philoſophy which he had been ſo long meditating, and of which he framed a ſyſtem, in two parts, which, in his own language, but with a licence or privilege from the French King, he publiſhed in the following year, and which is regarded by the learned as his principal performance (n). Some have inſinuated, that, in this work of his, he has taken to himſelf the honour of many weighty and curious obſervations which he met with in the writings of his learned and judicious friend Thomas Allen, of Glouceſter-Hall (o); but as never any proof of this was attempted, and as Sir Kenelme Digby, in every thing he penned, had the air of an original writer, this ought, in juſtice, to be conſidered as a very groundleſs ſuggeſtion. We ſhall give the reader a more full account of theſe two parts of his Philoſophy in the notes [I]. After the King's affairs

[I] Of theſe two parts of his Philoſophy in the notes.] In order to treat the ſubject of this note as clearly and as conciſely as poſſible, we will firſt give the titles of our author's works; then ſome obſervations upon them; next ſhew how they were received; and laſtly, ſpeak of the anſwers that were written to them.

V. "A Treatiſe of the Nature of Bodies." Paris, 1644. fol. printed again at London in 1658, 1665, and 1669, all which editions are in 4to, and to the laſt ſome other pieces of his are added.

VI. "A Treatiſe declaring the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul, out of which the Immortality of Reaſonable Souls is evinced." Paris, 1644, fol. Printed again at London 1645, 1657, 1669, all in 4to. and together with the former treatiſe.

VII. "Inſtitutionum Peripateticarum libri quinque, cum Appendice Theologica de Origine Mundi;" that is, "Five Books of Peripatetick Inſtitutions, together with a Theological Appendix concerning the Origin of the World." Paris, 1651, fol. This piece is added to the two former, tranſlated into Latin by J. L. together with a Preface prefixed in the ſame language, by Thomas Anglus, that is, Thomas White, who alſo tranſlated theſe Peripatetick Inſtitutions into Engliſh.

The author addreſſes the two treatiſes firſt mentioned, which are, indeed, but the firſt and ſecond parts of the ſame work, to his ſon Kenelme Digby, and his epiſtle to him is dated at Paris, Auguſt 31, 1644, and the French King's privilege at Fontainbleau, the 26th of September in the ſame year. It will appear clearly to ſuch as peruſe theſe pieces, that our author was a man of very deep thought, extenſive learning, and very happy in ſupporting his philoſophic arguments by a very dextrous application of facts. He was entirely addicted to the Corpuſcularian Philoſophy, which for thoſe times he very well underſtood; but his notions being for the moſt part very new, and the relations advanced by him very extraordinary, thoſe who envied him took occaſion from thence to treat him, not only with ſeverity, but indecency; and better writers having ſucceeded him, have not taken the pains to expoſe this ill uſage, perhaps to prevent the world's taking notice how much they were obliged themſelves to our learned Knight. An inſtance will make all this plain. Our author having explained the ſenſe of ſmelling, and ſhewn why brutes have it in ſo much greater perfection than human creatures, he proceeds thus (23):

(23) Digby on Bodies, p. 310.

'When he was a little boy there being wars in the 'country, as that ſtate is ſeldom without moleſtations 'from abroad, when they have no diſtempers at home, 'which is an unſeparable effect of a country's ſituation 'upon the frontiers of powerful neighbouring Princes 'that are at variance, the village of which he was, 'had notice of ſome unruly ſcattered troops that were 'coming to pillage them, which made all the people 'of the village fly haſtily, with what they could carry 'with them, to hide themſelves in the woods, which 'were ſpacious enough to afford them ſhelter, for they 'joined upon the foreſt of Ardenne. There they lay 'till ſome of their ſcouts brought them word that the 'ſoldiers, of whom they were in ſuch apprehenſion, 'had fired their town and quitted it. Then all of 'them returned home excepting this boy, who, it 'ſeemeth, being of a very timorous nature, had images 'of fear ſo ſtrong in his fancy, that firſt he ran farther 'into the wood than any of the reſt, and afterwards 'apprehended that every body he ſaw through the 'thickets, and every voice he heard, was the ſoldiers; 'and ſo hid himſelf from his parents that were in much 'diſtreſs, ſeeking him all about, and calling his name 'as loud as they could. When they had ſpent a day 'or two in vain, they returned home without him, and 'he lived many years in the woods, feeding upon fruits 'and wild roots, and maſt.

'He ſaid, that after he had been ſome time in this 'wild habitation, he could by the ſmell judge of the 'taſte of any thing that was to be eaten, and that he 'could at a great diſtance wind by his noſe where 'wholeſome fruits or roots did grow. In this ſtate he 'continued (ſtill ſhunning men with as great fear as 'when he firſt ran away; ſo ſtrong the impreſſion was, 'and ſo little could his little reaſon maſter it), until, 'in a very ſharp winter, that many beaſts of the foreſt 'periſhed for want of food, neceſſity brought him to 'ſo much confidence, that, leaving the wild places of 'the foreſt, remote from all people's dwellings, he 'would, in the evenings, ſteal among cattle that were 'fothered, eſpecially the ſwine, and among them glean 'that which ſerved to ſuſtain wretchedly his miſerable 'life. He could not do this ſo cunningly, but that 'often returning to it, he was upon a time eſpied, and 'they who ſaw a beaſt of ſo ſtrange a ſhape, for ſuch 'they took him to be, he being naked and all overgrown with hair, believing him to be a ſatyr, or 'ſome ſuch prodigious creature as the rencounters of 'rare accidents tell us of, laid wait to apprehend him. 'But he that winded them as far off as any beaſt could 'do, ſtill avoided them; till at length they laid ſnares 'for him, and took the wind ſo advantageouſly of 'him, that they caught him, and then ſoon perceived 'he was a man, though he had quite forgotten the uſe 'of all language; but, by his geſtures and cries, he 'expreſſed the greateſt affright that might be, which 'afterwards he ſaid (when he learnt to ſpeak anew), 'was becauſe he thought thoſe were the ſoldiers he 'had hidden himſelf to avoid, when he firſt betook 'himſelf to the wood, and were always living in his 'fancy, through his fears continually reducing them 'thither.

'This man, within a little while after he came to 'good keeping and full feeding, quite loſt that acuteneſs of ſmelling which formerly governed him in his 'taſte, and grew to be in that particular as other ordinary men were. But at his firſt living with other 'people, a woman that had compaſſion of him, to ſee a 'man ſo near like a beaſt, and that had no language to 'call for what he wiſhed or needed to have, took parti-

affairs were totally ruined, this Gentleman found himſelf under a neceſſity of returning into England (p), in order to compound for his eſtate, as is generally ſaid, though another account is given of this journey (q); but at what time he came, how long he remained here, or where he reſided, is very uncertain. He met, however, during his ſtay, with ſeveral misfortunes, ſtill more ſenſible than that which brought him over. Amongſt theſe we ought to reckon the loſs of his eldeſt ſon Kenelme Digby, Eſq. a young Gentleman of great hopes, with reſpect both to his abilities and his virtues (r). He engaged himſelf with the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Peterborough, the Lord Petre, and many other Noblemen and Gentlemen, who, on July 7th, 1648, appeared for the King, under the Earl of Holland, near Kingſton in Surry; but, being attacked before they could well form, were obliged to retire into Huntingdonſhire, where, at St. Neot's, they were ſurprized by Colonel Adrian Scroop's regiment of horſe, and, though they made a gallant defence, were totally routed; Colonel Dalbier, who till then had ſerved the Parliament, and is ſaid to have taught Cromwell the art of war, with Mr. Digby, being ſlain upon the ſpot (s). The Parliament, notwithſtanding Sir Kenelme's compoſition, did not, for reaſons which will be hereafter mentioned, judge it proper that he ſhould remain in England, and therefore not only ordered him to withdraw, but voted if he ſhould afterwards, at any time, return without leave of the Houſe firſt obtained, he ſhould loſe both life and eſtate (t). Upon this he went again into France, where he was very kindly received by Queen Henrietta Maria, Dowager of England, to whom he had been, for ſome time, Chancellor, and was, not long after, ſent into Italy, where he was, at firſt, well received by Pope Innocent X (u); but Mr. Wood ſays he behaved to him ſo haughtily, that he very quickly loſt his good opinion; and adds farther, that there was ſuſpicion of his being no faithful Steward of the contributions raiſed in that part of the world, for the aſſiſtance of the diſtreſſed Catholicks in England (w). However that matter might be, it is very certain, that he viſited ſeveral other Courts in Italy, where he was treated with great reſpect, as well on account of his perſonal qualifications, as from the eſteem thoſe Princes had of the Queen his miſtreſs (x). But, whether his conduct deſerved thoſe imputations mentioned by Mr. Wood, or whether his figure and addreſs were capable of making ſuch impreſſions as another writer mentions, we have not lights ſufficient to determine (y) [K]. 'cular care of him, and was always very ſolicitous to 'ſee him furniſhed with what he wanted; which made 'him ſo apply himſelf unto her in all his occurrents, 'that whenſoever he ſtood in need of aught, if ſhe were 'out of the way and were gone abroad into the fields, 'or to any other village near by, he would hunt her out 'preſently by his ſcent, in ſuch ſort as with us thoſe dogs 'uſe to do which are taught to draw dry foot. I imagine 'he is yet alive, to tell a better ſtory of himſelf than 'I have done, and to confirm what I have here ſaid of 'him; for I have it from them who ſaw him but a few 'years agone, that he was an able ſtrong man, and 'likely to laſt yet a good while longer.

'And of another man I can ſpeak aſſuredly myſelf, 'who being of a very temperate or rather ſpare diet, 'could likewiſe perfectly diſcern by his ſmell the qua'lities of whatſoever was afraid to paſs the exa'mination of his taſte, even to his bread and beer. 'Wherefore to conclude, it is evident both by reaſon 'and by experience, that the object of our touch, our 'taſte, and our ſmell, are material and corporeal 'things, derived from the diviſion of quantity into 'more rare and more denſe parts, and may with eaſe 'be reſolved into their heads and ſprings ſufficiently 'to content any judicious and rational man.'

The reception given to this work when it firſt appeared, may be collected from this character given of the author by one who wrote in his own time (24), Sir Kenelme Digby is an ingenious learned gentleman, and an ornament of this nation, as his book of Bodies ſhews. We might cite many writers of our own, and of the French nation, of the ſame ſtanding, to vouch with equal ſtrength in favour of his reputation; but perhaps it will be ſufficient to take notice of the learned Morhoff, who had conſulted moſt of his writings, cites them often, and ſpeaks of their author with great applauſe (25). The Abbe Vallemont was a great admirer of Sir Kenelme Digby's writings (26), and applauded the ſagacity with which he handles the moſt difficult ſubjects, his penetration in diſcovering the true cauſes why they were difficult, and his perſpicuity in delivering his own notions.

We muſt not however imagine, that Sir Kenelme could make himſelf ſo famous by his writings without meeting ſome degree of cenſure, and, in an age ſo full of cavils as that was, of oppoſition. Accordingly, we find that he was attacked at home by Alexander Roſs, a voluminous writer, who likewiſe undertook to diſparage the abilities of Dr. Hervey and Sir Thomas Browne. The title of his work was,

The Philoſophical Touchſtone, or Obſervations upon Sir Kenelme Digby's Diſcourſes of the Nature of Bodies, and of the Reaſonable Soul, &c. in which his erroneous Paradoxes are refuted. Lond. 1645, 4*to*.

He was alſo attacked abroad in a ſmall treatiſe, intituled,

Triumphans Anima, ſive Philoſophica Demonſtratio immortalitatis Animæ. Frank. 1661, 12*mo*. This was publiſhed under the fictitious name of Amandus Verus, which concealed John Chriſoſtom Enggenfield, a very learned Bavarian, J. U. D. concerning whoſe hiſtory the curious reader may meet with ſome circumſtances in the author cited in the margin (27).

[K] We have not lights ſufficient to determine.] It appears from the original picture of Sir Kenelme Digby ſtill remaining, that though he was a perſon of the largeſt ſize, as indeed his family generally were, yet he was a very well made graceful man. His gallant action at ſea, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, affords us a pregnant proof of his courage, which ſhewed itſelf alſo upon other occaſions; and his writings, which are peculiarly calculated to enliven the drieſt, as well as to enlighten the darkeſt ſubjects, cannot leave us in any doubt as to the faculties of his mind. But that with all theſe high qualities he had his imperfections, who can doubt? Of what nature theſe failings were the reader muſt collect, as well as he can, from Mr. Wood's account, which is this (28): 'He was not only maſter 'of a good, graceful, and judicious ſtile, but alſo wrote 'an admirable hand both faſt and Roman. His per'ſon was handſome and gigantick, and nothing was 'wanting to make him a compleat Cavalier. He had 'ſo graceful elocution and noble addreſs, that had he 'been dropped out of the clouds into any part 'of the world, he would have made himſelf re'ſpected; but the Jeſuits who cared not for him, 'ſpoke ſpitefully, and ſaid it was true, but then he 'muſt not ſtay there above ſix weeks. He had a great 'faculty, which proceeded from abundance of wit 'and invention, of propoſing and reporting matters 'to the Virtuoſi, eſpecially to the Philoſophical Aſ'ſembly at Montpellier, and Royal Society at home. After Cromwell had assumed the supreme power in this kingdom, Sir Kenelme Digby, who had now nothing to fear from the Long Parliament, ventured to return home (z), and continued here a great part of the year 1655, when it is very certain that he was embarked in some very great design; and, as some writers have suggested, this was reconciling the Papists to the Protector (a). This created great jealousies against him on all sides; and the countenance he received from Cromwell, who is said to have been very much taken with him, produced no small clamour against his government (b). Whether either of them were sincere, or whether, like thorough Politicians, each acted a part which suited with their interests at that juncture, remains doubtful; but that the facts already mentioned are certainly true, and that Mr. Wood has not injured Sir Kenelme in his censure (c), may be proved to the Reader's satisfaction [L]. 'Which is the reason why many say, that as he was 'most exactly accomplished with all sorts of learning, 'so he was guilty withal of extravagant vanities.' Mr. Lloyd (29), who likewise wrote when things were fresh in memory, bestows a better character on our illustrious Knight, whom he reports of a fluent invention and discourse, as appears from his long discourse at Montpellier in France, and his entertainments of the Ladies of the several nations he travelled in; of a great faculty in negotiations both at France, Rome, and Florence, and most of the states of Italy, of one of the Princes whereof it is reported, that, having no children, he was very willing his wife should bring him a Prince by Sir Kenelme, whom he imagined the just measure of perfection.

(29) Lloyd's Loyal Sufferers, p. 582.

[L] May be proved to the reader's satisfaction.] In the articles relating to our author inserted in foreign collections, his loyalty to King Charles I, his steady attachment to King Charles II, and his averring himself to be of the Romish religion at the peril of his life, are extolled as so many acts of heroism (30). As it is our business to discover truth, we are under a necessity of observing, that this gentleman has no title to these praises, and that whatever tincture of envy there might be in the censures passed upon his Philosophical character, what is said to the prejudice of his political behaviour will admit of no such extenuation. His practices in favour of the Catholicks, with those who murdered King Charles I. began early, as appears from the following passages in a letter from the Lord Byron to the Marquis of Ormond (31), dated from Caen in Normandy, March 1, 1649, N. S. 'In 'some letters from good hands I meet with a particular of great concernment, which I thought fit to 'advertise your Excellency of by this bearer, Major Jamot, who, though a Roman Catholick, yet herein 'so much detests their ways, that truly I believe it will 'alter his opinion. The business is briefly this: Sir 'Kenelme Digby, with some other Romanists, accompanied with one Watson an Independent, who hath 'brought them passes from Fairfax, is gone for England to join the interests of all the English Papists with 'that bloody party that murdered the King, in the 'oppositon and extirpation of monarchical government; 'or if that government be thought fit, yet that it 'shall be by election, and not by succession as formerly provided; that a free exercise of the Romish 'religion be granted, and of all other religions whatsoever, excepting that which was established by law 'in the Church of England. This devilish design, 'which most certainly is now setting on foot, I doubt 'may have an ill influence upon Ireland, especially 'upon O-Neil's party, if not prevented by your vigi'lance and prudence. Poyntz (my Lord of Worcester's devil) I hear is a prime actor in it, and it is 'much suspected that Walsingham, whom your Excellency knows for a pragmatical knave, and I believe comes over in Darcy's frigate, is employed by 'Sir K. Digby, though pretending some other busi'ness. Sir Edward Nicholas either hath, or will write 'to your Excellency, concerning this particular, and 'Major Jamot is able to say something in it. I am 'the apter to believe it, because, when I was in 'England, something to this purpose was propounded 'by the Independent party to the Recusants.' This was followed by a letter from Secretary Nicholas, inclosing a letter from Dr. Winstad, a Physician of the Romish religion at Rouen, dated February 7, 1649, in which he gives the following account of the same journey, from his own knowledge (32): 'Tuesday 'last arrived here Sir Kenelme Digby from Paris, with 'divers young gentlemen in his company; only there 'was a wry-necked fellow amongst them, which Sir 'Kenelme commended to my acquaintance and care, 'as being, he said, in a consumption, and for that cure 'had changed the air and came into France, but was 'now going into England, with an intention to return 'within sixteen or twenty days, and then would stay 'here, or go into Languedoc for his health. Feeling 'his hand and pulse, I assured him that he was in no 'consumption nor never had been. Afterwards I perceived that this was but a pretence, and that he was 'an agent for that accursed crew, his name Watson, 'Scout-master to the rebels. I spake freely my mind 'of the murther, and the judgment that was made 'here by the French: his answer was, that the 'French abhorred the fact in general. I spared no 'curses, for I assure myself it is no sin to curse the enemies of God and my King. I asked Sir Kenelme 'Digby why he would go now into England, con'sidering the abomination of that country: his answer 'was that he had not any means to subsist longer, 'and if he went not now he must starve. I answered 'it was the better choice to die, if he remembered 'the obligations he had to the Queen-Regent of 'France, who took him from those that would have 'destroyed him. He answered, that the Queen-Regent knew of his going, and that he had the King of 'France's pass, and would return again suddenly. I 'next prest him to stay two or three months; he replied, that by that time all his business would be settled. 'I desired him not to think to have from those at 'London any toleration, for that for my part I had 'rather live in exile all the days of my life, and suffer 'at Tyburn when I came home, than that my publick 'liberty to serve God should spring from the bloody 'murtherers of my Sovereign.' What his thoughts were of the design appears likewise from his own words: 'The plot as I am told about, which Sir Kenelme Digby (who came a few days since to this town) is employed as agent to treat with those horrid rebels, 'the Independents of England, is for the subversion of 'successive hereditary monarchy there, and to make it 'elective, and to establish Popery there, and to give 'toleration to all manner of religions, except that of 'the Church of England according to the practice 'thereof.' The reader will observe that this treaty was with the Independents, and that as soon as the Presbyterian faction recovered power, Sir Kenelme Digby was banished by the Parliament, as an artful, busy, and dangerous person. When Oliver came into power the same design of the Papists was revived again, for the prosecution of which Sir Kenelme Digby came over in 1655, when he lived here in all the ease, freedom, and credit imaginable (33), conversing entirely with those who were favourers of that government, which induced Mr. Hoiles, afterwards Lord Holles, to publish a pamphlet, in which he addresses himself to Cromwell in the following terms (34): 'What liberty the 'Priests and Jesuits take, how far they prevail on the 'people, what countenance they receive from this 'government, is apparent enough by not proceeding 'against them in justice, as if no laws were in force 'for their punishment. Your private negotiations 'with the Pope, and your promises, that, as soon as 'you can establish your own greatness, you will protect 'the Catholicks, and the insinuations that you will 'countenance them much farther, are sufficiently 'known and understood; and of their dependance 'upon, and devotion to, you, there needs no evidence 'beyond

Sir Kenelme had left England, and was again in France, we find him not only applying to the government of England, and particularly to Secretary Thurloe, for private favours, but in reſpect to matters of publick concern (d), and on the behalf of the Engliſh Merchants at Calais, who, without doubt, would not have applied to him, if they had not believed his credit with the Protector better than their own. But what ſerves to put this matter entirely out of doubt, is a letter of his, which contains ſuch extraordinary acknowledgments and aſſurances, as renders it every way worthy of the reader's notice (e) [M]. After ſome ſtay at Paris, he went to ſpend the ſummer of the year 1656 at Toulouſe; and, as he had there the pleaſure of converſing with a great many learned and ingenious men, ſo he frequently entertained them, in his turn, not only with his Mathematical,

' beyond the book lately written by Mr. White, a Ro-
' miſh Prieſt, and dedicated to your favourite Sir Ke-
' nelme Digby, entitled, "The Grounds of Obedience
' and Government;" in which he juſtifies all the grounds
' and maxims in your declaration, and determines po-
' ſitively, that you ought to be ſo far from performing ' any promiſe, or obſerving any oath that you have ' taken, if you know that it is for the good of the ' people, that you break it. Albeit they foreſeeing
' all that you now ſee, did therefore bind you by oath
' not to do it, and that you offend both againſt your
' oath and fidelity to the people, if you maintain thoſe
' limitations you are ſworn to, and ſure what you do
' muſt be ſupported by ſuch Caſuiſts.' This point is ſtill more explicitly handled by Mr. Prynne, who tells us of Cromwell (35) ' that Sir Kenelme Digby was his ' particular favourite, and lodged by him at White-
' hall; that Maurice Conry, Provincial of the Fran-
' ciſcans in England, and other Prieſts, had his pro-
' tections under hand and ſeal, and that he ſuſpended
' laws and executions againſt Popiſh Prieſts and Jeſuits,
' though ſometimes taken in their pontificalibus at
' maſs, and were ſoon after releaſed; and that he en-
' deavoured to ſtop the bill againſt Papiſts the very
' morning he was to paſs it, by his Whitehall inſtru-
' ments, who moved its ſuſpenſion for a time, as not
' ſuiting with the then preſent foreign correſponden-
' cies, againſt whom it was carried by eighty-eight
' votes, that it ſhould be ſent up with the reſt then
' paſſed, and that he writ to Mazarine to excuſe his ' paſſing that bill, as being carried on by a violent
' Preſbyterian party, much againſt his will, and that
' yet it ſhould not hurt them though paſſed, &c.'
All theſe teſtimonies, taken conjunctly with the letter produced in the next note, are certainly very deciſive, and prove plainly, that Sir Kenelme had preciſely his father's principles, and purſued nothing with ſo much vehemence as the eſtabliſhment of Popery in England, under any government, and upon any terms. It is very ſtrange that this did not ruin him with the Queen-Dowager, but that it did not is very certain, as it likewiſe is, that theſe intrigues were continued to the very laſt hour of our diſturbances, Lambert, who made the final ſtruggle, being a concealed Papiſt, and King Charles II, or at leaſt his Miniſters, ſo thoroughly apprized of theſe points, as to ſend inſtructions to thoſe who managed his affairs in England, to concert nothing with the Papiſts (36), though, as we have ſeen, there might be honeſt men amongſt them, who deteſted thoſe treacherous arts, by which, after the miſcarriage of the Powder-treaſon, diſaffection was cunningly ſpread all over England, commotions excited in Scotland, and, by degrees, the body of the Papiſts in Ireland precipitated into a bloody maſſacre, and a moſt unnatural rebellion. As this detail has a near relation to Sir Kenelme Digby's perſonal hiſtory, ſo it opens to our view one of the darkeſt parts of that diſagreeable period of our Hiſtory, in which many people are apt to think that the Papiſts are accuſed rather from prejudice than proof; whereas in reality, though they muſt be allowed an admirable faculty in mining, yet it would not be at all impoſſible to prove, that, during this ſpace, the Popes and their agents were as active abroad, as Cromwell and his party were indefatigable at home, and both with the like views, though not from the ſame principles; and hence we may eaſily account for Sir Kenelme Digby's great favour and credit with the Protector.

Sir Kenelme Digby to Secretary Thurloe.

' Right Honourable, Paris, Mar. 18, 1656.

' THE French Ambaſſador taking leave of me
' yeſterday, told me, that his Secretary at London
' had, among other things, written to him, that Sir
' Robert Welſh had ſpoken ſomething to your Ho' nour much to my prejudice, and that ſince ſome letter
' of a Lady to me had been intercepted, the contents
' whereof did in ſome ſort make good what he had
' ſpoken. I believe your Honour hath ſo good infor' mation what this woful Knight is, that if there were ' nothing but the venom that his malicious tongue can
' ſpit, I ſhould not think it needful to trouble myſelf,
' much leſs your Honour's more ſerious occaſions, with ' taking any notice of it. But ſince he hath contrived
' as I verily believe, ſome better name than his own,
' to ſeem to juſtify what would have no credence
' from him, I may not ſit down without beſeeching
' your Honour to ſearch the matter to the bottom,
' and to drive it to the utmoſt. I look upon this as ' a contriving of his, becauſe forging of letters,
' and doing treacheries of this kind, hath been his
' ordinary courſe, and becauſe I am confident that
' nobody in the world, who hath ſo much familiarity
' with me as to write to me, but knoweth me ſo well,
' as to be ſure that whatſoever may be diſliked by my
' Lord Protector and the Council of State, muſt be ' deteſted by me. My obligations to his Highneſs are
' ſo great, that it would be a crime in me to behave
' myſelf ſo negligently as to give cauſe for any ſhadow
' of the leaſt ſuſpicion, or to do any thing that might ' require an excuſe or apology. I make it my buſineſs
' every where, to have all the world take notice how ' highly I eſteem myſelf obliged to his Highneſs, and
' how paſſionate I am for his ſervice, and for his ho' nour and intereſts, even to the expoſing of my life
' for them. If your Honour cannot readily find out
' the bottom of this villainy plotted againſt me upon
' notice of ſo much, I will take poſt the next day to ' return into England (though it may be much to the ' prejudice of my domeſtick affairs, in my broken
' eſtate, becauſe my debts are not yet quieted) and I ' doubt not but I ſhall ſoon make diſcovery of ſome
' wicked treachery intended againſt me: for this ' wretched creature hath as much malice to me as he is ' capable of, firſt, as being an Iriſh Papiſt (whoſe
' whole tribe have an implacable animoſity againſt me),
' and next, becauſe I have heretofore ſhamed him, and
' have broken ſome cheating deſigns of his, by making
' publick ſome of his infamous villanies, for which he ' never durſt make any expoſtulation with me. I
' humbly crave pardon of your Honour for ſuffering
' myſelf to be thus far tranſported. My excuſe is,
' that I ſhould think my heart were not an honeſt one,
' if the blood about it were not warmed with any the ' leaſt imputation upon my reſpects and my duty to ' his Highneſs, to whom I owe ſo much. I humbly
' crave a line or two from your Honour, that I may ' either reſolve to return preſently home, or remain
' ſatisfied by your having diſcovered the villany at' tempted againſt me, which, with all humility, ex' pecting, I reſt,

' Your Honour's Moſt Humble,

' and Moſt Obedient ſervant, &c.'

Phyſical,

Phyſical, and Philoſophical Diſcoveries, but with ſuch communications alſo received from his friends in the different parts of Europe, as he thought moſt capable either of extending knowledge, or of creating pleaſure or delight (f). Amongſt theſe was a relation he obtained concerning a petrified city in Africa, which he likewiſe tranſmitted to a friend in England in the month of September, the ſame year, and which very undeſervedly drew upon him a very heavy load of calumny and reproach (g) [N]. We find him the next year at Montpelier, in the South of France, whither he went, partly for the ſake of his health, which began to be impaired by ſevere fits of the ſtone, and partly for the ſake of enjoying the learned ſociety of ſeveral worthy and ingenious perſons, who had formed themſelves into a kind of academy (h) there, and to whom he read his large diſcourſe of the Sympathetic Powder, afterwards printed and publiſhed in ſeveral languages, and, at that time, generally well received (i) [O]. We are indebted to the letters lately publiſhed of the famous Mr. Algernon Sydney (k), for the knowledge of this Gentleman's paſſing the year 1658, and part of the year 1659, in the Lower Germany, and more eſpecially in the Palatinate; but, as to what he ſays of his going there by the name of Earl or Count Digby, and other circumſtances of a very diſparaging nature, they ſeem to flow from a mixture of inconnected reports, joined to a very high diſlike of the perſon to whom they related. It is probable, that he returned from thence towards the cloſe of the laſt mentioned year to Paris, where we find him in 1660, and employed there after his accuſtomed manner in converſing with the learned, moderating in their aſſemblies, and giving them occaſional lights from his own obſervations and informations. This circumſtance we derive from the pen of a very ingenious and knowing perſon, who wrote it as acceptable news to his great patron in England (l) [P]. He returned the following [N] A very heavy load of calumny and reproach.] The matter of fact hinted at in the text was plainly this: Mr. Fitton, an Engliſh Gentleman, who was at that time Library-Keeper to the Great Duke of Tuſcany, wrote a letter, dated July 2, 1656, to Sir Kenelme Digby, at Toulouſe, with an Account of a city within the territories of Tripoli in Africa, ſuppoſed to be entirely petrified by the riſing of a vapour out of the earth; which piece of intelligence Sir Kenelme having written to a friend in England, he was ſo free in communicating it, that it was at length printed in the Mercurius Politicus (38). The famous Dr. Stubbes took occaſion from this to ſhew at once his diſlike to Sir Kenelme Digby, and to gratify his profeſſed averſion for the Royal Society, by treating the thing as an abſurd and ridiculous falſhood, and by ſaying of Sir Kenelme, whom he would have repreſented as the author of it, That he was the Pliny of our age for lying (39). To ſhew that ſuch a city as this there is from the accounts given by modern writers, would indeed vindicate the ſagacity of our author, and ſhew that he made a better judgment of things than his antagoniſt Stubbes; but we can do more than this; for we can ſhew that Sir Kenelme did not either credit a haſty, or an idle report, but that it had been current ſome time, and the truth of it believed upon good authoriry; which is ſufficient to juſtify Sir Kenelme in his Philoſophic character, and to demonſtrate, that though he was extremely curious, he was not at all credulous (40).

The following Paper was delivered to Richard Waller, Eſq. Fellow of the Royal Society, by Mr. Baker, who was the Engliſh Conſul at Tripoli, Nov. 12, 1713.

'ABOUT forty days journey S. E. from Tripoli, 'and about ſeven days from the neareſt ſea coaſt, there 'is a place called Ougila, in which there are found the 'bodies of men, women, and children, beaſts and 'plants, all petrified of a hard ſtone-like marble. 'That about 1654 or 5, the Corſairs having taken ſe'veral of the Engliſh ſhips, Admiral Blake was ſent, 'with a ſquadron of men of war to Tripoli, from which 'place and Tunis he had all the captives delivered 'without ranſom, at which time the report of this diſ'covery of the abovementioned city was new, ſo that 'he obliged the Alkade to procure a whole figure for 'him, which he promiſed. But Blake not ſtaying 'long enough there, but ſailing to Leghorn, he ſent 'a ſmall frigate to Tripoli to fetch it aboard; in 'which frigate one Mr. Hebden (then a young gen'tleman) went, who told Mr. Baker, that he himſelf 'ſaw a figure of a man petrified, which was conveyed 'to Leghorn, and thence to England, and that it was 'carried to Secretary Thurloe.

'The ſame Mr. Baker told me, that, when he was 'at Tripoli, he ſpoke with ſeveral Turks, who af'firmed themſelves to have been eye-witneſſes of the 'ſaid petrifaction. That particularly an officer that 'commanded a garriſon of two hundred men, on a 'frontier place called Derney, not many days journey 'from the place, had promiſed him to procure a figure 'thence; the ſame affirmed the relation, that accord'ingly he ſent ſome ſpies to find the place, which at 'that time they could not, as he ſent him word, it 'being wholly buried in the ſands, which in that 'country are carried in great clouds; that a ſtrong 'north wind blows the ſand off, and by that means 'diſcovers the place, which, at other times, is covered 'by theſe ſands.

'He farther told me, that this Mr. Hebden died 'about two years ſince a priſoner in the Fleet, though 'he had been formerly ſent to Moſcow by King 'Charles II. He ſaid he had procured the arm of a 'fig-tree, as big as his arm, petrified, whereon the 'bark and wood were plainly viſible, the bark grey, 'the wood yellowiſh, of the true colour of the plant; 'that in the bark was a groove, in which were ſeveral 'ſmall inſects, like the lady-cow, petrified; that he 'had preſented this piece of petrified wood to my 'Lord Torrington, in whoſe poſſeſſion he believes it 'now is.'

[O] At that time generally well received.] Our author deſigned to have collected Roger Bacon's Works, and actually tranſlated from the Latin of Albertus Magnus, Biſhop of Ratiſbon, a ſmall piece, intituled,

VIII. "A Treatiſe of adhering to God," Lond. 1654, 8vo.

IX. "Of the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of "Sympathy," Lond. 1658, ſpoken in French in a ſolemn aſſembly at Montpellier in France, in 1657, and tranſlated into Engliſh by Richard White, Lond. 1660, reprinted at London with the Treatiſe of Bodies, anno 1669, and tranſlated into Latin by Laur. Stranſius of Darmſted in Heſſe. It is alſo printed in the book intituled, "Theatrum Sympatheticum," publiſhed by John Andreas Endter at Norimberg, 1662, in 4to, of which there is an account in our Philoſophical Tranſactions. As to the philoſophical arguments in this treatiſe, and the manner in which the author accounts for the ſtrange operations of this remedy, they were highly admired in thoſe days, have been often copied ſince, and even in this inquiſitive and judicious age, are allowed to be very ingenious, though not very convincing.

[P] Who wrote it as acceptable news to his great patron in England.] The perſon mentioned in the text is Mr. Oldenburgh, afterwards Secretary to the Royal Society, who, in his letter to Mr. Boyle, dated Paris Mar. 20, 1660, writes thus (41): 'Sir Kenelme 'Digby will himſelf aſſure you, by the annexed, of 'his lowing year to England, and was very well received at Court, notwithſtanding the Miniſters were far from being ignorant of the irregularity in his conduct, and the court that he had paid to Oliver while the King was in exile (m). It does not, however, appear, that any other favour was ſhewn him, than ſeemed to be due to a man of letters (n). In the firſt ſettlement of the Royal Society, we find him appointed one of the Council, by the title of Sir Kenelme Digby, Knight, Chancellor to our dear mother Queen Mary (o). He was not likely to be conſidered or truſted in the beginning of King Charles's adminiſtration, becauſe he not only ſhewed himſelf an open but a buſy Papiſt, interfered in their quarrels, and declared himſelf, upon all occaſions, an eager enemy to the Jeſuits (p), who were not at all behind with him in reſentment, but took all the care they could to leſſen his character, and to defame him. As long as his health would permit, he attended the meetings of the Royal Society, and gave his aſſiſtance towards the improvements that were then made in uſeful knowledge. One of his diſcourſes (q) was printed and publiſhed by itſelf, of which we ſhall take notice [Q]. He ſpent the remainder of his days at his houſe in Covent-Garden, where he enjoyed the company of his friends, and was much viſited by the lovers of Mathematical and Philoſophical Learning; ſo that, according to a cuſtom which then prevailed much in France, he had a kind of Academy, or Literary Aſſembly, in his own dwelling (r). Some years before his death, he cauſed a vault to be built under the eaſt end of the ſouth iſle of Chriſt-Church within Newgate, in which was depoſited the body of his wife, and over it was erected a very ſtately altar monument of black marble, whereon her buſt, made of copper gilt, was placed, with four inſcriptions in honour of her memory (s). This lady's name was Venetia, daughter to Sir Edward Stanley, of Tongue-Caſtle, in Shropſhire, Knight of the Bath, by his wife the Lady Lucy, daughter and coheireſs of Thomas Piercy, Earl of Northumberland (t), which Sir Edward Stanley was the ſon of Sir Thomas Stanley, Knight, and grandſon of Edward Earl of Derby (u), by the Lady Dorothy Howard, daughter of Thomas Duke of Norfolk. We ſhould have been able to have rendered this article much more perfect, if we could have had the aſſiſtance of that noble manuſcript which Sir Kenelme cauſed to be collected at the expence of a thouſand pounds, as well out of private memorials, as from publick hiſtories and records in the Tower, and elſewhere, relating to the Digby family in all its branches (w): but not knowing where this was to be found, we have drawn together, with no ſmall pains, what lay ſcattered about him in a variety of authors, and have digeſted the ſeveral facts they mentioned in the beſt order we could. In the ſummer of the year 1665, his old diſtemper the ſtone increaſed upon him very much, and

'his reſpects to you. We met lately at the houſe of 'a Chemiſt, where the queſtion was agitated about the 'diſſolvent of gold, Whether the univerſal ſpirit of 'the world, in its undetermined nature, or, as it is 'ſpecified and contracted to a mineral, be the menſtruum of that noble metal? The diſcuſſion hereof 'being rather made by authority than reaſon, gave 'ſmall ſatisfaction to the auditors, whereof the learned 'Knight himſelf being the chief, did moderate the 'action, but not determine the queſtion, interlacing 'the diſcourſes of others with ſeveral conſiderable re'lations, whereof two did raviſh the hearers to admi'ration. The one was of a King's houſe in England, 'which having ſtood covered with lead for five or ſix 'ages, and being ſold after that, was found to con'tain three-fourths of ſilver in the lead thereof. 'The other was of a fixed ſalt, drawn out of a certain 'potters earth here in France, at a place called Ar'cueil, which ſalt being for ſome time expoſed to the 'ſun-beams, became ſalt-petre, then vitriol, then lead, 'tin, copper, ſilver, and, at the end of fourteen 'months, gold; which he aſſured to have experienced 'himſelf, and another able Naturaliſt beſides him. 'I muſt confeſs I would rather ſee this than believe it, 'though the author be a very authentick gentleman.' Theſe facts, as they are very cloſely ſet down, and without any illuſtration of circumſtances, have an air of incredibility: but without doubt if we knew exactly how they were related by Sir Kenelme, they would not appear either ſo ſtrange or ſo improbable. As to the alterations of lead indeed, and its growing heavier in time, ſo as to endanger the buildings covered with it, we meet with ſome very extraordinary inſtances in Mr. Boyle's own writings (42): and as to the other matter, ſtrange as it is, it appears not to have reſted entirely upon Sir Kenelme Digby's authority, and ſeems beſides to have ſome concurrence with the accurate experiments long afterwards made in France by that ingenious and candid Chemiſt Mr. Homberg. It may not however be amiſs to remark, by the way, that Sir Kenelme Digby had a true philoſophic ſpirit, and was much more covetous of knowledge than of wealth, and as deſirous of communicating ſcience as of obtaining it; which ſometimes expoſed him, as it hath done other great men, to the ſupercilious contempt of perſons far inferior both in learning and in underſtanding.

[Q] Of which we ſhall take notice.] In this note we are to ſpeak of the laſt genuine work of our author; which was,

X. "Diſcourſe Concerning the Vegetation of Plants." Lond. 1661, 8*vo*, and again in 1669, 4*to*, printed in Latin at Amſterdam 1663, and again in 1669, 12*mo*, under this title: "Diſſertatio de Plantarum Vegetatione."

This work is highly applauded by the learned Morhoff, whoſe judicious character of it will give the reader a true idea of the worth of our author (43). 'Magnam huic vegetationi lucem affert liber Kenelmi 'Digbæi, de Vegetatione Plantarum, è lingua Angl. in 'Lat. converſus, quo eleganter proceſſum nutritionis & 'accretionis è ſemine demonſtrat, cujus Diſſertationis 'argumentum libro ſuo de immortalitate animæ inſeruit. Tota illa Diſſertatio ſubtiliſſima eſt, & cum accuratione legi meretur. Mathematica demonſtratione 'enim ob oculos ponit, quomodo à primo ſeminali 'puncto partes extra partes procedunt, partim ſalibus 'aëris aut terreſtribus evocatæ, partim preſſione aëris & 'humoris externi, partim calore ſubterraneo, quæ omnia 'hic ſingulatim explicare, nimis eſſet operoſum. Vi'deatur Auctor ille, & cum ipſo conferatur Honor: Fa'ber, qui partes plantarum, quæ ſucceſſione excreſcunt, 'optime delineavit, &, ut exiſtimo, maxime ad men'tem Digbæi.'

The reader may find in Wood, and in ſome other authors, ſeveral pieces attributed to Sir Kenelme Digby (44); but as theſe were publiſhed after his deceaſe by one Hartman, who was his Operator, and who put Sir Kenelme Digby's name in the title-page, with a view to recommend compoſitions very unworthy of him to the publick; they ſeem by no means to deſerve a place here, which, with our deſire to bring this article within bounds as much as poſſible, are our reaſons for rejecting them.

brought him very low, which rendered him desirous, as it is said, of going to France (x); which, however, he lived not to accomplish, but deceased on his birth-day, June 11th, 1665 (y), when he was sixty-two years of age: his corpse was interred near that of his lady in the Church before-mentioned (z). Sir Kenelme's valuable library, which was justly esteemed a most excellent collection, had been transported into France at the first breaking out of the troubles, and improved there at a very considerable expence; but, as he was no subject of his Most Christian Majesty's, it became, according to that branch of the prerogative which the French style Droit d' Aubain, the property of the Crown upon Sir Kenelme's decease. This was a very great injury to his family, as may appear from hence, that, being afterwards begged from that King, the new possessor, for I think one can hardly call him proprietor, sold it (and, it is very probable, below its real value) for ten thousand crowns. Sir Kenelme left an only son, John Digby, Esq. who succeeded to the family estate (a); and, therefore, there is plainly some mistake in the account given us by a certain great Historian (b), who says, that the death of this son of Sir Kenelme produced the ruin of his family, as that did the finding his grandfather's papers; of which, in the former article, we gave some account, and of which it will be necessary to say somewhat farther here [R]. This John Digby, Esq. of Gothurst in Buck-

[R] To say somewhat farther here.] The great Historian mentioned in the text is the Bishop of Salisbury, who seems to have had some particular concern in this extraordinary transaction, or at least to have been for some time possessed of Sir Everard Digby's original papers. His own words are these (45): 'I will mention what I myself saw, and had for some time in my 'possession: Sir Everard Digby died for being of the 'conspiracy. He was the father of the famous Sir 'Kenelme Digby. The family being ruined upon the 'death of Sir Kenelme's son, when the executors were 'looking out for writings to make out the titles of the 'estates they were to sell, they were directed by an 'old servant to a cupboard that was very artificially 'hid, in which some papers lay that she had observed 'Sir Kenelme was oft reading. They looking into it 'found a velvet bag, within which there were two 'other silk bags (so carefully were those relicks kept), 'and there was within these a collection of all the 'letters that Sir Everard writ during his imprisonment. 'In these he expresses great trouble, because he heard 'some of their friends blamed their undertaking: he 'highly magnifies it, and says, if he had many lives 'he would willingly have sacrificed them all in carrying it on. In one paper he says, they had taken 'that care that there was not above two or three worth 'saving, to whom they had not given notice to keep 'out of the way: and in none of those papers does he 'express any sort of remorse for that which he had 'been engaged in, and for which he suffered.' We will now compare this with the attestation prefixed to the papers (46): 'The several papers and letters of 'Sir Everard Digby, which are, as we have been credibly informed, the original papers and letters written by him concerning the Gunpowder-treason, were 'found by us Sir Rice Rudd, Bart. and William Wogan of Gray's-Inn, Esq; in the presence of Mrs. Ursula Giles, and Mr. Thomas Hughes, about the month 'of September 1675, at the house of Charles Cornwallis, Esq; who was Executor of Sir Kenelme Digby (son and heir to the said Sir Everard) tied up in 'two silk bags, amongst the deeds, evidences, and 'writings of the said Sir Kenelme Digby.

Polyhistor. 4o. 2.

It is not clear from the Prelate's account whose executors he means, but it looks as if it were the executors of Sir Kenelme's son (47); whereas the certificate shews, that the papers were not found by any executors at all, but by two gentlemen of credit, in the house of the executor of Sir Kenelme Digby. In the certificate two silk bags are mentioned, though not the velvet bag; and, which is very singular, there is no notice at all taken of their being led to this discovery by hearing of the cupboard, or of the old servant; but there are the names of two persons in whose presence they were found, and it is not impossible they might take to themselves some merit in the discovery. But from the certificate, one can see no reason to judge they were hidden at all, but rather that they were accidentally found, searching among Sir Kenelme's papers, who might die in circumstances indifferent as to himself, but whose estate, as we have seen, was too well secured to prejudice his son or his family.

 [The Correspondent to whom we have so often been obliged has remarked, that the story of the cure of the warts, related in note [B], is very different from the operation of the Sympathetic Powder. In the former case, the medicine was applied; and if the bacon had any effect, it was owing to that circumstance, and not to its being nailed at the post of a south window. It may, however, be observed, that even Lord Verulam was not exempted from the credulity of his age; since, otherwise, he would not have mentioned so childish a receipt for removing warts. With respect to the quotation from Bayle, our friend adds, "Bayle was no philosopher. And "as he often disbelieved, so perhaps he might some-"times believe from singularity. King Charles the "Second said, that Vossius believed every thing but "the Bible. Lord Shaftesbury observes something "to the same purpose of many unbelievers, that they "scrupled to credit a Christian, but easily assented "to the truth of a Chinese Miracle."

Sir Kenelme Digby seems to have obtained a reputation that was beyond his merit. He was undoubtedly a man of strong natural abilities, and possessed of considerable learning; but he has no claim to the character of a sound philosopher. His notions were visionary, and his credulity very great; besides which, we are afraid that his veracity may sometimes be called in question. It is not easy to give credit to all which he relates concerning his Sympathetic Powder; and it is still more difficult to believe his story of the transmutations of a fixed salt, though he asserted that he had experienced them himself. We admire the candour of our ingenious predecessor in his narration of these matters, but we cannot pay an equal compliment to his judgment.

Whimsical and ill-founded as was Sir Kenelme Digby's philosophy, he was not without his followers. One of them attained so much celebrity, especially abroad, that Bayle has thought him deserving of an article; for which reason we shall give a short account of him in this place. The person we are speaking of was usually called, especially in France, Thomas Anglus; and under that appellation the lives that occur of him, in different Biographical works, are written. As an author, he occasionally assumed other signatures, but his real name was Thomas White. He was the son of Richard White, Esq; of Hatton in the county of Essex, by Mary his wife, daughter of Edmund Plowden, the famous lawyer in Queen Elizabeth's reign. His parents being Roman Catholics, he was educated, probably abroad, in the strictest principles of that profession, and at length became a secular priest (48). In that character he resided very much in foreign parts. He was principal of the College at Lisbon, and sub-principal of that at Douay; but his longest stay was at Rome and Paris. For a conſiderable time, he lived in the houſe of Sir Kenelme Digby; and he ſhewed his attachment to that gentleman's philoſophy by various publications. His firſt work of this kind was printed at Lyons, in 1646. It is entituled, Inſtitutionum Peripateticarum ad mentem ſummi clariſſimique Philoſophi Kenelmi Equitis Digbæi. "Inſtitutions of the Peripatetic Philoſophy, according "to the Hypotheſis of the great and celebrated Phi- "loſopher Sir Kenelme Digby." Mr. White was not contented with paying homage to Sir Kenelme on account of his philoſophical opinions, but raiſed him alſo to the character of a Divine. A proof of this is afforded in a book publiſhed by him, the title of which is, Quæſtio Theologica, quomodo ſecundum principia Peripapetices Digbæanæ, ſive ſecundum rationem, et abſtrahendo, quantum materia patitur, ab authoritate, humani Arbitrii Libertas, ſit explicanda, et cum Gratia efficaci concilianda. "A Theological Queſtion, in "what Manner, according to the Principles of Sir "Kenelme Digby's Peripatetic Philoſophy, or accord- "ing to Reaſon, abſtracting, as much as the Subject "will admit, from Authority, the Freedom of a Man's "Will, is to be explained and reconciled with Efficacious "Grace." Another publication to the ſame purpoſe, which appeared in 1652, was entituled Inſtitutiones Theologicæ ſuper Fundamentis in Peripatetica Digbæana jactis exſtructæ. "Inſtitutions of Divinity, built "upon the Foundations laid down in Sir K. Digby's "Peripatatic Philoſophy."

Buckinghamſhire, dying many years after his father, left behind him, by his wife Margaret, daughter of Sir Edward Longueville, of Wolverton, in the ſame county, Baronet, by

By his friend Sir Kenelme Mr. White was introduced, with large commendations, to the acquaintance of Des Cartes, who hoped to make a proſelyte of him; but without ſucceſs. Thomas Anglus was too much devoted to Ariſtotle's philoſophy to admit of the truth of any other ſyſtem. In his application of that philoſophy to Theological Doctrines, he embarraſſed himſelf in ſo many nice diſtinctions, and gave ſuch a free ſcope to his own thoughts, that he pleaſed neither the Moliniſts nor the Janſeniſts. Indeed, though he had a genius very penetrating and extenſive, he had no talent at diſtinguiſhing the ideas which ſhould have ſerved as the rule and foundation of his reaſonings, nor at clearing the points which he was engaged to defend. His anſwer to thoſe who accuſed him of obſcurity may ſerve to diſplay the peculiarity of his diſpoſition. "I value myſelf," ſays he, "upon ſuch a brevity and conciſeneſs, as is "ſuitable for the teachers of the ſciences. The Di- "vines are the cauſe that my writings continue ob- "ſcure; for they refuſe to give me any occaſion of "explaining myſelf. In ſhort, either the learned "underſtand me, or they do not. If they do un- "derſtand me, and find me in an error, it is eaſy "for them to refute me; if they do not underſtand "me, it is very unreaſonable for them to exclaim "againſt my doctrines." This, obſerves Mr. Bayle, ſhews the temper of a man who ſeeks only to be talked of, and is vexed at not having antagoniſts enow to draw the regard and attention of the public upon him (49). Conſidering the ſpeculative turn of Mr. White's mind, it is not ſurprizing that ſome of his books were condemned at Rome by the congregation of the "Index Expurgatorius," and that they were diſapproved of by certain Univerſities. The Treatiſes which found their way into the "Index Expurgatorius," were "Inſtitutiones Peripateticæ;" "Appendix Theologica de Origine Mundi;" "Ta- "bula ſuffragialis de Terminandis Fidei Litibus "ab Eccleſia Catholica Fixa;" and "Teſſeræ Ro- "manæ Evulgatio." In oppoſition to the Doctors of Douay, who had cenſured two and twenty propoſitions extracted from his "Sacred Inſtitutions," he publiſhed a piece, entituled, "Supplicatio poſtula- "tiva Juſtitiæ," in which he complains that they had given a vague uncertain cenſure of him, attended only with a reſpective, without taxing any propoſition in particular; and he ſhews them that this is acting like prevaricating divines. Another of his works was the "Sonitus Buccinæ," in which he maintained that the Church had no power to determine, but only to give her teſtimony to tradition.

(49) General Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary. Vol. II. p. 2, 3.

This likewiſe was cenſured. Mr. White had a very particular notion concerning the ſtate of ſouls ſeparated from the body, which involved him in a diſpute with the Biſhop of Chalcedon (50). Two tracts were written by him upon this ſubject, of which a large and elaborate account is given in Archdeacon Blackburne's Hiſtorical View of the controverſy concerning an intermediate ſtate. The concluſion drawn by the Archdeacon is, that Mr. White entered into the queſtion with more preciſion and greater abilities than any man of his time; and that it is very clear, from the inconſiſtencies he ran into to ſave the reputation of his orthodoxy, that if the word purgatory had been out of his way, he would have found no difficulty to diſpoſe of the ſeparate ſoul in a ſtate of abſolute unconſcious reſt (51).

Our author ſpent the latter part of his life in England. Hobbes had a great reſpect for him, and when he lived in Weſtminſter, would often viſit him. In their converſations they would carry on their debates with ſuch eagerneſs as ſeldom to depart in cool blood; for "they would wrangle, ſquabble, and "ſcold," ſays Anthony Wood, "about philoſophi- "cal matters, like young ſophiſters," though they were both of them eighty years of age. In conſequence of Hobbes's not being able to endure contradiction, thoſe ſcholars who were ſometimes preſent at theſe wrangling diſputes, held that the laurel was carried away by White (52).

(52) Athenæ Oxonienſes, Vol. ii. col. 665

It is remarkable that Mr. White's book, "De "medio Animarum Statu," was cenſured by the Houſe of Commons. In the Journal of that Houſe is the following Reſolution:

Anno 1666.

"Die Mercurii 17° Octobris 18° Car. II.

"Ordered, That the Committee to which the "Bill againſt Atheiſm and profaneneſs is committed, "be impowered to receive information touching ſuch "books as tend to Atheiſm, Blaſphemy, and pro- "faneneſs, or againſt the eſſence and attributes of "God, and in particular the book publiſhed in the "name of one White, and the book of Mr. Hobbes "called the Leviathan, and to report their opinions "to the Houſe *."

* Journals of the Houſe of Commons, Vol. VIII. p. 636.

In thoſe days, to call in Queſtion the natural immortality of the human ſoul was underſtood to imply atheiſm. White's treatiſe had certainly a tendency to weaken the arguments for that immortality, by weakening the common proofs of the ſoul's conſciouſneſs in a future ſtate; but there was nothing in his work which could juſtly be conſtrued as being of an atheiſtical nature. It does not appear that the bill againſt Atheiſm and Profaneneſs ever paſſed, or that the Commons proceeded farther in their cenſures of White and Hobbes. Perhaps White would not have been cenſured, in the Houſe of Parliament, for his Theological Notions, if he had not been obnoxious to the politicians of the time on another account. "To underſtand this," ſays Archdeacon Blackburne, "it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that White "was a diſciple of Sir Kenelme Digby, not only in "philoſophy, but alſo in politicks. The knight has "been accuſed, and upon very authentic evidence, "of intriguing with Cromwell, to the prejudice of "the exiled Stuarts. Whether White was in the "depth of the ſecret or not, it is probable that he "knew ſomething of the tranſaction, and that Digby "might ſet him to work with his pen, in favour of "Cromwell's government.

"Be this as it might, White wrote a book, about "that time, entituled, "The Grounds of Obedience and "Government;" wherein he held, "That the people, by "the evil management, or inſufficiency of their Governor, "are remitted to the force of nature to provide for them- "ſelves, and not bound by any promiſe made to their "Governor: that the magiſtrate, by his miſcarriages, "abdicateth himſelf from being a magiſtrate, and "proveth a brigand or robber; inſtead of a defender:— "that if he be innocent and wrongfully depoſed, and to- "tally diſpoſſeſſed, it were better for the common good "to ſtay as they are, than to venture the reſtoring him, "becauſe of the public hazard." (53)

Mr. White departed this life, at his lodging in Drury Lane, on the ſixth of July, 1676, aged ninety-four years, and, on the ninth day of the ſame month, was buried in the church of St. Martin's in the Fields. We ſhall cloſe our addition to Sir Kenelme Digby's article with the maſterly character drawn of him by Lord Clarendon. "Sir Kenelme Digby," ſays the noble hiſtorian, "was a perſon very eminent and "notorious throughout the whole courſe of his life, "from his cradle to his grave: of an ancient family "and noble extraction; and inherited a fair and "plentiful fortune, notwithſtanding the attainder of "his father. He was a man of a very extraordinary "perſon and preſence, which drew the eyes of all "men upon him, which were more fixed by a won-"derful graceful behaviour, a flowing courteſy and "civility, and ſuch a volubility of language, as ſur-"priſed, and delighted; and though in another "man it might have appeared to have ſomewhat of "affectation, it was marvellous graceful in him, and "ſeemed natural to his ſize, and mould of his per-"ſon, to the gravity of his motion, and the tune "of his voice and delivery. He had a fair reputation "in Arms, of which he gave an early teſtimony "in his youth, in ſome encounters in Spain, and "Italy, and afterwards in an action in the Medi-"terranean Sea, where he had the Command of a "Squadron of ſhips of war ſet out at his own charge "under the King's Commiſſion; with which, upon "an injury received, or apprehended from the Vene-"tians, he encountered their whole fleet, killed "many of their men, and ſunk one of their galeaſſes; "which in that drowſy and unactive time was looked "upon with a general eſtimation, though the crown "diſavowed it. In a word, he had all the advan-"tages that nature, and art, and an excellent edu-"cation could give him, which, with a great con-"fidence and preſentneſs of mind, buoyed him up "againſt all thoſe prejudices, and diſadvantages (as "the attainder and execution of his father for a "crime of the higheſt nature; his own marriage "with a Lady, though of an extraordinary beauty, "of as extraordinary a fame; his changing and "rechanging his religion; and ſome perſonal "vices, and licences in his life) which would have "ſuppreſſed and ſunk any other man, but never "clouded or eclipſed him, from appearing in the "beſt places, and the beſt company, and with the "beſt eſtimation and ſatisfaction (56)].

 [DIGBY (JOHN), the firſt Earl of Briſtol, and an Embaſſador and Stateſman of eminence, was born at Coleſhill, in Warwickſhire, in February, 1580, and was the youngeſt ſon of Sir George Digby, Knight, by Abigail his wife, daughter of Sir Arthur Hevenengham, a Gentleman ſeated in the county of Norfolk. That the family of the Digbies was ancient and honourable, and that it was divided into numerous and flouriſhing branches, is ſufficiently apparent from Dugdale's Baronage, and other Peerages. John, the ſubject of the preſent article, after having gone through a proper courſe of grammatical education, was admitted a Commoner of Magdalen-College, Oxford, in 1595, and made himſelf known in the following year, by a copy of verſes, compoſed on the death of Sir Henry Unton, of Wadley, in Berkſhire. Upon quitting the Univerſity, which he appears to have done without taking a Degree, he traveled into France and Italy; from which countries he returned into England a very accompliſhed young gentleman (a) About this time a circumſtance occurred, which introduced him to the notice and favour of King James the Firſt. When the Conſpirators in the gunpowder-plot had formed the deſign of ſeizing the Princeſs Elizabeth, then reſiding at Combe, in Warwickſhire, under the guardianſhip of Lord Harrington, his Lordſhip, who had received private intimation of the ſcheme, ſent Mr. Digby to court, to lay the matter before his Majeſty; which commiſſion he executed with ſo much fidelity and addreſs, that a high opinion was formed of his abilities; and he was immediately promoted to be a Gentleman of the Privy Chamber, and one of the King's Carvers (b). On the preceding thirtieth of Auguſt, of the ſame year (1605), he had been created Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford, his Majeſty being then upon a viſit to that Univerſity (c). He received the honour of Knighthood on the ſixteenth of March following; and in April, 1611, was appointed Embaſſador to Spain. In 1614, he was again ſent to that kingdom in the ſame character; and continued there till he was ſucceeded by Mr. Francis Cottington, who went thither on the third of January, 1615-16. Sir John Digby arrived in England about the middle of March; and on the third of April, 1616, was preferred to the poſt of Vice-Chamberlain of the Houſehold, and ſworn of the Privy Council. King James having formed the deſign of negotiating a marriage between Charles Prince of Wales and the Infanta Maria daughter to Philip the Third King of Spain, Sir John Digby was thought to be a proper perſon for the purpoſe; and accordingly he was commiſſioned to carry it into execution. In the commiſſion, which bore date on the 16th of April, 1617, he was highly commended for his fidelity, wiſdom, induſtry, and experience. He repaired to Spain in July; and upon his return, which was in the next year, he was raiſed, on the twenty-fifth of November, to the dignity of the Peerage, by the title of Baron Digby of Shireburne, in the County of Dorſet. The caſtle and manor of that town had been previouſly granted to him by the King; and he purchaſed the monaſtery and parſonage about the year 1620. In that year, he was ſent Embaſſador to the Archduke Albert; and, in the ſucceeding year, to the Emperor Ferdinand the Second; and alſo to the Duke of Bavaria. The purpoſe of theſe embaſſies, and eſpecially of that to the Emperor, was to obtain a poſitive anſwer concerning the recovery of the Palatinate, and to accompliſh that event without the neceſſity of having recourſe to actual war (d). The ability with which Lord Digby conducted this buſineſs will be apparent from the large diſpatches relating to it, which are printed in the Appendix to the firſt volume of the Clarendon State Papers (e); and a more conciſe view of the matter may be ſeen in a ſpeech delivered by him in the Houſe of Lords, in the month of November, 1621, ſoon after his return to England (f). With regard to the grand object of his negotiation, we need not ſay that he was unſucceſsful. The reſtoration of the Palatinate was not to be obtained. Perhaps it was the King's diſappointment in this reſpect, that, amongſt other cauſes, the more ſtrongly impelled him to puſh forward, with freſh vigour, the Spaniſh match, from the completion of which alone he could hope to procure favourable terms for his ſon-in-law. Be this as it may, Lord Digby was commiſſioned, in March, 1622, to go into Spain, as Embaſſador extraordinary, to negotiate (in conjunction with Sir Walter Aſton, who reſided there as Embaſſador in ordinary), a treaty of friendſhip and alliance with Philip the Fourth, who had lately come to the crown by the deceaſe of his father, and to conclude the long-depending marriage. In conſideration of his Lordſhip's merits, as well as to give greater credit to his negotiations, he was created, on the fifteenth of September following, Earl of Briſtol (g).

It is not our deſign to enter particularly into the buſineſs of the Spaniſh match, which makes a prominent figure in the various hiſtories of this kingdom. All that is neceſſary to our preſent purpoſe is, only to take notice of it ſo far as more immediately relates to the Earl of Briſtol. His Lordſhip appears to have been himſelf fully convinced of the wiſdom and good policy of the marriage; and, therefore, beſides the general obligation he was under to diſcharge the duty of his commiſſion with fidelity, he was ardently ſolicitous to bring the affair to an accompliſhment. So zealous was King James upon the matter, that if Briſtol had finally ſucceeded in his negotiation, it was likely that he would come into great favour with his Majeſty, and probably too with the heir apparent. The honour and advantage he was hence in the road of acquiring excited the envy and jealouſy of the favourite Buckingham; upon which account he contrived the journey of himſelf and the Prince of Wales into Spain (b). At firſt, every thing ſeemed to proſper in the fulleſt manner: but at length the Prince and Buckingham quitted that kingdom in diſguſt, and in the way to which no readers of the Engliſh hiſtory can be ſtrangers. After the Prince's return to England, he ſtill continued to profeſs great ſolicitude for the completion of the match, though in the end it was wholly broken off. That the Earl of Briſtol, as well as the Spaniſh Court, ſuſpected him of ſome duplicity in the buſineſs, is evident from the letters which the Earl wrote home from Madrid, and in one of which, dated on September the twenty-fourth, 1623, new ſtile, he expreſſes himſelf in the following terms: "I muſt now crave leave to ſpeak unto your Highneſs "like a faithful plain ſervant; which is, that if your Highneſs's pleaſure be to have "made uſe of the powers you have left in my hands, I no way doubt but in this parti-"cular ſuch ſatisfaction will be given as will appear reaſonable to all the world. But, "if your Highneſs deſire that theſe powers ſhould not be uſed, they may be detained "upon other juſt reaſons, which will ariſe in the treaty of the temporal articles; and "I doubt not but the deſpoſorios may be deferred upon other fair pretexts: but theſe in-"conveniences I conceive will follow. Firſt, it will be of great diſcomfort to the " Infanta, who, until the deſpoſorios are paſt, is not her own woman, but muſt be governed " by the pleaſure of the Junta, which, I think ſhe is very weary of; neither till then " may ſhe declare herſelf to be your's, nor comply with your Highneſs in anſwering of " your letters and meſſages, and giving you thoſe reſpects and comforts which I know " ſhe would be glad to do; but, if ſhe ſhould any way judge that the delay of the " deſpoſorios ſhould ariſe from your Highneſs's part, I conceive ſhe would take it moſt " heavily. Secondly, it will certainly raiſe great jealouſies in this King and his Miniſ- " ters, and retard the reſolutions that are fit to be taken with ſpeed for the putting in " execution that which is capitulated. I therefore offer it unto your Highneſs's wiſ- " dom, whether, upon the ſatisfaction which they will give in this particular, which " will be whatſoever you can deſire, and upon the agreement of the temporal articles, " your Highneſs would, upon the coming of the Pope's approbation, have me make " any further ſcruple in the delivering of your Highneſs's powers? If I ſhall, I am " confident they will not preſs it, as not decent for the woman's part to urge the " haſtening of the marriage. But, I conceive, it will caſt ſuch a cloud of jealouſy and " diſtruſt upon the buſineſs, that, beſide the diſcontent and affliction which I know it " will give unto the Infanta (which moſt worketh with me), it will ſo diſorder the " buſineſs, that it will make a ſtand in the whole proceedings and preparations, where- " in they now go on chearfully and confidently, and, I conceive, will punctually per- " form all they have capitulated with your Highneſs.

" I dare not ſo much as give myſelf leave once to queſtion your Highneſs's intention " of proceeding to the real effecting of the match; which makes me deſirous that all " things may be excuſed that may any way retard or diſturb it. Only I ſhall, like a " faithful though poor ſervant, preſume thus much to ſay unto your Highneſs, that, " for divers years paſt, I know the King your Father and yourſelf have held this the " fitteſt match in the world; and, by a deſire of effecting it, your Highneſs was in- " duced to undertake that hazardous journey of coming to this Court in perſon. In the " time of your being here, admitting that their proceedings have been in many things " unworthy of you, and that diſtaſtes have grown up by intervenient accidents, yet " now, things being reduced to thoſe terms, that the match itſelf is ſure, the portion " and the temporal articles ſettled, I hope to the King's liking and your's, and all other " good effects that could be hoped for by this alliance are in a fair way; if to theſe " reaſons may be added, that, on his Majeſty and your Highneſs's part, you have " already paſt and overcome the main difficulties, and your Highneſs, by your journey, " hath ſatisfied yourſelf of the perſon and worth of the Infanta, GOD forbid that any " perſonal diſtaſtes of miniſters, or any indiſcreet or paſſionate carriages of buſineſſes, " ſhould hazard that which your Majeſty and your Highneſs have done ſo much for to " obtain, and whereby, doubtleſs, ſo much good and peace is to accrue to Chriſten- " dom by the effecting it; and, contrariwiſe, ſo much trouble and miſchief by the " miſcarrying of it, beſides the individual happineſs of your Highneſs in ſuch a wife, " which the world ſuppoſeth you infinitely eſteem for her perſon, and for her birth " and portion is no where to be matched; and, queſtionleſs, for her virtue and ſettled " affection to your Highneſs, deſerveth you better than any woman in the world.

" I humbly crave pardon for writing to your Highneſs in this manner; which I hope " your Highneſs well knoweth, that neither the benefits I have received from Spain, nor " their grateful uſage to me upon occaſions, nor, I proteſt unto your Highneſs, any " earthly reſpect moveth me unto it, but the love and zeal I bear to your ſervice, for " which I ſhall ever undervalue anything that may concern myſelf: and therefore I ſhall " conclude by entreating your Highneſs, that, if you would have things go well, a " poſt may inſtantly be diſpatched back unto me, authoriſing me to deliver the ſaid " powers upon the arrival of the diſpenſation, and having taken fitting ſecurity in this " particular point. And this I earneſtly beſeech your Highneſs may be done with all " poſſible ſpeed and ſecrecy, and that the Spaniſh Ambaſſadors may not know that there " ever was any ſuſpenſion made of the delivery of the powers. In the interim, I will " find means, if the diſpenſation come, for twenty or twenty-four days, to allege ſome " fair pretexts for the deferring of the deſpoſorios: but herein I deſire I may know your " Highneſs's reſolution with all poſſible ſpeed (i)."

(i) Appendix to the Clarend State Papers, vol. I. p. xx. xxi

We have been thus copious in our extracts from this letter, both becauſe it diſplays the Earl of Briſtol's conduct in one of the principal tranſactions of his political life, and becauſe it throws ſome additional light on the character of the Prince of Wales, which, in the point we are ſpeaking of, will not, perhaps, appear to the higheſt advantage. It will not be thought ſurprizing that the iſſue of this affair was productive of an irre- concilable variance between the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Briſtol; and, conſider- ing the all-powerful influence of the over-grown favourite, the Earl was expoſed to every diſadvantage in the conteſt. In 1624, he returned from Spain; and, immediately on his arrival in England, a warrant was iſſued for ſending him to the Tower. He was ſoon, however, releaſed from his confinement; but, at the ſame time, orders were carried to him from the King, to retire to his country-ſeat, and to abſtain from all attendance in Parliament. He obeyed; but loudly demanded an opportunity of juſtifying himſelf, and of laying his whole conduct before his Royal Maſter. On all occaſions, he proteſted his innocence, and threw on his enemy the blame of every miſcarriage. Buckingham, and, at his inſtigation, the Prince, declared that they would be reconciled to the Earl of Briſtol, if he would but acknowledge his errors and ill conduct; but, jealous of his honour, and animated with a becoming ſpirit, he refuſed to buy favour at ſo high a price. Though James had the equity to ſay, that the inſiſting on that condition was a ſtrain of unexampled tyranny, he had not courage to ſupport the Earl's cauſe in oppoſition to his favourite and his ſon (k). In the courſe of theſe proceedings, Briſtol had been examined by a Committee of Lords; but there is no evidence that any thing material was the reſult of the enquiry. Indeed, their lordſhips met but once upon the buſineſs (l). After the acceſſion of Charles the Firſt to the throne, the tide of reſentment ran ſtronger againſt the Earl of Briſtol. He endeavoured, for a time, to divert it; and made many trials to regain the good opinion of his maſter. Finding them all, however, to be fruitleſs, and obſerving that the King was entirely governed by Buckingham, his implacable enemy, he reſolved no longer to keep any meaſures with the Court. "A new "ſpirit," ſays Mr Hume, "he ſaw, and a new power ariſing in the nation; and to "theſe he was determined for the future to truſt for his ſecurity and protection." When the Parliament for 1626 was ſummoned, it was contrived to expoſe the Earl of Briſtol to a particular mortification. The King, by a ſtretch of prerogative, gave orders that the cuſtomary writ for his parliamentary attendance ſhould not be ſent to him. He was not in a diſpoſition to ſubmit tamely to this undue exertion of power. Accordingly, he laid his caſe, by petition, before the Houſe of Lords; and entreated their good offices with his majeſty for obtaining what was his due as a Peer of the realm. In conſequence of this application, his writ was ſent to him; but it was accompanied with a letter from the Lord Keeper, Sir Thomas Coventry, commanding him, in the King's name, to abſent himſelf from Parliament. This letter the Earl of Briſtol conveyed to the Lords, and aſked their advice how to proceed in ſo delicate a ſituation. His Majeſty's prohibition was at length withdrawn, and the Earl was permitted to take his ſeat (m). As this affair is ſomewhat curious we ſhall inſert below the fuller account of it, which is to be found in the Parliamentary Hiſtory [A]. The Earl of Briſtol's ſpirited behaviour in this buſineſs was

'After this, the Earl petitioned the Houſe of Lords, 'and ſhewed, "That he, being a Peer of this realm, "had not received a ſummons to Parliament, and de- "ſired their Lordſhips to mediate with the King, that "he might enjoy the liberty of a ſubject and the "privilege of his peerage, after almoſt two years "reſtraint without being brought to a trial: and, "if any charge was brought againſt him, he prayed "that he might be tried by Parliament."

'Upon the receipt of this Petition, the Lords re- 'ferred it to the Committee of Privileges; from 'whom the Earl of Hertford reported, "That it was "neceſſary for their Lordſhips humbly to beſeech his "Majeſty to ſend a writ of ſummons to the Earl of "Briſtol; as alſo to ſuch other Lords whoſe writs "are ſtopped, except ſuch as are made uncapable to "ſit there by judgment of Parliament, or ſome other "legal courſe."

'Hereupon the Duke of Buckingham ſignified to 'the Houſe, That, upon the Earl's petition to the 'King, his Majeſty had ſent him his writ of ſum- 'mons; and, withal, ſhewed the Lords a copy of 'a letter, written from the King to the ſaid Earl, 'dated Jan. 28, 1625-6, the tenor of which followeth:

"WE have read your letter addreſſed unto us by "Buckingham, and cannot but wonder that you "ſhould, thro' forgetfulneſs, make requeſt to us of "favour, as if you ſtood evenly capable of it, when "you know what your behaviour in Spain deſerved of "us, which you are to examine by the obſervations "we made, and know you well remember; how, at "our firſt coming into Spain, taking upon you to be "ſo wiſe, as to foreſee our intention to change our "religion, you were ſo far from diſſuading us, that "you offered your advice and ſecrecy to concur in it; "and, in many other conferences, preſſing to ſhew "how convenient it was to be a Roman Catholic, it "being impoſſible, in your opinion, to do any great "action otherwiſe; and how much wrong, diſad- "vantage, and diſſervice you did to the treaty, and "to the right and intereſt of our dear brother and 'ſiſter, and their children; what diſadvantage, in- "convenience, and hazard you intangled us in by "your artifices, putting off and delaying our return "home; the great eſtimation you made of that ſtate, "and the low price you ſet this kingdom at; ſtill "maintaining, that we, under colour of friendſhip "to Spain, did what was in our power againſt them, "which they ſaid you very well knew: and, laſt of "all, your approving of thoſe conditions, that our "nephew ſhould be brought up in the Emperor's "court; to which, Sir Walter Aſhton then ſaid, "that he durſt not give his conſent for fear of his "head: your replying unto him, that without ſome "ſuch great action, neither marriage nor peace could "be had.

'There is no anſwer to this letter in the Journals; 'but, inſtead of it, we find another petition from the 'Earl, addreſſed to the Lords, on his receiving his 'writ of ſummons; to which he annexed the Lord 'Keeper's letter and his anſwer, and deſired to be 'heard in accuſation of the Duke.

The HUMBLE PETITION of JOHN Earl of BRISTOL.

"Humbly ſhewing unto your Lordſhips,

"THAT he hath lately received his writ of "ſummons to Parliament, for which he returned "unto your Lordſhips moſt humble thanks; but, "jointly with it, a letter from my Lord Keeper, "commanding him, in his Majeſty's Name, to for- "bear his perſonal attendance; and altho' he ſhall "ever obey the leaſt intimation of his Majeſty's "pleaſure, yet he moſt humbly offereth unto your "Lordſhips wiſe conſiderations, as too high a point "for him, how far this may trench upon the liberty "and ſafety of the Peers, and the authority of their "letters patents, to be in this ſort diſcharged by a "letter miſſive of any ſubject, without the King's "hand; and, for your Lordſhips due information, "he hath annexed a copy of the ſaid Lord Keeper's "letter, and his anſwer thereunto.

"He further humbly petitioneth your Lordſhips, "that having been, for the ſpace of two years, "highly wronged in point of his liberty and of his "honour, was so offensive to the governing powers, that it was determined to act against him with the utmost severity. A message was accordingly delivered from the King to the House of Lords, acquainting them, that it was his Royal Pleasure, that the Earl should be sent for as a delinquent, to answer in the House his offences committed in his negotiations before his Majesty's being in Spain, his offences while he was in Spain, and his offences since his Majesty's coming from Spain (n). But it was not deemed sufficient merely to charge his lordship with having been guilty of several high offences: for the royal resentment went farther; and Sir Robert Heath, the Attorney General, was directed to exhibit against him articles of Treason. On the first of May, 1626, the Earl was brought to the bar of the House of Lords, where, being ordered to kneel, the Lord Keeper acquainted him, "That the King had commanded the Attorney General to "charge his Lordship with high treason, and other offences and misdemeanors of a "very high nature, that they may proceed in a legal course against him, according to "the justice and usual proceedings of Parliament." Then the Attorney General began

"He therefore most humbly beseecheth, that he "may be heard, both in the point of his wrong, "and of his accusation of the said Duke: wherein "he will make it appear, how infinitely the said "Duke hath abused their Majesties, the State, and "both the Houses of Parliament. And this, he is "most confident, will not be denied, since the Court "of Parliament never refuseth to hear the poorest "subject seeking for redress of wrongs, nor the "accusation against any, be he never so powerful. "And herein he beseecheth your Lordships to me-"diate to his Majesty, for your suppliant's coming "to the House, in such sort as you shall think "fitting; assuring his Majesty, that all he shall "say, shall not only tend to the service of his Majesty "and the State, but highly to the honour of his "Majesty's Royal Person, and of his princely virtues: "and your suppliant shall ever pray for your Lord-"ships prosperity."

The LORD KEEPER to the Earl of BRISTOL.

"Dorset-court, March 31, 1626.

"My very good Lord,

"BY his Majesty's commandment, I herewith send "unto your Lordship your writ of summons for "the Parliament; but withal signify his Majesty's "pleasure herein further, that howsoever he gives "way to the awarding of the writ, yet his meaning "is thereby not to discharge any former directions "for restraint of your Lordship's coming hither; "but that you continue under the same restriction as "you did before; so as your Lordship's personal at-"tendance here is to be forborne. And herein I "doubt not but your Lordship will readily give his "Majesty satisfaction; and so I commend my service "very heartily unto your Lordship, and remain,

"Your Lordship's
"Assured friend and servant,
"THO. COVENTRY, C. S."

The Earl of BRISTOL's Answer to the LORD KEEPER.

"May it please your Lordship,

"I have received your Lordship's letter of the "31st of March, and, with it, his Majesty's writ of "summons for the Parliament. In the one, his Ma-"jesty commandeth me, that, all excuses set aside, "upon my faith and allegiance, I fail not to come "and attend his Majesty; and this under the Great "Seal of England. In the other, as in a letter missive, "his Majesty's pleasure is intimated by your Lordship, "that my personal attendance should be forborne. "I must crave leave ingenuously to confess unto your "Lordship, that I want judgment rightly to direct "myself in this case: as likewise, that I am ignorant "how far this may trench upon the privileges of the "Peers of this land, and upon mine and their safety "hereafter: for if the writ be not obeyed, the law "calleth it a mis-prision, and highly fineable, whereof "we have had late examples; and a missive letter "being avowed or not, it is to be doubted would not "be adjudged a sufficient discharge against the Great "Seal of England: on the other side, if the letter be "not obeyed, a Peer may, de facto, be committed "upon a contempt in the interim, and the question "cleared afterwards; so that in this case, it is above "mine abilities. I can only answer your Lordship, "that I will most exactly obey; and to the end I may "understand which obedience will be, in all kinds, "most suitable to my duty, I will presently repair to "my private lodging at London, and there remain, "until, in this and other causes, I shall have petitioned "his Majesty, and understand his further pleasure. "For the second part of your Lordship's letter, where "your Lordship saith, "that his Majesty's meaning is "not thereby to discharge any former directions for "restraint of your Lordship's coming hither, but that "you continue under the same restriction as before; so "that your Lordship's personal attendance here is to be "forborne:" I conceive your Lordship intendeth this "touching my coming to Parliament only; for as "touching my coming to London, I never had at any "time one word of prohibition, or colourable pretence "of restraint; but, on the contrary, having his late "Majesty's express leave to come to London to follow "my affairs, out of my respect to his Majesty, then "Prince, and to the Duke of Buckingham, I forbore "to come until I might know whether my coming "would not be disagreeable unto them. Whereunto "his Majesty was pleased to answer, both under the "hand of the Duke, and of Mr. Secretary Conway, that "he took my respect unto him herein in very good "part, and would wish me to make use of the leave "the King had given me. Since which time I never "received any letter or message of restraint, only his "Majesty, by his letter, bearing date in June last, "commanded me to remain as I was in the time of "the King his father; which was with liberty to "come to London to follow my own affairs as I pleased, "as will appear unto your Lordship, if you will afford "me so much favour as to peruse it. I have writ thus "much unto your Lordship, because I would not, "thro' misunderstanding, fall into displeasure by my "coming up, and to intreat your Lordship to inform "his Majesty thereof: and that my Lord Conway, "by whose warrant I was only restrained in the late "King's time, of famous memory, may produce any "one word, that may have such as any colourable "pretence of debarring my coming up to London. "I beseech your Lordship to pardon my desire to have "things clearly understood: for the want of that for-"merly hath caused all my troubles; and when any "thing is misinformed concerning me, I have little or "no means to clear it; so that my chief labour is to "avoid misunderstanding. I shall conclude with be-"seeching your Lordship to do me this favour, to let "his Majesty understand, that my coming up is only "rightly to understand his pleasure, whereunto I "shall, in all things, most dutifully and humbly con-"form myself. And so, with my humble service to "your Lordship, I recommend you to God's holy "protection, and remain,

"Your Lordship's
"Most humble Servant,
"BRISTOL (1)."

" to read the charge; but he was immediately interrupted by Briſtol, deſiring, that, agreeably to a petition he had before delivered to the Houſe, he might be firſt heard againſt the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Conway, Secretary of State, againſt whom he had prepared articles of impeachment. This produced a long debate, at the cloſe of which it was agreed, that the three charges ſhould be ſucceſſively read, beginning with that againſt the Earl of Briſtol. The articles exhibited by the Crown againſt him were in ſubſtance as follows: That he had, contrary to his knowledge, given information to the Court of England, that the King of Spain did really intend to conclude the marriage and make reſtitution of the Palatinate: that he had, contrary to inſtructions, continued the treaties on generalities: that he had terrified the late King from re-treating, by magnifying the power of Spain: that he had perſuaded the enlargement of Jeſuits and Romiſh Prieſts: that he had endeavoured traitorouſly to perſuade the Prince to change his Religion: that on the offer made by Spain of a marriage between the Palatine's eldeſt ſon and the Emperor's daughter, with the condition of his being brought up at the Emperor's Court, he had given it as his opinion, that the propoſition was reaſonable: that he had ſet a day for the delivery of the deſpoſorios, without treating of the things commanded to him as reſtrictions: that he had ſignified in confidence, that he cared not what the ſucceſs of the treaties might be, but was determined to make his fortune by the negotiation: that his intricate management had enforced the preſent King, when Prince, to the dangerous journey into Spain: and, laſtly, that he had offended in a high manner, by preferring a ſcandalous petition to the Houſe, to the diſhonour of his Majeſty, of bleſſed memory, deceaſed, and of his ſacred Majeſty that now is; offences no way ſufferable in a ſubject towards a Sovereign; and in one article of that petition, wherein he gives his now Majeſty the lie, in denying of that relation which his Majeſty affirmed (o). The heads of the charges brought againſt Buckingham by the Earl of Briſtol were, that the Duke did combine with the Conde Gondeſnar to carry his Majeſty, late Prince, into Spain, to procure his converſion: that when in Spain he laboured it; and by flattering the Spaniſh miniſtry on this point, he had cauſed them to recede from conditions which had been before propounded: that he had procured a letter to be written from his late Majeſty to the pope: that he had received a bull to encourage him in the perverſion of the Prince: that he had given ſcandal by his perſonal behaviour in Spain; and, having incenſed the King of Spain and his miniſters, he put in practice divers undue courſes to break the match: that he had been, in great part, the cauſe of the ruin and misfortune of the Prince Palatine and his eſtates, inaſmuch as thoſe affairs had relation to the kingdom of Spain: that he had abuſed the Parliament by his ſiniſter relation; and wronged the Earl of Briſtol in point of his honour, by many ſiniſter aſperſions he had laid upon him; and in point of his liberty, by many undue courſes, through his power and practices: and that he had vexed and preſſed his late Majeſty, for having ſent the Earl of Briſtol word that he would hear him againſt the Duke, as well as he had heard the Duke againſt him. Briſtol next produced his articles againſt the Lord Conway, which, in general, were, that that Lord had profeſſed himſelf ſo great a ſervant of the Duke's, that he had not ſtuck to declare, that if matters could not be accommodated between them, he muſt then adhere to the Duke; from which it was to be inferred, that Lord Conway was unfit to be a Judge in any thing which concerned the Duke or the Earl: that the Lord Conway, as a creature of the ſaid Duke, had, by various miſrepreſentations and undue means, not only obtained the Earl of Briſtol's reſtraint, and lengthened it, but during its continuation had perplexed him in his buſineſs and otherwiſe: that on the Earl of Briſtol's having fully anſwered twenty interrogatories, which had been made to him in his late Majeſty's name, the Lord Conway, being the Secretary to the Lords Commiſſioners who were appointed to ſearch into the proceedings of the ſaid Earl, perceiving that the ſaid Earl was likely to be cleared, never moved for a farther meeting, nor had the Lords Commiſſioners ever been permitted to meet to that day: that though the Lord Conway knew that the match of the King of Bohemia's eldeſt ſon with the Emperor's daughter, and his being bred in the Emperor's Court, was allowed and propounded by his late Majeſty, yet had he ſuffered it to be charged againſt the Earl of Briſtol, both in the interrogatories, and in his Majeſty's laſt letter: and that the Lord Conway had been the cauſe of all the Earl of Briſtol's troubles, by his dubious and entrapping diſpatches, and inferring that the ſaid Earl had failed in his directions, when it ſhould be made appear that his diſpatches contained no ſuch directions as he alleged were given.

(o) Parliamentary Hiſtory, Vol. VII. p. 1—12. Macaulay's Hiſtory of England, Vol. I. p. 309, 310.

After the reading of theſe different accuſations, the Houſe came to a reſolution that the Earl of Briſtol ſhould not be committed to the Tower, but remain, as before, in the cuſtody of the Gentleman Uſher of the Black Rod; and it was farther ordered, that the King's charge againſt him ſhould be firſt heard, and then the Earl's againſt the Duke; yet ſo that the Earl's teſtimony againſt the Duke ſhould not be prevented, prejudiced, or impeached. On the next day, the Lord Keeper delivered a meſſage from the King to the Houſe of Peers, in which his Majeſty took notice of the articles exhibited againſt the Duke of Buckingham, and declared that he found them to be ſuch, that he was able of his own knowledge to ſay more than any man of the Duke's ſincerity; and that one of them, touching the narrative made in Parliament, trenched as far upon himſelf as upon the Duke (p). Thus injudiciouſly did Charles the Firſt run the riſque of incurring a public affront, by thruſting himſelf in, not only as an evidence, but as an acceſſary with his favourite. The Lords, who were ſenſible that his Majeſty's offering himſelf to be a principal witneſs againſt Briſtol, was contrived on purpoſe to reſtrain the freedom of their judgment, conſulted the Judges on the following points: "Whether in the caſe of "Treaſon or Felony, the King's teſtimony were to be admitted or not? Whether "words ſpoken to the Prince, who is after King, make an alteration in the caſe?" The Judges gave the Houſe to underſtand, that they had received an expreſs command not to deliver their opinion on theſe queſtions (q).

On the ſixth of May, the Earl of Briſtol was again brought to the bar of the Houſe of Lords, when, the charge againſt him being read, he was permitted to ſpeak generally in his own defence, previouſly to the ſpecific anſwers he was afterwards to give to the diſtinct articles of his accuſation. As the ſpeech which he delivered on this occaſion, contains a variety of particulars relative to the treatment he met with at Court after his return from Spain, it ſhall be given in a note [B]. "I deſire your Lordſhips that I may have a copy "of my charge in writing, and time for my anſwer, "and counſel aſſigned me.

"There is a great difference between the Duke of "Buckingham and me: the Duke is accuſed of trea"ſon, and yet at large, and in the King's favour; "and I being accuſed but of that which I had long "ſince anſwered, am a Priſoner; and, therefore, I "beſeech your Lordſhips, that we may be put into "equal condition. And, foraſmuch as I have ex"hibited articles againſt the Lord Conway; I humbly "deſire that his Lordſhip may not meddle in this "particular buſineſs, nor uſe the King's name againſt "me, ex officio, as Secretary of State; and that your "Lordſhips would be ſuitors unto his Majeſty on my "behalf, that all the particular diſpatches of my own "ambaſſages, and Sir Walter Aſton's, may be brought "hither, and I to make uſe of them for my defence "as my evidences.

"And ſince his late Majeſty hath heretofore, in the "preſence of my Lords here preſent, affirmed, that "I had neither committed treaſon nor felony in my "late ambaſſages, and permitted divers of his ſervants "to come unto me; and his Majeſty that now is then "ſaid, that he thought me an honeſt man; and hath "lately ſaid, that my faults were little criminal, in the "preſence of divers of your Lordſhips and others; "and that the Lord Conway did lately offer me to "come to my trial, but he thought the coronation"pardon would free me; and yet now my offences "are made high treaſon; and for that when I ſaw "I could get no redreſs from his Majeſty, by means "of the Duke of Buckingham, I did addreſs my "Petition unto this Houſe concerning his (the Duke's) "cunning, who hath made the King a party againſt "me: and for my accuſation of him I am made a "traitor, and he a judge to vote againſt me. I do "therefore humbly beſeech your Lordſhips to diſtin"guiſh of this. And although I have been too "tedious already, to ſuffer me to proceed and preſent "my caſe unto you."

This being granted, he went on thus:

"At the Prince's coming out of Spain I was in "favour with his Highneſs, and with the late King "alſo at his return into England. But I having "acquainted the Prince (at his being in Spain) with "my letters which I wrote unto the late King, of "the Duke's unfaithful dealing, which letter his "Highneſs forbade me to ſend; and the Duke, at his "return, having got a ſight of thoſe letters (hinc illæ "lachrymæ), he laboured with the Duke of Richmond, "and the Marquis of Hamilton, for my commitment "to the Tower, ſo ſoon as I ſhould return into Eng"land; and he moved the Marquis to deal with my "Lord Chamberlain for my commitment, though but "for a time, until things were ſettled, leſt my "coming to the King ſhould diſturb all. I deſire "the Lord Chamberlain, who is here preſent, to "deliver his knowledge herein.

"Then the Duke accuſed me in the Parliament, "of the Prince's dangerous journey into Spain, "which I will prove to have been plotted by the Duke "himſelf aforehand, with Conde de Gondomar the "Spaniſh Ambaſſador. And I will alſo make it "appear unto your Lordſhips, that there are very "many contrarieties in the Duke's relation to both "houſes. I hearing of this, and the many dangers "threatened me, offered to come home preſently, "but my letters were anſwered that I might ſtay and "come at leiſure; yet I came with as much ſpeed as "conveniently I could, conſidering my long journey, "and that I brought up my wife and family with "me; and, being at Calais with above forty pounds "worth of the King's jewels, I could not procure "ſhipping from thence to paſs me over, but was en"forced to enter in a boat with ſix oars, I making "haſte to come before the Parliament ſhould end; "and the Duke uſing all the means he could to put "off my coming until the Parliament was ended.

"At my coming to land a ſingle letter was ſent of "ſome ſix lines, from the Lord Conway, of his "Majeſty's ſel was allowed him to plead his cauſe; which was ſo diſagreeable to the King that he expreſſed his diſapprobation of it by a meſſage to the Houſe. The Peers, however, perſiſted in an adherence to their own determination, and, at length, his Majeſty thought proper to withdraw his objection (r). From an apprehenſion that the temper of the Houſe was too favourable to the Earl of Briſtol, an attempt was made by the Crown to carry the proſecution into the King's Bench; but without effect. It was vigorouſly oppoſed by the Lords for the following ſubſtantial reaſons: Becauſe, in that caſe, the Earl could have no Counſel: becauſe he could uſe no Witneſs againſt the King: becauſe he would not know what would be the evidence againſt him time enough to prepare for his defence: becauſe it would not be in the power of the Houſe to keep him from arraignment, and thus he might be diſabled from making good his charge againſt the Duke: becauſe, for the ſpace of two years, he had not ſo much as been queſtioned for matter of treaſon; and though he had been examined on twenty interrogatories, the Commiſſioners were ſatisfied that his anſwers would admit of no reply: becauſe the Lord Conway, in ſeveral letters, had intimated, that there was nothing againſt him, but what was pardoned by the Parliament's pardon of the twenty-firſt of James; and had ſignified his Majeſty's pleaſure, that he might reſt in that ſecurity: and becauſe his Majeſty had often declared, both to the Counteſs of Briſtol and others, that there was neither felony nor treaſon againſt her Lord, nor aught elſe but what a ſmall acknowledgment would expiate (s).

(r) Parl. Hiſt. ubi ſup. p. 28, 29. 180, 181.

" Majeſty's pleaſure not to come to the Court, but to " remain in my own lodgings. Being there, I petitioned " the King that I might anſwer in the Parliament, " and his Majeſty ſaid that the Parliament was ſo in- " cenſed againſt me, that it was not ſafe for me to " be brought thither, but in a few days I ſhould have " an end of my troubles.

" At laſt I had articles ſent me, by Commiſſioners " appointed to enquire into my proceedings, which " articles contained the ſubſtance of this charge, and " I fully anſwered them in writing; and the late " King read them all, and was ſo well ſatisfied there- " with, that he ſent me word that he would ſee me; " whereupon the Duke of Buckingham deſired his " Majeſty that I might firſt anſwer ſome four other " queſtions; which being delayed, and I petitioning " the King for them to be ſent me, his Majeſty gave " orders to have them preſently ſent; yet they came " not: divers days were fought, and at laſt the Lord " Conway wrote me a letter, that they were ready, " but he thought it better I did accommodate the " buſineſs.

" Though I often ſolicited the Lord Conway, yet " his Lordſhip, perceiving I ſhould be cleared by the " Commiſſioners, would never ſend thoſe queſtions, " nor ſuffer the Commiſſioners once to meet; and at " laſt anſwered, " he had no more to do with me."

" Then the late King ſent me a meſſage, to write " but a fair letter unto Buckingham for a reconcili- " ation, and that I ſhould leave the reſt unto him: " the Duke hereupon ſent one Mr. Clarke unto me: " what fair propoſitions I ſhould make were theſe, " only to retire into the country and not come to the " Court, but permit his Grace to diſpoſe of the Vice- " Chamberlain's place. And I ſhewing Mr. Clarke, " by way of private conference, what papers I had to " produce againſt the Duke, his Grace then required " a retraction, which I denied: and ſo all reconcile- " ment broke off. Afterwards the Duke ſent me " certain propoſitions in a letter, which I ſhould ac- " knowledge; and the preface of that propoſition " ſaith, it is not granted that the Earl of Briſtol hath " by his anſwer ſatisfied either the King, the Prince, " or me, of his innocency (a ſtrange conjunction " of a ſubject); and the Duke would not be ſatisfied " with leſs than a direct acknowledgement.

" Upon this I petitioned the late King, that I " might be at liberty to follow my affairs freely, " which his Majeſty condeſcended unto, and ſignified " his pleaſure by the Duke, that he was ſatisfied, and " that therefore I had my freedom: but when I had " an intent to come to my lodging at Whitehall, and " made the Duke acquainted therewith, he ſeemed " much diſpleaſed thereat, and moved his Majeſty, " that I might firſt make an acknowledgment of my " fault, which his Majeſty refuſed to compel me " unto; ſaying, he might then be thought a tyrant " to force a man to acknowledge that which he was " not guilty of. And his Majeſty ſent me word, " that I ſhould make no acknowledgment unleſs I " would freely confeſs myſelf guilty. Yet the Duke " cauſed a meſſage to be ſent me, that his Majeſty ex- " pected that I ſhould make the acknowledgment and " confeſs myſelf guilty. And thus it ſtood with me " when the late King (my bleſſed maſter) ſickened " and died.

" When his Majeſty that now is came to the " crown, he was pleaſed to ſend me a gracious " meſſage upon the occaſion of a great ſickneſs I had, " and my writ of Parliament was freely ſent me; but, " out of reſpect, I deſired to know what would beſt " pleaſe the King, my coming or my ſtay from the " Parliament; and the Duke of Buckingham did write " unto me, that his Majeſty took that reſpect very " well at my hands, but would have me excuſe my " coming; for which I craved a letter of licence from " the Parliament, inſtead whereof I received from " the Lord Conway a letter of prohibition, and re- " ſtraint, and confinement, under the King's own " hand, whereas before I was reſtrained only by the " Lord Conway.

" After this I continued quiet almoſt a year in the " country until the coronation, and then I wrote a " moſt humble letter unto his Majeſty, and to the " Duke of Buckingham; but received a letter from " his Majeſty, written in a great Roman hand, in- " cloſed in one from the Duke, ſo differing from " thoſe gracious meſſages his Majeſty had made to " my wife and others, that I knew not what judg- " ment to make of the ſaid letters; and divers copies " of them were divulged abroad.

" Then, my writ of Parliament being denied, I " ſeveral times cauſed the Lord Keeper to be moved " for it, but could procure no redreſs; and when I " petitioned the Houſe for my writ, the Duke there- " upon took occaſion (to my great diſgrace) to read " the above-ſpecified letter in the open Houſe; and " a letter of prohibition was ſent me (with my writ) " to ſtay me from the Parliament. Upon this I peti- " tioned the Houſe for redreſs againſt the Duke of " Buckingham's wrongs unto me, and accuſed him " of divers crimes. And ſince the Houſe was poſſeſſed " of this my petition, I have been charged with treaſon, " having been offered from his Majeſty, but few days " before, to reſt in ſecurity, and not to be queſtioned: " but I thinking it fit, for the clearing of mine honour, " to have recourſe unto this Houſe, do find myſelf " a reſtrained man, and the Duke at liberty, ſitting " as one of my judges; which I hope your Lordſhips " will ſpeedily redreſs.

" I humbly deſire your Lordſhips to take my cauſe " into your Lordſhips conſideration, having put my- " ſelf wholly into your hands."

The Earl of Briſtol, on the nineteenth of May, was a third time brought to the bar of the Houſe of Lords, when he delivered his anſwer to the articles that had been alleged againſt him. As the anſwer is too long to be inſerted, and is even incapable of being abridged within any reaſonable compaſs, we ſhall refer ſuch of our Readers as may be deſirous of peruſing it to the Parliamentary Hiſtory (t). It may be ſufficient to obſerve, that the Earl made a very able, and, on the whole, a very ſatisfactory reply to the accuſations of his enemies. After ſome farther proceedings, on the eighth of June, of little conſequence, the buſineſs ended; for, in two weeks, the King diſſolved the Parliament, in reſentment of the tranſactions of the Houſe of Commons, with regard to the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham. On the day of the diſſolution, the Earl of Briſtol was committed to the Tower by his Majeſty's order (u); but does not appear to have been long detained in confinement.

That the proſecution of the Earl was the reſult of perſonal malignity, and that he was treated with great injuſtice and cruelty, cannot be denied by any one who reads the hiſtory of the affair with attention. But it does not hence follow, that his own character was perfectly free from reproach. Mrs. Macaulay has made ſome reflections upon it, which, we are afraid, are not entirely groundleſs. "It is very apparent," ſays this lady, "notwithſtanding the ſpecioufneſs of Briſtol's defence, that his whole conduct had been "ſubſervient to the point of private advantage; that he had already obtained an opu"lent fortune by an exact conformity to the views of James; and that, from motives "of ſelfiſhneſs, he had put in practice every expedient to prevent the rupture of the "Spaniſh treaty. Nor was his preſent oppoſition excited by the principles of inde"pendence, or generous feelings, whilſt recriminating againſt Buckingham. He "meanly courted the Prince, who was exerciſing over him the moſt unjuſtifiable op"preſſion. On the merit of his management in the treaty with Spain, he had obtained, "and at this very time enjoyed, the ſpoils of a man whoſe unjuſt fate was yet freſh in the "memory of the Publick (w). To theſe circumſtances, ill-adapted to attract the eſteem "of the people, his avowed principles of religion were as extravagantly hierarchical as "were thoſe of the preſent miniſtry. The extreme odium, therefore, which his an"tagoniſt Buckingham had at this time incurred, and the oppreſſive treatment himſelf "had met with from the Crown, were the only cauſes which gained a popularity to his "ſide of the conteſt (x)."

From this time we hear little of the Earl of Briſtol till the year 1640. We are only told that he lived in the country in eaſe and plenty, and with great reputation among all who had not an implicit reverence for the Court. When the troubles began, he was again called into active life. In September, 1640, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners to treat with the Scots, in order to compoſe the differences that had ariſen between the two nations; and, in the November of the ſame year, he took his ſeat in the Long Parliament. Here it is aſſerted that he appeared at the head of all the diſcontented party (y); but the aſſertion is not true. No inſtance occurs, in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, of his having conducted himſelf with violence againſt the meaſures of the crown. On the contrary, he ſoon gave offence to the great leaders of oppoſition. A petition having been framed in Kent, very adverſe to the proceedings of Parliament, Lord Briſtol was accuſed of having taken a copy of it, without doing his duty in acquainting the Houſe of Lords with a Paper of ſuch dangerous conſequence; and for this, on the twenty-eighth of March, 1642, he was committed to the Tower for the preſent, until the buſineſs ſhould be farther examined (z). On the twentieth of May, he made a ſpeech in favour of a reconciliation with the King, the wiſdom and moderation of which entitle it to a place below [C]. Another ſpeech, delivered on the eleventh of June,

'My Lords,

'I have ſpoken ſo often upon the ſubject of accommodation, with ſo little acceptance, and with ſo ill ſucceſs, that it was in my intention not to have made any further eſſay in this kind; but my zeal to the peace and happineſs of this kingdom, and my apprehenſions of the near approach of unſpeakable miſeries and calamities, ſuffer me not to be maſter of mine own reſolution.

'Certainly this kingdom hath, at all times, many advantages over the other monarchies of Europe; as of ſituation, of plenty, of rich commodities; of power both by ſea and land; but more particularly at this time, when all our neighbouring States are, by their ſeveral intereſts, ſo involved in war, and with ſuch equality of power, that there is not much likelihood of their maſtering one another, nor of having their differences eaſily compounded; and thereby, we alone being admitted to trade to all places, wealth and plenty, which ever follow where trade flouriſheth, are in a manner caſt upon us.

'I ſhall not trouble your Lordſhips by putting you in mind of the great and noble undertaking of our anceſtors; nor ſhall I paſs higher than the times within mine own remembrance.

'Queen Elizabeth was a Princeſs diſadvantaged by her ſex, by her age, and chiefly by her want of iſſue; yet if we ſhall conſider the great effects wrought upon moſt of the States in Chriſtendom by this nation, under her prudent government (the growth of the monarchy of Spain chiefly by her impeached; the United Provinces by her protected; the French in their greateſt miſeries relieved; moſt of the Princes of Germany kept in high reſpect and reverence towards her and this kingdom; and the peace and tranquillity wherein this kingdom flouriſhed, and which hath been continued down unto us by the peaceable government of King James, of bleſſed memory, and of his now Majeſty, until

'theſe

June, in vindication of the former, closed his Parliamentary attendance (a). He hastened to his Majesty at York, accompanied his Royal Master at Edgehill, and then followed him

(a) Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. VII. Col. 164.

'these late unhappy interruptions), we cannot but judge 'this nation equally capable, with any other, of 'honour, happiness, and plenty.

'Now if, instead of this happy condition, in 'which we have been, and might be, upon a sober 'and impartial inquiry, we shall find ourselves to have 'been, for some few years last past, involved in so 'many troubles and distractions, and at the present to 'be reduced to the very brink of miseries and calami-'ties; it is high time for us to consider by what 'means we have been brought into them, and by 'what means it is most probable we may be brought 'out of them.

'This kingdom never enjoyed so universal a peace, 'neither hath it any visible enemy in the whole world, 'either Infidel or Christian; our enemies are only of 'our own house, such as our own dissentions, jealousies, 'and distractions have raised up; and certainly where 'they are found, especially betwixt a King and his 'people, no other cause of the unhappiness and misery 'of a state need to be sought after: for civil discord 'is a plentiful source, from whence all miseries and 'mischiefs flow.

'The Scripture telleth us of the strength of a 'little City united, and of the instability of a King-'dom divided within itself: so that, upon a prudent 'enquiry, we may assign our own jealousies and dis-'cords for the chief cause of our past and present 'troubles, and of our future fears.

'It must be confessed, that by the counsel and 'conduct of evil ministers, the subjects had cause 'to think their just liberties invaded; and from 'thence have our former distempers grown: for it 'is in the body politic of a monarchy, as in the na-'tural body, the health whereof is defined to be, 'Partium Corporis æqua Temperies, an equal temper 'of the parts: so likewise a State is well in health and 'well disposed, when Sovereign power and common 'right are equally balanced, and kept in even temper, 'by just and equitable rules.

'And truly, my Lords, by the goodness of his 'Majesty, and by the prudent endeavour of the Par-'liament, this State is almost reduced to that equal 'and even temper; and our sickness is rather con-'tinued out of fancy and conceit, (I mean fears and 'jealousies) than out of any real distempers.

'I well remember, that, before the beginning of 'this Parliament, some noble Lords presented a pe-'tition unto the King; and in that petition did set 'down all or most of the grievances and distempers of 'the kingdom which then occurred to them. To 'these, as I conceive, the Parliament have procured, 'from his Majesty, such redresses as are to their good 'satisfaction.

'Many other things for the ease, security, and 'comfort of the subject, have been, by their great 'industry, found and propounded; and, by his 'Majesty's goodness, condescended unto. And now 'we are come so near the happiness of being the 'most free and most settled nation in the Christian 'world, our dangers and miseries will grow, every 'day, greater and nearer, if not speedily prevented.

'The King, on his part, offereth to concur with 'us in the settling all the liberties and immunities, 'either for the property of our goods or liberty of 'our persons, which we have received from our an-'cestors, or which himself hath granted unto us; 'and as to what shall yet remain for the good and 'comfort of his subjects, he is willing to hearken to 'all our just and reasonable propositions; and for the 'establishing the true Protestant religion, he wooes 'us to it: and the wisdom and industry of the Par-'liament hath now put it in a hopeful way.

'The rule of his government, he professeth, shall 'be the laws of the kingdom; and, for the comfort-'ing and securing of us, he offereth a much more 'large and more general pardon than hath been 'granted by any of his predecessors. And truly, my 'Lords, this is all that ever was, or can be, pretended 'unto by us.

'We, on the other side, make profession, that we 'intend to make his Majesty a glorious King; to 'endeavour to support his dignity; and to pay unto 'him that duty and obedience, which, by our al-'legiance, several oaths, and late protestation, we 'owe unto him, and to maintain all his just regalities 'and prerogatives; which I conceive to be as much 'as his Majesty will expect from us.

'So that, my Lords, we being both, thus recipro-'cally, agreed of that which in general would make 'both King and people happy, shall be most unfor-'tunate, if we shall not bring both inclinations and 'endeavours so to propound and settle particulars, 'as both King and people may know what will give 'them mutual satisfaction: which certainly must be 'the first step towards the settling of a right under-'standing betwixt them. And in this I should not 'conceive any great difficulty, if it were once put 'into a way of preparation. But the greatest dif-'ficulty may seem to be, how that which may be 'settled and agreed upon may be secured. This is 'commonly the last point in treaties betwixt Princes, 'and of the greatest niceness; but much more betwixt 'a King and his Subjects, where that confidence and 'belief which should be betwixt them is once lost: 'and, to speak clearly, I fear that this may be our 'case; and herein may consist the chiefest difficulty 'of accommodation; for it is much easier to compose 'differences arising from reason, yea, even from 'wrongs, than it is to satisfy jealousies; which, 'arising out of diffidence and distrust, grow and are 'varied upon every occasion.

'But, my Lords, if there be no endeavours to 'allay and remove them, they will every day in-'crease and gather strength; nay, they are already 'grown to that height, and the mutual replies to 'those direct terms of opposition, that if we make 'not a present stop, it is to be feared it will speedily 'pass farther than verbal contestations.

'I observe, in some of his Majesty's answers, a 'Civil War spoken of: I confess it is a word of 'horror to me, who have been an eye-witness of 'those inexpressible calamities that, in a short time, 'the most plentiful and flourishing countries of Europe 'have been brought into by an intestine war.

'I further observe, "that his Majesty protesteth 'against the miseries that may ensue by a war, and 'that he is clear of them." It is true that a protesta-'tion of that kind is no actual denouncing of war, 'but it is the very next degree to it; ultima admoni-'tio, as the civilians term it, the last admonition: 'so that we are upon the very brink of our miseries. 'It is better keeping out of them than getting out of 'them; and, in a State, the wisdom of prevention 'is infinitely beyond the wisdom of remedies. If, for 'the sins of this nation, these misunderstandings should 'produce the least act of hostility, it is not almost to 'be believed how impossible it were to put any stay 'to our miseries: for a Civil War admits of none of 'those conditions of quarter, by which cruelty and 'blood are, amongst other enemies, kept from ex-'tremities: nay, if it should but so happen, (which 'God of his goodness avert!) that, mutually, forces and 'armies should be raised, jealousies and fears would 'be so much increased thereby, that any accommoda-'tion would be rendered full of difficulty and length; 'and the very charge of maintaining them (whilst first a 'cessation of arms, and then a general accommodation 'were in treating) would consume the wealth of the 'kingdom.

'And of this we had lately a costly example: for 'in those unhappy times, betwixt us and Scotland, 'after there was a stop made to any further acts of 'hostility, and a desire of peace expressed on both 'sides, commissioners nominated, and all the ar-'ticles propounded; yet the keeping of the armies 'together for our several securities, whilst the cessa-'tion at Rippon and the peace at London were in 'treating, cost this kingdom not much less than a 'million of pounds. And if two armies be once on 'foot here in England, either a sudden encounter 'must destroy one of them, or the keeping of them 'both on foot must destroy the kingdom.

'I hope

him to Oxford. The king had before reſtored him to his ſeat at the Council-Board, and appointed him of the Bedchamber. At the end of the war he retired to France, ſuffered the loſs of his eſtate, and died at Paris on the 16th of January, 1652-3. The place of his interment was the common burying ground of the Huguenots in that city (b).

The Earl of Briſtol married Beatrix daughter to Charles Walcott, Eſq. of Walcott, in Shropſhire, and widow of Sir John Dive of Bromham, in the county of Bedford, and had by her two ſons and two daughters. George, the eldeſt, will be the ſubject of the next article. John Digby, the ſecond ſon, was born in March, 1617-18; and, in the year 1634, was entered as a nobleman in Magdalen-College, Oxford. In the beginning of the civil war he ſided with the King's party, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in many encoun-

'I hope, therefore, we ſhall make it our endeavour, by moderation and calmneſs, yet to put a ſtay to our ſo near approaching miſeries; and that we ſhall hearken to the wiſe advice of our brethren of Scotland, in their late anſwer to the King and Parliament: wherein they earneſtly intreat us, "that all means may be forborne which may make the breach wider, and the wound deeper; and that no place be given to the evil ſpirit of diviſion, which at ſuch times worketh inceſſantly, and reſteth not; but that the faireſt, the moſt chriſtian, and compendious way may be taken by ſo wiſe a King and Parliament, as may, againſt all malice and oppoſition, make his Majeſty and poſterity more glorious, and his kingdoms more happy than ever." And, in another place, they ſay, "That ſince this Parliament hath thought meet to draw the practice of the Parliament of Scotland into example, in the point of their declaration, they are confident that the affection of this Parliament will lead them, alſo, to the practice of that kingdom in compoſing the unhappy differences betwixt his Majeſty and them; and (ſo far as may conſiſt with their religion, liberties, and laws) in giving his Majeſty all ſatisfaction, eſpecially in their tender care of his Royal perſon, of his princely greatneſs and authority, and the proſperity of the kingdom.

'Certainly, my Lords, this is wiſe and brotherly advice, and I doubt not but we are all deſirous to follow it. We muſt not then ſtill dwell upon generals, for generals produce nothing; but we muſt put this buſineſs into a certain way, whereby particulars may be deſcended unto; and the way that I ſhall offer, with all humility, is, that there may be a ſelect Committee of choice perſons of both Houſes, who may, in the firſt place, truly ſtate and ſet down all things in difference betwixt the King and the ſubject, with the moſt probable ways of reconciling them. Secondly, to deſcend unto the particulars which may be expected by each from other, either in point of our ſupporting of him, or his relieving of us. And, laſtly, how all theſe conditions, being agreed upon, may be ſo ſecured as may ſtand with the honour of his Majeſty and the ſatisfaction of the ſubject.

'When ſuch a Committee ſhall have drawn up the heads of the propoſitions, and the way of ſecuring them, they may be preſented unto the Houſes; and ſo offered unto his Majeſty, by ſuch a way as the Parliament ſhall judge moſt probable to produce an accommodation.

'My Lords, what I have yet ſaid unto you, hath been chiefly grounded upon the apprehenſions and fears of our future dangers. I ſhall ſay ſomething of the unhappineſs of our preſent State, which certainly ſtandeth in as much need of relief and remedy, as our fears do of prevention; for although the King and people were fully united, and that all men who now draw ſeveral ways, ſhould unanimouſly ſet their hand to the work, yet they would find it no eaſy taſk to reſtore this kingdom to a proſperous and comfortable condition: if we take into our conſideration the deplorable ſtate of Ireland, likely to drain this kingdom of men and treaſure; if we conſider the debts and neceſſity of the Crown, the engagements of the kingdom, and the great and unuſual contributions of the people; which laſt, although they may not be ſo much to their diſcontent, for that they have been legally raiſed, yet the burden hath not been much eaſed. Let us likewiſe conſider the diſtractions (I may almoſt call them confuſions) in point of religion; which, of all other diſtempers, are the moſt dangerous and deſtructive to the peace of a State.

'Beſide theſe publick calamities, let every particular man conſider the diſtracted and uncomfortable ſtate of his own condition. For mine own part, I muſt ingenuouſly profeſs unto your Lordſhips, that I cannot find out, under the different commands of the King and the Parliament, any ſuch courſe of caution and warineſs, by which I can promiſe to myſelf ſecurity or ſafety. I could give your Lordſhips many inſtances of the inconſiſtency and impoſſibility of obeying theſe commandments; but I ſhall trouble you only with one or two.

'The ordinance of Parliament, now in ſo great agitation, commandeth all perſons in authority to put it in execution, and all others to obey it according to the fundamental laws of the land: the King declareth it to be contrary to the fundamental laws, againſt the liberty of the ſubject and rights of Parliament; and commandeth all his ſubjects, of what degree ſoever, upon their allegiance, not to obey the ſaid ordinance, as they will anſwer the contrary at their perils.

'So likewiſe, in point of the King's commanding the attendance of divers of us upon his perſon, whereunto we are obliged by ſeveral relations of our ſervices and oaths: in caſe we comply not with his commands, we are liable to his diſpleaſure, and the loſs of thoſe places of honour and truſt which we hold under him: if we obey his commands without the leave of the Parliament, which hath not been always granted, we are liable to the cenſure of Parliament: and of both theſe we want not freſh examples; ſo that, certainly, this cannot but be acknowledged to be an unhappy and uncomfortable condition.

'I am ſure I bring with me a ready and obedient heart, to pay unto the King all thoſe duties of loyalty, allegiance, and obedience, which I owe unto him: and I ſhall never be wanting towards the Parliament, to pay unto it all thoſe due rights and that obedience which we all owe unto it; but, in contrary commands, a conformity of obedience to both is hardly to be lighted on. The reconciliation muſt be in the commanders and the commands, and not in the obedience or the perſon that is to obey: and therefore, until it ſhall pleaſe God to bleſs us with a right underſtanding betwixt the King and Parliament, and a conformity in their commands, neither the kingdom in public, nor particular men in private, can be reduced to a ſafe or comfortable condition.

'I have ſaid thus much to give occaſion to others to offer likewiſe their opinions; for if we ſhall ſit ſtill, and nothing tending to the ſtay of the unhappy miſunderſtanding betwixt the King and his people be propounded, it is to be feared that our miſeries will haſten ſo faſt upon us, that the ſeaſon and opportunity of applying remedies may be paſt.

'I have herein diſcharged my conſcience ſuitable to that duty which I owe to the King my ſovereign and maſter, and ſuitable to that zeal and affection which I ſhall ever pay to the happineſs and proſperity of the kingdom; towards which I ſhall ever faithfully contribute my humble prayers and honeſt endeavours; and I ſhall no way doubt, whatſoever ſucceſs this my propoſition may have, it will be accompanied with the good wiſhes of your Lordſhips, and of all peaceable and well-minded men (3).'

ters, and was raiſed to the rank of General of the Horſe, in the army of Ralph Lord Hopton. Upon the declenſion of the Royal Cauſe, he went into France, and was for ſome time a follower of the Court of Charles the Second; but at length he retired to Pontoiſe, entered himſelf among the Religious of that place, became a Secular Prieſt, ſaid maſs daily to the Engliſh nuns, and died there after the Reſtoration. Of the Earl of Briſtol's two daughters, the eldeſt, Mary, was married to Arthur, Earl of Donegal, and the ſecond, Abigail, to George the ſon and heir of John Freke, Eſq. of Shrowton, in Dorſetſhire. This Lady died young, and was buried at Sherborne (c).

Lord Briſtol has ſome title to notice as an author. In his youth he was a Poet; and, beſides his verſes on the death of Sir Henry Unton, wrote other Poems: one of which, an air for three voices, was ſet by Henry Lawes, and publiſhed in his "Ayres and "Dialogues," London, 1653, folio. The reſt of the Earl's works were as follows: A Tract wherein is ſet down thoſe motives and ties of religion, oaths, laws, loyalty, and gratitude, which obliged him to adhere unto the king in the late unhappy wars in England. A tract, wherein he vindicates his honour and innocency from having in any kind deſerved that injurious and mercileſs cenſure of being excepted from pardon or mercy, either in life or fortunes. Theſe two pieces have the general title of his "Apology." An Appendix to the firſt Tract, printed together with both pieces, and two of his ſpeeches, at Caen, 1647. thin folio. Reprinted in 1656, quarto. "Anſwer to the Declaration of the Houſe of Commons, February "11th, 1647, againſt making any more addreſſes to the King." Caen, 1648. quarto. "An Addition to the above." In manuſcript. "Several Letters in the Cabala, Cla- "rendon's State Papers, and the Parliamentary Hiſtory." "A Tranſlation of Peter Du "Moulin's Book, entituled, "A Defence of the Catholic Faith, contained in the Book "of King James againſt the Anſwer of N. Coeffeteau, &c." London, 1610." The Dedi- cation to his Majeſty is in the name of J. Sandford, the Earl's Chaplain (d).

(d) Walpole's Noble Authors, Vol. I. p. 222, 223.

Mr. Walpole's brief character of his Lordſhip is drawn up with elegance and ſpirit: "John "Digby, Earl of Briſtol, father of the celebrated Lord Digby, was by no means incon- "ſiderable himſelf, though checked by the circumſtances of the times from making ſo great "a figure in various lights as fortune and his own talents ſeemed to promiſe. Marked for a "ſeaſon as a favourite by King James, he was eclipſed by the predominant luſtre of the "Duke of Buckingham; and traverſed by the ſame impetuoſity in his Spaniſh negotia- "tions, to which his grave and ſtately temper had adapted him. Being attac ked by tha "overbearing man, he repelled and worſted him; and ſhone greatly among the diſcon- "tented in Parliament. But the violences of that aſſembly ſoon diſguſted his ſolemn diſ- "poſition; for he that was not ſupple enough for a Court, was by far too haughty "for popularity. He would have been a ſuitable Miniſter for Auſtrian phlegm, or a "proper Patriot in a Diet, which would have been content to proceed by remonſtrance "and memorial. A mercurial favourite, and a military ſenate, overſet him (e)."

(e) Ibid. p. 221, 222.

Lord Clarendon informs us, that the Earl of Briſtol was a very handſome man; and that it was this circumſtance which firſt recommended him to the favour of King James. Beauty and dignity of perſon ſeem to have characterized the Digbies of the laſt century. The Noble Hiſtorian adds, that though Lord Briſtol was a man of great parts, and a wiſe man, yet, as he had been for the moſt part ſingle, and by himſelf, in buſineſs, and had lived little in conſort, he was paſſionate and ſupercilious in Council, and did not bear contradiction without much heat. He was, likewiſe, too voluminous in diſcourſe; ſo that he was not conſidered at the Board with that reſpect to which he was otherwiſe entitled (f).] K.

 [DIGBY (GEORGE), the eldeſt ſon of the ſubject of the preceding article, and a Nobleman of very extraordinary abilities and character, was born at Madrid, in the month of October 1612, during his father's firſt embaſſy in Spain (a). In that kingdom, with the exception of a journey or two into England, he received his education, till he was thirteen years of age; the conſequence of which was, that he became ſuch a maſter of the Spaniſh language, that he could ever after ſpeak it as well as if he had been an original Spaniard. When, through the all-diſpoſing power of the Duke of Bucking- ham, the Earl of Briſtol was not only removed from Court, but committed to the Tower, our young Lord was ſent with a petition to the Houſe of Commons in his father's behalf, which he delivered at the bar, and accompanied it with a ſhort ſpeech of his own. The confidence with which he ſpoke it, in conjunction with his tender years, his delicate features, and a very graceful perſon, made a good impreſſion upon that body, and cauſed him to be looked upon as a youth of great expectation (b). After an excellent courſe of preparatory learning, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, and entered a Nobleman of Magdalen College, on the fifteenth of Auguſt, 1626. Here he derived conſiderable advantage from the directions and converſation of Peter Heylin, a Fellow of that Houſe (c). His reſidence at Oxford, where he continued ſome years, was diſtin- guiſhed by his remarkable improvement in all kinds of literature. On quitting the Univerſity, Univerſity, he travelled into France, in the language of which he was previouſly well verſed, and had been carefully inſtructed. From that kingdom he returned to his own country, and to his father's houſe, the moſt accompliſhed young man that the Engliſh nation, or, it may be, any other nation could at that time preſent to the world; to which the beauty, comelineſs, and gracefulneſs of his perſon added no ſmall degree of luſtre. The peculiar and retired ſituation of the Earl of Briſtol was of eminent advantage to Lord Digby. There being no footing for him at court, he was under a neceſſity of reſiding in the country, where, beſides the benefit of his father's information, and a very liberal converſation with men of the beſt quality and parts, who frequently reſorted to Sherborne Caſtle, he had leiſure enough to attend to his books, in which he took a wonderful delight. Such, indeed, was the progreſs which he made in his ſtudies that no branch of learning appears to have eſcaped his attention. He applied himſelf, in particular, to the moſt curious parts of philoſophy, and was excellently verſed in the Latin and Greek Fathers, and in thoſe controverſies in which their authority was in that age appealed to, by the contending religious ſects of every denomination. At this time he wrote a diſcourſe, addreſſed to his relation Sir Kenelme Digby, againſt the Catholic Religion, which he would never afterwards take upon him to anſwer, when he came to have a better opinion of that religion. It was not, however, to the abſtruſer parts of knowledge that Lord Digby's application was confined; for he was equally fond of whatever related to polite literature. With the poets, ancient and modern, he was intimately converſant; and from his pen proceeded not only ſerious compoſitions, of a theological and philoſophical nature, but copies of verſes in Latin or Engliſh, and pieces of wit and humour. In this happy retreat he acquired great reputation; his eminent abilities being ſedulouſly ſpread abroad, whilſt his infirmities, which were known but to very few perſons, were carefully concealed. At length, the impetuoſity of his paſſions brought him into more public notice. Having come up to the metropolis, he engaged in an amour, which he purſued with all the eagerneſs of his natural diſpoſition, and by which he got involved in a conteſt with an inſolent rival, with whom he fought, or rather whoſe cowardice was ſuch that he could only be ſaid to have chaſtiſed him. The tranſaction was in the vicinity of Whitehall, and Lord Digby's antagoniſt was an unworthy favourite at court. His Lordſhip, therefore, was firſt committed to priſon, and afterwards treated with a ſeverity very unuſual to perſons of his quality. This adventure forced him back again into the country, to which he carried his reſentments for the ill uſage he had received. His own wrongs being thus added to thoſe which his father had met with, he entered the more eagerly into the ſentiments of the diſcontented part of the nation, and was held in high reputation by all who oppoſed the meaſures of Government (d). On the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, 1636, probably before the event now related, he was created, in conjunction with many other Noblemen and Gentlemen, Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford (e).

When the diſorders of Scotland obliged the King to call a Parliament, and which was ſummoned to meet on the thirteenth of April, 1640, Lord Digby, with the unanimous approbation of the Freeholders, was choſen one of the Knights of the Shire for Dorſetſhire, the county in which he lived. In this Parliament, his perſon, his parts, and the fame he had already acquired, cauſed him to be ſpeedily taken notice of; and his joining himſelf with thoſe who were determined to enquire into every thing that was amiſs, and who would not be ſatisfied with any ordinary application of remedies, made it eaſily be foreſeen what counſels he intended to follow. But this ſtage allowed ſo ſhort a time for action, that no poſſible concluſion could be made; for on the fifth of May the Parliament was diſſolved. This abrupt meaſure only involved the King in ſtill greater difficulties. In a few months, the diſcontents of the people were grown higher than ever, and the reverence to Government much impaired. Nevertheleſs, at this criſis, Charles the Firſt was again laid under the neceſſity of having recourſe to the parliamentary advice and aſſiſtance of his ſubjects. When the famous Long Parliament met on the third of November, 1640, Lord Digby took his ſeat in it as the ſecond time a repreſentative for the County of Dorſet, to which honour he had been elected as unanimouſly as before; and it was ſoon diſcerned that he meant to make himſelf of as much conſequence as he poſſibly could. If any thing was ſpoken too bluntly and rudely againſt the Government, he reſumed the argument and poliſhed it, rendered the edge more ſharp to wound, and dreſſed the general charge with ſuch lively inſtances, as added to the ſenſibility of the enormity deſcribed. All this, united with the moſt pleaſing manner of delivery and ſpeaking, and a perſon uncommonly beautiful and graceful, wonderfully reconciled him to his auditors. When any grievances in religion were touched upon, and the Government of the Church aſſaulted or reproached, he improved the diſcourſe with more bitterneſs and animoſity, treating of the things he would be thought to value gravely, and, as it ſeemed, with piety and devotion. With regard to the perſons againſt whom he found it acceptable to inveigh, he expoſed them wittily, pleaſantly, and ſcornfully; ſo that the Members of the Houſe who took the lead in oppoſition to the Hierarchy, believed that they had gotten a champion to their own deſire, who would be equal to their ſtouteſt adverſaries, and even to the Biſhops themſelves (f). That this character of Lord Digby's eloquence is, in general, true, is evident from ſuch of his ſpeeches as are ſtill preſerved, and which have a perſpicuity and elegance of compoſition beyond the common ſtandard of the time. Accordingly, they will find a proper place in our notes. The firſt ſpeech that appears to have been delivered by him was on the ninth of November, when the Houſe of Commons reſumed the affair of grievances. Upon this occaſion he expreſſed himſelf as will be ſeen below [A]. The next ſpeech which we have upon record is in purſuance

[A] Upon this occaſion he expreſſed himſelf as will be ſeen below.]

'Mr. Speaker,

'YOU have received now a ſolemn account, 'from moſt of the Shires of England, of the ſeveral 'grievances and oppreſſions they ſuſtain; but nothing 'as yet from Dorſetſhire. Sir, I would not have you 'think that I ſerve for a land of Goſhen; that we live 'there in ſun-ſhine, whilſt darkneſs and plagues over-'ſpread the reſt of the land. As little would I have 'you think, that, being under the ſame ſharp meaſure 'as the reſt, we are either inſenſible or benumbed, 'or that that Shire wanteth a ſervant to repreſent its 'ſufferings boldly.

'It is true, Mr. Speaker, the County of Dorſet 'hath not digeſted its complaints into that formal 'way of petition, which others, I ſee, have done; 'but have intruſted them to my partner's, and my 'delivery of them, by word of mouth, to this honour-'able Houſe. And there was given unto us, in 'the County-Court, the day of our election, a ſhort 'memorial of the heads of them, which was read in 'the hearing of the Free-holders there preſent, who 'all unanimouſly, with one voice, ſignified upon 'each particular, that it was their deſire that we ſhould 'repreſent them to the Parliament; which, with 'your leave, I ſhall do, and theſe they are:

Firſt, 'The great and intolerable burden of Ship-'Money, touching the legality whereof they are 'unſatisfied.

Secondly, 'The many great abuſes in preſſing of 'ſoldiers, and raiſing monies concerning the ſame.

Thirdly, 'The Multitude of Monopolies.

Fourthly, 'The new canons, and the oath to be 'taken by Lawyers, Divines, &c.

Fifthly, 'The oath required to be taken by Church-'officers, to preſent according to articles new and 'unuſual.

'Beſides this, there was likewiſe preſented to us, 'by a very conſiderable part of the Clergy of that 'county, a note of remembrance containing theſe 'two particulars:

Firſt, 'The impoſition of the new oath required 'to be taken by all Miniſters and others; which they 'conceive to be illegal, and ſuch as they cannot take 'with a good conſcience.

'Secondly, 'The requiring of a pretended bene-'volence, but, in effect, a ſubſidy, under the penalty 'of ſuſpenſion, excommunication, and deprivation, 'and all benefit of appeal excluded.

"This is all we had particularly in charge; but, 'that I may not appear a remiſs ſervant of my Coun-'try and of this Houſe, give me leave to add ſome-'what of my own ſenſe.

'Truly, Mr. Speaker, the injurious ſufferings of 'ſome worthy Members of this Houſe, ſince the diſ-'ſolution of the two laſt Parliaments, are ſo freſh in 'my memory, that I was reſolved not to open my 'mouth in any buſineſs, wherein freedom and plain 'dealing were requiſite, untill ſuch time as the breach 'of our privileges were vindicated, and ſafety of 'ſpeech ſettled.

'But ſince ſuch excellent Members of our Houſe 'thought fit, the other day, to lay aſide that caution, 'and to diſcharge their ſouls ſo freely in the way of 'zeal to his Majeſty's ſervice, and their Country's 'good, I ſhall interpret that confidence of theirs for a 'lucky omen to this Parliament; and, with your per-'miſſion, licenſe my thoughts too a little.

'Mr. Speaker, under thoſe heads which I pro-'poſed to you, as the grievances of Dorſetſhire, I 'ſuppoſe are comprized the greateſt part of the miſ-'chiefs which have, of late years, laid battery either 'to our eſtates or conſciences.

'Sir, I do not conceive this the fit ſeaſon to ſearch 'and ventilate particulars; yet, I profeſs, I cannot 'forbear to add ſomewhat to what was ſaid, the laſt 'day, by a learned gentleman of the long robe, con-'cerning the acts of that reverend new ſynod, made 'out of an old convocation. Doth not every Par-'liament-man's heart riſe to ſee the Prelates thus uſurp 'to themſelves the grand pre-eminence of Parliament? 'The granting of ſubſidies, and that under ſo pre-'poſterous a name as of a benevolence, for that which 'is a malevolence indeed: a malevolence, I am con-'fident, in thoſe that granted it, againſt Parliaments; 'and a malevolence ſurely in thoſe that refuſe it, 'againſt thoſe that granted it; (for how can it incite 'leſs, when they ſee wreſted from them what they 'are not willing to part with, under no leſs a penalty 'than the loſs both of heaven and earth; of heaven, 'by excommunication; and of the earth, by depriva-'tion; and this without redemption by appeal?) what 'good Chriſtian can think with patience on ſuch an 'enſnaring oath, as that which is, by the new canons, 'enjoined to be taken by all Miniſters, Lawyers, Phy-'ſicians, and Graduates in the Univerſities? Where, 'beſides ſwearing ſuch an impertinence, as that 'things neceſſary to ſalvation are contained in diſci-'pline; beſides ſwearing thoſe to be of divine right, 'which, amongſt the learned, never pretended to it, 'as the arch things in our hierarchy; beſides ſwear-'ing not to conſent to the change of that, which the 'State may, upon great reaſon, think fit to alter; 'beſides the bottomleſs perjury of an Etcætera; beſides 'all this, Mr. Speaker, men muſt ſwear that they 'ſwear freely and voluntarily what they are compelled 'unto; and laſtly, that they take that oath in the 'literal ſenſe, whereof no two of the makers them-'ſelves, that I have heard of, could ever agree in the 'underſtanding.

'In a word, Mr. Speaker, to tell you my opinion 'of this oath, it is a covenant againſt the King, for 'Biſhops and Hierarchy, as the Scots covenant is 'againſt them; only ſo much worſe than that of the 'Scots, as they admit not of the ſupremacy in eccle-'ſiaſtical affairs, and we are ſworn unto it.

'Now, Mr. Speaker, for thoſe particular heads 'of grievances whereby our eſtates and properties 'are ſo radically invaded; I ſuppoſe, as I ſaid before, 'that it is no ſeaſon now to enter into a ſtrict diſcuſ-'ſion of them: only thus much I ſhall ſay of them 'with application to the county for which I ſerve, 'that none can more juſtly complain; ſince none can 'more juſtly challenge exemption from ſuch burdens 'than Dorſetſhire, whether you conſider it as a county 'ſubſiſting much by trade, or none of the moſt popu-'lous, or expoſed as much as any to foreign invaſion.

'But, alas! Mr. Speaker, particular lamentations 'are hardly diſtinguiſhable in univerſal groans.

'Mr. Speaker, it hath been a metaphor frequently 'in Parliament; and, if my memory fail me not, 'was made uſe of in the Lord-Keeper's ſpeech at the 'opening of the laſt, "That what money Kings 'raiſed from their ſubjects, it was but as vapours 'drawn up from the earth by the ſun, to be diſtilled 'upon it again in fructifying ſhowers." The com-'pariſon, Mr. Speaker, hath held of late years, in 'this kingdom, too unluckily. What hath been 'raiſed from the ſubject by thoſe violent attractions 'hath been formed, it is true, into clouds; but how? 'To darken the ſun's own luſtre; and hath fallen 'again upon the land, only in hailſtones and mildews, 'to batter and proſtrate ſtill more and more our 'liberties, and to blaſt and wither our affections, had 'not the latter of theſe been ſtill kept alive by our 'King's own perſonal virtues; which will ever pre-'ſerve him, in ſpight of all ill counſellors, a ſacred 'object both of our admiration and our love.

Mr. Speaker, it hath been often ſaid in this 'Houſe, and, I think, can never be too often repeated, 'that purſuance of the ſame ſubject [B]. On the 19th of January, 1640-41, he was called forth to diſplay his eloquence on a very important topic. This was the bill for preventing

'that 'the Kings of England can do no wrong:' but 'though they could, Mr. Speaker, yet Princes have 'no part in the ill of thoſe actions which their judges 'aſſure them to be juſt; their counſellors, that they 'are prudent; and their divines, that they are con-'ſcientious.

'This conſideration, Mr. Speaker, leadeth me 'to that which is much more neceſſary, at this ſea-'ſon, than any farther laying open of our miſeries; 'that is, the way to the remedy, by ſeeking to re-'move from our Sovereign ſuch unjuſt judges, ſuch 'pernicious counſellors, and ſuch diſconſcientious di-'vines, as have, of late years, by their wicked prac-'tices, provoked aſperſions upon the government of 'the moſt gracious and beſt of Kings.

'Mr. Speaker, let me not be miſunderſtood; I 'level at no man with a fore-laid deſign; let the 'faults, and thoſe well proved, lead us to the men; 'it is the only true parliamentary method, and the 'only fit one to incline our Sovereign: for it can no 'more conſiſt with a gracious and righteous Prince, 'to expoſe his ſervants upon irregular prejudices, 'than with a wiſe Prince to with-hold malefactors, 'how great ſoever, from the courſe of orderly juſtice.

'Let me acquaint you, Mr. Speaker, with an 'aphoriſm in Hippocrates, no leſs authentic, I think, 'in the body politic than in the natural: this it is, 'Mr. Speaker: bodies, to be thoroughly and effec-'tually purged, muſt have their humours firſt made 'fluid and moveable. The humours, that I under-'ſtand to have cauſed all the deſperate maladies of 'this nation, are the ill miniſters: to purge them 'away clearly, they muſt be firſt looſened, unſettled, 'and extenuated; which can no way be effected with 'a gracious maſter, but by truly repreſenting them 'unworthy of his protection. And this leadeth me 'to my motion, which is, that a ſelect Committee 'may be appointed to draw, out of all that hath here 'been repreſented, ſuch a remonſtrance as may be a 'faithful and lively repreſentation unto his Majeſty 'of the deplorable eſtate of this his kingdom; and 'ſuch as may happily point out unto his clear and 'excellent judgment, the pernicious authors of it: 'and that this remonſtrance being drawn, we may, 'with all ſpeed, repair to the Lords, and deſire them 'to join with us in it. And this is my humble 'motion (1).'

[B] The next ſpeech which we have upon record is in purſuance of the ſame ſubject.]

'Mr. Speaker,

'This happy meeting is to bemoan and redreſs 'the unhappy ſtate of this commonwealth. Let 'me have, I beſeech you, your leave to give you, in 'a word, a ſhort view of our griefs; then ſee whence 'they flow. Our laws, our liberties, our lives, and, 'which is the life of all, our religion, all which have 'been, by the endeavours of ſo many ages, ſecured, 'and made ſo much our own, can ſcarcely now be 'called ours. Our laws, the only ſinews and liga-'ments of our eſtates, which ſhould run in an even 'ſtream, are now made to diſdain their banks, and to 'overflow and drown thoſe fields, which they ſhould 'gently refreſh; our liberties, the very ſpirit and 'eſſence of our weal, which ſhould differ us from 'ſlaves, and ſpeak us Engliſhmen, are torn away by 'them, who, even while they take them from us, 'cannot but confeſs they are our proper dues. Are 'not our lives in danger, when a provoked enemy, 'diſguiſed like a friend, is, as it were, ſuffered (becauſe 'indirectly and in vain reſiſted) to come almoſt into 'our boſom; to rifle ſome of their goods, others of 'their loyalty, which perhaps they could not, neither 'would have touched, might we, with united force, 'have reſiſted? And, laſtly, which is the ſoul of all 'our grievances, our Religion, which ſhould have 'been our cordial in all our diſtempers, like a forced 'virgin, ever laments that her pure innocency is taken 'from her. And ſurely all theſe effects muſt have 'their cauſes.

'That we have juſt and wiſe laws, we may thank 'thoſe Kings that made them; the ſettled expoſition 'of juſt circumſcribed laws, to bind and defend the 'ſubject, we owe to the judges of former times, and 'that they are ſo well framed and uſeful, as to con-'tain enough to make a good King and people per-'fectly ſafe and happy.

'What do we not owe to thoſe grave counſellors, 'who ſat here before us, and that outlive the malice 'of ſome unbounded ſpirits? We are beholden to 'them for retrieving our laws from ruin, with their 'lives and fortunes; we call them ours, becauſe we 'are freely born to them, as to the air we breathe in; 'we claim them, and ſhould poſſeſs them under the 'protection of our gracious King, who is their great 'patron, and diſpoſes them not inconſiderately, but 'by the advice of thoſe learned expoſitors of them, 'the judges, and thoſe whom he truſts to be his great 'and faithful counſellors. If theſe prevert the ground 'and meaning of the law, and contract the power of 'it, or make it ſpeak louder or ſofter, as they them-'ſelves are tuned for it, the blame ſhould deſervedly 'fall on thoſe miſtruſted miniſters, who are the baſe 'betrayers of his Majeſty's honour, and his people's 'rights; to vindicate which, neceſſity hath here 'aſſembled you.

'Mr. Speaker, is not his offence and malice as 'great who ſhould undermine my tenure, and ſur-'reptitiouſly deprive me of my evidence by which I 'hold my inheritance, as he who, by violence, ſhould 'wreſt it from me? The Scots we have heard branded 'as traitors, becauſe they have, contrary to the law of 'nations and their loyalty, invaded our kingdom in 'arms; what other title have they merited, who have 'invaded our laws and liberties, the precious evi-'dence by which we ſhould freely enjoy ourſelves and 'our eſtates? The firſt we may reſiſt and drive forth 'by united force; and it will be called piety to our 'King and Country; if force be laid againſt the other, 'it will be ſtiled rebellion.

'What now remains but that we ſhould uſe the 'law; which, becauſe it hath been invented and 'turned againſt us, contrary to its own natural and 'plain diſpoſition, ſhould now right us and itſelf againſt 'our adverſaries? Surely the law is not ſo weak and 'improvident, to take care for others, and never pro-'vide for its own defence againſt thoſe (be they Peers 'or People) that have abuſed it. If we examine the 'law well, it will tell us what hath been the reward 'of ſuch ambitious men as have monopolized and 'abuſed the King's authority; what hath been the 'puniſhment of ſuch as have betrayed the well-mean-'ing ſubject to the King's diſpleaſure, and his Prince's 'counſel to his enemies; what they deſerve, who 'have raiſed mountains of monopolies, heaps of im-'poſitions, oceans of grievances; what hath been 'the puniſhment of ſuch as belied juſtice and their 'conſcience, and have made truth and honeſty out of 'faſhion.

'And, laſtly, if no penalty be found for theſe, ſurely 'there is ſome for ſuch as have ſo diſguiſed religion 'in fantaſtic dreſſes, that Heaven and Earth cannot but 'be angry to ſee it; and, in their politic pride, have 'been ſo long moulding a-new both State and Church 'for their own advantage, till they have, by their 'too much order, put all out of frame; and made 'us objects of pity, and themſelves of hate. What if, 'for theſe innovations, we innovate an exemplary 'puniſhment? Theſe are the ground-work of our 'miſeries: and ſurely, Mr. Speaker, there are too 'many of all theſe ſorts, which, like envious clouds, 'hinder us from the gracious ſhine our ſun intends us; 'therefore for his greater luſtre, and our more aſſured 'comfort, let us endeavour to remove theſe inter-'poſers; that he may freely ſee into his people's 'boſoms, and read, in their hearts, firm characters 'of loyalty and glad obedience; which the practices 'of theſe latter times have endeavoured to obliterate, 'but in vain.

'I ſhall not dare to borrow one minute more; but 'now make an end, though I have but new begun.

'If we conſider the juſt extent of our grievances, 'the deep ſearch of this wound I leave to better 'abilities:

venting inconveniences which happen by long intermiſſion of Parliaments. The ſentiments advanced by him, in favour of frequent Parliaments, are ſo truly patriotic, and ſo congenial, we doubt not, to the feelings of moſt of our Readers, that they will peruſe them with peculiar pleaſure [C].

' abilities: I beſeech you think not that I ſigh out ' theſe complaints, undertaking to inſtruct the grave ' council of this Great Aſſembly; my infant-advice ' preſumes not to reach ſo high: it is but to let you ' ſee how much the ſlighteſt parts of this abuſed com- ' monwealth are not only made ſenſible of our ' wrongs, but that what we feel is far exceeded by ' the numberleſs number of our juſt fears; which ' would, before this time, have utterly diſtracted us, ' had not our Great Phyſician now, at length, applied ' his ſovereign remedy to keep up our fainting hopes; ' by which we muſt either ſtand or fall (2).'

[C] That they will peruſe them with peculiar pleaſure.]

' Mr. Speaker,

' I riſe not now, with an intent to ſpeak to the ' frame and ſtructure of this bill, nor much by way ' of anſwer to objections that may be made; I hope ' there will be no occaſion for this, but that we ſhall ' concur, all unanimouſly, in what concerneth all ſo ' univerſally.

' Only, Sir, by way of preparation, to the end that ' we may not be diſcouraged in this great work by ' difficulties that may appear in the way of it, I ſhall ' deliver unto you my apprehenſions in general of ' the vaſt importance and neceſſity that we ſhould go ' through with it.

' The reſult of my ſenſe is, in ſhort, this; that, ' unleſs there be ſome ſuch courſe ſettled for the fre- ' quent convening of Parliaments, as may not be ' eluded, neither the people can be proſperous and ' ſecure, nor the King himſelf ſolidly happy. I take ' this to be the unum neceſſarium: let us procure this, ' and all our other deſires will effect themſelves. If ' this bill miſcarry, I ſhall have no public hopes left ' me; and, once paſt, I ſhall be freed of all public ' fears.

' The eſſentialneſs, Sir, of frequent Parliaments to ' the happineſs of this kingdom might be inferred ' unto you by the reaſon of contraries, and from the ' woful experience which former times have had of the ' miſchievous effects of any long intermiſſion of them.

' But, Mr. Speaker, why ſhould we climb higher ' than the level we are on; or think further than our ' horizon; or have recourſe for examples in this ' buſineſs to any other promptuary than our own ' memories, nay, than the experience almoſt of the ' youngeſt here?

' The reflection, backward, on the diſtractions of ' former times upon intermiſſion of Parliaments, and ' the conſideration, forward, of the miſchiefs likely ' ſtill to grow from the ſame cauſe, if not removed, ' doubtleſſly gave firſt life and being to thoſe two dor- ' mant ſtatutes of Edward III. for the yearly holding ' of a Parliament; and ſhall not the freſh and bleeding ' experience, in the preſent age of miſeries from the ' ſame ſpring, not to be paralleled in any other, ' obtain a wakening, a reſurrection of them?

' The inteſtine diſtempers, Sir, of former ages ' upon the want of Parliaments, may appear to have ' had ſome other co-operative cauſes; as, ſometimes, ' unſucceſsful wars abroad; ſometimes, the abſence ' of the Prince; ſometimes, competitions of titles to ' the Crown; ſometimes, perhaps, the vices of the ' King himſelf.

' Let us only conſider the poſture, the aſpect of ' this State, both toward itſelf and the reſt of the ' world; the perſon of our Sovereign, and the nature ' of our ſuffering, ſince the third of his reign: and ' there can be no cauſe, colourably inventible, where- ' unto to attribute them, but the intermiſſion, or, ' which is worſe, the undue fruſtration of Parliaments, ' by the unlucky uſe, if not abuſe, of prerogative in ' diſſolving them.

' Take into your view, Mr. Speaker, a kingdom ' in a ſtate of the greateſt quiet and ſecurity that can ' be fancied; not only enjoying the calmeſt peace ' itſelf, but to improve and ſecure its happy condi- ' tion, all the reſt of the world at the ſame time in ' tempeſts, in combuſtions, in uncompoſable wars.

' Take into your view, Sir, a King, Sovereign of ' three kingdoms, by a concentring of all the Royal ' lines in his perſon, as indiſputably as any mathema- ' tical ones in Euclid; a King firm and knowing in ' his religion, eminent in virtue; a King, that hath, ' in his own time, given all the rights and liberties ' of his ſubjects a more clear and ample confirmation, ' freely and graciouſly (I mean in the petition of right) ' than any of his predeceſſors, (when the people had ' them at advantage), extortedly.——This is one map ' of England, Mr. Speaker.

' A man, Sir, that ſhould preſent unto you, now, ' a kingdom, groaning under that ſupreme law which ' ſalus populi periclitata would enact; the liberty, the ' property, of the ſubject fundamentally ſubverted, ' raviſhed away by the violence of a pretended neceſ- ' ſity; a triple Crown ſhaken with diſtempers; men ' of the beſt conſcience ready to fly into the wilder- ' neſs for religion! would not one ſwear that this ' were the antipodes to the other?—And yet, let me ' tell you, Mr. Speaker, this is a map of England ' too, and both at the ſame time but too true.

' As it cannot be denied, Mr. Speaker, that, ſince ' the Conqueſt, there hath not been in this kingdom ' a fuller concurrence of all circumſtances in the for- ' mer character, to have made a kingdom happy, ' than for theſe twelve years laſt paſt; ſo it is moſt ' certain, that there hath not been, in all that deduc- ' tion of ages, ſuch a conſpiracy, if one may ſo ſay, ' of all the elements of miſchief in the ſecond character, ' to bring a flouriſhing kingdom, if it were poſſible, ' to ſwift ruin and deſolation.

' I will be bold to ſay Mr. Speaker (and I thank ' God, we have ſo good a King, under whom we ' may ſpeak boldly of the abuſe of his power by ill ' miniſters, without reflection upon his perſon), that ' an accumulation of all the public grievances ſince ' magna charta, one upon another, into an act of ' Parliament, would not amount to ſo oppreſſive, I ' am ſure not to ſo deſtructive, a height and magni- ' tude to the rights and property of the ſubject, as ' one branch of our beſlaving ſince the Petition of ' Right! The branch I mean is the judgment concern- ' ing ſhip-money.

' This being a true repreſentation of England, in ' both aſpects, let him, Mr. Speaker, that (for the ' unmatched oppreſſion and enthralling of free ſubjects, ' in a time of the beſt King's reign, and in memory ' of the beſt laws enacted in favour of ſubjects liberty,) ' can find a truer cauſe than the ruptures and inter- ' miſſion of Parliaments; let him, I ſay, and him ' alone, be againſt the ſettling of this inevitable way ' for the frequent holding of them.

' 'Tis true, Sir, wicked miniſters have been the ' proximate cauſes of our miſeries; but the want of ' Parliaments the primary, the efficient cauſes: ill ' miniſters have made ill times; but that, Sir, hath ' made ill miniſters.

' I have read, among the laws of the Athenians, ' a form of recourſe, in their oaths and vows of their ' greateſt and public concernment, to a three-fold deity, ' ſupplicium exauditori, purgatori, malorum depulſori. ' I doubt not but we, here aſſembled for the common- ' wealth in this Parliament, ſhall meet with all theſe ' attributes in our Sovereign. I make no queſtion ' but he will graciouſly hear our ſupplications, purge ' away our grievances, and expel malefactors; that ' is, remove ill miniſters, and put good in their ' places.—No leſs can be expected from his wiſdom ' and goodneſs.

' But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, if we partake ' not of one attribute more in him; if we addreſs not ' ourſelves unto that, I mean bonorum conſervatori, we ' can have no ſolid, no durable comfort in all the ' reſt: for let his Majeſty hear our complaints never ' ſo compaſſionately; let him purge away our griev-

One of the prime objects to which the first operations of the Long Parliament were directed, was the prosecution of the Earl of Strafford; into which business Lord Digby entered with distinguished ardour. He represented the Earl as the chief author of all that was grievous in England, and inveighed against him with such strength and severity as induced many, who might not otherwise have done it, to unite in the resolution of charging Strafford with high treason. By this conduct he gained the entire confidence

'ances never so efficaciously; let him punish and dispel 'ill ministers never so exemplarily; let him make 'choice of good ones never so exactly: yet if there be 'not a way settled to preserve and keep them good, 'the mischiefs and they will all grow again like Samp-'son's locks, and pull down the house upon our heads— 'believe it, Mr. Speaker, they will.

'It hath been a maxim among the wisest legislators, 'that whosoever means to settle good laws must pro-'ceed in them with a sinister opinion of all mankind; 'and suppose that whosoever is not wicked, it is for 'want only of the opportunity.

'It is that opportunity of being ill, Mr. Speaker, 'that we must take away, if ever we mean to be 'happy; which can never be done, but by the fre-'quency of Parliaments.

'No State can wisely be confident of any public 'minister's continuing good, longer than the rod is 'over him.

'Let me appeal to all those that were present in 'this House, at the agitation of the Petition of Right: 'and let them tell us truly, of whose promotion to 'the management of affairs do they think the gene-'rality would, at that time, have had better hopes 'than of the late Mr. Noy and Sir Thomas Went-'worth; both being at that time, and in that business, 'as I have heard, most keen and active patriots; and 'the latter of them (to the eternal aggravation of his 'infamous treachery to the commonwealth be it 'spoken) the first mover and insister to have this 'clause added to the Petition of Right, "That, for 'the comfort and safety of his Majesty's subjects, he 'would be pleased to declare his will and pleasure, 'that all his ministers should serve him according to 'the laws and statutes of the realm."

'And yet, Mr. Speaker, to whom now can all the 'inundations upon our liberties, under pretence of 'law, and the late shipwreck, at once, of all our 'property, be attributed more than to Noy; and 'those, and all other mischiefs whereby this monarchy 'hath been brought almost to the brink of destruc-'tion, so much to any as to that grand apostate to the commonwealth, the now Lieutenant of Ireland?

'The first, I hope, God hath forgiven in the other world; and the latter must not hope to be pardoned 'in this, till he be dispatched to the other.

'Let every man but consider those men as once 'they were,—the excellent law for the security of 'the subject, enacted immediately before their coming 'into employment, in the contriving whereof them-'selves were principal actors;—the goodness and vir-'tue of the King they served,—and yet the high and 'public oppressions that, in his time, they have 'wrought;—and surely there is no man but will con-'clude with me, that, as the deficience of Parliaments 'hath been the causa causarum of all the mischiefs and 'distempers of the present times; so the frequency of 'them is the sole Catholic antidote that can preserve 'and secure the future from the like.

'Mr. Speaker, let me yet draw my discourse a 'little nearer to his Majesty himself, and tell you, 'that the frequency of Parliaments is most essentially 'necessary to the power, the security, the glory of 'the King.

'There are two ways, Mr. Speaker, of powerful 'rule, either by fear, or love; but only one of happy 'and safe rule, that is, by love; that firmissimum im-'perium quo obedientes gaudent:——To this Camillus 'advised the Romans: Let a Prince consider what 'it is that moves a people, principally, to affection 'and dearness towards their Sovereign, he shall see 'that there needs no other artifice in it than to let 'them enjoy, unmolestedly, what belongs unto them 'of right: if that hath been invaded and violated in 'any kind, whereby affections are alienated, the next 'consideration for a wise Prince, that would be happy, 'is how to regain them; to which three things are 'equally necessary,

'Re-instating them in their former liberty.

'Avenging them of the authors of those violations. And;

'Securing them from apprehensions of the like 'again.

'The first, God be thanked, we are in a good 'way of.

'The second, in warm pursuit of.

'But the third, as essential as all the rest, 'till we 'be certain of triennial Parliaments, at the least, I 'profess I can have but cold hopes of.

'I beseech you then, since that security for the 'future is so necessary to that blessed union of affec-'tions, and this bill so necessary to that security; let 'us not be so wanting to ourselves, let us not be so 'wanting to our Sovereign, as to forbear to offer unto 'him this powerful, this everlasting philter, to charm 'unto him the hearts of his people, whose virtue 'can never evaporate.

'There is no man, Mr. Speaker, so secure of 'another's friendship, but will think frequent inter-'course and access very requisite to the support, to 'the confirmation of it: especially if ill offices have 'been done between them; if the raising of jealou-'sies hath been attempted.

'There is no friend but would be impatient to 'be debarred from giving his friend succour and relief 'in his necessities.

'Mr. Speaker, permit me the comparison of great 'things with little. What friendship, what union 'can there be so comfortable, so happy, as between a 'gracious Sovereign and his people? And what 'greater misfortune can there be to both, than to be 'kept from intercourse, from the means of clearing 'misunderstandings, from interchange of mutual 'benefits?

'The people of England, Sir, cannot open their 'ears, their hearts, their mouths, or their purses, 'to his Majesty, but in Parliament:—We can neither 'hear him, nor complain, nor acknowledge, nor give, 'but there.

'This bill, Sir, is the sole key that can open the 'way to a frequency of those reciprocal endearments, 'which must make and perpetuate the happiness of 'the King and kingdom.

'Let no man object any derogation from the King's 'prerogative by it. We do but present the bill, 'tis 'to be made a law by him. His honour, his power, 'will be as conspicuous in commanding at once that 'Parliaments shall assemble every third year, as in 'commanding a Parliament to be called this or that 'year. There is more of Majesty in ordaining pri-'mary and universal causes, than in the actuating 'particularly of subordinate effects.

'I doubt not but that glorious King, Edward III. 'when he made those laws for the yearly calling of 'Parliaments, did it with a right sense of his dignity 'and honour.

'The truth is, Sir, the Kings of England are never 'in their glory, in their splendor, in their Majestic 'sovereignty, but in Parliament.

'Where is the power of imposing taxes? Where 'is the power of restoring from incapacities? Where 'is the legislative authority? Why, marry, in the 'King, Mr. Speaker. But how? In the King cir-'cled in, fortified, and evirtuated by his Parliament.

'The King, out of Parliament, hath a limited, 'a circumscribed jurisdiction; but, waited on by his 'Parliament, no Monarch of the East is so absolute 'in dispelling grievances.

'Mr. Speaker, in chasing ill ministers, we do but 'dissipate clouds that may gather again; but, in 'voting this bill, we shall contribute, as much as in 'us lies, to the perpetuating our sun, our Sovereign, 'in his vertical, in his noon-day, lustre (3).'

of the grand leaders of the impeachment, and was admitted into all their ſecrets. Beſides being fixed upon to prepare part of the charge againſt the Earl of Strafford, the whole courſe of the intended proceedings, and the obſtructions that were moſt apprehended were as clearly underſtood by Lord Digby as by Mr. Pym and Mr. Hampden themſelves. Having thus gotten himſelf to the top of the pinnacle, he began to look about him, and to take the full proſpect of all that was to be ſeen. It is poſſible, perhaps probable, that, upon ſerious reflection, he might be conſcientiouſly diſſatisfied with the lengths to which the proſecution againſt Strafford was deſigned to be carried. Whatever might be his motives, he reſolved to ſteer another courſe, and, with a dexterity in which he eminently excelled, he contrived to make the Court acquainted with his intentions, and to raiſe a high opinion of the merit of his future ſervices. His overtures, as may reaſonably be imagined, were very cordially accepted. In conformity to his new views, he became more moderate in his parliamentary language, and ſhewed, in ſeveral inſtances, that he was not diſpoſed to embark wholly on the bottom of the party with which he had hitherto acted. He ſtill, however, continued his connection with the proſecutors of the Lord Strafford, and took his part in the management of the evidence againſt him; but with ſuch a temper, as ſufficiently manifeſted that he neither brought the ſpirit, nor would bring the teſtimony that had been expected from him by his coadjutors in the impeachment (g).

(g) Clarendon, ubi ſupra. P. LII. LIII.

At this time a circumſtance occurred of a ſingular nature. A paper of great conſequence to the trial was miſſing in the cloſe Committee of the Houſe of Commons; and by the Earl of Strafford's anſwer it was ſuppoſed that he had ſeen it, and that it had been conveyed to him by ſome one of the Committee. Mr. Whitelock, who was in the chair, and who had the charge and cuſtody of all the papers, was ſuſpected more than any other perſon to have been guilty of this piece of treachery. Strict ſearch was made for the paper; but it could not then be found. Mr. Whitelock alledged, in his own vindication, that amongſt ſuch a multitude of papers as he had in his cuſtody, it was not eaſy to ſee that he had them all again, when they were brought forth, or any of them called for. He added, that he never ſhewed the paper to any but the Committee; that he knew not who had it, or what was become of it; that he did not convey it away himſelf, and was totally ignorant by whom it had been conveyed. This apology did not give full ſatisfaction. The Houſe was acquainted with the affair, and it was ordered, that every one of the Committee ſhould make a ſolemn proteſtation, that they did not convey away the paper in queſtion, nor know what was become of it. All of them made this proteſtation, and the Lord Digby with more earneſtneſs and deeper imprecations than any of the reſt. Nevertheleſs, when, at the battle of Naſeby, the King's cabinet was taken, a copy of this individual paper was found in it, written in his Lordſhip's own hand. Thus was Mr. Whitelock cleared, and the conveyer of the paper to his Majeſty, and from him to the Earl of Strafford, fully diſcovered (b). Lord Clarendon ſeems unwilling to credit the truth of this ſtory; but it appears to reſt on a foundation too ſtrong to be eaſily ſhaken. What his Lordſhip obſerves is, that it may be preſumed, that a man who had gotten a paper in ſuch a manner, would, at leaſt, after ſuch an enquiry was made upon it, have caſt it into the fire (i). The Earl of Clarendon, who is otherwiſe miſtaken in his relation of the affair, ſhould have recollected, that it was not in Lord Digby's power to deſtroy his copy of the paper, after he had conveyed it to the King.

(i) Clarendon, ubi ſupra.

As ſoon as the trial of the Earl of Strafford was ended, and it was diſcerned that the Houſe of Peers would not paſs upon him a judgment of high-treaſon, the Commons determined to proceed againſt him by bill of attainder. Upon this occaſion it was that Lord Digby publicly avowed the change of his ſentiments. At the third reading of the Bill, on the 21ſt of April, 1641, he oppoſed the paſſing of it in a ſpeech full of energy and ſpirit [D]. Great offence was taken by the predominant party at his Lordſhip's

[D] He oppoſed the paſſing of it, in a ſpeech full of energy and ſpirit.]

'Mr. Speaker,

'We are now upon the point of giving (as much 'as in us lies) the final ſentence unto death or life 'on a great miniſter of State, and peer of this king-'dom, Thomas Earl of Strafford; a name of hatred 'in the preſent age by his practices, and fit to be 'made a terror to future ages by his puniſhment.

'I have had the honour to be employed by the 'Houſe in this great buſineſs from the firſt hour that 'it was taken into conſideration. It was a matter of 'great truſt; and I will ſay, with confidence, that I 'have ſerved the Houſe in it, not only with induſtry, 'according to my abilities, but with moſt exact faith-'fulneſs and juſtice.

'And as I have hitherto diſcharged my duty to 'this Houſe and to my Country, in the progreſs of 'this great cauſe, ſo I truſt I ſhall do now in the laſt 'period of it to God and to a good conſcience. I 'do wiſh the peace of that unto myſelf, and the 'bleſſings of Almighty God to me and my poſterity, 'according as my judgment on the life of this man 'ſhall be conſonant with my heart, and the beſt of 'my underſtanding in all integrity.

'I know well, Mr. Speaker, that by ſome things 'I have ſaid of late, whilſt this bill was in agitation, 'I have raiſed ſome prejudices upon me in the cauſe. 'Yea, ſome (I thank them for their plain dealing) 'have been ſo free as to tell me, that I have ſuffered 'much by the backwardneſs I have ſhewn in the bill 'of attainder of the Earl of Strafford, againſt whom 'I have formerly been ſo keen, ſo active.

'I beg of you, and the reſt, but a ſuſpenſion of 'judgment concerning me, till I have opened my 'heart ſhip's conduct. A motion was immediately made that, on the next day, he ſhould explain himſelf, with regard to ſome things that had occurred in his ſpeech. This he accordingly

'heart unto you, clearly and freely, in this buſineſs. 'Truly, Sir, I am ſtill the ſame in my opinions and 'affections as to the Earl of Strafford: I confidently 'believe him to be the moſt dangerous miniſter, the 'moſt inſupportable to free ſubjects, that can be 'charactered. I believe his practices in themſelves 'as high, as tyrannical, as any ſubject ever ventured 'on; and the malignity of them hugely aggravated 'by thoſe rare abilities of his, whereof God hath 'given him the uſe, but the devil the application. 'In a word, I believe him to be ſtill that grand 'apoſtate to the commonwealth, who muſt not ex-'pect to be pardoned in this world, till he be diſ-'patched to the other. And yet, let me tell you, 'Mr. Speaker, my hand muſt not be to that diſpatch: 'I proteſt, as my conſcience ſtands informed, I had 'rather it were off.

'Let me unfold to you the myſtery, Mr. Speaker: 'I will not dwell much upon juſtifying unto you my 'ſeeming variance at this time from what I was 'formerly, by putting you in mind of the difference 'between proſecutors and judges, how miſbecoming 'that fervour would be in a judge, which, perhaps, 'was commendable in a proſecutor. Judges we are 'now, and muſt put on another perſonage. It is 'honeſt and noble to be earneſt, in order to the diſ-'covery of truth; but when that hath been brought 'ſo far as it can to light, our judgment thereupon 'ought to be calm and cautious. In proſecution 'upon probable grounds, we are accountable only 'for our induſtry or remiſſneſs; but in judgment 'we are deeply reſponſible to God Almighty for its 'rectitude or obliquity. In caſes of life, the judge is 'God's ſteward of the party's blood, and muſt give a 'ſtrict account for every drop.

'But, as I told you, Mr. Speaker, I will not 'inſiſt long upon this ground of difference in me 'now from what I was formerly.

'The truth of it is, Sir, the ſame ground where-'upon I, with the reſt of the few to whom you firſt 'committed the conſideration of my Lord Strafford, 'brought down our opinion, that it was fit he ſhould 'be accuſed of treaſon: upon the ſame ground I was 'engaged, with earneſtneſs, in his proſecution; and 'had the ſame ground remained in that force of 'belief with me, which till very lately it did, I ſhould 'not have been tender in his condemnation: but 'truly, Sir, to deal plainly with you, that ground of 'our accuſation, that ſpur to our proſecution, and 'that which ſhould be the baſis of my judgment of 'the Earl of Strafford, as to treaſon, is, to my under-'ſtanding, quite vaniſhed away.

'This it was, Mr. Speaker: his adviſing the King 'to employ the army in Ireland to reduce England. 'This I was aſſured would be proved, before I gave 'my conſent to his accuſation. I was confirmed in 'the ſame belief during the proſecution; and for-'tified moſt of all in it, ſince Sir Henry Vane's pre-'paratory examination, by aſſurances which that wor-'thy member, Mr. Pymme, gave me, that his teſti-'mony would be made convincing by ſome notes of 'what paſſed at the juncto, concurrent with it; 'which I ever underſtanding to be of ſome other 'Counſellor, you ſee now prove but a copy of the 'ſame Secretary's notes, diſcovered and produced in 'the manner you have heard; and thoſe ſuch diſ-'jointed fragments of the venomous part of diſcourſes: 'no reſults, no concluſions of Councils, which are 'the only things that Secretaries ſhould regiſter; 'there being no uſe of the other, but to accuſe and 'bring men into danger.

'But, Sir, this is not that which overthrows the 'evidence with me concerning the army in Ireland; 'nor yet, that all the reſt of the juncto remember 'nothing of it; but this, Sir, which I ſhall tell you, 'is that which works with me, under favour, to an 'utter overthrow of his evidence, as unto that of the 'army of Ireland: before, whilſt I was proſecutor, 'and under tye of ſecrecy, I might not diſcover any 'weakneſs of the cauſe, which now, as a judge, I 'muſt. Mr. Secretary was examined thrice upon 'oath, at the preparatory Committee. The firſt time 'he was queſtioned to all the interrogatories; and to 'that part of the ſeventh, which concerns the army 'in Ireland, he ſaid poſitively theſe words, 'I can-'not charge him with that;' but, for the reſt, he 'deſired time to recollect himſelf; which was granted 'him.

'Some days after he was examined a ſecond time, 'and then depoſed theſe words concerning the King's 'being abſolved from rules of Government, and ſo 'forth, very clearly. But being preſſed to that part 'concerning the Iriſh army again, he ſaid, he could 'ſay nothing to that.

'Here we thought we had done with him; till, 'divers weeks after, my Lord of Northumberland, 'and all others of the juncto, denying to have heard 'any thing concerning thoſe words, of reducing Eng-'land by the Iriſh army, it was thought fit to examine 'the Secretary once more; and then he depoſed theſe 'words to have been ſpoken by the Earl of Strafford 'to his Majeſty, 'you have an army in Ireland, 'which you may employ here to reduce (or ſome 'words to that ſenſe) this kingdom.'

'Mr. Speaker, theſe are the circumſtances which, 'I confeſs with my conſcience, thruſt quite out of 'doors that grand article of our charge, concerning 'his deſperate advice to the King, of employing the 'Iriſh army here.

'Let not this, I beſeech you, be driven to an 'aſperſion upon Mr. Secretary, as if he ſhould have 'ſworn otherwiſe than he knew or believed; he is 'too worthy to do that; only let thus much be in-'ferred from it, that he who twice upon oath, with 'time of recollection, could not remember any thing 'of ſuch a buſineſs, might well a third time miſ-'remember ſomewhat: and in this buſineſs the differ-'ence of one word, here for there, or that for this, 'quite alters the caſe; the latter alſo being the more 'probable, ſince it is confeſſed on all hands, that the 'debate then was concerning a war with Scotland; 'and you may remember that, at the bar, he once 'ſaid 'to employ there.' And thus, Mr. Speaker, have 'I faithfully given you an account what it is that hath 'blunted the edge of the hatchet, or bill, with me, 'towards my Lord Strafford.

'This was that whereupon I accuſed him with a 'free heart, proſecuted him with earneſtneſs; and 'had it, to my underſtanding, been proved, ſhould 'have condemned him with innocence; whereas, 'now, I cannot ſatisfy my conſcience to do it. I 'profeſs, I can have no notion of any body's intent 'to ſubvert the laws, treaſonably, but by force; 'and this deſign of force not appearing, all his other 'wicked practices cannot amount ſo high with me.

'I can find a more eaſy and more natural ſpring 'from whence to derive all his other crimes, than 'from an intent to bring in tyranny, and to make 'his own poſterity, as well as us, ſlaves; as, from 'revenge, from pride, from avarice, from paſſion, 'and from inſolence of nature.

'But had this of the Iriſh army been proved, it 'would have diffuſed a complexion of treaſon over 'all; it would have been a withe indeed—to bind 'all thoſe other ſcattered and leſſer branches, as it 'were, into a faggot of treaſon.

'I do not ſay but the reſt may repreſent him a 'man as worthy to die, and perhaps worthier, than 'many a traitor. I do not ſay but they may juſtly 'direct us to enact, that they ſhall be treaſon for 'the future.

'But God keep me from giving judgment of death 'on any man, and of ruin to his innocent poſterity, 'upon a law made à poſteriori.

'Let the mark be ſet on the door where the plague 'is, and then let him that will enter die.

'I know, Mr. Speaker, there is in Parliament a 'double power of life and death by bill, a judicial 'power, and a legiſlative: the meaſure of the one is, 'what is legally juſt; of the other, what is pruden-'tially and politickly fit for the good and preſervation 'of cordingly did, and here the matter reſted for the preſent; but future opportunities were embraced of diſplaying the reſentment which was conceived againſt him (k).

(k) Parliamentary Hiſtory. Vol. IX. p. 262.

From this time Lord Digby was looked upon as at leaſt the deſerter, if not the betrayer, of his political friends: and he who at Chriſtmas was the object, not only of the higheſt eſteem, but almoſt even of adoration; before Eaſter was fallen ſo low in the opinion of thoſe who were devoted to the rights of the people, that they thought no reproach equal to his demerit. Indeed, through the whole courſe of his life he had a wonderful facility of arriving ſooner to a high pitch of eſtimation and affection than any man who in that age was known, and then of making the greateſt haſte to fall into a gulph of prejudice and deteſtation. The effect of this was, that he had ſcarcely ever a notable enemy with whom he had not been connected in the cloſeſt friendſhip, or at leaſt to whom he had not profeſſed ſuch an inclination as in any other caſe would have amounted to friendſhip. At the ſame time he bore both theſe extremes with perfect unconcern, imputing the eſteem and regard he was held in to his own virtue and tranſcendant parts, and his dexterity in the management of mankind; and aſcribing the enmity that followed to the unſteadineſs and inconſtancy of men's humours, and to their envy and jealouſy of his ſuperior faculties (l).

As Lord Digby was now become very obnoxious to the majority of the Houſe of Commons, and could not be of any ſervice to the King in that Houſe, it was thought proper to raiſe him to the Peerage. The writ for that purpoſe bore date on the ninth of June; and the next day he took his ſeat among the Lords. Dr. Nalſon and Anthony Wood aſſert, that the very ſame day in which he was introduced into the Houſe of Peers he was expelled the Houſe of Commons. But there does not appear to be any ſufficient foundation for this aſſertion. No ſuch circumſtance is found in Ruſhworth, Whitelock, or Clarendon; and what is more to the purpoſe there is no entry of that kind in the Journals. The whole of what we find there, is, an order for the iſſuing out a writ for the electing a Knight for Dorſetſhire in his room, without the leaſt mention whether the vacancy was occaſioned by expulſion or promotion. Immediately on his admiſſion among the Peers, it was ordered that his name ſhould be added to all their ſtanding Committees (m).

(m) Athenæ. Oxonienſes. Vol. II. col. 579. Parl. Hiſt. ubi ſupra. p. 379.

Though Lord Digby was thus preferred out of the way of the Commons, their reſentment purſued him in a very ſevere and unjuſtifiable manner; and in a manner totally contrary to thoſe principles of liberty which they profeſſed to act upon, and which in many reſpects they maintained. On the thirteenth of July, an order was made that the ſpeech which he had delivered in the caſe of the Earl of Strafford, and which had been printed and publiſhed, ſhould be burnt by the hands of the common hangman; and this order was followed by a reſolution to move the Peers to join in a petition to his Majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to forbear to confer any honour or employment upon the perſon of Lord Digby, who had deſerved ſo ill of the Parliament (n). A fuller account of this tranſaction, together with ſome of his Lordſhip's juſt reflections upon the occaſion will be ſeen below [E].

In

'of the whole: but theſe two, under favour, are 'not to be confounded in judgment. We muſt not 'piece up want of legality with matter of convenience, 'nor the defailance of prudential fitneſs with a pre-'tence of legal juſtice.

'To condemn my Lord of Strafford judicially, as 'for treaſon, my conſcience is not aſſured that the 'matter will bear it: and to do it by the legiſlative 'power, my reaſon, conſultively, cannot agree to 'that; ſince I am perſuaded neither the Lord nor the 'King will paſs this bill; and conſequently, that our 'paſſing it will be a cauſe of great diviſions and con-'buſtions in the State.

'Therefore my humble advice is, that, laying 'aſide this bill of attainder, we may think of another, 'ſaving only life, ſuch as may ſecure the State from 'my Lord of Strafford, without endangering it as 'much by diviſion concerning his puniſhment, as he 'hath endangered it by his practices.

'If this may not be hearkened unto, let me con-'clude in ſaying that to you all which I have tho-'roughly inculcated in mine own conſcience upon this 'occaſion. Let every man lay his hand upon his 'own heart, and ſeriouſly conſider what we are going 'to do with a breath, either juſtice or murder; juſtice 'on the one ſide, or murder heightened and aggra-'vated to its ſupremeſt extent on the other: for, as 'the caſuiſts ſay, he who lies with his ſiſter commits 'inceſt, but he that marries his ſiſter ſins higher, 'by applying God's Ordinance to his crime; ſo, 'doubtleſs, he that commits murder with the ſword 'of juſtice, heightens that crime to the utmoſt.

'The danger being ſo great, and the caſe ſo doubt-'ful, that I ſee the beſt lawyers in diametrical oppo-'ſition concerning it, let every man wipe his heart, 'as he does his eyes, when he would judge of a nice 'and ſubtle object. The eye, if it be pretincted 'with any colour, is vitiated in its diſcerning. Let 'us take heed of a blood-ſhotten eye in judgment.

'Let every man purge his heart clear of all paſſions. 'I know this great and wiſe body politic can have 'none; but I ſpeak to individuals from the weak-'neſs which I find in myſelf. Away with perſonal 'animoſities; away with all flatteries to the people, 'in being the ſharper againſt him, becauſe he is 'odious to them; away with all fears, leſt by 'the ſparing his blood they may be incenſed; 'away with all ſuch conſiderations, as that it is 'not fit for a Parliament that one accuſed by it 'of treaſon ſhould eſcape with life. Let not former 'vehemence of any againſt him, nor fear from thence 'that he cannot be ſafe while that man lives, be an 'ingredient in the ſentence of any one of us.

'Of all theſe corruptives of judgment, Mr. Speaker, 'I do, before God, diſcharge myſelf, to the utmoſt 'of my power; and do, with a clear conſcience, waſh 'my hands of this man's blood, by this ſolemn pro-'teſtation, that my vote goes not to the taking of the 'Earl of Stafford's life (4).'

[E] A fuller account, &c. will be ſeen below.] The Commons had ſome time before, appointed a Committee to conſider about the printing and publiſhing a ſpeech made by the Lord Digby on the bill of

In the melancholy and declining ſtate of the Court party, the acceſſion of ſuch a man as Lord Digby was deemed a matter of no ſmall conſequence. Great things were expected from the quickneſs of his conceptions, the vigour of his underſtanding, and the fearleſſneſs of his courage. Indeed,

" Si duo præterea tales Idæa tuliſſet
" Terra viros,"

it is impoſſible to ſay what might, or might not have reſulted from the boldneſs of his temper. The effect might have been uſeful, or it might have been hurtful, in the higheſt degree. By the introduction of Lord Digby into the Houſe of Peers life and ſpirit were added to the proceedings of that Houſe. The majority of the Lords retained a ſtrong affection to the King, to the Church, and to Government; and conſequently were well inclined to follow his Lordſhip's example, and to be ſwayed by his arguments, which were always delivered by him with peculiar advantages of gracefulneſs and elocution. He was known to be confided in, and to be acquainted with the views of the Court, where he was looked upon, not as having deſerted his principles or his party, but as having receded from the leaders of oppoſition, becauſe they harboured exorbitant deſigns under fair pretenſions, and becauſe he would not part from his integrity. Perhaps if the too great activity and reſtleſſneſs of his nature would have permitted him to have ſitten ſtill, calmly to have waited the courſe of events, and prudently to have improved the incidents of the times, he might, in conjunction with wiſe, ſober, and moderate men, have contributed to prevent the calamities that enſued. But his diſpoſition was impatient of repoſe, and he always embraced the boldeſt and moſt hazardous counſels, which he thought would give a greater luſtre to his wit and conduct. This unhappy infirmity and vanity made him reſerved to thoſe whom he moſt intimately conſulted, and without whoſe concurrence he pretended to reſolve nothing. In any determination that was agreed upon between them, he always kept to himſelf ſome important particular, which would in truth have changed the whole counſel, and have cauſed them all to proteſt againſt that which he reſolved to have done as if it had been a matter mutually adjuſted between them. Nor did he act thus from jealouſy or diſtruſt of thoſe with whom he was connected, or from a contradiction to their opinions and judgment, with which he was moſt ready to comply. Indeed, upon any debate, he was more eaſily perſuaded to depart from his own inclinations than almoſt any man that was ever known who poſſeſſed ſuch an extent of underſtanding. The reſervation proceeded only from an opinion, that his concealing ſomething which was unthought of by the reſt would, in the ſequel, add greatly to his own credit and reputation. By this unfortunate turn of diſpoſition he involved both himſelf and his Royal Maſter in many inconveniences. Such accidents, however, were ſo far from making an impreſſion upon him, that he was the more ready of attainder againſt the Earl of Strafford; and on the thirteenth of July, it was reſolved, upon the queſtion, "That Sir Lewis Dives, and John Moor, as "alſo Thomas Parſlow, printer of the ſaid ſpeech, "are delinquents, in printing and publiſhing there-"of; and that this book, thus printed, deſerves the "brand of this houſe." After this the following order was made: "Whereas on the twenty-firſt of "April laſt paſt, there was a ſpeech ſpoken, at the "Houſe of Commons, at the paſſing of the bill of "attainder, againſt Thomas Earl of Strafford, by "the Lord Digby, then a member of the ſaid Houſe; "the which ſpeech contained in it matters untrue "and ſcandalous, as they have reference to the pro-"ceedings of the Committees of both Houſes, and "to the evidence of the witneſſes produced in that "cauſe; and whereas the ſaid ſpeech was publiſhed "by the Lord Digby, after the bill of attainder "was paſſed by vote in this Houſe, and after great "offence had been taken to the ſpeech, and the ſame "queſtioned in the Houſe; to the ſcandal of the "proceedings of this Houſe, and to thoſe of his "Majeſty and both Houſes of Parliament, it is there-"fore ordered, that the ſaid books ſhall be pub-"lickly burnt, part of them in the New Palace Yard, "Weſtminſter, others in Cheapſide, London, and "the reſt in Smithfield, by the hands of the common "hangman." The Sheriffs of London and Middleſex were to take care to ſee this order executed.

In Lord Digby's Apology, which appeared in January, 1641-2, he gives the following account of the printing and publiſhing of his ſpeech. "I did "not only," ſays he, "find that it was unfaithfully "reported, and uncharitably repreſented, but was "informed, that copies went abroad of it, ſo falſely "and maliciouſly collected, as made the whole ſpeech "a juſtification of my Lord of Strafford's innocence; "and Sir Lewes Dives having heard of ſuch a copy in "the houſe of a citizen of good quality, where he "heard me mentioned as a perſon fit to have his "name fixed upon poſts that it might be torn in "pieces by the people; upon that reaſon, earneſtly "deſired me to give him a true copy of what I had "ſaid in that argument, which I did; and he forth-"with gave direction for the printing it, without "any privity of mine: yet, if I had conſented to it, "and directed it, I profeſs I ſhould little have ima-"gined, that (at a time when there was ſuch an "unwarrantable licence taken to print every thing, "of how great irreverence ſoever, either to Church "or State, with impunity,) the ſpeech made in the "Houſe of Commons, a ſpeech ſo narrowly and ſo "ſeverely ſifted and examined there, and yet let "paſs without the leaſt cenſure, either on the ſpeech "itſelf or the author: that the printing, I ſay, of "ſuch a ſpeech ſhould riſe to ſo high a nature, as to "make me for ever incapable of any honour or em-"ployment in the commonwealth, I profeſs could "hardly have fallen within my reaſon or fears to "ſuſpect. And yet, three months after the fact "committed; after the printing of a hundred ſpeeches "more by other men; after my having ſeveral "times ſued and preſſed for a hearing, whilſt I was "a member of the Houſe of Commons; after, by "his Majeſty's favour, I had ſat ſix or ſeven weeks "a member of the Houſe of Peers; after all this, "no leſs a judgment, as far as the vote of the Houſe "of Commons could contribute to it, paſſed upon "me unheard; over and above the ſhame of having "the ſpeech itſelf burnt by the hands of the com-"mon hangman (5)."

to

to embrace any new enterprize when the old miſcarried; and, notwithſtanding his incomparable parts, he never was the wiſer from the diſappointments or misfortunes that befell him, but was as eager as before to take the ſame meaſures, to purſue the ſame expedients, and even to employ the ſame perſons. What rendered his preſumption the longer from being diſcovered, or taken notice of, was the depth of his diſſimulation. When any thing was done by the Court that happened to be notoriouſly diſliked, he appeared to be more offended and enraged at it than every other perſon, and bitterly inveighed againſt the authors of ſuch evil counſel, though it had been contrived by himſelf alone, and to the execution of it no one elſe had been privy. Thus, when the King had been prevailed upon to cauſe the ſix members to be accuſed (o), Lord Digby, on finding that the meaſure was generally diſapproved and condemned in the Houſe of Peers, ſtood up and ſpake againſt it, and whiſpered the Lord Mandeville in the ear, that his Majeſty would be undone if he did not publicly diſcover thoſe who had given him that advice. At the ſame time he declared, that he would go immediately to Court, and endeavour to prevail upon the King to reveal the propoſers of the accuſation. And yet he alone was the man, who, without communicating it to any other, had adviſed the proſecution, had named all the perſons, and had promiſed his Majeſty to bring an ample teſtimony and evidence againſt them. All this, too, was done by him at a ſeaſon when the royal affairs were in ſo good a poſture, that there was no need of ſuch a deſperate remedy. In fact, no expedient could have been contrived that more effectually tended to raiſe the ability and credit of the parliamentary leaders; and it was therefore deteſted by the ſober friends of Government, as one of the moſt viſible introductions to all the miſeries that afterwards befel the nation. Nevertheleſs, ſo far was the great ſpirit of Lord Digby from ſinking, that, when he ſaw the whole city upon the matter in arms to defend the accuſed members, knowing in what houſe they were together, he offered the King, with a ſelect number of a dozen gentlemen, who he preſumed would ſtick by him, to ſeize upon the perſons of Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Holles, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Sir Arthur Haſlerigge, and Mr. Strode; and to bring them, dead or alive, wherever it ſhould be ordered. Nor is there any doubt but that he would have executed this purpoſe, which muſt have been productive of extraordinary commotions, had not the advice been prudently rejected (p).

(p) Clarendon, ubi ſupra. P. LV, LVI.

In the mean while, Lord Digby continued to be expoſed to the reſentment of the Commons. On the twenty-ninth of December, 1641, Sir Philip Stapylton was ſent with a meſſage to the Peers, to the following purport: "That the Houſe of Commons "find, by common fame, that it was ſaid in the Houſe of Lords, by the Lord Digby, "and offered to be juſtified by him, That the Houſe of Commons had invaded the Pri- "vileges of the Houſe of Lords, and the Liberty of the Subject; and that he did likewiſe "ſay, That this was no Free Parliament." It was therefore deſired by the Commons, that right might be done to them againſt the Lord Digby; and that, if no ſuch words were ſpoken by him, a declaration ſhould be ſet forth by their Lordſhips, to quit the Houſe of Commons of the ſcandal. The anſwer returned was, that the Lords would take the meſſage into conſideration; and, in the mean time, the words complained of were referred to the Committee for keeping a good correſpondency between the two Houſes. This tranſaction was ſucceeded, on the thirty-firſt of the month, by a warm ſpeech of Mr. Pym, on the ſame ſubject. It was delivered at a conference with the Lords, in which he repreſented, with his uſual energy, that the expreſſions uſed by Lord Digby were of the moſt dangerous conſequence. The words, which his Lordſhip was charged to have ſpoken, had, it ſeems, a reference to the excluſion of the Biſhops from the Upper Houſe. According to Mr. Pym, Lord Digby had ſaid, "That "the preſent Parliament was a forced one; and that the acts, votes, and laws, that "ſhould be enacted therein, without the votes and aſſents of the Biſhops, are void, and "of none effect, and not binding to the ſubject." It does not appear, by the Journals of either Houſe, whether any cenſure was paſſed upon his Lordſhip (q).

(q) Parl. Hiſt. Vol. X p. 136. 151—155.

Another event ſoon happened, which excited no ſmall degree of alarm. In the beginning of January, 1641-2, Lord Digby was ſent by his Majeſty to Kingſton-upon-Thames, either on a meſſage to ſome gentlemen at that place, or to viſit Colonel Lunſford. As Anthony Wood has deſcribed the matter, he went in a coach with ſix horſes, and no other equipage with him, ſaving only a ſervant riding behind him, and a companion in a coach. But a very different account of the expedition was communicated to Parliament. The intelligence there received was, that his Lordſhip, together with Colonel Lunsford, had collected ſome troops of horſe, and had appeared in arms. Upon this it was ordered, that the ſheriffs and juſtices of the peace, in the different counties of the kingdom, ſhould, with the aſſiſtance of the trained bands, ſuppreſs all unlawful aſſemblies, and ſecure the magazines. A ſevere ſpeech on account of the Kingſton buſineſs, againſt Lord Digby and Colonel Lunsford, was delivered by Sir Thomas Stapylton; and the reſult of the affair was, that his Lordſhip was commanded to attend his place, as a Peer of the Realm, to anſwer for himſelf; and the Colonel was committed mitted to the Tower. There muſt certainly have been much more in the enterprize than Wood and other Writers have repreſented; for if Lord Digby's going to Kingſton had been a mere private journey, it is not likely that the Houſe of Commons ſhould have been ſeized with ſuch alarm, or have proceeded with ſuch vehemence againſt him. That he himſelf regarded the parliamentary proſecution in a ſerious light, is evident from his not complying with the order of the Lords, to appear in his own juſtification, but thinking proper to depart out of the kingdom (r).

(r) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. Col. 579. Whitelock's Memorials. p 54. Parliamentary Hiſt ubi ſupra. p. 206, 207.

Whilſt Lord Digby was abroad, in Holland, to which country he had retreated, he ſent a packet of letters to England, under direction to Mr. Secretary Nicholas, which happened to be intercepted. Among theſe was one addreſſed to the Queen, the manner of treating which occaſioned no ſmall difficulty. The Lords diſputed the propriety of opening it, and ſent to know the opinion of the Houſe of Commons upon the matter. The Commons returned for anſwer, that they had voted it ſhould be opened. The Peers, however, conceiving the affair to be of great conſequence, deſired a conference; the report of which was, "That the Commons ſaid, they ſaw no reaſon to alter their vote, "1ſt, Becauſe it concerned the ſafety of the Kingdom; for, by this means the evil ſpirit "and counſels of the Lord Digby might be diſcovered and prevented. 2dly, If this "letter ſhould be delivered to the Queen unopened, the Parliament might be put to a "deal of trouble to diſcover what is preſented to her Majeſty in theſe letters. 3dly, "Since, of late, they had very good reaſon to ſuſpect the Lord Digby as an ill inſtru-"ment, they conceived they ought not to loſe ſo happy an occaſion offered to do the State "ſervice; which, if they neglected, they ſhould not be able to anſwer." On this a warm debate aroſe in the Lords; but, at laſt, it was ordered that the letter ſhould be opened. This affair produced a meſſage from the King to the following effect: that the Queen requeſted to have a tranſcript of the letter ſpeedily ſent to her; and that, if the Parliament deſired to be further ſatisfied from her, of any particulars mentioned in that letter, or any circumſtances concerning the ſame, ſo far forth as might any way relate unto or reflect upon her Perſon, or any whatſoever concerning her, ſhe was ready, and very willing, to give due ſatisfaction therein (s). No diſcovery appears to have been the reſult of theſe proceedings of the Commons; and we muſt confeſs that their treatment of the Queen does not accord with our feelings. The beſt thing that can be ſaid in their favour is, that in a ſeaſon of general apprehenſions, jealouſies, and reſentments, the moſt trivial matters are often deemed of great importance.

(s) Ibidem. p. 293, 294, 296.

On the twenty-ſixth of February, 1641-42, the Houſe of Commons impeached Lord Digby of high-treaſon. The charge was exhibited at a conference with the Lords, and ſent up by Sir John Evelyn, who made a ſpeech in its ſupport. It conſiſted of three articles, to the following purport: "1ſt, That, in or about the month of January preceding, he had maliciouſly and traiterouſly endeavoured to perſuade the King to levy forces againſt his liege ſubjects within this kingdom; and that he did actually levy forces within the realm, to the terror of his Majeſty's ſubjects. 2dly, That he had falſely, maliciouſly, and traiterouſly, laboured to raiſe a jealouſy and diſſention betwen the King and his People, and to poſſeſs his Majeſty that he could not live with ſafety of his Perſon among them; and did thereupon endeavour to perſuade his Majeſty to betake himſelf to ſome place of ſtrength for his defence. 3dly, That he had endeavoured to ſtir up jealouſies and diſſentions between the King and Parliament; and, to that end and purpoſe, did wickedly adviſe the framing certain falſe and ſcandalous articles of high-treaſon againſt the Lord Kimbolton, Denzill Holles, Eſq. &c. and did perſuade his Majeſty, accompanied with divers ſoldiers, and others in warlike manner, to come in perſon into the Houſe of Commons, and demand the ſaid Members of the ſaid Houſe then ſitting; to the apparent danger of his Majeſty's perſon, and in high violation of the privileges and being of Parliaments (t)." However true, in general, were theſe accuſations of Lord Digby, it would not have been eaſy, at that time, to have eſtabliſhed the whole of them upon full proof; and it would have been ſtill more difficult to have made them amount, in the ſtrict and legal ſenſe, to a juſt conviction of treaſon. It would have been a greater inſtance of wiſdom, as well as of moderation, to have impeached him only of high crimes and miſdemeanors. But there was a violence in all the proceedings of the Commons againſt him, which cannot be reconciled with the calm and ſober dignity of genuine patriotiſm. His deſertion of them in the caſe of the Earl of Strafford, and his ſpeech on the bill of attainder, were offences never to be forgiven. On the twenty-ninth of April, 1642, a meſſage was ſent from the Commons to the Lords, deſiring that a day might be aſſigned for them to come up, and demand juſtice againſt Lord Digby. The anſwer returned was, that a day ſhould ſhortly be appointed for that purpoſe, and that notice ſhould be given of it; but the ſubſequent confuſions of the time prevented any farther proſecution of the buſineſs. The Commons had been ſtimulated, in this laſt meaſure, by an apprehenſion that the Lord Digby, in his letters to the Queen, had adviſed the attempt which the King had lately made to obtain an admiſſion into the town of Hull (u).

(t) Parl. Hiſt. ubi ſup. p. 314—316.

(u) Ibid, p. 467.

It was not poſſible for a perſon of Lord Digby's diſpoſition long to continue quietly in his foreign retreat. He contrived to tranſport himſelf to York, where he ſtayed ſome days in diſguiſe, being known to very few friends, and ſpeaking with the King in ſo ſecret a manner in the night, that no notice was taken of his being there. Finding his Majeſty's affairs not to be in ſo proſperous a ſituation as he had expected, and conceiving that it was not yet proper for him to appear, he determined to return again to Holland, and to haſten a proviſion of arms and ammunition for the Royal Cauſe. He embarked in the ſame veſſel which had brought him to England; but the ſhip being purſued, he was taken in the fly-boat belonging to it, and was carried into Hull. So effectually had he diſguiſed himſelf, that his neareſt friends could not eaſily have known him. He pretended to be a Frenchman, the language of which country he ſpoke excellently; and he appeared to be ſo ſea-ſick, that he kept himſelf in the hole of the bark, till it arrived at the landing-place; and, in that time, he diſpoſed of ſuch papers as were not fit to be peruſed. When he came on ſhore, he ſo well counterfeited ſickneſs and want of health, that he obtained leave to be ſent, under a guard, to ſome obſcure corner, for repoſe. In this confinement he began ſeriouſly to reflect on the deſperateneſs of his condition. He did not think it poſſible for him to continue long concealed; and, if he ſhould be diſcovered, he knew that he was ſo odious, above all other men, to the Parliament, that his life would be in the greateſt danger. At the ſame time, he was ſenſible that Sir John Hotham, the Governor of Hull, was his enemy, and that he was a man of a covetous, rough, and unfeeling diſpoſition. Nevertheleſs, he reſolved to diſcover himſelf to him. Accordingly, Lord Digby, in broken Engliſh, which might well have become any Frenchman, found means to make one of his guard underſtand, that he deſired to ſpeak privately with the Governor; and that he would reveal ſome ſecrets of the King's and Queen's to him, that would highly advance the public ſervice. Upon being introduced to Sir John Hotham, and taken to a private part of the room, he aſked, in Engliſh, "Whether he knew him?" The other, ſurprized at the queſtion, told him, "No." "Then," ſaid Lord Digby, "I ſhall try whether I know Sir John Hotham, "and whether he be in truth, the ſame man of honour I have always taken him to be." Upon this he informed the Governor who he was, and that he hoped he was too much of a Gentleman to deliver him up a ſacrifice to thoſe who were his implacable enemies. Sir John Hotham was ſo ſtruck with Lord Digby's greatneſs of mind, and with the compliment paid to himſelf, that, contrary to what might have been expected, both from his own nature, and the moſt powerful motives of intereſt and ambition, he told his Lordſhip, that ſince he had placed ſuch a confidence in him, he would not deceive his truſt; and wiſhed him to conſider in what way, and under what pretence, he ſhould be ſet at liberty. At length it was agreed, that the Frenchman ſhould be openly ſent to York, as going upon a political buſineſs, with an aſſurance that he would return to Hull. In the converſations which, at this time, Lord Digby had with the Governor, he uſed every argument to perſuade him to engage in the King's ſervice; and it was upon ſome encouragement of that kind, that an expedition which his Majeſty ſhortly after made to Beverley, was founded. To forward the deſign, our enterprizing Nobleman returned to Hull in his old diſguiſe: but all his efforts to prevail upon Sir John Hotham to ſurrender the town were in vain. Sir John's ſon, and the principal officers, were devoted to Parliament, and new ſupplies of men were ſent into the place; ſo that the Governor either wanted the courage or the power to execute what he deſired (w).

(w) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion. Vol. I. p. 704—711.

Affairs now drawing to an extremity, Lord Digby openly appeared with the King at York; and when the civil war broke out, he raiſed a regiment of horſe, and charged at the head of it in the battle of Edge-Hill, with as much courage as any man in the army. He afterwards marched with Prince Rupert towards the North, and, in the way, finding the cloſe in the city of Lichfield garriſoned by the Parliament's forces, and ſecured by a ſtrong wall and a mote, and the Prince reſolving to reduce it, the foot were ordered to ſtorm it; but not being ſufficient in number for ſuch a general aſſault as was neceſſary, they were beaten off. Lord Digby, therefore, to encourage the officers of the horſe to make an attempt in another place, offered to go himſelf at the head of them; and accordingly, led them through the mote to a different part of the wall, which was thought to be weaker. By this diverſion, the garriſon within being divided into ſeveral quarters, the foot entered the place, and made themſelves maſters of it, though with great difficulty and with great loſs. Many of the horſe officers, likewiſe, who had paſſed through the mote were killed, and the reſt repulſed. Lord Digby himſelf, being in the mud up to the middle, was ſhot through the thigh with a muſquet-bullet, and brought off with extraordinary hazard. In no long time he recovered of his wounds (x).

(x) Clarendon's State Papers. Vol. III. Appendix P. LVI.

Soon after this action, Lord Digby, not being treated with that reſpect by Prince Rupert which he promiſed himſelf, and which he thought was due to his merit, gave up his regiment of horſe, and retired to the Court, were he was ſure of meeting with a very gracious reception. In the negotiations for a treaty of peace between the King and the Parliament, which were carried on at Oxford, in the beginning of the Year

1643, his Lordſhip was excepted from pardon. Conſidering his influence with his Majeſty, this circumſtance may reaſonably be ſuppoſed, among other things, to have contributed to the unſucceſsfulneſs of the pacification. Though Lord Digby quitted his regular connection with the royal army, his ardent ſpirit would not permit him totally to abſtain from military action. When the ſiege of Glouceſter had been raiſed, he joined the forces that were following the Earl of Eſſex, and was in an engagement at Auburne, where, in conſequence of the powder of a piſtol being ſhot in his face, it was apprehended that he would have loſt both his eyes. He eſcaped the more immediate danger of the bullet, by its paſſing by, or dropping on the ground. On the next day, being the twentieth of September, 1643, was fought the battle of Newbury, in which Lord Falkland, one of the Secretaries of State, was ſlain; and, in a little time, Lord Digby was appointed the ſucceſſor to that office. He brought with him to it abilities ſuperior to thoſe of his predeceſſor; but not, we are afraid, the ſame purity and virtue. This appointment was ſpeedily followed by his having the honour of being elected High Steward of the Univerſity of Oxford, in the room of William Lord Say, who was diſplaced on account of his adherence to the Parliament (y). Though Lord Digby exerted himſelf with great diligence in his new office, and was full of ſchemes for his Majeſty's ſervice; he was not ſo happy as to be ſucceſsful in any of his enterprizes. In December, 1643, he engaged in a project for a treaty between the King and the City of London; but a letter which he wrote to Sir Baſil Brooke on the ſubject was intercepted (z); and, indeed, conſidering the temper of the metropolis, the whole ſcheme was viſionary and groundleſs. Next year his Lordſhip was equally unſucceſsful in another of his attempts, which was to prevail upon Major General Brown to betray Abingdon; a ſervice that, from the vicinity of the town to Oxford, would have been highly acceptable to the Royal Party. The negotiation was carried on, by meſſengers and letters, for ten weeks together; and great offers of preferment and reward were made to the General, if he would give up the place. By the advice of a friend, whom he conſulted, and whoſe advice was agreeable to his own opinion, Brown entertained the treaty, ſhewed a ſtrong diſpoſition to comply with Digby's propoſal, and, in the mean time, took care to get the works about the town put into a poſture of defence. So delighted was Lord Digby with the proſpect before him, that he boaſted, that by his wit and eloquence he had prevailed over the Woodmonger, as he ſtiled the General. When, however, he inſiſted upon Abingdon's being ſurrendered on a particular day, Brown, having completed his works, gave his Lordſhip a poſitive denial; by which he was much diſappointed and enraged (a). When, in the year 1645, the Marquis of Montroſe had obtained his ſplendid victories in Scotland, Lord Digby conceived the deſign of detaching the Scottiſh army in England from the parliamentary cauſe, and of engaging it to join with the King and the Marquis in ſuch a ſettlement of the national differences as ſhould be mutually agreed upon. For this purpoſe, he wrote, in the moſt earneſt manner, to the Earls of Leven and Calandar, and the other Commanders of the Scotch forces, urging every conſideration, with which his great abilities could ſupply him, to prevail upon them to concur in his ſcheme. Among other things, he promiſed an abſolute ſecurity to Scotland in the matter of Religion. The principal letter never came to hand; but another, to the ſame effect, was tranſmitted by the Earl of Leven to the Parliament (b). A little before this tranſaction, which took place in the beginning of October, Lord Digby was conſtituted Lieutenant General of all the King's forces North of Trent; in which capacity he ſurprized, in the ſame month, near Ferry-bridge in Yorkſhire, four hundred of the parliamentary party, with their arms, and diſcomfited a regiment of horſe. This good fortune was of very ſhort duration. In a day or two the royal forces under his Lordſhip's command were defeated; and the Colonels Cornaby and Hutton, ſeveral officers, and forty others, were ſlain. The number of the priſoners was ſtill greater; conſiſting of four Colonels, many inferior officers and private gentlemen, and between three and four hundred troopers. Lord Digby's coach, in which were the Counteſs of Nitheſdale and the King's Surgeon, was likewiſe taken; and in it were found various letters and papers, and, among the reſt, a letter to a Member of the Houſe of Commons, which occaſioned his expulſion. So important was this action deemed by the Parliament, that the meſſenger who brought the good news of it was rewarded with a preſent of forty pounds (c). What added to Lord Digby's diſtreſs was, an irreconcileable difference between him and the greateſt part of the officers of the army. In ſhort, he had been ſo unfortunate, both in his political and military enterprizes, that, with the full approbation and conſent of his Royal Maſter, he was obliged to retire from his Majeſty's immediate ſervice, though without giving up his office, as one of the Secretaries of State. Upon this occaſion, he went over to Ireland, where the firſt thing he did was, to commit the Earl of Glamorgan to priſon. His reaſons for this meaſure were explained at large, in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Secretary Nicholas, and which being intercepted was laid before Parliament. From the letter it appears, that high as Lord Digby ſtood in his Majeſty's confidence, he had not been privy to the King's ſecret tranſactions with Glamorgan (d).

A new

A new ſcene now opened upon Lord Digby. No ſooner was he arrived in Ireland than his former diſappointments and misfortunes were forgotten, and he believed that he was upon a ſtage where he ſhould act wonders, and unite all the divided affections, and all the diſtinct intereſts, in ſuch a manner as to render the whole of them ſubſervient to the King's ſervice. This, too, was at a time when the affairs of the Iriſh rebels, under the direction of the Popiſh Nuncio, were in a very flouriſhing ſituation, and the Lord Lieutenant, the Marquis of Ormond, was almoſt entirely confined to the city of Dublin. The Prince of Wales had lately taken refuge in the iſle of Scilly, which he found in a much weaker condition than he had apprehended. He applied, therefore, to the Marquis of Ormond, requeſting that a hundred men, with good officers, might be ſent to him as a guard to his perſon. Lord Digby immediately conceived, that the Prince's preſence in Ireland would compoſe all the factions there, reduce the kingdom to his Majeſty's ſervice, and oblige the Pope's Nuncio, who was an enemy to the peace, to quit his ambitious deſigns. Nor was the Lord Lieutenant wholly averſe to the ſcheme; but being ſenſible of the difficulties in which it was involved, he declined giving his poſitive advice upon the ſubject. Lord Digby, however, who always concluded that that was fit to be done which his firſt thoughts ſuggeſted, and who never doubted about the execution of any thing which he once looked upon as proper to be attempted, embarked for Scilly, with two frigates, which had been ſent with the ſupply of officers and men that had been deſired; and he went with a full aſſurance that, by the ſtrength of his own reaſon alone, he ſhould be able to prevail upon the Prince of Wales, and the Council which attended him, to repair to Dublin. But when the veſſels arrived at Scilly, the Prince had tranſported himſelf to Jerſey, as a place of greater ſecurity and accommodation. To this iſland, therefore, Lord Digby ſailed as ſpeedily as poſſible, and loſt no time in acquainting his Highneſs with the happy ſtate and condition of Ireland. The peace, he ſaid, was concluded, and twelve thouſand men were ready to embark for England; and ſuch were the zeal and affection of the Lord Lieutenant, that, on the Prince's repairing to Ireland, he would find the whole kingdom devoted to his ſervice. On theſe conſiderations, Lord Digby urged his Highneſs, without farther deliberation, to put himſelf on board the frigates, which, he ſaid were excellent ſailers, and fit for his ſecure tranſportation. The Prince replied, that the propoſal was of too important a nature to admit of ſo haſty a reſolution; that the Queen had required him to retire to Paris; and that, though he had ſent to excuſe his not giving a ready obedience to her commands, it would be unbecoming in him to remove from Jerſey without waiting for the return of the meſſengers; beſide which, it would be highly proper to defer the matter till ſome accounts were received from the King. This reaſonable anſwer was not at all ſatisfactory to Lord Digby, who was ſo ardent in the proſecution of his ſcheme, that he endeavoured to perſuade one of the Prince's privy-council, with whom he had a particular friendſhip, to join with him in carrying his Highneſs to Ireland, even without and againſt his conſent. Having failed in this attempt, he immediately formed another determination, which was to go over to France. He did not in the leaſt queſtion but that he ſhould convert the Queen from the deſign of ſending for her ſon to Paris, and eaſily obtain her approbation of his repairing to Ireland. His Lordſhip was equally confident, that with her Majeſty's aſſiſtance, and, by his own dexterity, he ſhould be able to procure ſuch a ſupply of money from the French Government, as would add greatly to his own reputation, and render him the moſt welcome man alive to the Marquis of Ormond. Tranſported with this imagination, he departed from Jerſey, leaving at the ſame time his two ſhips and his ſoldiers, together with half a dozen gentlemen of quality, who, truſting to his promiſes, had accompanied him from Ireland, without one penny of money to ſubſiſt upon during his abſence (e).

(e) Clarendon, ubi ſupra. P. LVI—LIX.

As ſoon as Lord Digby came to Paris, and had viſited the Queen, whom he found reſolutely bent to have the Prince her ſon immediately with her, he waited upon Cardinal Mazarine. The Cardinal, who was no ſtranger to his Lordſhip's diſpoſition and character, treated him with every poſſible demonſtration of reſpect; paid the higheſt compliments to his abilities and actions; enlarged upon the inclination of the French Government to aſſiſt the King of England, eſpecially with regard to Ireland; promiſed a ſupply of money for that purpoſe; and repreſented, that, as France was going to take ſo decided a part in favour of the Engliſh and Iriſh Royaliſts, it was neceſſary that the Prince of Wales ſhould reſide in that kingdom. To this opinion Lord Digby became an immediate convert, and, with his uſual alacrity, engaged to bring over the whole council at Jerſey to the ſame opinion. Before he went to that iſland, he obtained from the Cardinal ſix thouſand piſtoles, which, though it was a ſum of money far inferior to what he expected, provided well for his own occaſions. By the time that he had paſſed through Jerſey, and landed at Dublin, the piſtoles were ſo much reduced, that the Lord Lieutenant never received one thouſand of them towards the ſupport of his Majeſty's affairs.

When Lord Digby came to Ireland, he found the whole treaty of peace diſavowed and broken by the Iriſh rebels under the Nuncio, who had been declared both their General

General at land, and their Admiral at ſea. Here was a new field for action, into which Lord Digby entered with an ardour not attended with diſcretion. Upon very little encouragement, or ſecurity for his own perſon, he made a journey to the Nuncio, by whom he was received and entertained with rudeneſs. It was with difficulty and hazard that he made his way back again to Dublin, where he amuſed himſelf, for a time, with many ſchemes for uniting parties, and dividing the Iriſh among themſelves. At laſt he plainly diſcovered that there was no way left to preſerve Ireland from being irrecoverably loſt to the Crown, but by putting it into the hands of the Parliament. When, therefore, the parliamentary Commiſſioners arrived to receive it, Lord Digby tranſported himſelf to France, where he immediately got involved in ſeveral quarrels with his countrymen, upon the account of what had formerly paſſed in England. In every diſpute he was ready, without ſcruple, to anſwer with his ſword in his hand; for his courage always faithfully ſeconded him in all his deſigns. Theſe conteſts being ended, he repaired again to his new friend the Cardinal, who did not receive him with the ſame marks of regard and eſteem which he had formerly done; but treated him as a man who propoſed to live upon the country. Nevertheleſs, the Cardinal gave him very good words, promiſed him ſome command in the army, and furniſhed him with a ſmall ſupply for his preſent ſubſiſtence. Nor did Lord Digby find a better reception from thoſe of whom he expected to be admitted as a full ſharer in all they enjoyed. Theſe mortifications would have broken moſt other men's ſpirits; but in his Lordſhip they only excited ſome temporary fits of indignation, without working in the leaſt degree upon the vigour of his mind (f). The ſeveral circumſtances which we have now recorded, without an exact ſpecification of their dates, occurred in the years 1646, 1647, 1648. When the melancholy cataſtrophe of the death of King Charles the Firſt took place, Lord Digby wrote a letter to Charles the Second, which every reader will pronounce to be admirable in point of compoſition. It was as follows:

(f) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, p. lix—lxi.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY,

"I ſhall not preſume to ſay any thing to you by way of conſolation in the deplorable ſubject of your deceaſed Royal Father, my gracious Maſter; being perſuaded, that when it pleaſes GOD to viſit Kings and Princes with afflictions of ſo high and extraordinary a nature, he doth at the ſame time adminiſter unto them ſentiments and conſiderations for the noble and virtuous ſupporting them, beyond what vulgar thoughts can comprehend, much leſs ſuggeſt. I ſhall only here by this letter (ſince I am diſabled to do it perſonally) caſt myſelf at your Majeſty's feet, with the faithful tender of my moſt humble duty and ſervice, in the ſame zeal, fidelity, and affection, wherewith I have continued to ſerve your Royal Father, improved, if it be poſſible, not only by a greater deteſtation of your enemies, but alſo by the love and veneration which I have to your Majeſty's Perſon; for having transferred all the devotion I had to him to your Majeſty, as his Succeſſor, and equally my Sovereign, I find great matter of improvement to it from your Majeſty's perſonal and princely virtues.

"SIR, I have no deſign nor pretenſion but to ſerve you in what ſphere you ſhall think me capable of doing it; and if in none, then ſtill with my prayers. In the mean time, till your Majeſty's commands ſhall direct me otherwiſe, I do apply myſelf in this ſtate to thoſe ways that I hope may lay ſome ſolid foundation for your ſervice hereafter; it being impoſſible to ſink into my thoughts, that the incomparable paſſion I have for your ſervice and intereſt can always continue effectleſs; but that GOD will one day bleſs me with ſome means of expreſſing to your Majeſty more conſiderably than by proteſtations, the inviolable devotion wherewith I am,

"Your Majeſty's moſt humble,

"St. Germains,
"March $\frac{2}{12}$, 1648-9. "and moſt faithful ſubject and ſervant (g)."

(g) Clarendon's State Papers, Vol. II. p. 471.

At this time thoſe civil commotions ſubſiſted in France to which the name hath uſually been given of The War of the Frondeurs; and Lord Digby ſought an occaſion from them of raiſing himſelf to a higher degree of conſideration than that with which he had lately been treated. Having with difficulty procured a horſe, he entered as a volunteer among the King's forces; and on that very day, when the contending armies were drawn up at a ſmall diſtance from each other, a perſon from the oppoſite ſide advanced out of his ranks in a bravado, to exchange a piſtol (as the phraſe is) with any ſingle man who ſhould be willing to encounter him. Upon this his Lordſhip, without ſpeaking a word, moved his horſe leiſurely towards the champion, who ſeemed to ſtand ſtill and expect him; but who, in fact, dexterouſly retired ſo near to his troops, that before Lord Digby could advance to the attack, the whole front of the ſquadron diſcharged all their carbines upon him, whilſt the other retreated to his place. By this diſhonourable proceeding his Lordſhip received a ſhot in the thigh with a brace of bullets; and, though he ſtill kept his ſeat, it was with difficulty that he got back to his own ſide. An action ſo gallant, and which was performed in the preſence of the King of France, the Cardinal Mazarine, and the Prince of Condé, occaſioned all men to enquire who the Gentleman was; and few knew more than that he was an Engliſhman. His name, however, was quickly publiſhed, and directions were given for his accommodation and recovery, and for his being treated with every degree of reſpect and regard. By this accident Lord Digby made another glorious flight into the world; for as ſoon as he was recovered of his wounds, and went to make his acknowledgments to the King and the Cardinal, he met with a moſt gracious reception, and was ſpeedily poſſeſſed of an honourable command of horſe, with ſuch liberal appointments as rendered his ſituation not only eaſy but affluent. The Cardinal took all occaſions to do him honour, and he well underſtood how to cultivate his Eminency's favourable inclinations (b).

(b) Clarendon's State Papers, Vol. III. Apdendix, p. lxi.

If Lord Digby had been born to be happy, or if he had been of a diſpoſition wiſely to improve the approaches of good fortune, nothing could have obſtructed his aſcent to any height which he could reaſonably propoſe. He was the diſcourſe of the whole Court, and had drawn the eyes of all men upon him. His quality, his education, the handſomeneſs of his perſon, the beauty of his countenance, his alacrity and courage in action againſt the enemy, the ſoftneſs and civility of his manners, his profound knowledge in all kinds of learning, and in all languages, in the manifeſtation of which he enlarged or reſtrained himſelf as circumſtances directed, rendered him univerſally acceptable. The firſt troop of horſe, which he commanded, conſiſted moſtly of Engliſh, who reſorted to him in as great numbers as he could wiſh, and who thought that by their dependence upon him their fortunes were made. This expectation was encouraged by him without any meaſure of diſcretion. Hence they congratulated themſelves on the great bleſſing that had befallen them, in having committed their fate into the hands of a perſon who could ſo eaſily provide for them, and who was reſolved to do it in the moſt ample manner; and they celebrated him in all places as the wonder of the world. Lord Digby, on his part, was equally extravagant in their praiſe. He repreſented them as brave men, and excellent officers, who, though they had the choice of all places and preferments, had determined, out of the mere love and eſteem for his perſon, to grow up alone under his ſhadow, and to wait with patience and induſtry for the opportunities of promotion. But patience and induſtry were virtues with which neither of them were acquainted. They had ſuch confidence in his promiſes, as to expect the moſt ſpeedy accompliſhment of them; and in that expectation they ran into expences by which they were greatly embarraſſed. He, on the other hand, had ſuppoſed that they would never be weary of preſerving a diſintereſted attachment to him. In a little time, all this union was broken. The Engliſh Gentlemen abandoned him, as a perſon who promiſed largely, lightly, and unreaſonably, and who, even if it had been in his power, would not have performed his engagements; and he was ſo far from being mortified at their forſaking him, that he felicitated himſelf on being delivered from a ſet of importunate and inſatiable dependents who only obſtructed the progreſs of his own good fortune.

When Lord Digby made his firſt cornet for his troop, his impreſs was an oſtrich, which was his own creſt, and in its mouth was a piece of iron, under which were theſe words, Ferro vivendum eſt tibi, quid Præſtantia Plumæ? Herein he alluded to what was ſuppoſed to be the nature of the oſtrich, to live upon iron, without any benefit from the beauty of her feathers; and he meant to expreſs, that he was now obliged to have recourſe to the ſword for his ſubſiſtence, without depending upon the excellence of his pen. The ingenuity and acuteneſs of this device added to his reputation, even when his reputation was at the higheſt (i).

Whilſt the civil wars of France continued, Lord Digby grew into ſuch credit, both with the French King and the Cardinal, that he was admitted into their moſt ſecret confidence. At the ſame time, he was ready for the boldeſt undertakings; in which, if he ſucceeded, he never forgot his ſucceſs; and if he failed, he never remembered his failure; but was always prepared for any new enterprize. Indeed, the changes he met with, and the happy termination of ſome of his actions, were ſufficient to have worked upon a leſs ſanguine diſpoſition.

So long as Charles the Firſt lived, Lord Digby continued to ſuſtain the character of Secretary of State, though from the year 1645 little or no duty had been attached to the office. Upon the deceaſe of that Monarch, ſeveral of Charles the Second's Counſellors wiſhed that his Lordſhip might be treated with particular reſpect, as a man who had behaved himſelf faithfully and ſignally in the ſervice of his Majeſty's father, and who likewiſe was of ſuch rank and quality as had ſeldom received diminution upon the ſucceſſion of the Crown. But to this the young King was extremely averſe. Some of the inferior people about him had made it their buſineſs to give him a bad impreſſion of Lord Digby, and had repreſented, that, as he was the moſt obnoxious perſon in England, his Majeſty could not do a more unpopular thing than to treat him with attention and regard. Such was the effect of theſe inſinuations, that Charles had conceived a ſtrong averſion to his Lordſhip; ſo that when he attended to pay his duty to his new Sovereign, he he was received with no degree of grace, and admitted to no kind of conſultation. He retired, therefore, to his command in the army; and though he felt with indignation the treatment he had met with, he ſpeedily conſoled himſelf with the reflection, that he had diſcharged his obligations by making an overture of his ſervice, and that the rejection of it was advantageous to him, as he could now proſecute his fortune in a way that was far more likely to be accompanied with ſucceſs. However, in the courſe of two or three years, by his own pure addreſs and dexterity, he recovered ſo much credit with Charles the Second as to be greatly in his favour; one ſtrong evidence of which was his being created Knight of the Garter, upon the deceaſe of his father the Earl of Briſtol. This circumſtance, conſidering the exiled and low ſtate of the Engliſh monarch, might ſeem to be of little importance, but it had its weight in adding to his reputation at the French Court; nor was his new title, to which he regularly ſucceeded, wholly without its influence in a country, where, at that time, and long after, the higheſt regard was paid to the diſtinctions of Nobility.

The commands of the Earl of Briſtol in the army of France grew to be ſo conſiderable, not only in point of honour, but of profit, the paſſes and licences from the Rivers to Paris being under his control, that it was concluded by all men that he would raiſe a large eſtate to himſelf: and this was the more naturally to be expected, as he never diſpenſed with, or remitted the leaſt ſum which he could exact; never was at any expence in eating or drinking, or in the maintenance of an equipage; never exerciſed his bounty towards friend, ſervant, or dependant; and never diſplayed his charity towards perſons in diſtreſs. But, notwithſtanding all this, he was always without money. Nor was he merely without money: he was even without thoſe ſupplies of linen and cloaths which are uſually poſſeſſed by people of far inferior condition. There are two vices for the ſupport of which the largeſt wealth is often found unequal, and of theſe he was guilty; gaming and an attachment to women. He was particularly engaged in a conſtant ſucceſſion of amours. When he was in the purſuit of any lady, he would admire and extol her beyond what poetry had ever invented, and then would grieve and lament, and bewail his own want of merit, even in tears, at his miſtreſs's feet. To effect his deſign, he would make all the promiſes and vows imaginable, and would procure letters, giving an account that his wife was ſo deſperately ill that ſhe could not be cured, or ſurvive above two or three months; and upon the ſtrength of this pretended information, he would proceed to offers and promiſes of marriage with as much importunity as if the certainty of completing them were at hand. As ſoon as ſucceſs, or want of ſucceſs, had put an end to or allayed the fervour of his addreſſes, he was equally ardent in ſome new intrigue, and would act as extravagant exploits as are related in extravagant romances. One of his adventures excited the general laughter of the Court. Whilſt he was a votary to a Lady of noble extraction and incomparable beauty in Paris, it happened that a young Abbot frequented the ſame houſe, who, finding his preſence leſs agreeable than he had formerly thought it to have been, uſed ſome expreſſions by which ſhe was diſobliged, and of which ſhe complained to many perſons of quality who frequented her company. Lord Briſtol, having gained information of the place where the Abbot was, and of a journey which was intended by him, ordered an officer whom he could truſt to march with ſome horſe, and take him priſoner. This being done, his Lordſhip ſent the Abbot to the Lady with a letter, declaring, that if he did not make an entire and full ſatisfaction to her for his miſcarriage, he had appointed the guard to bring him back to him, and he ſhould thereupon do ſuch farther juſtice as was proper. The Lady was extremely ſurprized and offended at the reparation provided for her; cauſed the Abbot to be immediately diſmiſſed, without ſeeing him; and ſignified her deſire to the officer that his ſuperior would meddle no more with her intereſt, or concern himſelf in any thing that related to her reputation (k).

(k) Clarendon, ubi ſupra. P. LXII—LXIV.

The Earl of Briſtol was not ſo deeply involved in amorous intrigues as to be leſs awake than ever to the ſtimulations of ambition. When, in the protraction of the civil commotions of France, Cardinal Mazarine was obliged to quit the kingdom, and to retire to Cologn, he commended Lord Briſtol to the Queen, as a perſon in whom ſhe might confide, and who would be faithful to the Cardinal's intereſts. Even the ſagacity of an old ſtateſman was in this inſtance deceived. The Earl of Briſtol's bold imagination ſuggeſted to him the hopes of ſupplanting Mazarine, and of ſucceeding to the office of the premier miniſter in France. Accordingly, he was not only well ſatisfied with the clamour which was raiſed againſt the Cardinal's return to that country, but openly took upon himſelf to adviſe the Queen not to be ſolicitous for it, as being a meaſure which it was impoſſible for her to accompliſh, and the very deſiring of which would expoſe her own perſonal ſecurity to danger. Her Majeſty received the Earl of Briſtol's advice with ſeeming complacency, but took care to advertiſe Mazarine of his friend's conduct. When, therefore, the Cardinal was brought back to Paris, as he not long after was, in triumph, it was contrived to ſend Lord Briſtol to Italy, on an enterprize in which it was not meant that he ſhould be ſucceſsful. On his returning from the expedition, Mazarine treated him with many compliments, and gave him a ſupply of money, which, however, was not equal to the juſt demands of his appointments. But at the ſame time, he was caſhiered from all his commands in the French ſervice, ordered to depart from the Kingd m, and forbidden to return thither again. The reputation he left behind him was that of being a very extraordinary perſon, who was wonderfully qualified for ſpeculation, but who was ſomewhat defective in reducing his ſpeculations into practice.

Magnis tamen excidit auſis (l).

The Earl of Briſtol was now laid under the neceſſity of ſeeking his fortune in another quarter. The firſt thing which he did was to repair to Bruges, where Charles the Second then reſided. Here he declared that he had brought enough with him to ſupport him for a year; which was four times more wealth than any perſon about his Majeſty could pretend to poſſeſs. However, in leſs than ſix weeks he had ſpent all the money with which he had been provided, and therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary to beſtir himſelf for a ſpeedy ſupply. His only reſource was to enter into the ſervice of the King of Spain's army in the Netherlands, and to this there appeared to be many obſtructions. He was, indeed, perfect maſter of the Spaniſh language; but the gaiety of his diſpoſition and the freedom of his manners were very oppoſite to the gravity of that nation. Beſides this, Don Alonzo de Cardinas, who was in principal truſt about Don Juan, the chief Governor of the Low Countries, and who had reſided ſeveral years in England, was well acquainted with the mercurial temper and the unſteady conduct of the Earl of Briſtol. But what moſt of all ſeemed to militate againſt his promotion was, that, a year or two before, he had commanded a party of Horſe and Dragoons in a Winter expedition againſt Flanders, which, for plunder and every ſpecies of rapine, and for the unneceſſary conflagration of many Villages and Towns, had exceeded any enterprize that had been undertaken during the war, ſo that his name had been rendered peculiarly odious by lampoons and ſongs through the whole province. Nevertheleſs, theſe circumſtances, to which was added the extreme poverty of the Spaniſh Court and army at that time, wrought in him not the leaſt degree of diſcouragement. Without any advantage or credit but the ſtrength of his own genius, without carrying or deſiring a recommendation from Charles the Second, he directed his journey to the place where Don Juan lay with his forces. At firſt the Earl of Briſtol was received with coldneſs and reſerve, as a man againſt whom it behoved the Spaniards to be much upon their guard. In the mean time, with his accuſtomed vivacity, he entered into converſation with the principal officers of the army, and with the miniſters of ſtate, adapting his diſcourſe to them in the manner that was exactly ſuited to their different tempers and humours. So acceptable, in a few days, did he become to all kinds of perſons, that he was univerſally ſpoken of as a very fine gentleman, and a man of extraordinary parts. Nay, Don Juan himſelf was well pleaſed to ſee him frequently, and eſpecially at the ſeaſon of leiſure; at meals for inſtance, and in the hours of the evening. That Prince had fine natural parts, had been converſant in various branches of polite learning, and had a much larger acquaintance with books than was uſual with the grandees of his own nation. The people of quality about him were greatly inferior to him in theſe reſpects; ſo that he was highly delighted with the opportunity of exerciſing his talents in converſation with a perſon of ſuch univerſal literature as the Earl of Briſtol. Don Juan, while in Italy, had acquired a taſte for judicial aſtrology, and Lord Briſtol was an adept in the ſame ſcience; in which both of them placed a greater degree of credit than they would have been willing openly to acknowledge. By this conformity of taſtes in literary purſuits, the Earl grew every day more and more into the Prince's favour. When his Lordſhip had thus excited a high opinion of his abilities and talents, his next work was to diſplay his intereſt, and the power he had of rendering himſelf eminently uſeful to the Spaniards. There were many regiments in the French army, which conſiſted entirely, both officers and ſoldiers, of Iriſh; ſome of whom, during Charles the Second's reſidence at Paris, had withdrawn themſelves from the Spaniſh ſervice, declaring that they would always ſerve their own King, or in ſuch places as he ſhould require them. Theſe were now as ready to leave the crown of France, and to engage for the Spaniard in Flanders; and to this they were the more diſpoſed from a general and well-grounded rumour, that the Duke of York was going to quit the French dominions, and to repair to his royal brothers, the King and the Duke of Gloceſter, in the Netherlands. At this time the French were in poſſeſſion of a ſtrong garriſon at St. Gillen, a few miles from Bruſſels, under the command of Marſhal Schomberg, who had taken care to fortify the place in ſuch a manner that it was very difficult of attack; ſo that it was a thorn in the ſide of Flanders, and exceedingly diſcommoded all the Spaniſh affairs. It was of the utmoſt conſequence to Don Juan to reduce the Fort, and he had made ſeveral attempts to that purpoſe, but entirely without ſucceſs. Recourſe, therefore, was had to a private negotiation with the officers and ſoldiers of the garriſon, who were moſt of them Iriſh; and the Earl of Briſtol was the principal agent in conducting the buſineſs; in which he was ſo proſperous that Marſhal Schomberg was compelled, by the mutinous diſpoſition of his forces, to treat with Don Juan for the ſurrender of the town; and conditions being agreed upon, he marched out with all thoſe who were inclined to follow him, much the larger part entering into the army of the Spaniards. By his dexterity in this affair Lord Briſtol acquired great reputation, and was very liberally rewarded. He now conſidered himſelf as ſettled in the ſervice of the Spaniſh crown, and in the particular affection of Don Juan, of which he made daily uſe. One purpoſe to which he applied it was to propoſe to Charles the Second his being reſtored to the character of Secretary of State; and Charles was induced, by the Earl of Briſtol's diſplay of the power which he ſhould have to ſerve him, to comply with his requeſt. The office was at this period altogether needleſs; Mr. Secretary Nicholas, who was then with the King, being equal, and more than equal, to all the buſineſs that was neceſſary to be tranſacted. Indeed, it was not intended that Lord Briſtol ſhould take an active part in the employment. He only wiſhed for the title, and it was no more than a title which he hoped to obtain; for he did not believe that it would ever come to be an office in England. At that time he deſpaired of the King's being ever reſtored to his dominions; and therefore he modeled all his deſigns to the view of living in a good condition abroad (m).

(m) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, p. lxiv—lxviii.

Hitherto the Earl of Briſtol had adhered to the Proteſtant religion, and had ably reſiſted all the attempts which were made in France to convert him to the Catholic faith. But he now found that he muſt adapt his conduct to another meridian. The temper which had done him no harm in France would be prejudicial to him in Flanders. In that bigoted country it was not ſufficient for a man to be a Chriſtian, unleſs he was likewiſe a Catholic. Lord Briſtol had never entertained any ſtrong expectations of the King's Reſtoration; and at this time that event ſeemed to be rendered entirely hopeleſs by the defeat of Sir George Booth and his adherents. It was to the Spaniards, therefore, that his Lordſhip could now only look for ſupport and promotion; and, whilſt he continued a Proteſtant, he knew that many obſtructions would lie in the way of his advancement. It was his character through life never to be long in ſuſpence, either in forming his ſchemes, or in carrying them into execution. He had then a daughter reſiding at Ghent, with the Lady Abbeſs of the Engliſh monaſtery. To this place, therefore, he repaired, and, pretending to be taken extremely ill, ſent for Phyſicians, deſcribed his caſe to them, and begged them to apply the proper remedies. In the mean while, the Lady Abbeſs adminiſtered her ſpiritual conſolations; to perform which the more effectually, ſhe called in the aſſiſtance of Father Courtney, the Provincial of the Engliſh Jeſuits; and by their joint efforts the ſcruples of the Earl of Briſtol were removed, and he was reconciled to the Church of Rome. Courtney, indeed, was far inferior to the Earl in point of abilities; but his Lordſhip was apparently reduced to ſo low a ſtate by his diſorder, that he was not able to withſtand the arguments of the Provincial. When this farce, which was tranſacted in great ſecrecy, was over, the Earl of Briſtol ſent to the Marquis of Ormond and Sir Edward Hyde, the only two friends who had ſtill maintained their regard for him, earneſtly intreating them to pay him a viſit at Ghent, his health being ſtill very doubtful, and he having ſomething to impart to them of the laſt importance. It was only in the power of the former to take the journey. When the Marquis arrived at Ghent, Lord Briſtol expatiated at large on the riſe and progreſs of his diſeaſe, the religious doubts with which he had been previouſly diſturbed, the ſatisfaction he had received from the Jeſuit's reaſonings, and the tranquillity of mind that had ſucceeded his converſion. He added his deſire, that the whole affair might be candidly related to his Majeſty, and that a generous interpretation might be put upon his conduct. What he had principally in view, was to retain the character of Secretary of State. But to this the King, with the concurrence of his Council, would by no means agree. Sir Edward Hyde, who was more ſurprized at the Earl's change of Religion than any other perſon, was ordered to forbid his appearing for the future at the Board, and to demand from him the ſignet of his office; with which order he immediately complied.

It was with no ſmall degree of mortification that the Earl of Briſtol was obliged to give up his character as Secretary of State to Charles the Second. He did not think that the King, in the condition of dependence to which his Majeſty was reduced, would venture to diſmiſs him from his office becauſe he became a Catholic; and he imagined that he ſhould be the medium through which all favours to the Engliſh Royaliſts would be conveyed. In both reſpects he was diſappointed; and he was particularly diſappointed with regard to the good fruits of preferment which he expected from Spain, in conſequence of his converſion. After the firſt congratulations for his becoming a Chriſtian (as it was called), and which for a few days were liberally paid, he found no ſunſhine from the change of his climate. No proffer of place or of penſion came from Madrid; nor did the Pope, to whom he had made an early communication of his ſorrow for, and renunciation of his former hereſy, return him the high compliments he looked for; but only ſent him the cold and cuſtomary exhortation: Tu converſus converte fratres tuos: "Thou being converted, convert thy brethren." Even Don Juan's countenance was ſo far from being peculiarly gracious to him, that in truth it was more reſerved than before; to which the Marquis of Carracina, and eſpecially Don Alonzo de Cardinas had contributed; for, from a jealouſy of the Earl of Briſtol's influence with the chief Governor, they had tranſmitted ſuch an unfavourable repreſentation of his Lordſhip to the Spaniſh Court, that the Prince received a reproof for the attention which he had ſhewn him. From another circumſtance it appeared with how little eſteem he was regarded at Madrid. When the treaty between the two Crowns of France and Spain was appointed to be held at Fontarabia, and was to be conducted by Don Louis de Haro on the one ſide, and Cardinal Mazarine on the other, Don Louis, who was well-diſpoſed to Charles the Second's intereſt, wiſhed his Majeſty to be preſent at the negotiation; but, at the ſame time, adviſed him to come with as ſmall a train as poſſible, and by no means to bring with him the Earl of Briſtol. The advice would probably have wholly been complied with, if the Cardinal would have granted to the King a ſafe conduct for his paſſing through France; but this he expreſsly refuſed, and as expreſsly diſſuaded his going to the treaty. Charles, however, being determined upon the journey, and being at the ſame time obliged to make it in the moſt ſecret manner, it became neceſſary to have the attendance of the Earl of Briſtol, on account of his being perfectly acquainted with the bye-roads of the country; nor was his Majeſty in himſelf diſpleaſed with having ſo pleaſant a companion.

During the courſe of the expedition, the King was contented to ſee as many conſiderable places as were within any diſtance of the ways through which he was to paſs; and the Earl, being ſole conductor, led him ſo far about, that the negotiations were nearly concluded, before he arrived at the borders. A general report was likewiſe ſpread, that the treaty was actually at an end, and that Don Louis de Haro had returned to Madrid. Upon the ſtrength of this intelligence, though the Marquis of Ormond had been ſent directly to Fontarabia to know the truth, Lord Briſtol perſuaded the King, without waiting for the Marquis's return, that he ought to make all poſſible haſte to Madrid, and ſo far prevailed, that they proceeded to Saragoſa, in the kingdom of Arragon. Here they received clear information that Don Louis was ſtill at the place of negotiation; and the next day an expreſs came from the Marquis of Ormond and Henry Bennet, urging his Majeſty to repair with the utmoſt ſpeed to Fontarabia, and repreſenting the injury which his affairs had ſuſtained by the delay that had hitherto occurred. As for the Earl of Briſtol, notwithſtanding the prejudice which Don Louis had conceived againſt him, he found means, by his dexterity and addreſs, to work himſelf into the good opinion and favour of that Stateſman, and had encouragement to go to Madrid, where he was well received by the Spaniſh Monarch, and ſupplied with at leaſt two or three thouſand pounds ſterling. Being thus liberally treated, he reſided in Spain till the great change of affairs took place in England (n).

(n) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, p. lxxi, lxxii.

Upon the Reſtoration of King Charles the Second, the Earl of Briſtol returned to his own country; and, having been elected a Knight of the Garter at the time beforementioned, he was inſtalled, at Windſor, with various other noblemen, in April, 1661 (o). His Lordſhip now found the inconvenience ariſing from his having embraced the Roman Catholic Religion, which precluded him from being appointed of the Privy Council, or raiſed to any of the high Offices of State. Nevertheleſs, he flattered himſelf with the hopes of having a great ſhare in the management of foreign affairs, and that, upon account of his experience, he ſhould be conſulted in all matters of that kind. This not being the caſe, he was filled with indignation, and was particularly offended with the Earl of Clarendon, whom he conſidered as the principal obſtruction to his power and influence. A friendſhip had long ſubſiſted between them; but it had been interrupted by the Earl of Briſtol's converſion to Popery, and was never afterwards ſincerely renewed, though they continued to maintain the external offices of civility. The light in which Lotd Briſtol now choſe to be regarded was, that of being wholly devoted to the intereſt of Spain, and he entered into a very cloſe connection with Baron de Batteville, the Embaſſador from that country. When, therefore, he heard of the negotiations for the marriage of Charles the Second with the Infanta of Portugal, he united with the Embaſſador in uſing his utmoſt efforts to obſtruct the match. Accordingly, he repreſented to his Majeſty, that the Infanta was too old for him; that ſhe was deformed in her perſon; that ſhe had many diſeaſes; and that ſhe was incapable of bearing children. He added, that ſuch a cloſe alliance with Portugal might involve England in a war with Spain: and he expatiated largely on the beauty, accompliſhments, and perfection, of two Italian Ladies of the Houſe of Medici; with regard to each of whom, he ſaid the King might have his choice; together with a fortune from the Spaniſh monarch equal to his expectations from the other connection. Theſe repreſentations had ſuch an effect upon the mind of Charles the Second, that he immediately grew cold to the Portugueſe match. Nay, he went ſo far as to commiſſion the Earl of Briſtol to undertake a private journey to Italy, in order to judge concerning the perſons and merits of the ladies in queſtion (p), and to report which of them would be the moſt deſirable object of his Majeſty's choice. All this while the King had gone too far in the treaty with Portugal to retreat with honour. At the inſtance, therefore, of the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, and others of his Privy Counſellors, he gave up the Italian project, and concluded his marriage marriage with the Infanta. The Earl of Briſtol, having thus taken his journey in vain, and being totally diſappointed in his operations, was inflamed with ſo much reſentment againſt the Chancellor, that, from that time, he became his open and declared enemy (q).

Another circumſtance which ſtill farther added to the rupture between the Earls of Briſtol and Clarendon, was the conduct of the former with relation to the Bill for reſtoring the Biſhops to their ſeats in Parliament. This bill had originated in the Houſe of Commons. When, however, it was carried up to the Houſe of Peers, and all men expected that it would find a general concurrence, it met with ſome obſtruction; which produced the diſcovery of an intrigue, that had not been ſuſpected. The author of this intrigue was the Earl of Briſtol. He went to the King, and informed his Majeſty, "that if the Bill ſhould ſpeedily paſs, it would abſolutely deprive the Catho-"lics of all thoſe graces and indulgences which he intended to them; for that the Biſhops, "when they ſhould ſit in the Houſe, whatever their own opinions or inclinations were, "would find themſelves obliged, that they might preſerve their reputation with the "people, to contradict and oppoſe whatever ſhould look like favour and connivance "towards the Catholics: and therefore, if his Majeſty continued his former generous "inclinations towards the Roman Catholics he muſt put ſome ſtop (even for the Bi-"ſhops own ſakes) to the paſſing that bill, till the other ſhould be more advanced, "which he ſuppoſed might ſhortly be done;" there having already ſome overtures been made to that purpoſe, and a Committee appointed in the Houſe of Lords to take a view of all the ſanguinary laws in matters of religion, and to preſent them to the Houſe for farther conſideration. Though the King was ſurprized at this diſcourſe, from a man who had often told him the neceſſity of reſtoring the Biſhops, and that there could not be a perfect Parliament without their preſence; nevertheleſs, he thought that there was weight in the reaſon for the delay, and that the protraction of a few days could be attended with no prejudice to the matter itſelf. His Majeſty, therefore, was willing that the bill ſhould not be called for, and that when it was under commitment, it ſhould be detained there for ſome time: and the better to produce this delay, Lord Briſtol was permitted to acquaint ſeveral of his friends, "that the King "would be well pleaſed, that there ſhould not be overmuch haſte in the preſenting "of the bill for his Royal Aſſent." It ſoon began to be taken notice of in the Houſe of Peers, that, after the firſt reading of the bill, it had been put off for a ſecond reading longer than uſual; and that when it was under commitment, it was obſtructed there, notwithſtanding all the endeavours ſome Lords of the Committee could uſe for the diſpatch. The delay in the buſineſs appeared the more extraordinary, as the bill contained very few words, being only for the repeal of a former act, and as the expreſſions of it could ſcarcely admit of any debate. The Earl of Clarendon deſiring to know whence the obſtruction proceeded, was informed, by one of the Lords of the Committee, "that they were aſſured, that the King would have a ſtop put to the bill "till another bill ſhould be provided, which he expected." Hereupon the Chancellor applied to his Majeſty, who told him all the conference which the Earl of Briſtol had held with him, and what he had conſented ſhould be done. Upon this Clarendon replied, "that he was ſorry that his Majeſty had been prevailed upon to give any obſtruc-"tion to the bill, which every body knew his Majeſty's heart was ſo much ſet upon for "diſpatch; and that, if the reaſon were known, it would quickly put an end to all "the pretences of the Catholics; to which his Majeſty knew he was no enemy." With this anſwer the King was ſatisfied, and expreſſed his wiſh that the act might be diſpatched as ſpeedily as poſſible, in order to his paſſing it that ſeſſion, which he had appointed to make an end of within a few days. Accordingly, on the next day, the report was called for and made, and the bill ordered to be engroſſed againſt the following morning, the Earl of Briſtol not being at that time in the Houſe. But on the ſucceeding morning, when the Chancellor had the bill engroſſed in his hand to preſent it to the Houſe to be read a third time, Lord Briſtol came to him to the woolſack, and with great diſpleaſure and wrath in his countenance told him, "that if that bill were "read that day, he would ſpeak againſt it." The Chancellor, without being influenced by his Lordſhip's anger, perſevered in his purpoſe, and the act was paſſed that day (r).

(r) Continuation of the Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 262—265.

In the year 1663, an incident occurred which brought the Earl of Briſtol into an examination before the Houſe of Commons. On the thirteenth of June, Mr. Coventry acquainted the Houſe, from the King, "that a meſſage was delivered to his Ma-"jeſty, by a perſon of quality, from Sir Richard Temple, to the effect following; "viz. that Sir Richard Temple was ſorry his Majeſty was offended with him that he "could not go along with them that had undertaken his buſineſs in the Houſe of Com-"mons: but, if his Majeſty would take his advice, and intruſt him and his friends, "he would undertake his buſineſs ſhould be effected, and the revenue ſettled, better "than he could deſire, if the Courtiers did not hinder it (s)." A Committee being appointed to examine the matter, Sir Richard Temple, on the ſixteenth, informed the Houſe,

(s) Journals of the Houſe of Commons, Vol. VIII. p. 502.

Houſe, that, in purſuance of the leave granted him, he had petitioned the King for the name of the perſon who had given a repreſentation of him to his Majeſty, and that Mr. Secretary Morrice had told him that he ſhould receive his anſwer in the Houſe. Accordingly, the Secretary delivered, in Writing, a meſſage from his Majeſty; upon which it was reſolved, that the ſaid meſſage ſhould be referred to the Committee before appointed to conſider, upon the preſent debate, how far the Houſe is concerned in the caſe of Sir Richard Temple, and to report their opinion what is fit to be done in the buſineſs (t). On the twentieth of June, upon a report of the Committee, it was farther reſolved, "That the King's Majeſty be humbly deſired, that he would be graciouſly "pleaſed to name the perſon who did deliver the meſſage to his Majeſty from Sir "Richard Temple." In conſequence of this addreſs, Mr. Secretary Morrice, on the twenty-ſixth of the month, acquainted the Houſe, that the Earl of Briſtol was the perſon who had delivered the meſſage from Sir Richard Temple to his Majeſty. It was then reſolved, that a copy of the King's firſt meſſage to the Houſe againſt Sir Richard Temple, ſhould be ſent to the Earl, and his anſwer be deſired. In return, his Lordſhip rendered his moſt humble and hearty thanks to the Houſe, that, in ſuch an important matter, and ſo much concerning his honour, they did ſignify their deſires to him in ſo obliging a manner: but in regard the thing was of ſo great conſequence, partly relating to his Majeſty, and alſo concerning his own honour, and the reputation of a member of the houſe, he could not entruſt any other perſon to deliver his anſwer, for fear of miſtakes, which might thereby happen, and becauſe he might probably, if preſent, clear any matter which might farther accrue: and therefore, that he might give full ſatisfaction to ſo illuſtrious a repreſentative of his country, he deſired a day might be prefixed when he might be admitted to give an account to the Houſe, in perſon, concerning the matter: and he concluded with declaring, that he would make his addreſs to the Lords, that he might be permitted ſo to do. Wedneſday, the firſt of July, being fixed upon for the Earl of Briſtol's perſonal appearance; on that day, being placed in a chair ſet for him on purpoſe, on the left ſide of the Houſe, within the bar, and the Speaker having opened the buſineſs, the Earl addreſſed himſelf to the Commons, in a ſpeech admirable for its ingenuity and eloquence; which, therefore, and eſpecially as it is little known, many of our Readers may wiſh to peruſe [F].

[F] Many of our Readers may wiſh to peruſe.] It is as follows:

'MR. SPEAKER,

'Were I to be wrought upon by the arts and menaces of my enemies, or by the alarms of my friends 'on my behalf, contrary to the firmneſs and aſſurance which a clean heart and a good conſcience 'does always uphold in a man of honour, I ſhould 'have appeared in this place with ſuch fear and trembling, as could not chuſe but diſorder any man's 'reaſon and elocution: the niceneſs of the ſubject 'upon which I am brought hither, were enough to 'diſcompoſe one; but over and above that, I am 'not ignorant what perſonal prejudices I am under, 'and how induſtriouſly they have been improved 'among you. But when I look round this illuſtrious 'aſſembly, and ſee three parts of it compoſed of 'men who wear, as I do, a ſword by their ſides, and 'who have drawn it ſo often for the King's ſervice, 'Gentlemen of birth, integrity, fortune, all apprehenſions vaniſh from a man, who hath ſerved and 'ſuffered for the King as I have done. Mr. Speaker, 'I know the time of this Houſe, upon whoſe prudent 'deliberations the happineſs of the King and kingdom depend, is too precious to have any part of 'it ſpent in vindication of me: but, ſince not only 'the reputation and innocence of one of your members depends upon what I ſhall ſay, but even his 'Majeſty's honour may in ſome ſort be concerned 'in the right apprehenſion of it, I hope it will be 'thought no preſumption in me to beg of you, as I 'do, in all humility, one quarter of an hour's patience and attention.——Mr. Speaker, I am here 'expoſed as the bearer of a meſſage to his Majeſty 'from Sir Richard Temple, which he hath thought 'worthy to be complained of to this Houſe, and 'which Sir Richard Temple affirms he never ſent. 'Lay your hands upon your hearts, Gentlemen, and 'ſay truly, does not your innate candour pity my 'condition, brought into a ſtreight in all appearance ſo inextricable? For, on the one ſide, if I 'avow to have carried from Sir Richard Temple the 'meſſage, which his Majeſty has been pleaſed to 'make ſo high and ſo unuſual an expreſſion of his 'being offended at, and which Sir Richard Temple 'denies to have ſent, how can men of honour forgive me ſo ungentlemanly a proceeding towards a 'perſon who hath truſted me, as a friend, to do 'him (as he thought) a good office with his Majeſty! 'On the other ſide, Mr. Speaker, ſhould I diſavow 'the having delivered the meſſage from Sir Richard 'Temple, which his Majeſty hath thought fit to affirm that he received from him and by me, what 'ſubject can be ſtrong enough not to ſink for ever 'under the weight of ſuch a contradiction to his 'Sovereign! I aſk you again, Gentlemen, does 'not the condition you ſee me brought into, by the 'arts of my enemies, move you at the ſame time to 'pity and indignation? Mr. Speaker, when David 'was put to his choice of one of the three calamities, 'he made election of the plague. And why; that he 'might fall into the hands of GOD, and not of men. 'In like manner, Mr. Speaker, if one of the two 'extremes with which I am threatened be, as it 'appears, unavoidable, let me fall into the hands 'of GOD's vicegerent, the King: the world will 'never pardon me an unworthy action; his goodneſs, 'I am ſure, would in time pardon a generous fault. 'But when you have heard me out, Gentlemen, I 'am confident you will find, that I ſhall need neither 'the world's pardon nor the king's, but only yours. 'In the firſt place, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to clear 'Sir Richard Temple, which I here do upon my 'honour, that he never ſent by me a meſſage to the 'King, that had in it the leaſt tincture of an undertaking of his; which I conceive could be the only 'part that could give offence to his Majeſty, or be a 'ground for the complaint made againſt him.—— 'In the next place, if the King, who, the law ſays, 'can do no wrong, hath thought fit to affirm, that 'I brought him that undertaking meſſage from Sir 'Richard Temple, it muſt needs be true, and I do 'with all ſubmiſſion avow whatever his Majeſty is 'pleaſed to affirm of me. But, having diſcharged 'that duty towards my Sovereign, I hope I may be 'allowed to lay the fault home upon myſelf, and to 'tell you, that my tongue, I know not by what diſtemper, delivered that which, I proteſt to GOD, 'was never in my thoughts. I was ſo far from thinking to deliver ſuch a meſſage from Sir Richard 'Temple, that I did not think myſelf charged with

In concluſion it was reſolved, firſt, that Sir Richard Temple had not broken any privilege of the Houſe, in the matter in queſtion concerning him: and, ſecondly, that the

‘ any thing by way of meſſage. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that, being full of indignation at ill offices done him, I made a warm addreſs to his Majeſty in Sir Richard Temple's behalf, wherein I expreſſed his grief, that his Majeſty ſhould be offended with him; and having joined thereunto ſome reaſonings of his to juſtify his conduct, in relation to his Majeſty's ſervice, very agreeable to my own ſentiments, I purſued his expreſſions with ſuch of my own, as (all circumſtances conſidered) the moſt unattentive perſon, and the moſt biaſſed with paſſion againſt Sir Richard Temple, might have eaſily underſtood it to be no undertaking of his, but only a warm diſcourſe, and confident undertaking of my own.—Sir Richard Temple being thus cleared, without the leaſt contradiction to his Majeſty, if to undertake for you, Gentlemen, be a guilt, it is only I that ſtand guilty before you. But you are too noble, I am ſure, and too juſt, to condemn me in in your judgment, before you have heard the nature and circumſtances of my undertaking; which, with your leave, I ſhall declare to the full, taking the matter (as I muſt needs, to be rightly underſtood) from an higher original. Mr. Speaker, having had the honour heretofore of diſcharging, with approbation, a place of ſo high truſt as that of Secretary of State to his Majeſty's Father, of bleſſed memory, and to himſelf; and ſince my quitting that place, being admitted ſo frequently to the happineſs of his princely converſation; you cannot imagine but that ſometimes he vouchſafed to ſpeak to me of buſineſs, eſpecially of Parliaments, where I have the honour at preſent to be a Peer, and have heretofore been as much verſed as ſome of my cotemporaries in the proceedings of the Honourable Houſe of Commons. I confeſs, that before this laſt aſſembling he did it more than once and the opinion I moſt conſtantly delivered concerning this Houſe was, that never King was ſo happy in a Houſe of Commons as he was in you; a Houſe compoſed of ſo many Gentlemen of birth and fortune, eminent in their faithfulneſs to him, and ſuch as could never be ſuſpected of any ſiniſter deſigns, or of any other dependence but upon the Crown, and upon the care of thoſe that choſe them, and ſuch as in the laſt ſeſſions had manifeſted their affections to him by ſuch large aids and ſupplies; adding, that nothing could be more important to his ſervice, than to make and preſerve you ſtill popular with thoſe that ſent you. To which end I took the liberty to tell him, that if the neceſſity of his affairs (of which I, having no part in his council, was no good judge) could admit of it, he ought not in prudence to let you give him any money this ſitting, but rather to oblige you wholly to apply yourſelves to the making of ſuch laws as might endear both him and you to the People; by which means, at another meeting, he would be maſter of the hearts and purſes of his ſubjects. But in caſe his neceſſities ſhould urge him to preſs you, before the riſing, for a new ſupply, that he ought, by all means, to let it be accompanied, if not preceded, by ſome eminent acts for the reformation of former abuſes, and for the ſecuring his ſubjects from the like for the future.——I perſiſted, Mr. Speaker, in preſſing, upon all occaſions, this advice to his Majeſty, till within ſome few weeks after their meeting; when, finding myſelf (I know not by what misfortune) fallen under ſome prejudice, I thought that a total forbearance from ſpeaking to him of any buſineſs would be the beſt way of my ſerving him. And I proteſt unto you, Gentlemen, with all ſincerity, that from that time, until that of his Majeſty's expreſſing to me ſome diſpleaſure againſt Sir Richard Temple, I never once opened my lips to him of any public affair whatſoever. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that a ground being given me to enter again with his Majeſty upon a ſubject which my heart was ſtill full of, I laid hold on the occaſion, and, in purſuance of what I had ſaid in behalf of Sir Richard Temple, told his Majeſty, perhaps with more freedom and fervour than did become me, that I found his courtiers gave him wrong meaſures, both of the temper of the Houſe of Commons, and of the means to attain from them any new ſupplies, whether by way of preſent, gift, or of ſuch eſtabliſhments in his revenues, as might indeed put him out of neceſſity; ſince there could be no reaſonable hopes of obtaining from them any ſuch aſſiſtance but by a concomitance, if not a precedence, of ſuch acts as might be grateful and beneficial to his ſubjects, and ſecure them, that what ſhall be given hereafter ſhould be better managed for his Majeſty's ſervice than thoſe vaſt ſums that had been formerly granted: that if his Majeſty, in his princely wiſdom, ſhould think fit to drive on his buſineſs upon ſolid grounds, and not upon the falſe and ſelf-intereſted meaſures of ſome courtiers, he had a Houſe of Commons compoſed of Members ſo full of affection to his perſon, and zeal for his proſperity and glory, that not only Sir Richard Temple, but the moſt unprejudiced and wiſeſt men of the kingdom, as well as myſelf, durſt undertake for them. See here, Gentlemen, the bold undertaking that ſuch a Houſe of Commons would never let him want ſuch preſent ſupplies as the true neceſſity of his affairs ſhould require, nor ſuch an eſtabliſhed revenue as is fit to ſupport the greatneſs and honour of his Crown. If this was a criminal undertaking, you have before you, Gentlemen, confitentem reum. But whilſt I am endeavouring to clear Sir Richard Temple, and to vindicate or arraign myſelf, according as you ſhall be pleaſed to underſtand it, by telling you what paſſed from me to his Majeſty, I muſt not omit to give him the honour due to him for the kingly reply he made to me upon this occaſion, which was, That he had a true ſenſe of the merit of the Houſe of Commons towards him, even far beyond what I had expreſſed; and this was the reaſon why, relying ſo entirely as he did upon the affections of that whole body, he was, and ever ſhould be, offended at any propoſition to carry on his buſineſs there by officious undertakings and cabals, either of his courtiers or others. An expreſſion fit to be written with the rays of the ſun, that all the world may read it; an expreſſion which cannot chuſe but inflame the affections of all this noble aſſembly that hear me, and carry you to make good theſe happy impreſſions of you, which are ſo deeply ſtampt in his royal breaſt: ſuch as I ſhould think it a crime to doubt, but that all ſuſpicions being now vaniſhed of his Majeſty's owing the ſupply deſired to any acts or contrivances of others, your own zeal for his ſervice will, even in the proportion and timelineſs of that, exceed the vain propoſals of all pickthank undertakers. Mr. Speaker, I ſhould have here put a period to your trouble of hearing me, did I not think I might incur the imputation of much weakneſs and ſupineneſs in my own higheſt concernments, if, valuing as I do, above all earthly concernments, the favour and the eſteem of my country, of which you are the illuſtrious Repreſentatives, and knowing what induſtry has been uſed to blaſt me with you, I ſhould not lay hold on this juſt occaſion to remove from me ſome unjuſt prejudices under which I have laboured. And this Mr. Speaker, I humbly beg leave to do in very few words. I appeal, Gentlemen, to numbers of you that hear me, whether I have not been repreſented unto you for the giver of advice of a far different tenor from what you have heard upon this occaſion; whether I have not been painted out unto you as an inflamer of his Majeſty againſt his Parliament, for an enemy of the Church of England, and for a dangerous driver on of the Papiſtical intereſt. It is true, Mr. Speaker, I am a Catholick of the Church of Rome, but not of the Court of Rome; no negotiator there of Cardinals' caps for his Majeſty's ſubjects and domeſtics; a true Roman Catholick as to the other world, but a true Engliſh

the Earl of Briſtol, in the account which he had given in the matter concerning Sir Richard Temple, had carried himſelf with all dutifulneſs towards his Majeſty; had cleared the Member of the Houſe; and that the Houſe was well ſatisfied with his reſpects to them (r).

The Earl of Briſtol was at this time deeply embarraſſed in his affairs. His eſtate had been diſpoſed of and ſettled, by his own conſent, upon the marriage of his eldeſt ſon twice to great fortunes; ſo that when he returned to England after the Reſtoration, he had little more to ſubſiſt upon than the King's bounty, which was not poured upon him in the meaſure he wiſhed, though few perſons had larger experience of it than himſelf.

Charles the Second had been munificent to him in ſeveral reſpects, and had particularly given him at one time ten thouſand pounds in money, with which he had purchaſed Wimbledon of the Queen Dowager. Beſides this, his Majeſty had beſtowed upon him Aſh-down Foreſt, and other lands in Suſſex. Still, however, he was poor; and with the diſpoſitions he was poſſeſſed of, he could not avoid continuing to be poor. He was not only, in general, improvident in his expences, but retained his paſſion for gaming, which had been ſo fatal to him through the whole courſe of his life; and inſtead of deriving the advantages that might have been obtained from his purchaſe at Wimbledon, he ſpent as much money in building and gardening as the land was worth.

To the diſtreſs of his mind, ariſing from the embarraſſment of his circumſtances, was added another mortification. Though he had always free acceſs to the King, and was conſulted by him on various occaſions, yet he had not that degree of favour and affection with his Majeſty, which he imagined to be due to his merit, and which he wiſhed that the world might believe him to poſſeſs. On account, indeed, of his religion, he

'man as to this: ſuch a one as, had we a King inclined to that profeſſion (as, on the contrary, we have one the moſt firm and conſtant to the Proteſtant Religion that ever ſat upon the throne), I would tell him as freely as the D. of Sully, being a Proteſtant, told his grandfather Henry IV. that if he meant to be a King he muſt be a conſtant profeſſor and maintainer of the religion eſtabliſhed in his dominions. Believe me, Gentlemen, Roman Catholick as I am, there is no man amongſt you all more thoroughly perſuaded than I am, that the true pillars that can uphold this Monarchy muſt ever be the maintenance of the ſubjects juſt rights and liberties, and the careful preſervation of that ſtate eccleſiaſtical whereof his Majeſty is the ſupreme Governour; and I do clearly profeſs, that ſhould the Pope himſelf invade that eccleſiaſtical right of his, I ſhould as readily draw my ſword againſt him as againſt the late uſurper. Mr. Speaker, one prejudice more I am under, which ought to have great weight indeed with this Honourable Houſe, if there were a real ground for it; and that is, that the Earl of Briſtol is one of thoſe who, by the vaſt grants that he hath got of the King, hath, in part, contributed to the groans of the people, to find their King ſtill in ſuch neceſſity, after ſuch unexampled charges laid upon the ſubjects for his ſupplies. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that though I have neither offices to keep, nor offices to ſell, his Majeſty's gifts to me have been great, in proportion to my merit, which is none; for in ſerving and ſuffering for him with faithfulneſs, I did but my duty, which carries a reward with itſelf enough to raiſe a comfort to me, from the very ruin of my fortune. It is alſo true, I have had the ſatisfaction from his Majeſty, that he never refuſed me any thing I aſked him for myſelf. But I hope I ſhall make it appear alſo, that I have not only been a very modeſt aſker, but alſo a moſt careful one, to aſk nothing conſiderable but what carried advantage with it, as well to his Majeſty's intereſt as my own. I know well, Mr. Speaker, that, with ſo kind and ſo generous a nature as our King's is, an ill proportion of bounty to merit, and conſequently the largeneſs and kindneſs of his Royal heart that way, may have contributed much to the preſent ſtreights he is in. Happy is the nation that hath nothing to fear for the publick, but from the virtues of their Prince. It is your proper work, Gentlemen, to reduce the effects of them to a right temperament, by your prudent inſpection; and may you begin it with all my concernments, which I moſt readily lay at your feet, humbly begging of you to appoint a time, when I may diſplay them all faithfully before you; in hopes that no man who hath been a partaker of his Majeſty's bounty will prove himſelf ſo unworthy of it as not to follow the example. Mr. Speaker, if having thus poured out my ſoul before you, I have been ſo happy as to have begot in this Honourable Houſe a right perſuaſion of the ſincerity of my heart, I expect and implore two gracious effects of it: The firſt, that you will be pleaſed to grant me your pardon, if the ſame zeal for his Majeſty's ſervice, and the good of my country, which made me preſume (being no counſellor) to preſs upon his Majeſty my opinion in matters of ſuch importance, has tranſported me alſo, at this time, in ſome ſort, ſo as to become your adviſer. You have heard, Gentlemen, of the dumb man whoſe tongue was ſet free by the imminent danger of his father's life: wonder not then, Gentlemen, that ſuch a lover of his King and Country as I am, having ſeen them, within theſe three years, in a proſpect of ſuch glory and happineſs, both at home and abroad, and finding to what a ſad condition things are now reduced (by what means it is more proper for you to enquire, and may heaven bleſs your inſpection!); wonder not, I ſay, Gentlemen, that a man ſo affected as I am, ſhould, by ſome eruptions of heart, let you ſee, that periculum patriæ ought to have a more powerful effect upon a man of public ſoul, than periculum patris, and is capable, if I were a mute, to make me become a counſellor. The next is, Mr. Speaker, that if (as I ſaid before) I have been ſo happy in what I expreſſed as to have raiſed in you ſome more favourable thoughts concerning me, you would vouchſafe me ſome demonſtration of it, whereby I may no more be made, by my enemies, ſuch a bugbear as I am: as if a gracious look of his Majeſty upon me, were enough to ruin all his affairs with you. I ſhall then continue the way I am in with comfort; but if I be ſo unfortunate, as that there ſtill remains in this incomparable repreſentative of my country any umbrage of danger to it by my acceſs to his Majeſty, as dear as the converſation of the amiableſt Prince that ever breathed is to me, I ſhall baniſh myſelf for ever from his ſight into the obſcureſt part of his dominions, rather than continue upon me the jealouſy of thoſe on whom his proſperity depends; or if this be not enough, I ſhall once more try my fortune abroad; where, I truſt, this ſword, this head, this heart, ſhall make me live as heretofore, in ſpite of my enemies, with luſtre to myſelf and ſome honour to my nation (5).'

knew

knew that he could not be a member of the Privy Council, or occupy an oſtenſible Poſt in Government, but he flattered himſelf that he ſhould derive great conſequence from being the principal head of the Roman Catholics, and the prime conductor of all their affairs. However, he was even in this reſpect diſappointed. The Jeſuits, to whom he profeſſed a peculiar attachment, did not admit him to their moſt ſecret conſultations; and the reſt of the Catholic clergy were ſtill leſs diſpoſed to put themſelves under his direction.

A few days after the Earl of Briſtol's appearance before the Houſe of Commons, finding himſelf reduced to difficulties which it was neither in his power to bear nor to remove, his mind was thrown into ſuch agitation, that he was carried to a great pitch of extravagant behaviour in the preſence of the King. Having made a requeſt to his Majeſty which he did not think proper to grant, the Earl told him, that "he knew "well the cauſe of his withdrawing his favour from him; that it proceeded only from "the Chancellor, who governed him and managed all his affairs, whilſt himſelf ſpent "his time only in pleaſures and debauchery." In the heat of his paſſion, Lord Briſtol upbraided the King with many exceſſes, which, however true, ought to have been more modeſtly and decently mentioned. All this, too, was tranſacted in the preſence of Lord Aubigny, who was as much ſurprized as his Majeſty. In concluſion, the Earl declared, "that if the King did not give him ſatisfaction within ſuch a time," (the time allowed did not exceed four and twenty hours), "he would do ſomewhat that would awaken him "out of his ſlumber, and make him look better to his own buſineſs." He added, likewiſe, many threats againſt the Chancellor. It was a farther aggravation of Lord Briſtol's conduct upon this occaſion, that he had himſelf been no ſmall encourager of Charles the Second's irregularities. During the Earl's reproaches, the King ſtood in ſuch confuſion (though in his reply he uſed ſharper words than were cuſtomary with him) that he did not preſerve that dignity of behaviour which he ought to have done. He afterwards ſaid, that he ought preſently to have called for the Guard, it being in his own cloſet, and to have ſent Briſtol to the Tower (s).

It ſpeedily appeared what was the revenge intended by the Earl of Briſtol. On the tenth of July, 1663, he exhibited, in the Houſe of Peers, a charge of High Treaſon againſt the Lord Chancellor Clarendon; the particulars of which will be ſeen below [G]. When

[G] The particulars of which may be ſeen below.]

'That being in place of higheſt truſt and confidence 'with his Majeſty, and having arrogated a ſupreme 'direction in all his Majeſty's affairs, both at home 'and abroad, he hath wickedly, and maliciouſly, and 'with a traiterous intent to draw ſcandal and contempt upon his Majeſty's perſon, and to alienate 'from him the affections of his ſubjects, abuſed the 'ſaid truſt in manner following, viz.

'That he had traiterouſly and maliciouſly endeavoured to alienate the hearts of his Majeſty's ſubjects 'from him by words of his own, and by artificial 'inſinuations of his creatures and dependances, that his Majeſty was inclined to Popery, and had a deſign 'to alter the religion eſtabliſhed in this kingdom.

'That, in purſuance of that traiterous intent, he 'hath to ſeveral perſons of his Majeſty's Privy-Council held diſcourſes to this effect, viz.

'That his Majeſty was dangerouſly corrupted in 'his religion, and inclined to Popery.

'That perſons of that religion had ſuch acceſs, and 'ſuch credit with him, that, unleſs there were a careful eye had unto it, the Proteſtant religion would be 'overthrown in this kingdom: and in purſuance of 'the ſaid wicked and traiterous intent, upon his Majeſty's admitting Sir Henry Bennet to be principal 'Secretary of State, in the place of Mr. Secretary 'Nicholas, he hath ſaid theſe words, or words to 'this effect:

'That his Majeſty had given 10,000l. to remove a 'zealous Proteſtant, that he might bring into that 'place of truſt a concealed Papiſt, notwithſtanding 'that the ſaid Sir Henry Bennet is known to have ever 'been both in his profeſſion and practice conſtant to 'the Proteſtant religion.

'That, in purſuance of the ſame traiterous deſign, 'ſeveral near friends and known dependants of his 'have ſaid aloud, that, were it not for my Lord 'Chancellor's ſtanding in the gap, Popery would be 'introduced in this kingdom, or words to that effect.

'That, in purſuance of the aforeſaid traiterous 'deſign, he hath not only adviſed and perſuaded the 'King to do ſuch things contrary to his own reaſons 'and reſolutions, as might confirm and increaſe the 'ſcandal, which he had endeavoured to raiſe upon 'his Majeſty as aforeſaid, of his favour to Popery, but 'more particularly to allow his name to be uſed to the 'Pope and ſeveral Cardinals in the ſolicitation of a 'Cardinal's cap for the Lord Aubigny, one of his 'own ſubjects, and Great Almoner at preſent to his 'Royal Conſort the Queen.

'That, in purſuance of the ſame wicked and traiterous deſign, he had recommended to be employed 'to the Pope one of his own domeſtics, Mr. Richard 'Bealing, a perſon (though an avowed Papiſt) known 'to be truſted and employed by him in diſpatches and 'negotiations concerning affairs of the greateſt concernment to the nation.

'That, in purſuance of the ſaid traiterous deſign, 'he being chief Miniſter of State, did himſelf write 'by the ſaid Mr. Richard Bealing, letters to ſeveral 'Cardinals, preſſing them in the King's name to induce the Pope to confer a Cardinal's cap on the ſaid 'Lord Aubigny, promiſing, in caſe it ſhould be attained, exemption to the Roman Catholicks of England from the penal laws in force againſt them; by 'which addreſs unto the Pope for that eccleſiaſtical 'dignity for one of his Majeſty's ſubjects and domeſtics, he hath, as far as from one action can be inferred, traiterouſly acknowledged the Pope's eccleſiaſtical ſovereignty, contrary to the known laws of 'this kingdom.

'That in purſuance of the ſame traiterous deſign, 'he has called unto him ſeveral Prieſts and Jeſuits, 'whom he knew to be ſuperiors of orders here in 'England, and deſired them to write to their Generals at Rome, to give their help for the obtaining 'from the Pope the Cardinal's cap for the Lord 'Aubigny, as aforeſaid, promiſing great favour to 'Papiſts here, in caſe it ſhould be effected for him.

'That he hath promiſed to ſeveral Papiſts he would 'do his endeavour, and ſaid he hoped to compaſs the 'taking away all penal laws againſt them, which he 'did in purſuance of the traiterous deſign aforeſaid; 'to the end they may preſume and grow vain upon 'his patronage, and, by their publiſhing their hopes 'of a toleration, increaſed the ſcandal endeavoured by 'him, and by his emiſſaries, to be raiſed upon his 'Majeſty throughout the kingdom.

'That,

When the articles had been read, it was ordered by the Lords, that they ſhould be delivered to the Lord Chief Juſtice, who, with all the reſt of the Judges, was to conſider whether the charge had been brought in regularly and legally; whether it might be proceeded in; and whether there was any treaſon in it or not. Sir Robert Forſter, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, having on the thirteenth reported the opinion of the Judges, it was the ſame day reſolved by the Lords, agreeably to that opinion, "Firſt, That a charge of high-treaſon cannot, by the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, "be originally exhibited by one Peer againſt another, unto the Houſe of Peers. "Secondly, That in theſe articles, if the matters alledged in them were admitted to be "true, there is no treaſon in them." It is remarkable that the Earl of Briſtol himſelf concurred in theſe reſolutions as freely as any other; and therefore it was by order entered that the votes were nemine contradicente (t). Such, however, was his averſion to the Earl of Clarendon, that he preferred, a ſecond time, his charge againſt him, but with no better ſucceſs than before. The Houſe of Lords immediately diſmiſſed the accuſation, as having no other ground than the ſpleen of an enraged and diſappointed enemy (u). Charles the Second was ſo much diſpleaſed with the Earl of Briſtol's conduct in the whole of the affair, that he gave warrants to a Serjeant at Arms to apprehend him; on which account he concealed himſelf in ſeveral places for the ſpace of nearly two years. During this interval, he ſometimes ſent letters and petitions by his wife to the King, who would not receive them. But, at length, through the influence of the favourite Lady (afterwards Ducheſs of Cleveland) and Lord Arlington, his Majeſty was prevailed with to ſee him in private; though ſtill he would not admit him to come openly to Court, or repeal the warrants for his apprehenſion. Accordingly, the Earl was obliged to abſtain from appearing in public till the time of the Chancellor's diſgrace; and then he came both to the Court and to the Parliament in great triumph, and diſplayed a higher degree of malevolence to the degraded ſtateſman than might have been expected from the ſtrength of his underſtanding, and the natural generoſity of his temper (w).

We hear little more of the Earl of Briſtol till the beginning of the year 1673, when he exhibited the laſt inſtance which we find upon record of the ſignal eccentricity of his

'That, in purſuance of the ſame traiterous deſign, 'being entruſted with the treaty betwixt his Majeſty, 'and his Royal Conſort the Queen, he concluded it 'upon articles ſcandalous and dangerous to the Pro-'teſtant religion.

'That, in purſuance of the ſame traiterous deſign, 'he concluded the ſame marriage, and brought the 'King and Queen together, without any ſettled agree-'ment in what manner the rites of marriage ſhould be 'performed, whereby the Queen refuſing to be married 'by a Proteſtant prieſt, in caſe of her being with 'child, either the ſucceſſion ſhould be made uncertain 'for want of the due rights of matrimony, or elſe his 'Majeſty to be expoſed to a ſuſpicion of having been 'married in his own dominions by a Romiſh prieſt, 'whereby all the former ſcandals endeavoured to be 'raiſed upon his Majeſty by the ſaid Earl, as to point 'of Popery, might be confirmed and heightened.

'That, having thus traiterouſly endeavoured to 'alienate the affections of his Majeſty's ſubjects from 'him upon the ſcore of religion, he hath endeavoured 'to make uſe of all the malicious ſcandals and jea-'louſies, which he and his emiſſaries had raiſed in his 'Majeſty's ſubjects, to raiſe from them unto himſelf 'the popular applauſe of being the zealous upholder 'of the Proteſtant religion, and a promoter of new 'ſeverities againſt Papiſts.

'That he hath traiterouſly endeavoured to alienate 'the affections of his Majeſty's ſubjects from him, by 'venting in his own diſcourſe, and by the ſpeeches of 'his neareſt relations and emiſſaries, opprobrious 'ſcandals againſt his Majeſty's perſon and courſe of 'life, ſuch as are not fit to be mentioned, unleſs 'neceſſity in the way of proof ſhall require it.

'That he hath traiterouſly endeavoured to alienate 'the affections of his Highneſs the Duke of York 'from his Majeſty, by ſuggeſting unto him jealouſies 'as far as in him lay, and publiſhing abroad by his 'emiſſaries, that his Majeſty intended to legitimate 'the Duke of Monmouth.

'That he hath wickedly and maliciouſly, contrary 'to the duty of a Privy Counſellor of England, and 'contrary to the perpetual and moſt important intereſt 'of this nation, perſuaded his Majeſty, againſt the 'advice of the Lord General, to withdraw the Engliſh 'garriſons out of Scotland, and to demoliſh all the 'forts built there at ſo vaſt a charge to this kingdom.

'That his Majeſty having been graciouſly pleaſed 'to communicate the deſires of the Parliament of 'Scotland, for the removal of the ſaid garriſon to the 'Parliament of England, and to aſk their advice 'therein, the ſaid Earl of Clarendon, not only per-'ſuaded his Majeſty actually to remove thoſe garriſons, 'without expecting the advice of his Parliament of 'England concerning it, but did, by menaces of his 'Majeſty's diſpleaſure, deter ſeveral Members of Par-'liament from moving the Houſe, as they intended, 'to enter upon conſideration of that matter.

'That he had traiterouſly and maliciouſly endea-'voured to alienate his Majeſty's affections and eſteem 'from his Parliament, by telling his Majeſty that there 'was never ſo weak and inconſiderable a Houſe of Lords, 'nor never ſo weak and ſo heady a Houſe of Commons, 'or words to that effect; and particularly, that it 'was better to ſell Dunkirk, than to be at their mercy 'for want of money, or words to that effect.

'That he hath wickedly and maliciouſly, contrary to 'his duty of Chancellor, and to a known law made laſt 'ſeſſions, by which money was given, and particularly 'applied, for the maintaining of Dunkirk, adviſed 'and effected the ſale of the ſame to the French King.

'That he hath, contrary to law, enriched himſelf 'and his treaſures by the ſale of offices.

'That, contrary to his duty, he hath wickedly and 'corruptly converted to his own uſe, great and vaſt 'ſums of public money raiſed in Ireland by way of 'ſubſidy, private and public benevolences, and other-'wiſe given and intended to defray the charge of 'government in that kingdom. By which means a 'ſupernumerary and diſaffected army hath been kept 'up there, for want of money to pay them off, 'occaſioned, it ſeems to be, becauſe of the late and 'preſent diſtempers of that kingdom.

'That, having arrogated to himſelf a ſupreme 'direction of all his Majeſty's affairs, he hath, with a 'malicious and corrupt intention, prevailed to have 'his Majeſty's cuſtoms farmed at a far lower rate than 'others do offer, and that by perſons with ſome of 'whom he goes a ſhare in that and other parts of 'money reſulting from his Majeſty's revenue.

character. This was occaſioned by the paſſing of the famous Teſt Act, which, from that time to the preſent, has been ſo much the object of diſcuſſion and debate, of applauſe and cenſure. Though he was a profeſſed Roman Catholick, and was willing to be thought of great conſequence among that body, he ſpoke in favour of the bill. Some account of what he ſaid upon the ſubject will be ſeen in the note (x) [G].

(x) Hiſt. and Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, Vol. I. p. 119—121.

The Earl of Briſtol departed this life on the twentieth of March, 1676-7, at Chelſea, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age, and was buried at that place. He married the Lady Anne Ruſſel, ſecond daughter of Francis Earl of Bedford, and had by her Ladyſhip, who ſurvived him nearly twenty years, two ſons and two daughters. John, his eldeſt ſon, the third Earl of Briſtol, and a Nobleman of very reſpectable character, died on the eighteenth of September, 1698, and was interred at Sherborne in Dorſetſhire, where a ſumptuous monument is erected to his memory. Dying without iſſue, the honours of the family ceaſed on his death. Colonel Francis Digby, the ſecond ſon, was killed in the great naval engagement with the Dutch, on the twenty-eighth of May, 1672. He died likewiſe without iſſue. Lady Diana, the eldeſt daughter, was married to the Baron of Moll, in Flanders (y). This was an unfortunate match. The young Lady had been brought up by her mother in the ſtricteſt principles of the Proteſtant religion; but her father, having ſent for her into the Low Countries, where ſhe was addreſſed by the Baron, had ſuch a high opinion of the advantages that would accrue from the alliance, that he perſuaded her to become a convert to Popery. As for the Baron of Moll, he was a very weak man, and, at the ſame time, had not one twelfth part of the eſtate which the Earl of Briſtol's ſanguine imagination had ſuggeſted (z). Lady Anne, the Earl's ſecond daughter, was married to Robert Earl of Sunderland, by which connection ſhe became an anceſtor of the preſent Houſe of Marlborough (a).

[H] Some account of what he ſaid upon the ſubject will be ſeen in the note.]

Towards the beginning of his ſpeech he declared himſelf a Catholick of the Church of Rome, not a Catholick of the Court of Rome; a diſtinction he thought worthy of memory and reflection, whenever any ſevere proceedings againſt thoſe they called Papiſts ſhould come in queſtion, ſince thoſe of the Court of Rome did only deſerve the name. Therefore he inſiſted, that they ſhould not ſpeak here as Roman Catholicks, but as faithful members of a Proteſtant Parliament.

Coming to the bill itſelf, he proceeded thus: 'In the firſt place, my Lords, I beſeech you to conſider, that this bill for ſecuring of general fears is brought up to you from the Houſe of Commons, the great repreſentative of the people, and conſequently the beſt judges of the true temper of the nation: a Houſe of Commons ſurpaſſing all that ever have been, in the illuſtrious marks of their duty, loyalty and affection to their Sovereign, both in his perſon and government: ſuch a Houſe of Commons as his Majeſty ought to conſider, and cheriſh always, with ſuch a kind love as is due to a wife, never to be parted with unkindly, and as a miſtreſs to be turned off when our turn is ſerved by her. My Lords, this caſual mention of a wife ſuggeſts to my thoughts a purſuance of the compariſon. I have obſerved in the courſe of my life, that men, who have wives ſomewhat coquet, that is, a little ſubject to gallantries, live eaſier lives with them, and freer from troubleſome contentions, than thoſe who have wives of exact rigid virtue; and the reaſon is clear: for the more gameſome ladies, being conſcious of their failings in that eſſential part, are careful to diſguiſe and repair them by kind and tender compliances with their huſband's humours in all other things; whereas wives ſeverely punctual and exact in the chief matrimonial duty, expect, and even exact, far greater compliances from their huſbands; and think themſelves as it were privileged, by the rigidneſs of their virtue, to be ſometimes troubleſome in domeſtic affairs, eſpecially if there be any jealouſy in the caſe. In like manner, my Lords, it is not to be much wondered at, if this incomparable Houſe of Commons, tranſcending all that ever were in the grand eſſentials of duty, loyalty, and affection to their King, ſhould, at ſome times, be a little troubleſome to him in leſſer occurrences; eſpecially when once fears and jealouſies are on the wing. My Lords, I ſhall not pretend to determine whether there have been any juſt grounds given by any violent men, or by the unreaſonable ambition of any Roman Catholicks, for ſuch fears and jealouſies: it ſuffices to exact the neceſſity of a timely remedy, ſince they have indeed moſt violently ſeized, and diſtempered the minds of the major part of his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects, which certainly no man converſant in the world can deny. Now, my Lords, in popular fears and apprehenſions, thoſe uſually prove moſt dangerous, that are raiſed upon grounds not well underſtood; and may rightly be reſembled to the fatal effects of panic fears in armies, where I have ſeldom ſeen great diſorders ariſe from intelligences brought in by parties and ſcouts, or by advertiſements to Generals, but from alarms upon groundleſs and capricious fears of danger, taken up we know not either how, or why. This no man, of moderate experience in military affairs, but hath found the dangerous effects of one time or other: in giving a ſtop to which miſchiefs, the ſkill of great commanders is beſt ſeen. In like manner, my Lords, this great and judicious aſſembly of the Houſe of Commons, rightly ſenſible of the dangerous effects which ſo general a diſturbance of men's minds in the concernments of religion (how groundleſs ſoever) might produce, have applied their care to obviate them by this bill; a bill, in my opinion, as full of moderation towards Catholicks, as of prudence and ſecurity towards the religion of the State. In this bill, my Lords, notwithſtanding all the alarms of the increaſe of Popery and deſigns of Papiſts, here is no mention of barring them from a private and modeſt exerciſe of their religion; no baniſhing them to ſuch a diſtance from Court; no putting in execution of penal laws in force againſt them. All their precautions are reduced to this one intent, natural to all ſocieties of men, of hindering a leſſer, oppoſite party from growing too ſtrong for the greater and more conſiderable one: and in this juſt way of prevention, is not the moderation of the Houſe of Commons to be admired, that they have reſtrained it to this ſole point, of debarring their adverſaries from offices and places, from acceſſion of wealth by favour of the ſovereign? And, after all, my Lords, how few do theſe ſharp trails, and teſt of this act regard! Only a few ſuch Roman Catholicks as would fain hold offices and places at the price of hypocriſy, and diſſimulation of their true ſentiments in religion. My Lords, however the ſentiments of a Catholick of the Church of Rome (I ſtill ſay not of the Court of Rome) may oblige me, upon ſcruple of conſcience, in ſome particulars of this bill, to give my negative to it, when it comes to paſſing; yet, as a member of the Proteſtant Parliament, my advice prudentially cannot but go along with the main ſcope of it, the preſent circumſtances of time and affairs conſidered, and the neceſſity of compoſing the diſturbed minds of the people (7).'

Lord Briſtol ranks among our noble authors. To this character he is juſtly entitled from his numerous ſpeeches and letters, which are ſcattered through various collections, and many of which were ſeparately printed. He was the author, likewiſe, of ſome other publications. Of the letters which paſſed between him and Sir Kenelme Digby, on the ſubject of religion, an account is given in the note [D] of the article concerning that gentleman. The Earl tranſlated from the French into Engliſh the three firſt books of the famous romance, "Caſſandra;" and he was the writer of a Comedy, called "Elvira, "or the worſt not always true," which occaſioned his being introduced into Sir John Suckling's Seſſion of Poets. Of this play we are told, that the ſcene lies in Valencia; that the plot is very intricate and buſy; and that from ſome part of it Mrs. Centlivre ſeems to have borrowed "The Wonder; or, A Woman keeps a Secret." Another publication, aſcribed to the Earl of Briſtol, but not certainly known to be written by him, was, "A True and Impartial Relation of the Battle between his Majeſty's Army "and that of the Rebels, near Ayleſbury, Bucks, September the twentieth, 1643." The following piece, though probably not of his writing, was publiſhed under his name, in 1655; "Lord Digby's Arcana Aulica; or, Walſingham's Manual of Prudential "Maxims for the Stateſman and the Courtier." His Lordſhip left in manuſcript, "Excerpta e diverſis Operibus Patrum Latinorum (b)."

On the character of the Earl of Briſtol it is not neceſſary farther to enlarge, ſince the whole article contains a diſplay of the extraordinary turn of his mind. One thing, however, it is proper to obſerve, which is, that, amidſt his numerous faults, he was diſtinguiſhed by a ſoftneſs and tenderneſs of diſpoſition that reſtrained him from unkind and ill-natured actions. When he had been treated with the greateſt harſhneſs, and had experienced the higheſt degrees of hoſtility, he was always readily inclined to forgiveneſs and reconciliation (c).'

(c) Clarendon State Papers, Vol. III. Suppl. p. lxxiii.

Upon the whole, the Earl of Briſtol hath afforded a ſtriking proof, that the brighteſt genius, the moſt ſplendid talents, the moſt extenſive knowledge, and the richeſt eloquence, are of little advantage to the poſſeſſor, and of little benefit to the world, unleſs they be accompanied with ſteadineſs of principle, and ſteadineſs of conduct.]

DIGGES (LEONARD) Eſq. a conſiderable Mathematician in the XVIth century, was the ſecond ſon of James Digges, of Digges-Court in the pariſh of Berham in Kent, Eſq. [A] by Philippa his ſecond wife, daughter of John Engham, of Chartham in the ſame county. He was born at Digges-Court, and educated for ſome time in Univerſity-College in Oxford, where he laid a very good foundation of learning. Retiring from thence without a degree, he proſecuted his ſtudies, and became an excellent Mathematician, a ſkilful Architect (a), and a moſt expert Surveyor of land. He compoſed ſeveral books [B], and died about the year 1574 (b). By his wife Bridget, daughter of Thomas Wilford, Eſq. (c) and ſiſter to James and Thomas Wilford, two brave Knights, of Hartridge, in the pariſh of Cranbrook in Kent, he had a ſon, of whom we ſhall give ſome account in the next article.

[A] Was the ſecond ſon of James Digges of Digges-Court in the pariſh of Berham in Kent, Eſq.] That family was ancient and conſiderable, in the county of Kent. One of them, in the reign of King Richard I. had the aldermanry of Newingate in Canterbury, which was then an hereditary office. John Digges, Alderman of the ſame city, in 1258, was a great benefactor to the Franciſcans, then newly ſettled at Canterbury; and bought for them an iſland in that city called Binnewight. Adomarus Digges, of Digges-Court, was a Judge in King Edward IId's reign, and had much land about Rainham and Newington, where a marſh ſtill bears his name, being called Digges's Marſh. Roger Digges was one of the repreſentatives in Parliament for the city of Canterbury, in the 29th, 31ſt, and 34th years of the reign of King Edward III. John Digges, of Digges Court, was Sheriff of Kent in the 2d year of King Henry IV. and his grandſon John, in the 4th year of King Edward IV. and his ſon of the ſame name in the 11th year of King Henry VII. and his ſon James bore the ſame office in the 2d year of King Henry VIII. DIGGES (THOMAS), after a liberal education even from his tendereſt years, went and ſtudied for ſome time at Oxford; and by the improvements he made there, and the ſubſequent inſtructions of his learned father (a), became one of the moſt excellent Mathematicians of his time; upon which account he was greatly eſteemed by Dr. John Dee, and other his learned contemporaries. When Queen Elizabeth ſent ſome of her forces to the aſſiſtance of the oppreſſed inhabitants of the Netherlands, Mr. Digges was appointed Muſter-Maſter-General of them (b); whereby he had an opportunity of becoming perfectly ſkilled in military affairs. He wrote and publiſhed ſeveral books [A]. But his moſt valuable character is, that his piety was as great as his learning. He died Auguſt 24, 1595, and was buried in the Church of St. Mary Aldermanbury, London (c); where a monument was erected to him [B]. If he was great in himſelf, he was greater in his ſon, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the enſuing article.

DIGGES (DUDLEY), the eldeſt ſon of Thomas mentioned in the laſt article, was born in the year 1583 (a), and entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Univerſity-College, Oxon. in 1598; where he very much improved himſelf in learning, under the tuition of Dr. George Abbot, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury (b). Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, on the firſt of July, 1601 (c), he went and ſtudied for ſome time at the Inns of Court; and then traveled beyond ſea, having before received the honour of knighthood. After much experience, and proper remarks on the laws, cuſtoms, and manners, of foreign nations, he returned home, excellently well qualified to ſerve his King and Country (d). But obſerving too many to juſtle for place, and croſs the public intereſt, if not joined with their own private gain; he was ſatisfied with the conſciouſneſs of his own merit, knowing good men only can deſerve honours, though the worſe might attain them. His moderate deſires, therefore, confined a long while his thoughts to the innocence of a retired life (e), till the year 1618, when he was ſent by King James I. Embaſſador to the Czar, or Emperor of Ruſſia. In 1620, he was commiſſioned, with Sir

Sir Maurice Abbot, to go to Holland, in order to obtain the reſtitution of goods taken by the Dutch, from ſome Engliſhmen in the Eaſt-Indies [A]. He departed in November (f), but how long he ſtayed there doth not appear. He was a Member of the third Parliament of King James I. which met at Weſtminſter, January 30, 1620-1; and was ſo little compliant with the Court-meaſures, as to be among thoſe whom the King called Ill-tempered Spirits. And, therefore, ſoon after the diſſolution of that Parliament, he was, for a puniſhment, ſent into Ireland, upon a forced commiſſion with others under the Great Seal, for the enquiry of ſundry matters concerning his Majeſty's pretended ſervice (g). He was likewiſe a Member of the firſt Parliament of King Charles I. in 1626; and joined thoſe eminent patriots, who were for bringing George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, the King's great favourite and Prime Miniſter, to an account: and ſo earneſt did he prove in that affair, that he was one of the eight chief managers who carried up, on the 8th of May, a charge againſt him [B] to the Houſe of Lords (h); for which he was committed to the Tower (i). But ſo highly offended were the Commons at his impriſonment, that they reſolved to proceed to no other buſineſs till they were righted in their liberties (k). Whereupon one of the Courtiers, to excuſe that irregular ſtep, ſaid, That his Majeſty conceived, Sir Dudley went too far beyond his commiſſion, in that, ſpeaking of King James the Firſt's death, and the plaiſter applied to him by the Duke of Buckingham, he had ſaid, That he did forbear to ſpeak further in regard of the King's honour, or words to that effect; which his Majeſty conceived to be to his diſhonour, as if there had been any underhand dealing by him in applying of the plaiſter; and that might make his ſubjects jealous of him. Theſe words, laid to Sir Dudley's charge, occaſioned an uncommon proteſtation from the Commons [C], which was alſo taken by thirty-ſix of the Lords. And Sir Dudley being releaſed ſoon after, proteſted, That the matter charged upon him was far from his words, and never came into his thoughts (l). He was again Member of the third Parliament of King Charles I. which met at Weſtminſter the 17th of March, 1627-8, being one of the Knights of the Shire for Kent (m), but ſeemed to be more moderate than he had been in the two laſt. For, when Secretary Coke moved for the diſpatch of the ſubſidies (n), he was ſeconded by Sir Dudley [D]. However,

[A] In the Eaſt-Indies.] For the Dutch were then beginning to uſe, in the Eaſt-Indies, thoſe wicked and ſupplanting arts againſt the Engliſh (the deliverers of their country, and the founders of their liberties) which ended in the tragical affair at Amboyna; of which an account was publiſhed in 1624, 4to.

[B] Who carried up a charge againſt him.] It was opened by Sir Dudley himſelf, who, in his Prologue, uſed theſe words (1): 'The Houſe of Commons, by 'a fatal and univerſal concurrence of complaints from 'all the ſea-bordering parts of this kingdom, did find 'a great and grievous interruption and ſtop of trade 'and traffick; the baſe pirates of Salle ignominiouſly 'infeſting our coaſts, taking our ſhips and goods, and 'leading away the ſubjects of this kingdom into barbarous captivity; while, to our ſhame and hindrance 'of commerce, our enemies did (as it were) beſiege 'our ports, and block up our beſt rivers mouths. 'Our friends, on ſlight pretences, made imbargoes of 'our Merchants goods, and every nation, upon the 'leaſt occaſion, was ready to contemn and ſlight us; 'ſo great was the apparent diminution of the antient 'honour of this crown, and once ſtrong reputation of 'our nation. Wherewith the Commons were more 'troubled, calling to remembrance, how formerly in 'France, in Spain, in Holland, and every where, by 'ſea and land, the valors of this kingdom had been 'better valued.—The Commons therefore wondering 'at the evils which they ſuffered, and debating of 'the cauſes of them, found they were many, drawn, 'like one line, to one circumference, of decay of trade, 'and ſtrength of honour, and reputation in this kingdom; which, as in one center, met in one great 'man, the cauſe of all who I am here to name, the 'Duke of Buckingham.'——Then, after having read the preamble to the charge, he continued his ſpeech, in which he hath this paſſage.——'The laſt of the 'charges which are prepared, will be an injury offered to the perſon of the late King of bleſſed memory, who is with God; of which, as your Lordſhips may have heard heretofore, you ſhall anon have 'further information. Now upon this occaſion, I am 'commanded by the Commons to take care of the 'honour of the King our Sovereign that lives—and alſo his bleſſed father, who is dead; on whom, to the grief of the Commons, and their great diſtaſte, the Lord Duke did (they conceive) unworthily caſt 'ſome ill odor of his own foul wayes; whereas ſervants 'were antiently wont to bear, as in truth they ought, 'their Maſter's faults, and not caſt their own on them 'undeſervedly.'——Theſe words I have taken notice of, becauſe they were miſunderſtood and miſapplied, as will be ſeen under note [C], and above in the text of this article.

(1) Ruſhworth, ubi ſupra. p. 302. &c.

[C] Occaſioned an uncommon Proteſtation from the Commons.] Being as follows: 'I proteſt before Almighty God, and this Houſe of Parliament, That I 'never gave conſent that Sir Dudley Digges ſhould 'ſpeak theſe words that he is now charged withal, or 'any words to that effect; and I have not affirmed to 'any, that he did ſpeak ſuch words, or any to that 'effect.' This was taken by every member in particular for himſelf; and it was ordered, That they that were ſick in town, ſhould have three of the Houſe ſent to them, to take the ſame proteſtation. The King, to pacify the Commons, ſignified to them by the Vice-Chamberlain, That he underſtood, out of ſome notes taken at the Conference (2), that Sir Dudley Digges had ſpoken the words wherewith he was charged; but, now, was ſatisfied that he did not ſpeak them, nor any words to ſuch effect. Nevertheleſs, the Duke of Buckingham affirmed to the Houſe of Peers, that ſome words were ſpoken at the late Conference by Sir Dudley Digges, which ſo far did trench upon the King's honour, that they were interpreted treaſonable: he therefore earneſtly deſired, ſince divers conſtructions had been made of thoſe words, that every one of thoſe who had reported them, would be pleaſed to produce their notes taken at the Conference. But after a long debate upon that matter in the Houſe of Peers, thirty-ſix of them made this voluntary proteſtation, 'That the ſaid Sir Dudley Digges did not ſpeak any thing at the ſaid Conference, which did or might trench on the King's honour (3). It followed therefore, as Mr. Rapin obſerves (4), from the teſtimony of the Lords, and the proteſtation of the Commons, either that the King was wrong and maliciouſly informed, or that he wanted and ſought an opportunity of puniſhing Sir Dudley Digges, for having ſpoken ſo irreverently of the Duke as he did. For which purpoſe the words abovementioned were invented.

However, his ſpirits were rouzed, when any attempts were made upon the liberties of his country, or the conſtitution of Parliament [E]. For, on the 14th of April, he opened the grand conference between the Lords and Commons, 'concerning the liberty of the perſon of every Freeman,' with a ſpeech, wherein he made many excellent obſervations [F], tending to eſtabliſh the liberties of the ſubject (o). In all theſe affairs he ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his parts and abilities, that he was much taken notice of by the Court; being, in conſequence of that, one of thoſe eminent patriots whom they thought worth while to gain to their ſide (p). Accordingly, they tempted him with the honourable and advantageous office of Maſter of the Rolls, of which he had a reverſionary grant the 29th of November, 1630 (q), and became poſſeſſed of it the 20th of April, 1636 [G], upon the death of Sir Julius Cæſar (*). But he did not enjoy it quite three years; for he died the 18th of March, 1638-9, which the wiſeſt men reckoned among the public calamities of thoſe times (r). After having lain ſome time in ſtate, he was buried in Chilham-Church, in Kent, in which pariſh he had a good eſtate (s), and built a noble ſeat (t). A monument was afterwards erected in that Church, in memory of him and his lady, and others of that eminent family; with an inſcription, of which the ſubſtance is included in this article (u). His Lady was Mary, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir Thomas Kemp, of Chilham aforeſaid; with whom he had part of the eſtate there, and purchaſed the reſt of the three other daughters and coheirs (w). As to his character, his actions, related above, ſhow that he was (as one (x) expreſſes it) 'a great aſſertor of his coun-' try's liberty in the worſt of times, when the ſluices of prerogative were opened, and the ' banks of the law were almoſt overwhelmed with the inundations of it.' Beſides this, we are informed, that his underſtanding few could equal, and his virtues fewer would. He was a pious man, a careful father, a loving huſband, a fatherly brother, a courteous neighbour, a merciful landlord, a liberal maſter, and a noble friend (y). He was author of a few things [H]. As hereditary learning ſeemed to run in the veins of that family

[E] However his ſpirits were rouzed, when any attempts were made upon the liberties of his country, &c.] For when Sir John Finch, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, interrupted Sir John Elliot in the Houſe, telling him, 'There is a command laid upon me, that ' I muſt command you not to proceed;' Sir Dudley Digges vented his great uneaſineſs in theſe words: 'I ' am as much grieved as ever. Muſt we not proceed? ' let us ſit in ſilence, we are miſerable, we know not ' what to do.' This was on the 5th of June 1628.

[F] With a ſpeech wherein he made many excellent obſervations.] Among other things, he ſays—— ' I am firſt commanded to ſhow unto your Lordſhips in ' general, that the laws of England are grounded on ' reaſon, ancienter than books, conſiſting much in un-' written cuſtoms; yet ſo full of juſtice and true equity, ' that your moſt honourable predeceſſors and anceſtors, ' many times propugned them with a nolumus mutare ' (i. e. we will not change them); and ſo ancient, ' that from the Saxons days, notwithſtanding the inju-' ries and ruins of time, they have continued in moſt ' parts the ſame; as may appear in old remaining ' monuments of the laws of Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian ' King of Kent, Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, Offa ' of the Mercians, &c. whoſe laws are yet to be ſeen, ' publiſhed (as ſome think) by Parliament.— ' And though, during the troubleſome times of the ' Danes, the laws in a manner were laid aſleep in the ' kingdom; yet, by the bleſſing of God, good King ' Edward, commonly called St. Edward, did awaken ' theſe laws, —— and confirmed them (7), con-' firmavit: which confirmavit ſheweth, that good King ' Edward did not give thoſe laws, which William the ' Conqueror, and all his ſucceſſors ſithence that, have ' ſworn unto.——And, as we have now, even in ' thoſe Saxon times they had their Courts Barons, and ' Courts Leets, and Sheriffs Courts, by which (as Ta-' citus ſaith of the Germans) their anceſtors Jura red-' debant per pagos & vicos: i. e. adminiſtered juſtice in ' the burghs and villages. [G] And became poſſeſſed of it the 20th of April, 1636.] The author of his epitaph obſerves upon that occaſion, that 'This did crown his former actions; ' and though it would not increaſe his integrity, yet it ' made him more conſpicuous; and whom his acquain-' tance before, now the kingdom, honoured. If the ' example of his juſtice had powerful influence on all ' Magiſtrates, the people who are governed would be ' happy on earth, and the rulers in Heaven, with him, ' who counted it an unworthy thing to be tempted to ' vice by the reward of virtue.' What is ſaid in the ſame place is not literally true; namely; that he was ' unbiaſſed by popular applauſe, or court-hopes.' For, if he was unbiaſſed by court-hopes, why did he accept of the place of Maſter of the Rolls?

[H] He was author of a few things.] The only thing he publiſhed was this: I. A Defence of Trade: "in a Letter to Sir Tho. Smith, Knight, Governor of "the Eaſt India Company." London, 1615, 4*to*.  [The ſpeeches delivered by Sir Dudley Digges may be ſeen more at large in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, under the reſpective years to which they relate. But the extracts given in the notes [B], [C], [D] [E], and [F], are ſufficient to diſplay his general ſentiments, and the mode of language in which they were cloathed. There is one inſtance of his having ſpoken as a member of Parliament which is not taken notice of by our predeceſſor. It was on the twenty-ſecond of April, 1628, at a conference between the Houſe of Lords and the Houſe of Commons, on the liberty of the ſubject. At this conference Sir Dudley Digges replied to a Speech that had been made by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. George Abbot. Both the ſpeeches are animated by a ſpirit of moderation and candour (18).

From all that we read concerning Sir Dudley Digges, he appears to have been a firm, but temperate, oppoſer of the ſtretches of prerogative, by which the reign of King Charles the Firſt was ſo unhappily diſtinguiſhed.]

 [DILLENIUS (JOHN-JAMES), an eminent Botaniſt, who ſettled in England, was born at Darmſtadt, in Germany, in the year 1687. He was early intended for the ſtudy of phyſic, and had the principal part of his education at the Univerſity of Gieſſen, a city of Upper Heſſe. To this ſeminary he was probably led by family connections; for at that place two perſons of the ſame name then reſided; one of whom was a profeſſor of medicine, and Dean of the faculty of phyſic; and the other, poliater, or public phyſician, an office which is ſaid not to be uncommon in Germany, though it is wholly unknown in our own country. The ſame office was afterwards held in Gieſſen by Dillenius himſelf (a). Of all the parts of ſcience connected with the medical profeſſion, he was moſt attached to the cultivation of Botany; and in this reſpect he ſoon obtained ſo much reputation, that, early in life, he was choſen a member of the " Academia Curioſorum Germaniæ." How well he deſerved the honour conferred upon him, was apparent in the papers which he communicated to that learned body, and which were publiſhed in their " Miſcellanea Curioſa." The firſt of his communications that we are acquainted with, and which could not have been written later than in the year 1715, was a Diſſertation concerning the plants of America that are naturalized in Europe. It is in the " Third Century of Obſervations," publiſhed by the Society juſt mentioned. The ſubject is curious, and is ſtill capable of much farther illuſtration. A diligent enquiry into it would unqueſtionably prove, that a far greater number of plants than is uſually imagined, and which are now thought to be indigenous in Europe, were of foreign origin. Beſides the moſt obvious increaſe of them, owing to their paſſage from the garden to the dunghill, and thence to the field, they have been augmented in conſequence of various other cauſes. No ſmall number of them have been introduced and diſperſed by the importation of grain, the package of merchandiſe, and the clearing out of ſhips. The Engliſh Flora of this kind, in its preſent ſtate, cannot, perhaps, contain fewer than ſixty acknowledged ſpecies; and a critical examination would probably add greatly to the catalogue (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 155, 156.

Another paper of Dillenius's, publiſhed in the " Fourth Century" of the " Miſcellanea " Curioſa," was a critical Diſſertation on the Coffee of the Arabians, and on European Coffee, or ſuch as may be prepared from grain or pulſe. In this diſſertation he gives the reſult of his own preparations made with peaſe, beans, and kidney-beans; but ſays, that from rye is produced what comes the neareſt to true Coffee. In the " Sixth Century of Obſervations," our author deſcribed and figured four ſpecies of dubious plants; three of the Spergula genus, now Arenariæ; and a Veronica; and in the Appendix to the ſame " Century," he gave the firſt ſpecimen of his accurate examination of ſome plants of the Cryptogamous claſs; which he afterwards purſued ſo greatly to the improvement of Botany [A]. Dillenius, in the "Ninth Century" of the "Miſcellanea Curioſa," relates an experiment which he made concerning ſome opium which he had prepared himſelf, from the poppy of European growth. In the preceding number of the ſame collection, he had figured as a Zoologiſt, in a paper on Leeches; and in a deſcription of two ſpecies of the Papilio genus (c).

(c) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p. 157, 158.

Dillenius, in 1719, excited the notice of naturaliſts by the publication of a ſeparate work; which was his "Catalogue of Plants growing in the Neighbourhood of Gieſſen." This production eſtabliſhed his character as one of the moſt accurate botaniſts of the age. It was entituled as follows: "Jo. Jac. DILLENII, M. L. Ac. Nat. Cur. Coll. "Catalogus Plantarum ſponte circa Giſſam naſcentium, cum Appendice, qua, Plantæ poſt editum Catalogum circa et extra Giſſam obſervatæ recenſentur, Specierum novarum vel dubiarum Deſcriptiones traduntur, et Genera Plantarum nova Figuris Æneis illuſtrata, deſcribuntur; pro ſupplendis Inſtitutionibus Rei Herbariæ Joſephi Pitton Tournefortii." Frank. ad Mæn. 1719. 8vo. Cum Tab. xvi. Cat. p. 240. App. p. 174. "Cui ſubjicitur Examen Reſponſionis Aug. Quir. RIVINI." This performance is dedicated to the heads of the Univerſity of Gieſſen; and contains the plants of the neighbourhood, confined to a circuit of not more than a German mile and a half. A map of this tract of country is given in the book. To the whole is prefixed "A Critical Examination "of the Method of arranging Plants," publiſhed by Ray and Knaut, who had founded their claſſical diſtinctions on the fruit; and of thoſe publiſhed by Rivinus and Tournefort, founded on the flower. After a diligent inveſtigation into the merit of each of theſe ſyſtems, Dillenius gave the preference to that of Ray, and adhered to it throughout his life. His animadverſions on Rivinus excited the reſentment of that author, which was followed by a vindication of his own ſyſtem. Dillenius had not treated Rivinus with the reſpect due to his age; but had indulged himſelf in a ſtyle that was juſtly reprehenſible. The only apology that can be made for him, and that not a ſufficient one, is the warmth natural to a young writer. However, it has been generally acknowledged that he had the advantage in the argument. Nothing can more ſtrongly diſplay the early ſkill and indefatigable induſtry of Dillenius, than his being able to produce ſo great a number of plants in ſo ſmall a tract. Not fewer than nine hundred and eighty ſpecies are enumerated by him, of what were then called the more perfect plants; that is, excluſively of the muſhroom claſs, and all the moſſes. Into the examination of this claſs Dillenius entered minutely; and by his diligence and diſcoveries, extended the bounds of that field, which had been ſo ſucceſsfully cultivated before him by the Engliſh botaniſts. More had been done in our own country in this way than in any other nation. So little had the muſci been regarded before, that the pinax of Caſpar Bauhine contains but fifty ſpecies. Ray's Synopſis, in its firſt edition, had not more than about eighty kinds; whereas by the inveſtigation of the Engliſh botaniſts, particularly of Doody, Sherard, Vernon, Llhwyd, Robinſon, Petiver, Robart, and others, this order was ſo far augmented in the ſecond edition of the ſame work, in 1696, as to comprehend upwards of an hundred and ſeventy ſpecies. Dillenius, however, was the firſt writer who examined them with a view to generical characters, and divided the moſſes and muſhrooms each into ſeparate genera. It is in his Gieſſen Catalogue that Bryum, Hypnum, Mnium, Sphagnum, Lichenoides, and Lichenaſtrum, are firſt met with as generical names. The four former of theſe were terms in uſe with the patres botanici; but they had been neglected by the reſtorers of the ſcience, who had ranked them all under the general term muſcus, the Lychen, Lycopodium, and Polytrichum, excepted. It is a ſtriking proof of Dillenius's accuracy and diligence that, in the environs of Gieſſen alone, he diſcovered more than two hundred ſpecies of moſſes, of which a hundred and forty were new. Of the muſhroom order he enumerates a hundred and ſixty; upwards of ninety of which he judged not to have been noticed by any author before. The plants in his catalogue are diſpoſed in the order of flowering throughout all the year; and the places of their growth are ſubjoined, with critical obſervations on many of the ſpecies. In the Appendix is contained a liſt of twenty plants, additional to thoſe of the Catalogue. Theſe were diſcovered in the immediate environs of Gieſſen; beſides which, there is an enumeration of upwards of a hundred ſpecies, obſerved by the author, beyond the bounds circumſcribed in the catalogue. This circumſtance renders the book, in a great meaſure, a

He deſcribes the flowers 'of that genus, which he afterwards called Lichenaſtrum, and which was named by Micheli Jungermannia. Flora

Flora of the plants of Heſſe. Then follows a deſcription of the new ſpecies of the Catalogue; which is ſucceeded by the eſtabliſhment of his new genera of moſſes, fungi, and a variety of others, amounting nearly to a hundred. Some of theſe had been noticed by former authors, and are here only amended: but the far greater part are of Dillenius's own conſtructing, and entirely new. The parts of fructification are ſeparately delineated, in ſixteen copper plates. This part of the work has been of great authority with ſucceeding writers; and many of the characters of the plants have ſtood the teſt of the Linnæan ſyſtem (d).

(d) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p. 158—162.

By the merit of this performance, the character of Dillenius, as a perfectly ſcientific botaniſt, was fixed; and henceforward he attracted the notice of all the eminent profeſſors and admirers of the ſcience. To this ſcience no one was more ardently devoted at that time in England, than William Sherard, Eſq. who had been Britiſh Conſul at Smyrna, from which place he had returned to his own country in 1718; and who, ſoon after, had the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws conferred upon him by the Univerſity of Oxford. Being particularly enamoured with Dillenius's diſcoveries in the Cryptogamia claſs, he entered into a correſpondence with him, which ripened into a cloſe friendſhip. In the year 1721, Dr. Sherard, in the purſuit of his Botanical reſearches, made the tour of Holland, France, and Italy, much to the advantage of the ſcience; but what, in an eſpecial manner, rendered his travels of conſequence to the ſtudy of nature in our own country was, that, on his return, he brought Dillenius with him to England. It was in the month of Auguſt, in the ſame year, that this event took place (e).

(e) Ibid. p. 146, 147.—162, 163.

Dillenius had not long reſided in England before he undertook a work that was much deſired; which was that of publiſhing a new edition of the Synopſis Stirpium Britannicarum of Ray. This very valuable performance had been laſt printed in 1696, and was become ſcarce. Dillenius was eminently qualified for the undertaking. He had firmly attached himſelf to Ray's ſyſtem, and even improved it in ſome parts: and he was furniſhed with ample means of enlarging the book, by his diſcovery of ſpecies of Cryptogamia, and by the eſtabliſhment of new genera: Beſides this, he was enabled, by the diſcoveries of many ingenious men, whoſe names are enumerated in the preface, greatly to enlarge Engliſh botany. He was, likewiſe, ſufficiently qualified, through the ſkill and aſſiſtance of Dr. Richardſon, and Mr. James Sherard (brother of William), to add the old Britiſh botany, if the expreſſion may be allowed, to the Engliſh. With all theſe advantages, the third edition of Ray's Synopſis appeared in 1724, much to the ſatisfaction of all the lovers of the ſcience throughout Europe. Twenty-four plates of rare plants were added to this edition; and the addition of new ſpecies was very great. Many valuable notes, and emendations in the genera might alſo be mentioned. The accumulation to this book from Dillenius's own diſcoveries, and from the communications of others, whoſe names are mentioned in the preface, amounted to nearly forty new fungi, as many marine plants, upwards of a hundred and fifty moſſes, and conſiderably above two hundred other plants, which had been diſcovered to be natives of Britain, ſince the publication of the ſecond edition. The whole number of Britiſh plants, as they ſtand in this book, are about two thouſand and two hundred. It is, however, here to be obſerved, that botaniſts had not at that time ſufficiently eſtabliſhed ſpecific diſtinctions; for this number, which could not bear the teſt of the Linnæan rules, has ſince been reduced to fewer than eighteen hundred (f). Dillenius's edition of the Synopſis ſeems to have been the moſt popular of all his publications. Such was the encouragement derived from the ſale of it, that, ſome time after its appearance, he was buſily engaged in collecting materials for a fourth edition. He had drawn moſt of the fungi deſcribed in the above work, and had made a large collection, with a view to the completion of his deſign. He had alſo drawn, though not finiſhed, moſt of the perfect plants (as they were then called) deſcribed in the third edition (g). Though he did not carry his purpoſe into execution, his labour was not ſpent in vain. His exertions on this occaſion were favourable to the grand ſcheme he ever had in view, of completing the Hiſtoria Muſcorum (h).

(f) Ibid. p. 163—165.

(g) From the information of Dr. Sibthorpe, communicated by Dr. Shaw.

(h) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p. 167.

During the former years of Dillenius's living in England, his time appears to have been divided between the Country reſidence of Mr. James Sherard, at Eltham, in Kent; the Conſul's houſe in town; and his own lodgings, which, in 1728, were in Barking Alley. In the year 1727, Dr. Threlkeld publiſhed his Synopſis Stirpium Hibernicarum; in the courſe of which work he introduced ſome ſevere ſtrictures on Dillenius. Theſe were principally leveled at the introduction of his new generical names; but, at the ſame time, great fault was found with him for unneceſſarily multiplying the ſpecies of plants. Though the attack was made in harſh and coarſe language, Dillenius had temper enough to abſtain from entering into any controverſy on the occaſion. He probably did not think that Threlkeld's objections were ſo forcible as to influence the opinions of men of judgment in the ſcience, as the Iriſh Botaniſt had but little regarded any true principles of generical diſtinction. In a letter which Dillenius wrote to a correſpondent, he informs him, that there was but one plant recited in Threlkeld's book which was not known before as a native of Ireland (i). At the latter end of the year 1727, Dillenius was ſo doubtful concerning what might be the ſtate of his future circumſtances, that he entertained a deſign of reſiding ſome time, if not finally ſettling, in Yorkſhire. In a letter which he wrote to a correſpondent of that County, he enquired about the price of boarding, and whether, if he ſhould reſolve to go and live in that country, he might expect any ſmall encouragement in buſineſs. This ſcheme did not take effect; and on the twelfth of Auguſt, 1728, Dr. William Sherard died, and, by his will, gave three thouſand pounds, to provide a ſalary for a profeſſor of botany at Oxford, on condition that Dillenius ſhould be choſen the firſt profeſſor. Before his deceaſe he had erected the edifice at the entrance of the garden, for the uſe of the profeſſor; and he bequeathed to the eſtabliſhment his botanical library, his Herbarium, and his Pinax. The Univerſity of Oxford having waved the right of nomination, in conſequence of Dr. Sherard's benefaction, Dillenius now arrived at that ſituation which had probably been the chief object of his wiſhes; and which he conſidered as the completion of his hopes, the aſylum againſt future diſappointments, and the field of all that gratification which his taſte and purſuits prompted him to deſire, and qualified him to enjoy. He was placed, likewiſe, in the ſociety of the learned, in the completeſt ſenſe of that word, and at the fountain of every information which the ſtores of both ancient and modern erudition could diſplay to an inquiſitive mind (k).

(i) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p. 165, 166.

One of the principal employments of Dr. William Sherard, was the carrying on a Pinax, or collection of all the names, which had been given by botanical writers to each plant. This was a continuation of Caſpar Bauhine's great plan; and Sherard, during his life, was much aſſiſted in it by Dillenius (l). After the death of Sherard, our profeſſor moſt zealouſly fulfilled the will of his benefactor, in the care he took of his collection, which he greatly augmented. But he was not a little chagrined from the want of books, and the means of purchaſing them. Without this aid, he could not complete, in the manner he wiſhed, the Pinax which Dr. Sherard had long laboured, and of which Boerhaave had given a very handſome teſtimony, in his Index of the Leyden Garden. Unfortunately for Dillenius, publications increaſed when the purſe of his friend was no longer opened, and he found few remaining ones to aſſiſt him (m).

(k) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p. 149, 167.

(m) From the information of Dr. Sibthorpe, communicated as before.

Another undertaking in which our author was engaged, was the Hortus Elthamenſis, being a deſcription of the plants contained in the garden of Mr. James Sherard (brother to William), who was firſt an apothecary, and afterwards created Doctor of Phyſic. This was one of the richeſt gardens that England had ever poſſeſſed; and the plan of deſcribing it had been laid ſo early as the year 1724. After Dillenius's ſettlement at Oxford, he proſecuted the deſign with vigour; and, in 1732, the work was printed, under the following title: "Hortus Elthamenſis, ſeu Plantarum rariorum quas, in Horto ſuo Elthami in Cantio "coluit vir ornatiſſimus et præſtantiſſimus Jacobus Sherard M.D. Soc. Reg. et Coll. Med. "Lond. Soc. Gulielmi P. M. Frater, Delineationes et Deſcriptiones, quarum Hiſtoria vel "planè non vel imperfectè a Rei herbariæ ſcriptoribus tradita fuit, Auctore Johanne Jacobo "DILLENIO, M.D." Lond. Fol. pp. 437. In this elegant and elaborate work, of which Linnæus ſays, eſt opus botanicum quo abſolutius mundus non vidit, four hundred and ſeventeen plants are deſcribed and figured with the moſt circumſtantial accuracy. They are all drawn and etched with Dillenius's own hand, and conſiſt principally of ſuch exotics as were then rare, or had but lately been introduced into England. They are diſpoſed in the alphabetical order, and a few of the more uncommon Engliſh and Welch plants are included. The figures are as much as poſſible of the natural ſize; and the better to aſcertain the ſpecies, the Synonoma of former authors are quoted and accompanied by a large number of critical examinations and obſervations. Several of the new Genera are eſtabliſhed; many of the new Gerania are figured; and a copious Hiſtory of the genus Meſembryanthemum is given; with a ſynoptical view of all the ſpecies, fifty-four of which are deſcribed in the performance (n). The ſale of this work did not by any means correſpond with its merit. So limited was the attention which was at that time paid to botanical objects, that the Hortus Elthamenſis had but few purchaſers. Dillenius cut a conſiderable number of copies, as papers to hold his Hortus ſiccus; and in deſpair of ſelling the remaining ones, through the recommendation of his friend Gronovius, he diſpoſed of them, together with the plates, to a Dutch Bookſeller, who broke; ſo that our author loſt the whole of the little profit which he expected to derive from the ſale (o). On the third of April, 1735, he was admitted to the degree of Doctor of Phyſic, in the Univerſity of Oxford. His former degree of the ſame kind had probably been taken at Gieſſen. In the Summer of 1736, he had the honour of receiving a viſit, at Oxford, from the celebrated Linnæus; and though he did not reliſh the Sexual ſyſtem, about that time firſt divulged, yet Linnæus returned with the higheſt opinion of his merit. He afterwards expreſſed himſelf concerning our profeſſor in theſe words: In Anglia nullus eſt qui genera curat vel intelligit præterquam DILLENIUS. From this period a correſpondence was carried on between Linnæus and our author. The Swediſh botaniſt ſent him his Flora Lapponica, and dedicated to him the Critica Botanica. On this occaſion Dillenius ſent his acknowledgments in the following terms: "Vidi, accepi, et legi floram tuam Lapponicam multa cum voluptate; utinam plures iſtiuſmodi nobis præſtarent, tali ſtudio et cura elaboratæ; in hac te virum præſtitiſti." Another perſon with whom our profeſſor correſponded, and whom he probably the more eſteemed, on account of the affinity of his ſyſtem with that of Ray, was Haller. It appears that Haller was conſidered by him as almoſt the only man qualified to carry on the Pinax; and he wiſhed him to have been his ſucceſſor. About this time, Dillenius was employed with Dr. Shaw, in reducing to order and aſcertaining that learned traveller's oriental plants. As they were all of them dried ſpecimens, and the collection extenſive, conſiſting of ſix hundred and forty ſpecies, it required the aid of an able hand to diſtinguiſh and apply ſynonyms to ſo conſiderable a number. The catalogue which is annexed, with the engraving of a few of the plants, to the firſt edition of Dr. Shaw's elaborate work, is indebted, for no ſmall degree of its merit, to the ſkill and diligence of our botanical profeſſor (p).

(p) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p 172—174.

After the publication of the Hortus Eltbamenſis, Dillenius purſued his "Hiſtory of "Moſſes," with great application; in the proſecution of which deſign he enjoyed every deſirable aſſiſtance. By means of the excellent botanical library of the Sherards, and free acceſs to their ample Herbarium, and that of Mr. Du Bois, who had, with Mr. Doody and ſeveral others, ſignalized themſelves by their diſcoveries in the moſs way ſome years before, he poſſeſſed advantages which perhaps no other ſituation could have afforded. Beſides this, to give himſelf all farther opportunities that Britain allowed of making diſcoveries in the particular object of his purſuit, he had taken a journey into Wales in the Summer of the year 1726, and was attended in his excurſion by an eminent lover of botany, Samuel Brewer. They examined Cader, Idris, and took up their reſidence at Bangor; from which they proceeded to ſearch Snowdon, Glyder, and the Iſle of Angleſey. They viſited likewiſe the Iſle of Man. Mr. Green, a Clergyman of Wales, was uſeful in directing their reſearches, and in aſſiſting Dillenius in the Welch names of places and of plants. The Rev. Littleton Brown, M. A. Fellow of the Royal Society, is alſo commemorated, as having communicated to our author many ſpecimens of the Cryptogamous tribe, which had been collected by him in Wales, Shropſhire, and Herefordſhire. Thus by the communication of theſe and many other friends, foreign as well as Britiſh, whoſe aid Dillenius had gratefully acknowledged, he was enabled to bring his work to that degree of perfection which would not have been practicable in various other ſituations. In 1741 it appeared from the Sheldon preſs, under the following title: "HISTORIA MUSCORUM, in qua circiter ſexcentæ ſpecies veteres et novæ, ad ſua Genera relatæ, deſcribuntur, et Iconibus genuinis illuſtrantur; cum Appendice, et Indice Synonymorum. Opera Jo. Jac. Dillenii, M. D. in Univerſitate Oxonienſi Botanices Profeſſoris SHERARDINI. 4to. 1741. p. 552. Tab. 85. (q). The figures were moſtly drawn, painted, and engraved, by Dillenius's own hand (r). In this work are comprehended all thoſe plants which come under the name of Muſci and Algæ, in the Cryptogamia claſs of the ſexual ſyſtem, excepting the Fucuſes, ſome of the Ulvæ, Confervæ, and a very few others. Our author's method, throughout the whole of his performance, is to give at the head of each genus the etymology of the name; his reaſons for adopting that name, and applying it to the ſubject: and then the definition of his genus, followed by the ſubordinate diſtinctions for the arrangement of the ſpecies. 'In treating on each ſpecies,' ſays Dr. Pulteney, 'he gives 1. A new ſpecific character, 'in terms intended to diſtinguiſh it from others of the ſame genus, or ſubdiviſion. 2. The 'deſcription of the ſame ſpecies at length; diſtinguiſhing alſo, with great care, the 'ſeveral varieties; and referring each to the ſeveral figures on his plates. 3. The 'general places of growth; and under the more rare ſpecies, the particular places where 'they have been found, or from whence he had received them: to theſe is ſubjoined 'the time when each is found in heads, or in its moſt flouriſhing ſtate. 4. The ſynonym 'of every author at length, diſpoſed in chronological order; noticing at the ſame time 'ſuch as are referable to varieties; and frequently ſubjoining a number of critical 'obſervations. 5. The uſes of particular kinds, whether in the general œconomy of 'nature, or in medicine, or the other arts and conveniences of life (s)." In the preface there is a ſummary view of the uſes of ſeveral kinds of moſſes; and in the body of the work Dillenius has collected, with great diligence, numerous authorities on theſe heads; by which it is evinced, that this almoſt unnoticed tribe of vegetables may lay claim to a more conſiderable importance in the ſcale of utility, than a ſuperficial view might ſuggeſt. Various proofs of the truth of the ſame obſervation occur in the writings of ſeveral modern botaniſts. When the minuteneſs of the objects of our author's inveſtigation, the accuracy of his deſcriptions, the critical examination and nice diſcrimination of each ſpecies, the labour and ſkill he has diſplayed in the ſelection of the phœnomena, and the diſpoſition of them into chronological order, which is a highly meritorious part of the plan, are taken into due conſideration, it muſt be acknowledged that "The Hiſtory of Moſſes" is a very extraordinary performance. Nor is the value of it leſſened, in any degree that deſerves to be mentioned, by recent diſcoveries. For notwithſtanding any ſubſequent improvement in the arrangement of ſpecies, or in the reduction of them, in conſequence of more perfect obſervations, or even in the microſcopial diſcoveries of Hedwig reſpecting the Genera, Dillenius's work muſt long be the baſis of knowledge in this part of nature, and muſt remain with poſterity as an almoſt unexampled inſtance of patience, ingenuity, and ſcience. It poſſeſſes, moreover, a ſuperiority over moſt other botanical publications, in having a complete Index of the Synonyma at length. The want of an addition of this kind, in Linnæus's Species Plantarum has often been regretted by thoſe who are converſant with his writings. The whole impreſſion of Dillenius's "Moſſes" conſiſted only of two hundred and fifty copies, fifty of which were on imperial paper. So ſmall was the demand at this time in England for works in natural hiſtory, that one guinea was thought a ſufficient price for the book; and, notwithſtanding its cheapneſs, the ſale was very ſlow. Since another ſpirit has riſen in our country, ten guineas are not deemed too much for the "Hiſtory of Moſſes." A copy, with the plates coloured by Dillenius himſelf, has been ſold for twenty guineas, or upwards. The original edition having become extremely ſcarce, an impreſſion of the plates, with the names only annexed, was taken in the year 1768, and publiſhed by Millan. It may be remarked, that the "Hiſtory of Moſſes," was the firſt book printed in England, in which any of the Linnæan ſpecific characters were exhibited (t).

(t) Pulteney, ubi ſupra. p. 178—180.

There is the greateſt reaſon to believe that Dillenius intended to have proſecuted the Funguſſes, as well as the Moſſes; and this deſign he appears to have had in contemplation, not long after his ſettlement in our own country. In a letter which was written by him to a correſpondent, in 1726, he ſays, that 'he was buſy in painting Fungi. He correſponded with Deering on the ſubject; who was himſelf well ſkilled in the knowledge of theſe productions, and had painted a great number, ſome of which he communicated to our profeſſor. Dillenius is ſaid to have been of a corpulent habit of body; which circumſtance, united to his cloſe application to ſtudy, might probably contribute to ſhorten his days. In the laſt week of March, 1747, he was ſeized with an apoplexy, and died on the ſecond of April, in the ſixtieth year of his age. There is a portrait of him in the picture gallery, or ſchool, at Oxford, in which he is repreſented in the academical habit. It does not appear that any engraving from it was ever made. Concerning Dillenius's domeſtic character, habits, temper, and diſpoſitions, there is very ſlender information. The account of his contemporaries was, that he was moderate, temperate, and gentle, in all his conduct; that he was known to few who did not ſeek him; and, as might be expected from the bent of his ſtudies, and the cloſe application he gave to them, that his habits were of the recluſe kind. From the peruſal of ſome of of his letters, it may be collected that he was naturally endowed with a placid diſpoſition, improved by a philoſophical calmneſs of mind, which ſecured him in a conſiderable degree from the effects of the incidental evils of life. In one of his letters, he expreſſes himſelf as follows: 'For my little time, I have met with as many adverſities and misfortunes, as 'any body; which, by the help of exerciſe, amuſement, and reading ſome of the ſtoic 'philoſophers, I have overcome; and am reſolved that nothing ſhall afflict me more. 'Many things here, as well as at my home, that hath happened to me, would cut down 'almoſt any body. But two days ago I had a letter, acquainting me with a very near 'relation's death, whom I was obliged to aſſiſt with money in his calamities, in order 'to ſet him up again in buſineſs: and now this is all gone, and there is ſomething more 'for me to pay, which is not a little for me; but it does not at all affect me. I rather 'thank God that it is not worſe. This is only one, and I have had harder ſtrokes than 'this, and there lies ſtill ſome upon me (u). It is plain, from this extract, that Dillenius had not completely attained the grammar of our language. His drawings, dried plants, printed books and manuſcripts, &c. were left by our author to Dr. Seidel, his executor; by whom they were ſold to Dr. Sibthorpe, his ingenious and learned ſucceſſor in the botanical profeſſorſhip. Amongſt theſe botanical collections, were all the Britiſh Funguſſes, deſigned and painted by Dillenius himſelf; beſides a large number of ſuch non-deſcript Fungi as had been diſcovered ſubſequent to the publication of the Synopſis. There were alſo ſeveral drawings by him of the more perfect plants, but many of them were unfiniſhed. He himſelf coloured ſome copies of the Hortus Elthamenſis, one of which he preſented to the Bodleian Library (w).]

 [DILLON (WENTWORTH), Earl of Roſcommon, a Nobleman diſtinguiſhed for his poetical talents, was born in Ireland in the reign of King Charles I. at the time when the Earl of Strafford was inveſted with the office of Lord Deputy of that kingdom (a). He was nephew to that nobleman; his father, Sir James Dillon, the third Earl of Roſcommon, having married Elizabeth the youngeſt daughter of Sir William Wentworth, of Wentworth Wood-houſe, in the county of York, ſiſter to the Earl of Strafford (b).

He is ſaid to have been ſent for by his uncle into England when very young, and placed placed at his ſeat in Yorkſhire, where he was inſtructed in Latin [A]; which he learned, we are told, ſo as to write it with purity and elegance, though he was never able to retain the rules of grammar. When the proſecution commenced againſt Lord Strafford, that Nobleman's houſe was no longer conſidered as a proper reſidence for his nephew; and, therefore, young Dillon, by the advice of Archbiſhop Uſher, who had converted his father from Popery, was ſent to Caen in Normandy, where the Proteſtants had then an Univerſity, in order to proſecute his ſtudies under the learned Samuel Bochart. He is repreſented as having already made great proficiency in literature, and his progreſs was probably far beyond what is uſual at his age; but as he appears now not to have been more than nine years old, the accounts of his attainments ſeem to have been exaggerated. 'That he was ſent to Caen,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'is certain; that he was a great ſcholar 'may be doubted (c).' His father is ſaid to have died during his ſtay at Caen; and a ſtrange and improbable tale is related, of his having had ſome preternatural knowledge of that event [B]. How long he continued at Caen we are not informed; but it appears that after he had finiſhed his ſtudies at that place, he travelled into Italy, and at Rome examined with great care the moſt valuable remains of antiquity. He alſo particularly applied himſelf to the knowledge of medals, in which he acquired uncommon ſkill; and he made ſo great a proficiency in the Italian language, and ſpoke it with ſo much eaſe and fluency, that he is ſaid to have been frequently miſtaken for a native of Italy (d).

Soon after the Reſtoration, Lord Roſcommon returned to England, where he was well received by King Charles II. and made Captain of the Band of Penſioners. But this court-preferment appears to have been a great misfortune to him; for, in conſequence of it, he ſoon 'learned,' as Dr. Johnſon expreſſes it, 'ſo much of the diſſoluteneſs of the Court, that he addicted himſelf immoderately to gaming (e). This impaired his fortune, and involved him in quarrels, in which he is ſaid to have frequently hazarded his life in duels (f). At length, having a diſpute with the Lord Privy Seal about part of his eſtate, he found it neceſſary to return to Ireland, and thereupon reſigned his poſt in the Engliſh Court. But ſoon after his arrival at Dublin, the Duke of Ormond appointed him to be Captain of the Guards. His paſſion for gaming ſtill continued; he was involved in quarrels and in difficulties in Ireland, as he had been before in England; and an adventure befel him, which is related in the following terms by Fenton: 'As he 'returned to his lodgings from a gaming-table, he was attacked in the dark by three 'ruffians, who were employed to aſſaſſinate him. The Earl defended himſelf with ſo 'much reſolution, that he diſpatched one of the aggreſſors; whilſt a gentleman, 'accidentally paſſing that way, interpoſed, and diſarmed another; the third ſecured 'himſelf by flight. This generous aſſiſtant was a diſbanded officer, of a good family, 'and fair reputation; who, by what we call the partiality of fortune, to avoid cenſuring 'the iniquities of the times, wanted even a plain ſuit of cloaths to make a decent 'appearance at the Caſtle. But his lordſhip, on this occaſion, preſenting him to the 'Duke of Ormond, with great importunity prevailed with his grace, that he might 'reſign his poſt of Captain of the Guards to his friend; which for about three years the 'gentleman enjoyed; and, upon his death, the Duke returned the commiſſion to his 'generous benefactor (g).'

[A] At his ſeat in Yorkſhire, where he was inſtructed in Latin, &c.] Fenton ſays, that the Earl of Strafford 'placed him at his own ſeat in Yorkſhire, under the 'tuition of Dr. Hall, a perſon of eminent learning 'and piety. By him he was inſtructed in Latin; 'and without learning the common rules of grammar, 'which he could never retain in his memory, he 'attained to write in that language with claſſical 'elegance and propriety; and with ſo much eaſe, that 'he choſe it to correſpond with thoſe friends who had 'learning ſufficient to ſupport the commerce (1).' It is juſtly obſerved by Dr. Johnſon, that the inſtructor, here ſpoken of, could not be the famous Dr. John Hall, as he was then "an old man, and a Biſhop (2);" though that prelate is ſtated as the perſon in the Lives of the Poets publiſhed under the name of Cibber (3).

[B] Having had ſome preternatural knowledge of that event.] The ſtory is told by Aubrey, who is known to have had no inconſiderable portion of credulity, and is as follows: 'The Lord Roſcommon, being a 'boy of ten years of age at Caen in Normandy, one 'day was (as it were) madly extravagant in playing, 'leaping, getting over the table-boards, &c. He was 'wont to be ſober enough; they ſaid, God grant this 'bodes no ill luck to him. In the heat of this ex-'travagant fit, he cries out, my father is dead. A 'fortnight after, news came from Ireland, that his 'father was dead. This account I had from Mr. 'Knolles, who was his governor, and then with him, 'ſince Secretary to the Earl of Strafford; and I have 'heard his lordſhip's relations confirm the ſame (4).'

(4) Miſcellanies upon various ſubjects, p. 162, 163. edit. 1784.

Lord Roſcommon is ſuppoſed to have been born in the year 1633; and his father is ſaid to have died at Limerick in 1649 (5). Theſe dates do not agree with the above ſtory. If they are right, Lord Roſcommon muſt have been about ſixteen at the time of his father's death.

(5) Nichols's Select Collection of Poems, with Notes, Vol. VI. p. 53.

Anthony Wood mentions the following particulars of Lord Roſcommon's father. 'He was,' ſays he, 'when young, reclaimed from the ſuperſtition of the 'Romiſh Church by the learned and religious Dr. 'Uſher, primate of Ireland, and thereupon was ſent 'by him into England, as a Jewel of Price, to be 'committed to the care and truſt of Dr. George Hake-'will, who finding him to be a young man of preg-'nant parts, placed him in Exeter-college, under the 'tuition of Laurence Bodley, Bachelor of Divinity, 'nephew to the great Sir Thomas Bodley, in the 'beginning of the year 1628; in which College con-'tinuing ſome years, became a perſon of ſeveral ac-'compliſhments, and afterwards Earl of Roſcommon 'in his own country of Ireland *.'

the Dutcheſs of York; and married the Lady Frances, daughter of the Earl of Burlington, and widow of Colonel Courtney. He ſtill continued to cultivate literature, and formed the plan of a ſociety for refining our language, and fixing its ſtandard [C], in imitation of ſome ſimilar foreign eſtabliſhments. Mr. Dryden concurred with him in this project; but Lord Roſcommon did not live to bring it to any degree of maturity. After the acceſſion of King James II. he is ſaid to have formed a reſolution of retiring to Rome, on account of the religious contentions which then took place [D]; telling his friends, that "it would be beſt to ſit next to the chimney when the chamber "ſmoked (b)." His departure was prevented by the gout; and being too impatient either of pain, or of delay, he put himſelf into the hands of a French empiric, who is ſaid to have repelled the diſeaſe into his bowels; and thereby put a period to his life, in the year 1684 (i). At the moment in which he expired, he pronounced, with a voice that expreſſed the moſt intenſe fervour of devotion, two lines of his own verſion of Dies Iræ:

The Earl of Roſcommon was the author of ſeveral poetical pieces, which poſſeſs conſiderable merit, but on which ſuch high commendations were beſtowed in his own time [E] as he probably would not have obtained had he been of inferior rank. His principal

[C] Formed the plan of a ſociety for refining our language, and fixing its ſtandard.] Dr. Johnſon ſays, 'The ſame deſign, it is well known, was revived by 'Dr. Swift in the miniſtry of Oxford; but it has never 'ſince been publickly mentioned, though at that time 'great expectations were formed, by ſome at leaſt, of 'its eſtabliſhment and its effects. Such a ſociety 'might, perhaps, without much difficulty, be col-'lected; but that it would produce what is expected 'from it, may be doubted.

'The Italian academy ſeems to have obtained its 'end. The language was refined, and ſo fixed that 'it has changed but little. The French academy 'thought that they refined their language, and doubt-'leſs thought rightly; but the event has not ſhewn 'that they fixed it; for the French of the preſent time 'is very different from that of the laſt century.

'In this country an academy could be expected to 'do but little. If an academician's place were pro-'fitable, it would be given by intereſt; if attendance 'were gratuitous, it would be rarely paid, and no man 'would endure the leaſt diſguſt. Unanimity is im-'poſſible, and debate would ſeparate the aſſembly. 'But ſuppoſe the philological decree made and pro-'mulgated, what would be its authority? In abſo-'lute governments, there is ſometimes a general re-'verence paid to all that has the ſanction of power, 'and the countenance of greatneſs. How little this 'is the ſtate of our country needs not to be told. We 'live in an age, in which it is a kind of public ſport 'to refuſe all reſpect that cannot be enforced. The 'edicts of an Engliſh academy would probably be 'read by many, only that they might be ſure to diſ-'obey them. That our language is in perpetual 'danger of corruption cannot be denied: but what 'prevention can be found? The preſent manners of 'the nation would deride authority, and therefore 'nothing is left but that every writer ſhould criticiſe 'himſelf (6).'

(6) Biographical Preface, ubi ſupra, p. 10, 11, 12.

We can eaſily ſuppoſe, with Dr. Johnſon, that ſuch an Engliſh academy, as is above ſpoken of, might not be productive of much effect; but we do not think that this ſhould be preſumed merely from the unwillingneſs of the people of England to ſubmit to authority. We rather imagine, that the probable failure would ariſe from the difficulties neceſſarily attendant on ſuch an undertaking, and from the evaneſcent nature of language. According to Dr. Johnſon's own account, the French academy has failed; and yet ſurely the French nation, at the time referred to, were ſufficiently ſubmiſſive to authority. The people of England would probably be as ready to ſubmit to the deciſions of reaſon as the inhabitants of any other country; and we do not apprehend, that, in matters of literature, it would be any advantage to them to be inclined to an implicit ſubmiſſion to any other authority.

[D] On account of the religious contentions which then took place.] If Lord Roſcommon died in 1684, as all his biographers agree, he could not live to ſee much of what Dr. Johnſon calls 'the contentious turbulence of 'King James's reign (7).' James aſcended the throne on the 6th of February 1684-5. In the New and Gen. Biog. Dict. 8vo. it is ſaid, that Lord Roſcommon died Jan. 17, 1684. If it was 1684-5, his death happened before the acceſſion of James II.

(7) Ibid. p. 12.

In the ſeveral accounts of Lord Roſcommon's life, there appear to have been ſome miſtakes reſpecting dates, and other circumſtances, which cannot now be rectified. They are chiefly taken from Mr. Fenton's account, in his edition of Waller; and Fenton derived his materials from a life of Roſcommon written by Dr. Chetwood, but which has never been printed (8).

(8) Nichols, ut ſupra.

[E] On which ſuch high commendations were beſtowed in his own time, &c.] His "Eſſay on Tranſlated "Verſe" was ſtyled by Dryden 'a finiſhed Poem;' and, on account of its great merit, England and Ireland were repreſented as in danger of 'A nobler quarrel for his native earth,

'Than what divided Greece for Homer's birth (9).'

(9) Verſes addreſſed by Mr. Dryden to the Earl of Roſcommon on his Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe.

Charles Dryden alſo wrote a copy of verſes, in Latin, in honour of Lord Roſcommon's performance; in which are the following lines:

'Anglia ſi claris pollet fæcunda poetis
'Mundo præreptos jactans in pace triumphos;
'Pallada nutrivit ſi non minus ubere glebâ;
'Auguſto quam magna tulit ſub Cæſare Roma;
'Hoc tibi debetur Comes illuſtriſſime ſecli:
'Nam poſtquam per te patuit, populoque refulſit
'Ars Flacci, vatum ſurrexit vivida proles,
'Divinis inſtructa modis et carmine puro.
'Jam non ſola ſequi veſtigia ſacra Maronis
'Sed transferre datur: Vos O gaudete ſuperbi
'Angligenæ, meritiſque virum redimite corollis,
'Quem penes arbitrium eſt & jus & norma loquendi.
'Nam duce Te vatum ſeries æterna ſequetur,
'Qui tentare modos auſi immortalis Homeri,
'Heroaſque, Deoſque canent, plauſuque ſecundo
'Non male ceratis tendent ſuper æthera pennis.'

Which have been thus tranſlated by Mr. Needler:

'That happy Britain boaſts her tuneful race,
'And laurel wreaths her peaceful temples grace,
'The honour and the praiſe is juſtly due,
'To you alone, illuſtrious Earl! to you.
'For ſoon as Horace, with his artful page,
'By thee explain'd, had taught the liſtening age;
'Of brighteſt bards aroſe a ſkilful train,
'Who ſweetly ſung in their immortal ſtrain.
'No more content great Maro's ſteps to trace,
'New paths we ſearch, and tread unbeaten ways.

principal production is his "Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe [F];" to which were prefixed ſome encomiaſtic verſes by Mr. Dryden, in which he ſaid, that,

"Scarce his own Horace could ſuch rules ordain;
"Or his own Virgil ſing a nobler ſtrain."

He alſo publiſhed a tranſlation, in blank verſe, of Horace's Art of Poetry [G]; a Paraphraſe

'Ye Britons, then, triumphantly rejoice;
'And with loud peals, and one conſenting voice,
'Applaud the man, who does unrivalled ſit,
"The ſovereign judge, and arbiter of wit!"
'For led by thee, an endleſs train ſhall riſe,
'Of poets, who ſhall climb ſuperior ſkies;
'Heroes and Gods in worthy verſe ſhall ſing,
'And tune to Homer's lay the lofty ſtring (10).'

(10) Nichols's Select Collection of Poems, Vol. VI. p. 52.

Complimentary verſes were alſo prefixed to the Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe by Chetwood and Amherſt. In the former of theſe is the following paſſage:

'Thoſe talents all are yours, of which but one
'Were a fair fortune for a Muſe's ſon.
'Wit, reading, judgment, converſation, art,
'A head well balanc'd, and a generous heart.
'While inſect rhymes cloud the polluted ſky,
'Created to moleſt the world, and die,
'Your file does poliſh what your fancy caſt,
'Works are long forming which muſt always laſt.
'Rough, iron ſenſe, and ſtubborn to the mould
'Touch'd by your chymic hand is turn'd to gold.
'A ſecret grace faſhions the flowing lines,
'And inſpiration through the labour ſhines.
'Writers, in ſpite of all their paint and art,
'Betray the darling paſſion of their heart.
'No fame you wound, give no chaſte ear offence,
'Still true to friendſhip, modeſty, and ſenſe.
'So ſaints from heaven for our example ſent,
'Live to their rules, having nothing to repent.
'Horace, if living, by exchange of fate,
'Would give no laws, but only yours tranſlate.'

The panegyric of Amherſt concludes with the following lines:

'When this inimitable piece is ſhown,
'In languages and empires yet unknown,
'It will be learning then to know and hear
'Not only what you wrote, but what you were (11).'

(11) Verſes addreſſed to the Earl of Roſcommon, prefixed to the Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe, in the edition of his Works, 8vo. 1717.

His writings were alſo ſpoken of in very high terms after his death: 'His friends,' ſays Mr. Fenton, 'ſeem 'to have thought his own writings a more durable 'monument than any they could erect to his memory. 'And in them we view the image of a mind that was 'naturally ſerious and ſolid; richly furniſhed and 'adorned with all the ornaments of art and ſcience; 'and thoſe ornaments unaffectedly diſpoſed in the moſt 'regular and elegant order. His imagination might 'have probably been more fruitful and ſprightly, if 'his judgment had been leſs ſevere: but that ſeverity '(delivered in a maſculine, clear, ſuccinct ſtyle) con'tributed to make him ſo eminent in the didactical 'manner, that no man with juſtice can affirm he was 'ever equalled by any of our own nation, without 'confeſſing at the ſame time that he is inferior to none. 'In ſome other kinds of writing his genius ſeems to 'have wanted fire to attain the point of perfection: 'but who can attain it (12)?'

(12) Obſervations on ſome of Mr. Waller's Poems, p. 77.

'From this account,' ſays Dr Johnſon, 'of the 'riches of his mind, who would not imagine that 'they had been diſplayed in large volumes and nume'rous performances? Who would not, after the peru'ſal of this character, be ſurprized to find, that all 'the proofs of this genius, and knowledge, and judg'ment, are not ſufficient to form a ſingle book, or to 'appear otherwiſe than in conjunction with the works 'of ſome other writer of the ſame petty ſize? But 'thus it is that characters are written; we know 'ſomewhat, and we imagine the reſt. The obſerva'tion, that his imagination would probably have been 'more fruitful and ſprightly if his judgment had been 'leſs ſevere, may be anſwered, by a remarker ſome'what inclined to cavil, by a contrary ſuppoſition, 'that his judgment would probably have been leſs 'ſevere, if his imagination had been more fruitful. 'It is ridiculous to oppoſe judgment to imagination; 'for it does not appear that men have neceſſarily leſs 'of one as they have more of the other.

'We muſt allow of Roſcommon, what Fenton has 'not mentioned ſo diſtinctly as he ought, and, what 'is yet very much to his honour, that he is perhaps 'the only correct writer in verſe before Addiſon; and 'that, if there are not ſo many or ſo great beauties in 'his compoſitions as in thoſe of ſome contemporaries, 'there are at leaſt fewer faults. Nor is this his higheſt 'praiſe; for Mr. Pope has celebrated him as the only 'moral writer of King Charles's reign:

'Unhappy Dryden! In all Charles's days,
'Roſcommon only boaſts unſpotted lays (13).'

(13) Biographical Preface, ubi ſupra, p. 15, 16, 17.

This obſervation of Mr. Pope's ſeems not ſtrictly true. Milton's greateſt poetical productions were publiſhed, and probably for the moſt part written, in the reign of Charles the Second; and his lays were certainly as unſpotted as thoſe of Roſcommon. Pope has alſo celebrated this Nobleman in his Eſſay on Criticiſm. Speaking of judicious and able critics, he ſays,

'Such was Roſcommon——not more learn'd than good,
'With manners gen'rous as his noble blood;
'To him the wit of Rome and Greece was known,
'And ev'ry author's merit, but his own.'

[F] His Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe.] Dr. Johnſon ſays, 'His great work is his Eſſay on Tranſlated 'Verſe; of which Dryden writes thus in the Preface to 'his Miſcellanies: "It was my Lord Roſcommon's "Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe which made me uneaſy, "till I tried whether or no I was capable of following "his rules, and of reducing the ſpeculation into prac"tice. For many a fair precept in poetry is like a "ſeeming demonſtration in mathematics, very ſpecious "in the diagram, but failing in the mechanic operation. "I think I have generally obſerved his inſtructions: "I am ſure my reaſon is ſufficiently convinced both of "their truth and uſefulneſs; which, in other words, "is to confeſs no leſs a vanity than to pretend that I "have, at leaſt in ſome places, made examples to his 'rules." This declaration of Dryden will, I am afraid, 'be found little more than one of thoſe curſory civili'ties which one author pays to another; for when 'the ſum of Lord Roſcommon's precepts is collected, 'it will not be eaſy to diſcover how they can qualify 'their reader for a better performance of tranſlation 'than might have been attained by his own reflec'tions. He that can abſtract his mind from the ele'gance of the poetry, and confine it to the ſenſe of the 'precepts, will find no other direction, than that the 'author ſhould be ſuitable to the tranſlator's genius; 'that he ſhould be ſuch as may deſerve a tranſlation; 'that he, who intends to tranſlate him, ſhould endea'vour to underſtand him; that perſpicuity ſhould be 'ſtudied, and unuſual and uncouth names ſparingly 'inſerted; and that the ſtyle of the original ſhould be 'copied in its elevation and depreſſion. Theſe are the 'rules that are celebrated as ſo definite and important, 'and for the delivery of which to mankind ſo much 'honour has been paid. Roſcommon has indeed 'deſerved his praiſes, had they been given with diſ'cernment, and beſtowed not on the rules themſelves, 'but the art with which they are introduced, and the 'decorations with which they are adorned.

'The Eſſay, though generally excellent, is not 'without its faults. The ſtory of the quack, borrowed 'from Boileau, was not worth the importation. He 'has confounded the Britiſh and Saxon mythology:

'I grant that from ſome moſſy idol oak,
'In double rhymes, our Thor and Woden ſpoke.'

'The oak, as I think Gildon has obſerved, belonged 'to the Britiſh Druids, and Thor and Woden were 'Saxon deities. Of the double rhymes, which he ſo liberally Paraphraſe on the cxlviiith Pſalm; a tranſlation of the ſixth eclogue of Virgil, and of two odes of Horace; an ode on Solitude; a Poem on the Proſpect of Death; Verſes on Mr. Dryden's "Religio Laici;" the Prayer of Jeremiah paraphraſed; a Prologue ſpoken to the Duke of York at Edinburgh [H]; a tranſlation of part of a ſcene of Guarini's "Paſtor Fido;" a Prologue to Pompey, a tragedy [I], tranſlated by Mrs. Catharine Philips from the French of Corneille; Verſes on the Death of a Lady's Lap-dog; the Dream; a tranſlation of "Dies Iræ;" an Epilogue to Alexander the Great, when acted at the theatre at Dublin; a Song; Roſs's Ghoſt; and a piece, intitled, The Ghoſt of the old Houſe of Commons to the new one appointed to meet at Oxford [K]. He alſo tranſlated into French, at the deſire of the Duke of Ormond, Dr. Sherlock's Caſe of Reſiſtance to the Supreme Powers, a piece written in ſupport of the doctrine of Paſſive Obedience (m).

Of the general merit of Lord Roſcommon's writings, the following judgment is given by Dr. Johnſon: "He is elegant, but not great; he never labours after exquiſite "beauties; and he ſeldom falls into groſs faults. His verſification is ſmooth, but rarely "vigorous, and his rhymes are remarkably exact. He improved taſte, if he did not "enlarge knowledge, and may be numbered among the benefactors to Engliſh lite-"rature (n)."] T.

'liberally ſuppoſes, he certainly had no knowledge. 'His interpoſition of a long paragraph of blank verſes 'is unwarrantably licentious. Latin poets might as 'well have introduced a ſeries of iambicks among 'their heroics (14).'

(14) Biog. Pref. ubi ſupra. p. 17—22.

The Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe was tranſlated into Latin by Mr. Euſden; and this verſion was publiſhed in that edition of Lord Roſcommon's Works which was printed in 1717, in 8vo. together with the poems of the Duke of Buckingham and Mr. Richard Duke.

[G] A Tranſlation, in blank verſe, of Horace's Art of Poetry.] Of this verſion Dr. Johnſon, who appears to have conceived a very unreaſonable prejudice againſt blank verſe, ſpeaks not in the moſt favourable terms: 'His tranſlation of the Art of Poetry,' ſays he, 'has 'received, in my opinion, not leſs praiſe than it de-'ſerves. Blank verſe, left merely to its numbers, 'has little operation either on the ear or mind: it can 'hardly ſupport itſelf without bold figures and ſtriking 'images. A poem frigidly didactic, without rhyme, 'is ſo near to proſe, that the reader only ſcorns it for 'pretending to be verſe. Having diſentangled him-'ſelf from the difficulties of rhyme, he may juſtly be 'expected to give the ſenſe of Horace with great ex-'actneſs, and to ſuppreſs no ſubtilty of ſentiment for 'the difficulty of expreſſing it. This demand, how-'ever, his tranſlation will not ſatisfy; what he found 'obſcure, I do not know that he has ever cleared (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 22, 23.

Mr. Waller wrote ſome verſes in honour of this tranſlation of Lord Roſcommon, in which are the following lines:

'Rome was not better by her Horace taught,
'Than we are here, to comprehend his thought:
'The poet writ to noble Piſo there,
'A noble Piſo does inſtruct us here;
'Gives us a pattern in his flowing ſtyle,
'And with rich precepts does oblige our iſle (16).'

(16) Works of Edmund Waller, Fenton's edit. p. 236.

[H] A Prologue ſpoken to the Duke of York at Edinburgh.] In this prologue the Duke of York, afterwards King James II. was celebrated for his great and royal virtues, which ſhone, it was ſaid, divinely bright; his courage, and naval ſkill, were ſtated to have confirmed our empire over the ocean; and it was aſſerted, that ——'Such a hero never ſprings,

'But from the uncorrupted bloods of Kings (17).'

(17) Poems by the Earl of Roſcommon, 8vo. 1717. p. 122, 123, 124.

[I] A Prologue to Pompey, &c.] Dr. Johnſon ſays, 'Of the ſcene of Guarini, and the prologue to Pompey, 'Mrs. Philips, in her Letters to Sir Charles Cotterel, 'has given the hiſtory. "Lord Roſcommon," ſays 'ſhe, "is certainly one of the moſt promiſing young "noblemen in Ireland. He has paraphraſed a pſalm "admirably, and a ſcene of Paſtor Fido very finely, in "ſome places much better than Sir Richard Fanſhaw. "This was undertaken merely in compliment to me, "who happened to ſay that it was the beſt ſcene in Ita-"lian, and the worſt in Engliſh. He was only two "hours about it. It begins thus:

"Dear happy groves, and you the dark retreat
"Of ſilent horror, reſt's eternal ſeat."

'From theſe lines, which are ſince ſomewhat 'mended, it appears that he did not think a work of 'two hours fit to endure the eye of criticiſm without 'reviſal.

'When Mrs. Philips was in Ireland, ſome ladies that 'had ſeen her tranſlation of Pompey, reſolved to bring 'it on the ſtage at Dublin; and, to promote their 'deſign, Lord Roſcommon gave them a prologue, and 'Sir Edward Dering an epilogue; "which," ſays 'ſhe, "are the beſt performances of thoſe kinds I ever "ſaw." If this is not criticiſm, it is at leaſt gratitude. 'The thought of bringing Cæſar and Pompey into 'Ireland, the only country over which Cæſar never 'had any power, is lucky (18).'

(18) Biog. Pref. ubi ſupra, p. 24, 25, 26.

Dr. Johnſon has alſo made the following obſervations relative to two or three other pieces of Lord Roſcommon; 'Among his ſmaller works, the Eclogue 'of Virgil and the Dies Iræ are well tranſlated; 'though the beſt line in the Dies Iræ is borrowed 'from Dryden. In return ſucceeding poets have 'borrowed from Roſcommon.

'In the Verſes on the Lap-dog, the pronouns thou 'and you are offenſively confounded; and the turn at 'the end is from Waller.

'His verſions of the two odes of Horace are made 'with great liberty, which is not recompenſed by 'much elegance or vigour (19).'

(19) Ibid. p. 23.

[K] The Ghoſt of the old Houſe of Commons, &c.] This little piece contains ſome ſtrains of courtly ſervility, and very illiberal abuſe of that able Lawyer Serjeant Maynard. The few political poems of Lord Roſcommon will hardly be applauded by many in the preſent age; but they ſeem to have pleaſed Dr. Johnſon, who ſays, 'His political verſes are ſprightly, and 'when they were written muſt have been very popular '(20).'] T.

Mr. Diſney was born at Lincoln, December 26, 1677, and was eldeſt ſon of Daniel Diſney, of Lincoln, Eſq. by his firſt wife Catherine, youngeſt daughter and coheir of Henry Fynes of Kirkſtead, in that county, Eſq. [B]. He was educated at the Grammar-School of Lincoln, and afterwards at a private Diſſenting Academy. He was deſigned for the ſtudy of the law, and was ſome time a member of the Middle-Temple, but never proſecuted it as a profeſſion, notwithſtanding the progreſs he made in that ſtudy, as appeared afterwards when he acted as a Juſtice of the Peace for the county of Lincoln, and likewiſe in his labours as an Antiquary.

On May 20, 1698, he married Mary daughter and afterwards ſole heireſs of William Woolhouſe, M. D. (of North Markham, in the county of Nottingham) by Mary his wife, who was daughter, and in fine alſo ſole heireſs of John Hacker of Flintham-hall, in the county of Nottingham, Eſq.

The firſt publication of his which we meet with, is the effuſion of a devout mind and an informed underſtanding, though given to the world ſo early as in the twenty-eighth year of his age: it is entituled, "Primitiæ Sacræ; or, the Reflections of a devout Soli-"tude." Theſe little eſſays breathe the true ſpirit of piety and devotion, and are written in an eaſy and not inelegant ſtile. The three poems at the end, "An Ode on the Crea-"tion;" "The Eleventh Ode of the Second Book of Horace ſpiritualized;" and, "A Para-"phraſe on the third Chapter of Job," ſhew him not to have been entirely neglected, though he might not be courted by the Muſes.

The diligence, diſintereſtedneſs, and impartiality, which diſtinguiſhed him as a Magiſtrate, made him generally beloved and reſpected; but they failed not, at the ſame time, to create him many and powerful enemies among wicked men. Under the conſciouſneſs of his own integrity, he frequently applied himſelf in prayer to GOD for wiſdom and courage in his public office [C], and he poſſeſſed thoſe ſubſidiary requiſites, knowledge his Church Hiſtory (p. 155) gives the Roll of Battel-Abbey, from Holinſhead and Stow, referring to the page of his authority. In both of theſe the name is written Deſny; but Fuller does not omit to notice at the head of his copies of Battel Abbey Roll, (p. 154), the diſagreement in the ſpelling of the names, and in the number and order of them. And indeed it is hard to ſay whether any credit is due to this irregular and ſuſpicious record.

Leland, in his "Itinerary" fol. 29, among the Gentlemen of Keſteven diviſion in Lincolnſhire, names this family, writing "Diſney alias De Iſeney, "he dwelleth at Diſney, and of his name and line be "Gentilmel of Fraunce. Aileſham priory by Thor-"ney-Courtoiſe was of the Diſeneys foundation, and "there were divers of them buryed, and likewiſe at "Diſeney." Norton-Diſney is in a Note, written by Leland, Northampton-Diſeney, but which muſt be a miſtake, and may have arſen from firſt writing Norton nearer to its ſimple ſignification North-ton (or North-town), and then reading it as a contraction, not unfrequent at this day, for Northampton.

Leland ſeems to be under a miſtake, however, in ſaying that Aileſham Priory was of the Diſneys foundation. Dugdale in his "Monaſticon Anglicanum," (Edit. 1661) Vol. II. p. 421. ſays, that Hoſpitale de Elleſham agro Lincolnienſi was founded by Beatrix Wife of John de Amundeville (ſee alſo Thoroton's Nottinghamſhire p. 184), and recites the grants which were ſucceſſively given to the ſame by that family, and by John de Dive (1277), who was the Son of Sir William de Dive, who married Ermetrida the ſole heir of the Amundevilles; and which John de Dive, dying without iſſue, left his two ſiſters Elizabeth and Joan coheirs, the former marrying Sir Lambert Buſſy Knt. and the latter Sir William D'Eiſney, Knt. Therefore I conclude that Leland fell into the miſtake by not knowing, or not diſtinguiſhing that the Diſneys had only married the coheir of the foundreſs and benefactors.

Biſhop Tanner, "Notitia Monaſtica," p. 271, under Elleſham or Aileſham, recites Beatrix de Amundaville as the foundreſs of an Hoſpital for ſeveral poor brethren, which her ſon Walter confirmed, and committed to the care of a Prior and regular Canons of the order of St. Auſtin before A. D. 1166. Tanner cites Leland's Collect. Vol. I. p. 94. and Itin. Vol. I. p. 22, where he ſaith "Aileſham Priory was by Thorney (i. e. "Thornton) Curtoiſe, and of the Diſſeneys Founda-"tion." So that Tanner has only accumulated authorities in contradiction to each other, without explaining or reconciling them.

A ſimilar miſtake is made by Dugdale, in ſtyling Iſabel Counteſs of Warwick (in her own right) the foundreſs of the Nunnery of Cokehill in Worceſterſhire, whereas ſhe was only a benefactreſs, and had the Patronage thereof, being heir of the founder Walleran de Newburgh Earl of Warwick, her grandfather. See Edmonſon's Geneal. and Hiſt. Account of the family of Greville, p. 31. Note *.

Of the family of Diſney two generations ſerved ſucceſſively in Parliament as Knights of the Shire for Lincolnſhire ſo early as the 26 Edw. I. the 5th, 10, and 17th, of Edw. II. and the 17th. Edw. III. See Prynne's "Brevia Parliamentaria rediviva," p. 53, and 119, &c. and as Sheriff of the County at ſeveral periods from 14 and 18 Edw. III. See Fuller's Worthies.

[B] Coheir of Henry Fynes of Kirkſtead in that County, Eſq.] Henry Fynes, Eſq. was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Henry Fynes, of Kirkſtead, Knt. by his firſt wife Eleanor daughter of Sir James Harrington, Knt. and which Sir Henry was the eldeſt ſon of Henry (ſecond) Earl of Lincoln by his ſecond wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Richard Morriſon, Knt, and widow of William Norreys, Eſq. eldeſt ſon of Henry (firſt) Lord Norreys, of Rycot (by Bridget, only daughter of John Lord Huſſey, afterwards the wife of Henry Earl of Rutland, and Francis Earl of Bedford.) The Memoirs of the ſaid Sir Henry Fynes were publiſhed (by me) from a MS. in his own hand-writing in the "Gentleman's Magazine, Vol. XLII. p. 161—164;" and from thence were alſo publiſhed in the "Annual Regiſter" for 1772.

The above Mr. Fynes left two other daughters and coheirs, beſides Catherine the wife of Daniel Diſney, Eſq. viz. Elizabeth, who married the Hon. Geo. Willoughby, of Knaith, in the County of Lincoln, who on the death of his father became Lord Willoughby of Parham; and Dorcas, married to —— Prince, Eſq.

[C] In prayer to God for wiſdom and courage in his public office.] A prayer, which he drew up on this occaſion, is as follows:

"Moſt holy and bleſſed GOD, the fountain of all wiſdom, the inſpirer of all good reſolutions, the ſtrength of all that truſt in thee, from whom comes every good and perfect gift, and without whoſe powerful and continual aſſiſtance we are ſo far from being able in any thing to ſerve and glorify thee, that we can do nothing but offend thee; I humbly caſt myſelf at thy feet, imploring for the ſake of Chriſt, whoſe death and ſufferings have merited for us that grace which only can enable us to diſcharge our duty, that as thou haſt (notwith-

knowledge and diſcernment, which qualified him to proceed in the adminiſtration of juſtice with advantage to the common-weal, and with credit to himſelf. His own conduct cannot be better declared or defended than by himſelf in his two eſſays "On the Execution of the Laws againſt Immorality and Profaneneſs," which paſſed through two editions: nor can better evidence be given of his great knowledge of thoſe laws with reſpect to their antiquity, univerſality, and expedience, than may be found in his "View" of them "down to the Middle of the Eleventh Century," printed at Cambridge, in folio, in the year 1729: to which may be added alſo ſuch of his manuſcripts which continue that work down to his own time, and include alſo the gradual progreſs of the laws of our own country as we advanced in knowledge and civilization; forming together an aſtoniſhing and well-digeſted collection of materials, correſpondent to the large compaſs he had propoſed to take in his intended great and favourite work, under the title of "Corpus Legum de Moribus reformandis [D]."

Notwithſtanding the purity of his intentions, and the integrity of his conduct in the diſcharge of the duties of a Magiſtrate, he met with great oppoſition. In the year 1710, and under the ſanction of a tory adminiſtration, his name was ſtruck out of the Commiſ-ſtanding all my former errors and offences) vouchſafed to entruſt me now a third time with a commiſſion of civil authority, thou wouldſt ſo graciouſly direct me in, and ſo powerfully excite me to, the faithful execution of it, that hereafter (when I ſhall be ſummoned to thy ſevere and awful judgment) I may give up my accounts with comfort, and be received to mercy. I am ſenſible, O Lord, (and 'tis by thy grace that I am ſo, and I adore and bleſs thee for it) that the burden of Magiſtracy is greater than I can bear, the duties of it more difficult than I can ever hope to perform, without the mighty aid of thy ſpirit to ſupport me under it and conduct me through them. I utterly diſclaim all confidence in my own parts, or ſtrength, or reſolution, wiſdom or learning, whatever I may have, or fancy I have, of theſe or any of theſe, though I deſire to make the utmoſt uſe of them to thy glory, yet I dare not truſt in them. I fly to the aſſiſtance of thy promiſed grace; and there I place my ſtrength; from thence alone I hope for vigour and courage to diſcharge my duty; to that I humbly look for direction, to guide me in the way of prudence, for ſupport, and conſolation under all diſcouragements, and for ſucceſs to all my endeavours. Thou haſt promiſed in thy holy word (the incorruptible record of truth and faithfulneſs) that "if any lack wiſdom and aſk it of thee, (who giveſt to all men liberally and upbraideſt not) it ſhall be given him (Jam. i. 5). I therefore moſt earneſtly ſolicit at the throne of thy grace for that wiſdom (without which I am at beſt but darkneſs, ignorance, and folly) to direct in all my proceedings, that they may be agreeable to thy holy laws, and to the laws of my country, which I am ſworn to execute; that every ſtep I take may be pious, legal, and prudent, and that may give no juſt offence or prejudice to men in any thing thro' my raſhneſs or miſmanagement, nor incur any trouble from them which with a faithful regard to my duty I might have avoided. "Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a plain path, becauſe of mine enemies (Pſal. xxvii. 11)." Give me prudence that I may no way needleſſly provoke or exaſperate them: but at the ſame time give me grace that I may in nothing whatſoever neglect my duty either to pleaſe my vicious neighbours, or for fear of them. Thou has charged me "not to fear the reproach of men nor be afraid of their revilings (Iſa. li. 7)." "Not to be diſmayed at their faces leſt thou confound me before them (Jer. i. 8)." But "the Lord GOD will help me, therefore I ſhall not be confounded; I will truſt in the name of the Lord, and ſtay upon my GOD (Iſa. l. 7. 10)." "In GOD have I put my truſt, I will not be afraid what man can do unto me (Pſal. lvi. 11)." I acknowledge (and by ſad and daily experience I have reaſon to do ſo) the timerouſneſs and weakneſs of my own natural temper, while the duty of my office is a burden to me, and I cannot ſet myſelf to thoſe unpopular branches of it, the puniſhment of vice, eſpecially in perſons of any figure, but with a trembling heart and with a ſhaking hand, as knowing that "my ſoul is among lions, and I lie even amongſt them that are ſet on fire; even the ſons of men whoſe teeth are ſpears and arrows, and their tongue a ſharp ſword (Pſal. lvii. 4)." But at "what time I am afraid I will truſt in thee, O Lord (Pſal. lvi. 3)." "I will wait on the Lord, and be of good courage, and he will ſtrengthen my heart (Pſal. xxvii. 14)." Do thou, O Lord, ſo fortify my heart from time to time, inſpire me daily with ſuch a temperate, ſteady, and well-principled Chriſtian courage, that I may fear thee and none but thee.

"O deliver me, Lord God, deliver me, for thy mercy's ſake in Chriſt Jeſus, from a ſlaviſh and unworthy fear of man, from all thoſe ſecret tremblings and reluctances in my breaſt that make me backward in my duty, or may over-awe me with an unreaſonable and ſinful fear of diſobliging men. By thy grace I faithfully reſolve from this moment to ſtrive againſt them; and the aſſiſtance of that grace I earneſtly beg to enable me effectually to overcome them. Let me not only be willing, but rejoice to ſuffer ſhame for thy ſake, and for the ſake of a good conſcience: but give me grace to take care that it be indeed for thy ſake and for a good conſcience that I ſuffer. And to this end, O Lord, I beſeech, ſo purify my heart, that my aims and intentions in all I do may be purely thy glory and the good of mankind, free from any corrupt bias of private reſentments. Sanctify my conduct with an habitual meekneſs and charity; and preſerve me from all vain reflections upon my ſervices; preſerve me in a deep and true humility, a deep ſenſe of my own utter unworthineſs, my innumerable defects and imperfections, that after all I may continually acknowledge myſelf an unprofitable ſervant. And as it is my ſincere reſolution (thy grace aſſiſting me) to ſuit my conduct in every point to theſe my prayers; ſo I beſeech that grace to go along with my endeavours and bleſs them to the thorough reformation of evil men, and to the effectual diſcouragement and ſuppreſſion of vice and profaneneſs. Make thoſe, that ſhall be puniſhed, inwardly ſenſible of the evil of what they are puniſhed for, and ſo improve the reflections they may make thereupon, that it may lead them (by the bleſſed influence of thy ſpirit) to a thorough converſion; and that they and I may be hereafter received to thy mercy, and made happy in the love and favour of thee our GOD to all eternity, through the meritorious ſufferings, and interceſſion, of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in whoſe moſt holy name I humbly offer up all theſe my petitions, and beg to be heard, and hope to be accepted by thee. Amen."

[D] Under the title of "Corpus Legum de Moribus Reformandis."] 'I deſigned,' ſays he in his preface to his "View of Ancient Laws, 1729," 'to have 'brought down the account through every age and 'nation, even to the preſent times; to have com-'pared their laws in point of advantage or defect, 'and to have writ in Latin; that legiſlatures, if they 'were ſo diſpoſed, might take the hint, to make 'more perfect and effectual their own proviſions of this 'kind; as will appear by the propoſals which I 'printed, in 1713, to obtain aſſiſtance and materials 'from the learned in foreign parts: and which I 'publiſh here to excite, if it may be, ſome better 'hand to reſume the undertaking and go through 'with it.'

But even the violence of party, within the laſt four years of Queen Anne's reign, could not continue to bear up againſt the ſtill more powerful voice of reaſon, juſtice, and decency; and therefore he was reſtored again in the following year (1711). This manœuvre not being found defenſible, nor to be maintained, in the courſe of the ſucceeding year (1712) vexatious and malicious actions were brought againſt him, with a view to haraſs and diſcourage him from the even purſuit of duty on the revival of his commiſſion.

On theſe ſeveral occaſions, and the conſequence of them, there are two prayers of his compoſing; the one, that "GOD would preſerve him from Oppreſſion by his Enemies;" and the other, "a Thankſgiving that GOD had heard his Prayers, and preſerved him "from them [E];" and as the former is written in the ſpirit of charity, ſo is the latter in "A Prayer that GOD would preſerve him from Oppreſſion by his Enemies. (Aug. 4, 1712).

"Moſt great and merciful GOD, "the only refuge of the oppreſſed," the only help of thoſe that are in trouble; thou who art "higher than the higheſt," who over-ruleſt all things by thy providence, and ſitteſt in the throne judging right; "they that know thy name will put their truſt in thee; for thou, Lord, haſt not forſaken them that ſeek thee (Pſal. ix. 10)." Encouraged by thy mercy and goodneſs, thy ſovereign power and gracious promiſes, I caſt myſelf humbly upon thy protection; though reflecting upon my own miſcarriages, I muſt acknowledge (oh, that I could do it with the deepeſt ſorrow and repentance!) my unworthineſs of any merciful regard from thee.

"But for the ſake of him in whom thou art well pleaſed, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in whom alone we have acceſs to thee, and hope for mercy and acceptance with thee, remember not againſt me mine iniquities, to puniſh me for which thou mighteſt juſtly deliver me up into the hands of wicked and malicious men. O Lord, I beſeech thee, for thy truth and mercy's ſake, who haſt required us to "commit our way to thee, and to truſt in thee (Pſal. xxxvii. 5)," "and to caſt our burden upon thee," and aſſured us, that, if we do ſo, thou "wilt bring to paſs" what we deſire, and that thou "wilt ſuſtain us, and not ſuffer thoſe that truſt in thee to be moved;" look down upon me under my preſent fears and apprehenſions. And as thou haſt declared thyſelf "our refuge and ſtrength, a very preſent help in time of trouble (Pſal. xlvi. 1)," that thou art "nigh to all that call upon thee in truth, that thou wilt fulfil the deſire of them that fear thee, thou wilt hear their cry, and wilt ſave them (Pſal. cxlv. 18, 19);" "ſave me, O God, from them that perſecute me, and deliver me (Pſal. vii. 1);" "incline thine ear to me, and hear my prayer: ſhew thy marvellous loving kindneſs, O thou that ſaveſt by thy right hand them which put their truſt in thee from thoſe that riſe up againſt them. Keep me as the apple of thine eye, hide me under the ſhadow of thy wings, from the wicked that (would) oppreſs me, from my deadly enemies who compaſs me about (Pſal. xvii. 6, 7, 8, 9)." "They that hate me without a cauſe are more than the hairs of my head; they that would deſtroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty. For thy ſake I have born reproach (Pſal. lxix. 4, 7)." "Ariſe, O GOD, plead thine own cauſe (Pſal. lxxiv. 22)." "Let the wickedneſs of the wicked come to an end, but eſtabliſh thou the juſt (Pſal. vii. 9)."

"Do thou who haſt power over the hearts of all men, thou who "ſtilleſt the noiſe of the ſeas, and the tumult of the people (Pſal lxv. 7)." be pleaſed, I moſt humbly beg thee, either to convert the perſons, or abate the malice, or baffle the deſigns, of my enemies, that their wicked devices formed againſt me may not proſper. I beg this, O Lord, with an humble ſubmiſſion to thy will; to which I deſire at all times, and upon all occaſions, chearfully to ſacrifice my own. For thy glory I was created; and am content (as it is fit I ſhould) to be diſpoſed of by thee, abſolutely and without reſerve, into ſuch circumſtances in this world, whether of ſuffering or of comfort, as may beſt promote thy honor, the intereſt of religion, and my own better and eternal happineſs. Let me be put into ſuch a condition, I beſeech thee, whatever it is, that to thy infinite wiſdom ſhall ſeem fitteſt to glorify thee, and to ſecure thoſe great and important ends. And if the protection I now pray for may contribute moſt thereto, be pleaſed to grant it me, for the Lord Jeſus ſake; 'and mercifully aſſiſt my prayers that I make 'before thee in all my troubles and adverſities whenſoever they oppreſs me; and graciouſly hear me, 'that thoſe evils which the craft and ſubtilty of the 'devil or man worketh againſt me may be brought 'to nought, and by the providence of thy goodneſs 'they may be diſperſed, that I thy ſervant, being hurt 'by no perſecutions, may evermore give thanks unto 'thee in thy holy Church, through Jeſus Chriſt our 'Lord.'

I bleſs thee, O Lord, for the diſappointment they met with in their laſt endeavours of this kind; that thou didſt provide friends for me, and give ſucceſs to them. I humbly praiſe thy great and glorious name, I thankfully own and adore thy gracious providence in this, and take it as a juſt encouragement to depend ſtill upon thy protection. "Deliver me out of the hand of the wicked, out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man; for thou art my hope, O Lord GOD. Then will I hope continually, and will yet praiſe thee more and more (Pſal. lxxi. 4, 5, 14)."

But if thou haſt otherwiſe determined, O Lord, I ſubmit, begging only that what I ſuffer may be no diſadvantage or diſcouragement to the good cauſe of reformation, and that thou wouldſt vouchſafe to bring good out of evil, to ſanctify my affliction to me, to ſupport me under it; and whatever hardſhips I may undergo, let me be ſo far from daring to murmur or repine at thee, or from maligning my enemies or reſenting their unworthy uſage of me, that I may with an habitual chearfulneſs reſign myſelf and all my concerns into thy hand, may "rejoice and be exceeding glad," in all the perſecutions I may ſuffer for thy ſake, as knowing that great will be the reward of ſuch in Heaven as have the honour to be perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake on Earth. And grant me alſo the grace ſincerely to love and to forgive, and earneſtly to pray for thoſe that deſpitefully uſe me, and to do them all the good offices I can, that I may imitate the example of my meek and ſuffering Saviour.

"Hear my prayers, O Lord, I beſeech thee, and protect all others alſo (eſpecially thoſe in this Country), that have endeavoured the ſuppreſſion of vice and reformation of manners by due courſe of law, from all in the ſpirit of humility and thankfulneſs. Theſe litigations, however diſtreſſing for a time, were, in their iſſue, favourable to his general character, independently of the verdict reſpecting the particular matter in queſtion. They made a full diſplay of his con-all ſuffering and oppreſſion upon that account; except their ſufferings may be more for thy glory, more for the honour and advantage of religion, for their own greater good. Pour out a ſpirit of faithfulneſs and zeal upon our Magiſtrates, and raiſe up many others in my ſtead whom thou wilt pleaſe to bleſs in that great and neceſſary work of reformation, that they may more effectually chaſtiſe the inſolence of vice, and that the triumphing of the wicked may be ſhort.

"Hear me, I beſeech thee, O Lord, for the ſake of thy own glory, and the merits of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in whoſe moſt holy name and words, I farther call upon thee.

"Our Father, &c."

"Thankſgiving that GOD had heard my prayers, and preſerved me from the oppreſſion of my enemies, both this laſt aſſizes, and that before.

(Aug. 11. 1712).

"Moſt glorious and ever bleſſed GOD, infinite in power, in goodneſs, and in truth, I moſt humbly preſent myſelf before thee at this time, to acknowledge with a truly thankful heart my own late experience of thy love and faithfulneſs to thoſe that truſt in thee. 'Tis but a few days ſince I caſt myſelf at thy feet with prayers and ſupplications that thou wouldſt preſerve me from the oppreſſion which I had then too much reaſon to expect from the craft and malice of my enemies; "I ſought thee, O Lord, and thou haſt heard me, and delivered me from all my fears (Pſal.xxxiv.4)." "I will bleſs thee at all times, thy praiſe ſhall be continually in my mouth (ib.v.1)." "Bleſſed be GOD who has not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me (Pſal.lxvi.20)." "My ſoul is among lions, I lie even among them that are ſet on fire, whoſe teeth are ſpears and arrows, and their tongue a ſharp ſword (Pſal. lvii. 4)." "For they intended evil againſt me, they imagined a miſchevious device which (bleſſed be thy name) they were not able to perform (Pſal. xxi. 11)." "My heart (was) like wax, it (was) melted in the midſt of my bowels. (But the Lord) hath not deſpiſed the afflictions of the afflicted; he hath not hid his face from me, but when I cryed unto him he heard (Pſal. xxii. 14, 24)." "The Lord is my rock, my fortreſs and deliverer. In my diſtreſs I called upon the Lord, he heard my voice, and my cry came before him. He delivered me from my enemy, from them which hated me, and from the ſtrivings of the people (Pſal. xviii. 2. 6. 17. 43)." "He hath brought to nought the counſels of the wicked, and made their devices of none effect (Pſal. xxxiii. 10)."

"With the moſt devout gratitude I amable to excite in this too backward, too ungrateful heart of mine, (which I beſeech thee raiſe to a more lively, and fix in a moſt laſting ſenſe of all thy mercies, and particularly of that which I now praiſe thee for), I acknowledge thy late appearances on my behalf to preſerve me from the fury, and malice, and oppreſſive accuſations of ill men. I bleſs thee, O moſt merciful Father, that, in their former attempts upon me ſome months ago, thou didſt even prevent my prayers by a deliverance as unexpected by them, as their malicious proſecution was by me. Thou kneweſt their wicked deſign when I did not, and watcheſt all their motions, when I could not, and provideſt friends for me; and though they were fewer in number than my enemies, thou gaveſt them ſuch wiſdom, ſuch ſpirit and induſtry, and ſuch ſucceſs in their kind endeavours for me, as effectually (by thy bleſſing) baffled and defeated their contrivances againſt me. And when I feared new attempts from them of the ſame nature the laſt opportunity and ſolicitations were uſed by ſome to paſs them on thereto, thou, O GOD, who haſt the hearts of all men in thy hands, didſt ſo diſpirit and reſtrain them (upon my humble prayer to thee) that they did not ſo much as make an offer to renew the miſchievous uſage which I feared.

"I will praiſe thee, O Lord, with my whole heart, I will be glad and rejoice in thee: I will ſing praiſe to thy name, O thou moſt high. For thou haſt maintained my right and my cauſe, thou ſatteſt in the throne judging right. They that know thy name will put their truſt in thee, for thou haſt not forſaken them that ſeek thee (Pſal. ix. 1, 2, 4, 10)." "Let all thoſe that put their truſt in thee rejoice; let them ever ſhout for joy becauſe thou defendeſt them (Pſal. v. 11)." "Thou ſhalt keep them, O Lord; thou ſhalt preſerve them from this generation for ever (Pſal. xii. 7)." "O thou that heareſt prayer, unto thee ſhall all fleſh come (Pſal. lxv. 2)." "For the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, his ears are open to their cry; many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all (Pſal. xxxiv. 15, 19)." "Let the Lord be magnified who hath pleaſure in the proſperity of his ſervants (Pſal.xxxv.27)." "I will ſing of the mercies of the Lord for ever, with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulneſs to all generations (Pſal.lxxxix.1)." "I committed my way unto the Lord, I truſted in him and he has brought it to paſs (Pſal. xxxvii. 5)," according to that gracious promiſe in which he cauſed me to hope. I bleſs thee, O Lord, for the grace of that faith and truſt in thee with which thou didſt inſpire my ſoul, and prepare me for deliverance. I bleſs thee, that thou didſt put it into my heart to humble myſelf before thee for thoſe ſins, which I did then and do ſtill acknowledge rendered me utterly unworthy of any merciful regard from thee: O give me the further aſſiſtance of thy holy ſpirit, that I may not again provoke thee by the repetition or indulgence of thoſe ſins which might have juſtly expoſed me to be forſaken by thee, much more than any good thing that I have done could have entitled me to ſuch a favour as that I now make my acknowledgments of. I here moſt ſolemnly and ſeriouſly renew my vows that I will always watch againſt and mortify them, and that I will ſincerely make it my buſineſs to avoid whatever is offenſive to thee, and never wilfully to offend thee more. I humbly and thankfully, O Lord, in the ſenſe of thy late and other mercies to me, devote my whole ſelf, my ſoul and body and eſtate, and all I have, or am, or can do, to the promoting of thy glory and honour, and the intereſt of religion in the world; and hope thou wilt give me the grace to ſuffer as chearfully as to act for theſe great ends, whenever thy providence ſhall call me to it.

"In the mean time, O Lord, though ſuch as hate me without a cauſe are more than the hairs of my head, I caſt myſelf humbly upon thy protection, who haſt hitherto ſo remarkably preſerved me. "Be merciful to me, O God, be merciful to me, for my ſoul truſteth in thee; in the ſhadow of thy wings will I make my refuge. I will cry unto GOD moſt high, unto GOD that performeth all things for me. He ſhall ſend from Heaven and ſave me from the reproach of them that would ſwallow me up (Pſal.lvii.1,2,3)." "What time I am afraid, I will truſt in thee. When I cry unto thee, then ſhall my enemies turn back: this I know, for GOD is for me. In GOD have I put my truſt, I will not be afraid what man can do unto me (Pſal. lvi. 3, 9, 11)." "I will ſing of thy power, yea I will ſing aloud of thy mercy in the morning; for thou haſt been my defence and my refuge in the day of my trouble. Unto thee, O my ſtrength, will I ſing; for GOD is my defence (Pſal. lix. 16, 17.)" "Though I walk in the midſt of trouble thou wilt revive me; thou ſhalt ſtretch forth thine hand againſt the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand ſhall ſave me. Thy mercy, O Lord, endureth for ever (Pſal. cxxxviii. 7, 8)." "Thou art my hiding place; thou ſhalt preſerve me from trouble, thou ſhalt compaſs me about with ſongs of deliverance (Pſal xxxii.7)." "Thy vows are upon me, O God, I will render praiſes unto thee (Pſal. lvi. 12)." "The Lord upholdeth all that fall, and raiſeth up all thoſe that are bowed down. The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth. He will fulfil the deſire of them that fear him: he will alſo hear their cry and will ſave them (Pſal. cxlv. 14, 18, 19)." "Happy is he that——"

duct, principles, and motives, and were followed by the public thanks of the Judges on the circuit for his ſervices, and which were again repeated on a future occaſion.

He had, in the beginning of life, engaged himſelf in the cauſe of Religion and Virtue; he knew how much the full influence of theſe conduced to the happineſs of mankind in this life, and that they were the only ſecurity for happineſs in that which is to come [F]. "He had" (ſays he in his Second Eſſay, p. 1. and 2), ſerious reflections "upon the difference he obſerved betwixt the rules of Chriſtianity, and the practice of "Chriſtians. He was troubled to ſee that noble ſyſtem of Religion, left us by the Son "of GOD, ſo wretchedly martyred and diſguiſed in the behaviour of the moſt of thoſe "that profeſſed it."

There is yet extant his account of his receiving the Lord's Supper, commencing ſo early as in the year 1701, and continued down till within a few months of his death, wherein he regularly ſtates the diſpoſition and temper of his mind and affections, both in his prefatory Exerciſes, and at the time of receiving.

One entry, which occurs under the year 1707, runs in a ſpirit of liberal Piety ſuperior to the rigid, however well-meaning Formaliſts: "Indeed, I cannot but ſay, that "my uſual backwardneſs to the Sacrament may, in a great meaſure, be owing to my "too ſevere and ceremonial notions of preparation for performance of this duty. I en-"deavoured to ſatisfy myſelf with a ſenſe of true repentance of every particular ſin I "could recollect myſelf guilty of, and a firm and ſerious reſolution to do my utmoſt "againſt them for the future, and that habitual thankfulneſs I always have for our "redemption by Chriſt Jeſus, and the habitual knowledge I have of what the nature of "this ſacrament is, and the actual intention of profeſſing thereby my Faith in Chriſt, "my Chriſtian Profeſſion, and my obedience to him for the future. I contented myſelf "with this; and it pleaſed GOD to bleſs me with a ſerious ſenſe of theſe things during "the Sacrament-ſervice; and therefore, though I had not that warmth of affection "which does particularly become us in that ſolemn repreſentation of Chriſt's ſufferings "for us (and which I have ſo often and ſo earneſtly begged), I hope I did not receive "unworthily."

Neither would it be doing juſtice to his piety, and the devout and holy purpoſe of his heart and mind, to omit to take notice, from the ſame private, but not leſs authentic ſource of information, of an entry under Sunday, Dec. 26, 1708, wherein he writes as follows: "This being my birth-day, I did, both in my morning devotions and in "the Sacrament, with a particular ſolemnity, earneſtly devote and dedicate myſelf, ſoul "and body, and all the powers and faculties of either, my deſires, deſigns, and ſtudies, "to the bleſſed Jeſus; faithfully to ſerve, love, and obey him for ever; chearfully to "do and ſuffer whatever God would have me do and ſuffer in order to his glory; re-"ſigning myſelf wholly to be diſpoſed of by him for health or ſickneſs, reputation or "diſgrace, riches or poverty, pain or eaſe, life or death; juſt as may be moſt for his "glory, for which I humbly own I was created, and to which I heartily deſire to ſerve. "And let it here remain upon record againſt me, if ever I willingly or deliberately re-"tract the gift."

So again, he remarks, with great diſcernment, upon his own life and labours, his temper and inclination, and in a manner which beſpeaks him to have been poſſeſſed of an ingenuous and diſtinguiſhing mind: "I find myſelf," ſays he, in the ſame account of his receiving the Lord's Supper, 1711, "ſinking into a perfect ſlavery to my ſtudies, "producing in me a peeviſhneſs when I am at any time called off from them by other "buſineſs, an averſeneſs and uneaſineſs when obliged to leave them for the ſpiritual "duties of prayer either in my family or alone, and too impatient of the Lord's-day, "and apt to wiſh it over for the ſake of them. Good GOD! change my heart, and "draw off my affections, even from theſe otherwiſe innocent and uſeful engagements, "ſo far as they interfere with my neceſſary duty; for I find by experience, we may "perire licitis."

After upwards of twenty years labour in the unpopular work of Reformation of Manners, in conjunction with the Societies then eſtabliſhed for that laudable purpoſe, unwearied by his cloſe and unremitted ſtudy, his unbounded reſearches into antiquity, and his attendance on the execution of the laws of his own country, unſubdued by the malignant and haraſſing oppoſition of wicked men, he meditated upon engaging in the miniſtry of the Church of England.

When this deſign had come to ſome maturity in his own mind, he communicated it to Archbiſhop Wake, and received his hearty approbation, couched in terms of ſingular reſpect [G]. His father, who was a Proteſtant Diſſenter, was then living (and who alſo

He did not, however, argue, as is very frequent in ſuch caſes, from his own convictions in reſpect to matters of doctrine, againſt the propoſal of his ſon; for no argument which peculiarly reſpected the diſſent of the father could affect the ſon's engagement in the miniſtry of that church to which he betook himſelf when of age from principle and conviction, and in which he had conſtantly communicated and attended divine ſervice; unleſs, indeed, it were contended, that the duty of worſhiping God in ſpirit and truth was not equally obligatory upon the hearer, as well as the teacher, of the word. The principal objections made by his Father were, that "a gentleman, exemplary in his life, "might do more good than a clergyman, both by his example, inſtructions, and re- "proofs; and that his inclination to Orders might be a temptation to his leaving the "magiſtracy, rather than a call of God to ſerve him in the miniſtry." Several of his friends did not fail to urge their objections; while others adviſed the proſecution of his deſign. The objections which were advanced he committed to writing in their full force; he ſtated them with care and minuteneſs, and examined them with attention. In the end, he removed them to his own ſatisfaction, and purſued his purpoſe accordingly, uninfluenced by any hope of advantage, and unawed by the cenſure of thoſe who might diſapprove.

'The occaſion of my troubling your Grace with 'this, may probably (after ſo many years of my life 'ſpent in ſecular ſervices) be ſomewhat ſurprizing, 'as well as unexpected: but it is to crave your ſen- 'timents and direction upon a propoſal, which though 'it ſhould not meet with encouragement, may hope 'at leaſt for pardon. I have for ſome time had my 'thoughts ſeriouſly bent towards entering into holy 'orders, if it be approved by thoſe to whom our 'common Lord has committed the care and authority 'of ſending labourers into his vineyard. 'Tis true 'I offer myſelf at the ſixth hour of the day (if not 'the eleventh, for GOD only knows how ſhort my life 'may be), but it is from a ſincere deſire of doing 'ſervice in that ſtation, if I am thought capable of 'it. I thank the Providence of God, I need not do 'it for bread; and his Grace that I don't deſire it 'for preferment: my only aim is to ſerve the great 'ends of Religion, the promoting piety and charity. 'If I can do any ſervice this way, I ſhall think my 'time, my ſtudies, and my labour, well employed; 'if I fail of ſucceſs, (which is only the gift of GOD, 'and depends upon his bleſſing), yet my ſincere 'endeavours will not fail of acceptance with him, to 'whom I devote myſelf and all that I have and am. 'I own myſelf unworthy of this high and holy calling 'in many particulars beſt known to GOD and myſelf: 'but I humbly hope there is nothing in my conduct 'that may prejudice the world againſt the endeavours 'I ſhall uſe to aſſiſt them. I muſt own I was brought 'up in a diſſenting academy, and never was a member 'of either of our Univerſities: but ſo ſoon as I came 'of age, I betook myſelf to the Church of England, 'and that upon principle and conviction, and upon 'the ſame I hope I ſhall always adhere to it. This 'therefore I preſume will hardly be an exception 'againſt me. As to my learning, I have nothing to 'ſay; but that I am unworthy enough upon that 'ſcore. However, this is to be tried by thoſe who 'may be authoriſed to examine me; and to ſuch an 'examination I intirely ſubmit; not at all deſiring 'orders, if I be judged inſufficient for them. Your 'Grace has known me ſome years, and is a better 'judge of me in all points (except ſincerity) than I 'can be of myſelf. I humbly beg your Grace's 'advice and opinion in this matter to,

'JOHN DISNEY.'

The Archbiſhop's anſwer, dated March 4, 1717, and addreſſed "For the much reſpected John Diſney, Eſq. "at his houſe in Lincoln," is verbatim as follows.

'Hon. Sir,

'I had the favour of your Letter, with the incloſed 'to Dr. Wilkins, which I ordered to be delivered to 'him. As to the good deſign you propoſe to me, I 'cannot think but that you muſt needs believe I 'ſhould readily approve of it. Indeed I do ſo; and 'that as I conceive upon the juſteſt grounds, as far as 'my knowledge of you enables me to judge of it. 'GOD has given you ſeveral very proper talents for 'doing good in the miniſtry: and that zeal which you 'have ſhewn, while a layman, for ſuppreſſing vice 'and immorality, and encouraging true piety, will 'appear with a better advantage when it comes from 'one who has a ſpecial commiſſion from Chriſt, and 'his Church, to that purpoſe. Your life, as far as 'ever I heard, has been unblameable; your learning 'I have no doubt of: your age is not ſo far advanced, 'but that you may hope to be many years uſeful in 'the ſervice of GOD; and no man, who goes the 'ſooneſt into Orders, can tell how ſhort a time he may 'have to execute the office he is thereby admitted 'unto. But one thing muſt be provided; a title to 'Holy Orders; which I ſhould be ſorry a perſon ſo 'well deſerving it, ſhould long want. I ſhall add no 'more but my hearty prayers to GOD, that he who 'has put this good deſign into your heart, would 'enable you to bring it to good effect, and then I am 'confident the church will have the benefit, and many 'ſouls become the more holy and happy by it.

'I am, Hon. Sir,

'Your very affectionate humble ſervant,

'W. CANT.'

The foregoing Letter of Archbiſhop Wake's is recited in teſtimony of his opinion of Mr. Diſney and his propoſal. And as the Archbiſhop did, as might be expected, approve of Mr. Diſney's tender of himſelf for the Miniſtry, it might ſeem ſtrange that he ſhould ſtart the neceſſity of a former canonical title; but ſuch remarks are foreign to the preſent purpoſe: and as far as the matter of the title was concerned, the Archbiſhop ſeems to have recollected himſelf in a ſhort time; for in a ſecond Letter, Dated March 11, 1717. (only 7 days after the former) he wrote to Mr. Diſney, in a ſomewhat leſs official manner.

'Hon. Sir,

'I have not yet had any opportunity of ſpeaking to 'the Biſhop of Lincoln concerning yourſelf, or your 'good deſign of entering into the ſervice of the Church. 'I hope to do it this day; and will then remember 'the caution you deſire him to obſerve in diſcourſing 'of it.

'It is certain your eſtate anſwers the end of the 'Canon, though it does not alone warrant the Biſhop 'to proceed upon it. But I hope all that little difficulty 'will eaſily be ſet to rights; to which I ſhall contri- 'bute my part with great ſatisfaction. I pray GOD to 'bring your good purpoſe to a happy concluſion, and 'to bleſs his own work, that you may have the ſatis- 'faction to ſee it proſper in your hands.

'I am, Hon. Sir

'Your very affectionate friend,

'W. CANT.'

ritance, after having ſpent many years in the ſervice of Religion, as a layman, in diſtributing juſtice and promoting virtue and good morals as a magiſtrate, and that, not only in his public character, but in his writings, engaging in the Miniſtry, when he had advanced ſo far into life as the forty-third year of his age, requires that ſome of his reaſons ſhould be more particularly recited in his own words.

In a letter to his father upon this occaſion, dated April 2, 1718, he writes: "I muſt "own, I think myſelf (and I believe you will be of the ſame opinion that I am) of "age ſufficient to be led by my own diſcretion to what ſtate or courſe of life I may "chuſe to ſpend the remainder of my days in; but as I am not forgetful of the duty "I owe to a parent, to whom, beſide all other kindneſſes, I owe that great one of "a religious education, it has been my purpoſe to acquaint you with what I intend, in "an affair of ſo great moment; and it will be an uneaſineſs to me, not to have your "approbation of it. I deſign ſhortly to take Orders; and for this reaſon would quit all "ſecular cares and employments, as much as may be, that I may the more freely and "cloſely devote myſelf to the ſervice of GOD and Religion that way. You know me "too well to believe, that I have any ſiniſter and unworthy ends in this; and I know "my own conduct therein ſo well, as to aſſure you it is no raſh fancy, but the reſult of much "deliberation, and many ſerious thoughts for a good while. I have taken all thoſe "methods by which a rational mind can propoſe to come to the knowledge of God's "will, and the obtaining his direction herein; and by the beſt judgment I can make, "it ſeems to me, that I am duly called by our common Lord and Maſter to enter his "more immediate ſervice in the Church. And this is a juſt ground of hope, that (how-"ever unworthy in myſelf) I may be deſigned by Providence for an inſtrument of "ſome good; and that therefore, Sir, you will be pleaſed to reflect upon this purpoſe "of mine with favourable ſentiments; and not be ſurpriſed, that ſince my endeavours "have been ineffectual, with the force of human laws and authority, for ſurpreſſing "vice, I ſhould ſtill purſue the ſame end, by devoting myſelf under a higher com-"miſſion, and by the ſanctions of a greater law, to promote Religion and Holineſs, as "a miniſter of Chriſt."

To theſe reaſons were added, among others (in the paper containing his anſwers to the objections made againſt his going into the miniſtry), "that the firſt thought of Or-"ders came regularly to him, and his deſign and view therein, both then, and ever "after, was good; even promoting the glory of God, the honor and practice of "Religion, and the good of ſouls; at the ſame time ſincerely proteſting in his own heart "againſt all ambitious, covetous, vain-glorious, or other ſecular ends and aims in it; and "that diſcovering his intention to ſeveral ſerious men of his acquaintance, they all ap-"proved of it (Diſſenters as well as others), except his father. The ſuitableneſs of this "calling to his temper and Genius, added ſome weight to his reaſons for entering into "it. He was weary of public buſineſs of a ſecular nature. He deſired and found "great occaſion for more privacy and retirement from the world, to attend more cloſely "the concerns of a world to come (which were of great importance to him), and to "improve himſelf in piety in the choice of ſuch a ſtate of life during the reſt of his "days as might be (not an idle and monaſtical retreat, but a courſe of diligence and "ſpiritual labour) for the improvement of others alſo.

"His purpoſe in exerciſing this calling, was to lay aſide, as much as might be, all "needleſs controverſies, which eat out the heart and ſubſtance of Religion, and to em-"ploy himſelf in inculcating (ſo far as God ſhould be pleaſed to give him judgment, "ability, and ſtrength), the moſt practical truths of religion, the terms of the Chriſtian "covenant, according to the Scriptures, piety towards GOD, true faith in Chriſt, "charity towards men, obedience to the government, and every other Chriſtian virtue. "The effect of all might, he hoped (by the bleſſing of God upon his ſincere intentions "and faithful endeavours), be the doing of ſome real good, as an inſtrument, how-"ever unworthy, in the hands of him from whom all ſucceſs muſt come to ſuch in-"tentions and endeavours. And the iſſue of it to himſelf would be, he hoped (through "the mercy of GOD), the reward of a good and faithful ſervant in the life to come."

Among theſe reaſons is not omitted, "the method he had taken to know the mind "and will of GOD in this matter: it was ſuch as all prudent and pious perſons muſt "allow to be the only proper way (without ſpecial revelations, which were not to be "expected) to diſcover it: 1. Conſtant and daily prayer to GOD for his direction. "2. Private faſting and prayer on ſome certain days [H]. 3. Reading ſuch books as "moſt

[H] Faſting and prayer on ſome certain days.] We ſhall here ſubjoin a prayer before he went into Orders (for GOD's direction as to his deſign therein).

'O Almighty GOD, our heavenly Father, who 'has purchaſed to thyſelf an univerſal Church by the 'precious blood of thy dear Son, mercifully look upon 'the ſame, and ſo guide and govern the minds of 'thy ſervants the Biſhops and Paſtors of thy flock, that 'they may lay hands ſuddenly on no man; but faith-'fully and wiſely make choice of fit perſons to ſerve 'thee in the ſacred Miniſtry of thy Church. And to 'thoſe which ſhall be ordained to any holy function, 'give thy grace and heavenly benediction, that both 'by

" moſt ſtrongly repreſented the difficulties and duties of the miniſterial office, that he " might ſee whether his mind would ſtartle at it, or change thereby. 4. Taking a con- " ſiderable time for all."

Upon this particular caſe of Mr. Diſney's, it may not be out of place to obſerve the great difference of weight which the ſame arguments and reaſons carry to different minds, to minds equally uninfluenced by intereſt, and unuſed to the trammels of prejudice or authority, and which examine freely and judge ultimately for themſelves. There are men who live in our own day, who, at the ſame age, with the ſame information, and after much diſpaſſionate examination by all the means which this good man uſed, have receded from their miniſtry in our national Church. How much ſoever they wiſhed to miniſter in ſpiritual things, and however faithfully and zealouſly they diſcharged their ſtewardſhip, while they exerciſed it in the Church of England, they have found themſelves driven hence by the oppoſing ſtipulations of an human eſtabliſhment. While others again, though they cannot perſuade themſelves to ſecede, yet cannot adventure to repeat their required engagement. Theſe objections, which have heretofore and do now prevail with many who are, or lately were, miniſters of the Church of England, did not exiſt in Mr. Diſney's mind; nor were they indeed among thoſe objections which were offered by his father, a circumſtance which it is but juſtice to his memory to mention. The ſufficiency of his call, the purity of his motives in the deſign, and the propriety and uſefulneſs of his entering into the miniſtry, for his own ſake, and the ſake of others, ſeem to have been his principal conſiderations, and, ſatisfied in theſe, he rightly determined for himſelf.

On Sunday, March 15, 1719, he was ordained Deacon, in Somerſet-houſe chapel, and, on the 20th of September following, Prieſt, in St. Peter's church, in Cornhill, by Dr. Edmund Gibſon, then Biſhop of Lincoln. Soon afterwards he was preſented to the vicarage of Croft, and, on November the 25th, in the ſame year (1719), was inſtituted to the rectory of Kirkby-ſuper-Baine, both in Lincolnſhire. He was alſo appointed one of the Chaplains of James Lord Viſcount (afterwards Earl of) Caſtleton. He continued in poſſeſſion of theſe cures ſcarcely three years, being inſtituted to the vicarage of St. Mary's in Nottingham, October 2, 1722, on the preſentation of the Duke of Kingſton.

He removed to Nottingham, on his inſtitution to St. Mary's Church in that town, and lived there till the time of his death. His degree of Maſter of Arts he received from the univerſity of Cambridge. He was previouſly admitted (Nov. 29, 1720,) as fellow-

' by their life and doctrine they may ſet forth thy ' Glory, and ſet forward the Salvation of all men, ' through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. Amen.

' Moſt Glorious, infinite, eternal, inviſible Majeſty ' of Heaven and Earth, who haſt created all things, ' and for whoſe ſervice and glory they are and were ' created; I acknowledge that from thy Almighty ' power I received my being and life; from thy merciful ' bounty, all the parts, capacities, and endowments ' of my mind; whatever ſerious ſenſe of religion ' is in me, whatever virtue and goodneſs, whatever ' care to obey thee, whatever fervent and ſincere ' deſires I have to ſerve and glorify thee in this world ' and to obtain thy mercy in the next, is firſt and laſt, ' in all degrees and inſtances, the effect and powerfull ' working of thy grace. I have nothing, and am ' nothing of myſelf, but vile duſt and ſin. But as the ' end of all thy benefits vouchſafed to me, all the ' gifts thou haſt beſtowed upon me, is that I ſhould ' uſe them to thy glory and the good of others; as ' thou haſt in ſome meaſure been pleaſed to qualify ' me for thy ſervice; and as thou haſt wrought in me ' a ſincere and ſerious deſire to ſerve thee: I do now ' moſt humbly caſt myſelf at thy feet, with faſting and ' prayer moſt earneſtly and fervently beſeeching the ' direction of thy holy ſpirit in what way or pro- ' feſſion and calling of life thou wouldſt have me to ' glorify thee. Thy will, O Lord, (not mine) be ' done. I am thy Creature, entirely at thy diſpoſal, ' and beg that thou wouldſt diſpoſe of me as may be ' moſt to thy glory, to which I deſire to conſecrate ' myſelf, and all that I have and am.

' It is my thoughts and deſires to ſerve thee in the ' ſacred miniſtry of thy church, if thou ſhalt be pleaſed ' by the inward influences of thy Spirit, and the out- ' ward authority of thoſe to whom thou haſt committed ' the care of ſending labourers into thy vineyard, to ' approve of thoſe thoughts and deſires. I acknow- ' ledge, O Lord, and I deſire to do it with the deepeſt ' humility, that I am far from being worthy to ſerve ' thee in that high and holy calling. My ſinfulneſs ' is great, my imperfections numerous; but thy mercy ' in Chriſt Jeſus is above all theſe. And however un- ' worthy I am in myſelf, thy goodneſs will for Chriſt's ' ſake pardon me upon true repentance; thy grace ' can powerfully improve me in bleſſing my ſincere ' endeavours; thy mercy will accept the integrity of ' my heart; thy wiſdom can direct my judgment, thy ' holy Spirit give ſucceſs to my labours, and abun- ' dantly make up for my defects and weakneſs; as thy ' infinite bounty will reward my faithfulneſs.

' I do therefore, O Lord, with the moſt earneſt de- ' ſires this dull heart of mine is capable of, beſeech ' thee to ſhew what thou wouldſt have me to do. If ' my ſervice in the miniſtry be not acceptable to thee, ' be pleaſed, for Chriſt's ſake, ſome way or other to ' diſcover it to me; that I may not dare to ruſh into ' that ſacred office without the calling and authority of ' thy holy Spirit. If, on the other hand, it be accep- ' table to thee, be pleaſed to confirm and ſtrengthen ' my reſolutions to enter into it; remove all obſtruc- ' tions thereto; ſo diſpoſe the hearts of the ſpiritual ' governours of thy church, that I may be accepted to ' ordination by them; prepare and qualify me by the ' powerful illuminations and ſanctification of thy holy ' Spirit for the prudent and faithful, courageous, zea- ' lous, and ſincere diſcharge of my duty in that diffi- ' cult and important calling; and remove far from me ' all ſecular unworthy ends, all vain-glorious, covetous, ' or ambitious proſpects therefrom; and ſo thoroughly ' purify my intentions, that (free from all allowance ' of any corrupt mixtures whatſoever) I may (as I ' hope I do, and deſire more perfectly to do,) ſincerely, ' ſolely, and entirely, aim at thy glory, and the good ' of ſouls therein. All which I moſt humbly beg in ' his name and for his ſake who is the great Paſtor and ' Biſhop of ſouls, the ſupreme Head of thy Church; ' the Mediator of the New Teſtament, and thy be- ' loved Son, in whom thou art well pleaſed, and whom ' thou heareſt always, our Lord and Saviour Jeſus ' Chriſt. Amen.'

commoner of Magdalen College, of which ſociety his eldeſt ſon was at that time a member alſo, and was preſented to his degree, through the privileges allowed to certain deſcents from the Peerage.

The duties of his miniſtry, in a large and very populous pariſh, were his principal engagements; perſevering, at the ſame time, in his reſearches into ancient learning, with the laudable intention of deducing from the knowledge of the practice of antient times, a complete code of juriſprudence for the regulation of the morals of his own day. The publication of his "View of ancient Laws," in 1729, plainly indicates that a part, at leaſt, of the labours of his latter days had an uniform retroſpect to all that had been before ſaid and done by him upon his favourite ſubject. He had alſo brought into great forwardneſs for the preſs his digeſt and fair tranſcript of his "Collections and Remarks "upon the Laws of Great Britain, Ireland, and the Plantations," and was actually employed in that work when his laſt illneſs ſeized him, and until it removed him to the chambers of the dead.

His attainments in ſacred literature, and the living languages, were no leſs eminent, than his general acquaintance with all profane learning. His ſermons were much admired, and his delivery from the pulpit was nervous, manly, and harmonious. He poſſeſſed a graceful perſon, and a good ſpeech. He was frequently chearful in company, but generally preſerved a ſerious and devout temper of mind.

For ſome years before his death he had laboured under ſome of thoſe chronic diſorders incident to perſons of ſedentary lives. His bodily conſtitution had gradually ſunk under his ſevere application to his ſtudies, and his indefatigable attentions in the courſe of his miniſtry; but the powers of his mind preſerved their vigour to the laſt hour of his life. Under the lingering, but eaſy and flattering advances of an acquired conſumption, his diſorder gained ſo much ſtrength as to baffle the powers of medicine; and thus a life of the ſtricteſt temperance in regard to diet and pleaſure, was ſacrificed to mental exertions in the cauſe of Religion and Virtue. He died at his vicarage houſe in Nottingham, on the 3d day of February, 1729-30, in the 53d year of his age; and was buried, according to his own requeſt, in the chancel of his church, near to the communion-table, having no other inſcription over his grave than the initial letters of his name, and the year of his death. He left a widow, who afterwards lived at her own family-ſeat, Flintham-hall, in Nottinghamſhire, and died there May 20th, 1763, in the 86th year of her age, by whom he had five ſons and three daughters [I].

He was a zealous advocate for, and a great friend to, the Religious Societies (particularly that for the Reformation of Manners), then in their infancy; and if they had been uniformly conducted, as they ought to have been, upon thoſe pure principles and in that good ſpirit with which they ſet out, they would have deſerved the patronage and ſupport of every good Chriſtian and every good Citizen. His "Remarks" upon the very groſs and illiberal language of Sacheverell againſt theſe Societies, in his ſermon at Derby, are written in a temper that ſhould have done more than ſoftened the choler of the intemperate accuſer; but it is ſeldom to be expected that good manners will purchaſe the like return from the paſſionate untractable bigot to a party, or that fair argument will convert him from the error of his ways.

Mr. Diſney's temper was naturally warm and impatient; but he was formed by nature alſo with a generous and forgiving mind. And his warmth and impatience were under the government of his Reaſon, as their proper ſuperior. His principles of Religion were what are vulgarly ſtyled orthodox in regard to points of doctrine and articles of faith: in reſpect to the principles of others, they were truly catholic. It was in the true ſpirit of Chriſtianity, and under the good diſpoſition of his own mind, happily brought to approximate thereto, that he had remarked that "the ſubſtance of Religion "which GOD chiefly inſiſts upon, is rather the zeal of a good life, than of an orthodox "profeſſion." See his "Eſſay on Execution of Laws," ſecond edit. p. 167.

Mr. Diſney's correſpondence with ſome perſons of high name for literature in his age does honour to both parties. His own learning was acknowledged, and the great work which he had deſigned to have publiſhed, under the title of "Corpus Legum de Moribus Reformandis," was greatly approved by ſeveral judicious and learned men, and forwarded by their ready anſwers to queries propoſed to them by the writer, as occaſion ſuggeſted them, and not unfrequently by their voluntary contributions [K]. His own library contained a very extenſive and valuable collection of books in all languages; but he ſpared not journies to the public libraries in London, and both of our Univerſities, for the conſultation of ſuch ſcarce books, and ſome manuſcripts, which were no where elſe to be met with. His manuſcripts are preſerved in his family, and his exactneſs and preciſion in their arrangement, and the fairneſs of their tranſcript, are peculiar to himſelf.

The works which our author publiſhed will abundantly juſtify all that has been ſaid of his abilities, his piety, his learning, and his induſtry; and an account of them is ſubjoined in teſtimony thereof. A liſt of ſuch of his manuſcripts as are preſerved from the depredations which time and chance too frequently make upon ſuch reſcripts, is given with the ſame view, and as a farther gratification of a laudable curioſity for a perfect acquaintance with the works of the learned and the good.

A Catalogue of Mr. Diſney's Works, in the order of their publication.

1. "Primitiæ Sacræ, the Reflections of a devout Solitude, conſiſting of Meditations "and Poems on divine Subjects." By John Diſney, Eſq. London, 1701 and 1703, 8vo."

2. "Flora." In Admiration of the Gardens of Rapin, and the Tranſlation of Mr. Gardiner, written 1705. Prefixed to Subdean Gardiner's Tranſlation of "Rapin of Gardens;" the third edition of which was publiſhed 1728, 8vo.

3. "An Eſſay upon the Execution of the Laws againſt Immorality and Profaneneſs. "By John Diſney, Eſq. With a Preface, addreſſed to her Majeſty's Juſtices of the Peace." London, 1708 and 1710, 8vo. His portrait is prefixed to ſeveral copies on large paper.

4. "A Second Eſſay upon the Execution of the Laws againſt Immorality and Pro- "faneneſs. Wherein the Caſe of giving Informations to the Magiſtrate is conſidered, "and Objections againſt it anſwered. By John Diſney, Eſq. With a Preface addreſſed "to Grand Juries, Conſtables, and Churchwardens." London, 1710, 8vo. N. B. The preface to this ſecond Eſſay was afterwards printed in a ſmall ſize, by itſelf, in order to diſtribute it among thoſe whom it more particularly concerned.

5. "Remarks upon a Sermon preached by Dr. Henry Sacheverell, at the Aſſizes "held at Derby, Aug. 15, 1709. In a Letter to himſelf. Containing a juſt and mo- "deſt Defence of the Societies for Reformation of Manners, againſt the Aſperſions caſt "upon them in that Sermon." London, 1711, 8vo.

6. Propoſals for the Publication of his great Work, entituled, "Corpus Legum de "Moribus Reformandis." Dated, Lincoln, 1713. A ſingle ſheet, and republiſhed in "the View of Ancient Laws."

7. "The Genealogy of the moſt ſerene and moſt illuſtrious Houſe of Brunſwick Lu- "nenburgh, the preſent Royal Family of Great Britain, drawn up from the beſt hiſ- "torical and genealogical Writers. By John Diſney, Eſq. A. D. 1714." Dedicated to his Majeſty King George I. and engraved by J. Sturt, on two ſheets of Imperial paper. N. B. A miſtake in this Genealogical Table is corrected in the "Acta Regia," 8vo, 1716. vol. I. p. 102. Rymer ſays, that "Albert Great Duke of Brunſwick mar- "ried Adelhard daughter to Henry the Magnanimous Duke of Brabant; whereas Mr. Diſ- "ney makes Adelhard daughter of the Marquis of Montſerrat."

8. "A Sermon, preached in the pariſh church of St. Botolph's, Aldgate, London, on "Sunday, Nov. 22, 1719. By John Diſney, Rector of Kirby-ſuper-Baine, Lincoln- "ſhire." London, 1720. 8vo.

[K] And not unfrequently by their voluntary contributions.] Biſhop Gibſon was conſulted by him as a Canoniſt and Civilian; and Dr. Nicolſon, Archbiſhop of Caſhell, readily gave our Author ſuch information relative to the laws of Ireland, as could only be had from one reſident in the country; as did Mr. Dundas, of Philipſtone, in Scotland, in reſpect to the laws of that kingdom. Dr. Colbatch, Profeſſor of Caſuiſtry, in Cambridge, Fellow of Trinity College, Prebendary of Sarum (of whom ſee "Whiſton's Memoirs," vol. I. p. 356. and alſo "The Confeſſional," 3d edit. p. 102. note (t), writes to Mr. Chamberlyne (a friend of Mr. Diſney's), in a letter, dated Cambridge, Nov. 26, 1713, "I "ſhould think myſelf happy, could I do any thing "towards promoting your friend's deſign; than "which, if it be well executed, I know of none that "can contribute more to the general good of man- "kind. And ſo far as one can judge by his propo- "ſals and letter, the gentleman ſeems to be excellently "well qualified for it. His Latin, in particular, is "like to be a great ornament to his work, if he can "hold on in the ſame ſtyle as he has begun in his Pro- "poſals." After mentioning ſome authors, which he thought might be of uſe to the work in hand, and of forming them to Mr. Diſney's ſervice, he concludes with theſe words: "Pray, Sir, excuſe all theſe impertinencies, which I have been inſenſibly led to by a "ſtrong inclination to ſerve either you or your friend; "and a hearty deſire to ſee ſo great and good a deſign, "as I take Mr. Diſney's to be, go forward." Dr. Daniel Wilkins, author of "Leges Anglo-Saxonicæ," printed in folio, 1721, whom Mr. Diſney uſed to conſult in all difficult queſtions in Saxon literature and antiquity, concludes a letter to him, dated Oxford, Jan. 7, 1716-17, with theſe friendly offers: "As ſoon "as I can get a leiſure hour, I will copy the plan of "my Saxon laws for you; mean while, I deſire you "to exerciſe my little capacity in whatever you think "it can be ſerviceable to you. I can promiſe a hearty "and ready inclination, which, if it does not anſwer "your deſires entirely, you will pleaſe to accept for "the deed." In another letter, dated Chriſt-Church, Canterbury, Feb. 11, 1725-6, Dr. Wilkins writes: "I "am very glad you reſume your book of the Laws "againſt immorality. Whatever aſſiſtance lies in the "compaſs of my power, you may command freely." When he had occaſion for ſatisfaction on ſome queries upon what was gathered from the Koran, he was obliged by the aſſiſtance of the Rev. Simon Ockley, Profeſſor of Arabic in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and Fellow of Queen's College in that Univerſity.
